TO THE QVEENES MOST EXCELLENT MAIESTIE, OVR MOST REDOVBTED, MOST HAPPIE, AND TRVE SOVERAIGNE LADIE ELIZABETH, by the grace of God, Queene of England, France and Ireland, principall defender of the faith, and next vnder God, the onely, absolute, and full supreme head ouer all causes Ecclesiasticall and temporall through her Maiesties Dominions:

Geffray Fenton prayeth a perpetuall increasing of the spirit of Gods holy feare, and a continuall going on and confirmation of that godly course, wherein with so long peace and happinesse, her Maiestie hath gouerned the subiects and peoples of her Realmes and seuerall iurisdictions.

IT is not without reason nor contrary to example, that I presume to offer vp to the peculiar and graue view of your Maiestie, these my compositions and labours: for that the generall argument being historicall, a doctrine wherein your Maiestie farre aboue all other Princes, hath a most singular insight and iudgement; and the particular parts containing discourse of State and Gouernment, in which God hath expressed in the person of your Maiestie a most rare & diuine example to all other Kings of the earth, for matter of policie and sound administration: All law of reason, of equitie, and of other impression whatsoeuer, do challenge to appropriate the addresse and iustification of this worke to your Maiestie onely, in whom, for your inspired science and spirit to iudge of Monuments and euents of times, and for the felicitie of your gouernment in seasons so perillous and conspiring, all Kings, and kingdomes, and nations round about you, rise vp to reuerence in your forme of gouerning, that propertie of wisedome and vertue, which it seemes God hath restrained to your Maiestie onely, without participation to any of them. And in that regard they hold you that sacred and fixed Starre, whose light God will not haue put out, though the deuices of men on all sides, are busie to draw clouds and darke veiles to obscure it.

I am also encouraged to make this oblation to your Maiestie, by the example of many notable Writers, both of the primitiue times and in all ages and posterities ſucceeding, ſuch as for the grauitie and fidelitie of their pen and ſtyle, were cheriſhed by the greateſt Princes of thoſe daies, and vnder the authoritie and countenance of their names, their workes were with reputation and credit inſinuated into many peoples, nations, and regiments: the ſame being an effect due to the vertue and pietie of great Princes, for that as it is God that giueth wiſedome and ſcience to men, ſo it is authoritie that chieflie ſheweth it to the world, euen as the earth nouriſheth the roote of a tree, but the comfortable Sunne doth much to bring foorth the bloſſomes. So many are the teſtimonies and examples of this, and ſo familiar with your Maieſtie is the doctrine of Hiſtories and information of times, that by ſo much leſſe need I to ſtand vpon authorities of antiquitie, or declarations relatiue, by how much more is knowne to be happily laid vp in your Maieſties breaſt, and effectually expreſſed in the forme of your gouernment and reigne, all that which learning and bookes can ſet downe by rule and precept, your Maieſtie being the onely conſecrated Lampe from whom all other dominions about you do draw their light, or rather that terreſtriall Sunne, vpon whoſe influence God hath appointed to depend the motions of all the Regions and Climats of the whole Common-weale of Chriſtendome: A calling and authoritie which all other Potentates do honour in you, with ſo much the more merite and reuerence, by how much amidſt ſo many occaſions and opportunities to ambition, they proue your equitie, pietie, and moderation of mind, to exceede all examples of former Princes and times, and farre to ſurmount all humane expectation: for that hauing as it were a ſoueraigne power ouer them and theirs, you do notwithſtanding diſpoſe of things according to the law of meaſure and right. In regard of which diuine properties, accompanied with your Maieſties other vertues which God hath made infinite in you, and your felicitie which is the reward and effect of the ſame, I may with good comelineſſe reſemble the gracious reigne of your Maieſtie touching theſe regions of Chriſtendome, to the happie time and daies of Cæſar Auguſtus Emperour of Rome: who, after a long and generall combuſtion and harrying of the whole world with blood and warres, did ſo reforme and reduce the regions confining his Empire, that with the Scepter and ſeate of peace he much more preuailed, then euer he could haue done with the ſword: by his clemencie he brought to ſubmiſſion his neighbours that ſtood out againſt him, and by his conſtancie held them aſſured being once reconciled: his wiſedome ſeemed an Oracle to the Nations about him to diſpoſe of their counſels and ſway their enterpriſes. And touching quarrels and controuerſies of State, either for his grauitie and iuſtice, the onely arbitration and reſolution was referred to him, or at leaſt for the awe that was had of him, the factions durſt not burſt out to further limits then he liked of. Laſtly, it was an approued Monarchie of God, for that Chriſt the Sonne of God amidſt ſuch an vniuerſall malice of man & mankind, was contented to ſhew himſelfe in the daies of his reigne. Euen ſo though the ſingular perſons be changed, yet the effects and bleſſings of this time do nothing

vary vnder the happie rule of your Maieſtie, whom God hath raiſed and eſtabliſhed a ſoueraigne Empreſſe ouer ſeuerall Nations and languages, and with the fruits of a firme and continued peace hath plentifully enriched the peoples of your Dominions, reſtored Religion and the Church of Chriſt to dwell anew amongſt vs, made your authoritie awfull to all your neighbours & borderers: & laſtly hath erected your ſeate vpon a high hill or ſanctuary, and put into your hands the ballance of power and iuſtice, to poiſe and counterpoiſe at your will the actions and counſels of all the Chriſtian kingdomes of your time: wherein ſure according to the courſe your Maieſtie holdeth, much leſſe that either for the preſent or in poſterities to come, can be iuſtly obiected any matter of imputation againſt you, ſeeing on the contrarie, moſt of them that be wiſe and true obſeruers of your dealings, do daily confeſſe and publiſh, that in your Maieſtie hath bene orderly fulfilled all lawes and offices of a deuout Neutralitie. For that like as amidſt their heauie afflictions wherein ſucceſſiuely hath bene offered you no ſmall cauſes of ambition, your Maieſtie hath neuer ſtopped or cut from them the refuge of your amitie and mercie: So neuertheleſſe your compaſſion hath principally reſpected the equitie of the complaints of ſuch as implored it, eſteeming it not agreeable to the law of vertue and account of your conſcience, to make your profit vpon the diuiſions of your neighbours, though there haue not wanted reaſons and titles to induce your deſire.

I forbeare to make declaration to your Maieſtie of the life and learning of the firſt Author of this booke; a matter teſtified with ſufficient credit and reputation in the high negociations and emploiments which he managed long time vnder great Princes, Popes, and Common-weales: and I am bold (contrarie to the cuſtome of Writers) to leaue to particulate in my Epiſtle any part of the argument which with ſo great grauitie he hath digeſted at large in ſo great a volume: Onely the man for his integritie and ſoundneſſe was ſuch a one, as whoſe vertues were farre from all ſuſpition of partialitie, fauour, hatred, loue, reward, or any other propertie of humane affection, which might haue force to corrupt or turne from the truth the mind of a Writer. And for the generall matter of his worke, it doth not onely containe the warres and diuerſe accidents hapned in Italie and other parts for almoſt fortie yeares, but alſo he doth ſo diſtinctly ſet downe the cauſes, the counſels, and the fortunes of euery principall partie introduced into thoſe actions, that by his ſtudie and iudgement, is traced and made eaſie to the Reader, the way to all thoſe ſweete and plentifull fruites, which with painfulneſſe are ſought for in Hiſtories of this nature.

And for mine owne part, where in all my dedications heretofore, not my will, which was alwaies warranted by the gracious demonſtrations of your Maieſtie; but my manner of life, inſtituted vpon priuate cuſtomes and exerciſes, hath holden me from approching the authoritie of this place, afore which nothing ought to be preſented which hath not a full perfection of ſpirit and ſtudie: yet now, taking my reaſon of the worthineſſe of the worke, and obſeruing the examples and inducements of others in like oblations, I am bold vnder feare and hu-militie to proſtrate theſe my laſt paines afore that diuine moderation of mind, which alwaies hath holden for acceptable all things reſpecting learning or vertuous labours: humbly beſeeching your right excellent Maieſtie, that where the worke is now to appeare in the open view of the world, and ſtand before the vncertaine iudgements of ſo many ſundry and ſtrange humors of men, you will vouchſafe to let it paſſe vnder the happie name of your Maieſtie, and vnder your gracious authoritie to giue it defence and fauour againſt the emulation of ſuch as either through malice or ignorance may riſe vp to interprete me and my labours ſiniſterly. The Lord bleſſe your Maieſtie with a long and peaceable life, and confirme in you to the comfort of your people, that courſe of well tempered gouernment, by the benefite whereof they haue ſo long time liued vnder the felicitie of your name. THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE historie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

The Argvment.

Lodowike Sforce vncle and tutor to Iohn Galeas Duke of Millan, fearing leſt Ferdinand King of Naples would make warre vpon him, breaketh off from the league that had bene renewed betweene the ſaid Ferdinand, Iohn Galeas, and the Commonweale of Florence, againſt the Venetians. He procureth the French king Charles the viij. to paſſe into Italie to conquer the kingdome of Naples. Pope Alexander the ſixt alieth himſelfe with the King of Naples. The French King hauing ordered the affaires of the kingdome, deſcendeth into Italie, where he taketh many townes. Diuerſe emotions happen in the kingdome of Naples. The Pope is in great perplexitie and trauell. Piſa rebelleth againſt the Florentins. The French king entreth into Florence and Rome, and frō thence paſſeth to Naples.

HAuing in hand to write the affaires and fortunes of Italy, I iudged it conuenient to draw into diſcourſe, thoſe particularities that moſt neareſt reſemble our time and memorie, yea euen ſince the ſelfe Princes of that country calling in the armies of Fraunce, gaue the firſt beginning to ſo great innouations; a matter, for the variety, greatneſſe, & nature of ſuch things, verie notable, and well worthie of memorie: and for the heauie accidents, hatefull, bloudy, and horrible: for that Italy for manie yeares was trauelled with all thoſe ſorts of calamities, with the which mortall men are wont to be afflicted, aſwell by the iuſt wrath and hand of God, as through the impiety and wickednes of other nations. The knowledge of theſe things ſo great and diuerſe, may miniſter many wholſome inſtructions, aſwell to all men generally, as to euery one in particular. For by the triall, conſent and demonſtration of ſo many examples, all men may ſee to what inconſtancie (as a ſea driuen with diuerſe winds) humaine things are expoſed, and how harmefull are the ill meaſured counſels of Princes, many times to themſelues, but alwaies to their people and ſubiects, ſpecially when they are vainely caried away, either with their ſingular errours or priuate couetouſneſſe, without remembrance of the ordinarie changes of fortune; whereby turning to the domage of others, the power which is giuen them for the common good, they make themſelues, either by want of diſcretion, or too much ambition, authors of innouations and new troubles.

Intention of the Author.

The Italians cauſers of their owne calamities.

How harmfull be the errors of Princes.

But the better to make knowne the ſtate and condition of Italy at that time, together with the occaſions of ſo many afflictions hapning, it is to be conſidered, that their calamities began with ſo much the more diſpleaſure & aſtoniſhment in mens minds, by how much the vniuerſall eſtate of things ſtood both quiet, pleaſant and happie. For, it is euident that ſince the Romaine Empire (weakned chiefly by the change of ancient manners and cuſtomes) began a thouſand yeares afore to decline from that greatneſſe wherunto it was raiſed by a wonderful vertue and fortune, the Principalities of Italy had not taſted of ſo great and generall proſperitie, nor reioyced in a condition ſo happie, plauſible and well gouerned, as was that whereon it was with great ſurety repoſed the yeare of grace 1490, and ſome yeares afore and after: for that being on all ſides reduced into peace and tranquillitie, the hils and barren places tilled & made no leſſe fruitfull then the valleys and regions moſt fertill, & being ſubiect to no other Lords or Rulers then their own, it was not onely plentifully repleniſhed with people, & riches, but alſo greatly honored with the magnificence and maieſtie of many Princes, goodly aſpect of ſundrie right ſtately Cities, and with the ſeate and reſidencie of the throne of Religion: it floriſhed in men rare and excellent in adminiſtration of Commonweales, and infinite in good wits, ſeene and ſtudied in all ſciences and and artes of excellencie and induſtrie: laſtly, bearing alſo no ſmall praiſe and glorie for the ſeruice in war, according to the vſe & diſcipline of that time, it reteined iuſtly (by theſe gifts & bleſſings) a peculiar merite & reputation amongſt all other nations. This felicity being gotten with diuerſe occaſions, there were many things to entertaine & preſerue it, and amongſt others, common voyce & conſent gaue no ſmall praiſe and deſeruing to the induſtrie & vertue of Laurence de Medicis a citizen of Florence, in whom was expreſſed ſuch an excellencie of ſpirit & authoritie aboue the other citizens of that regiment, that vpon his counſell was repoſed the gouernment of the affaires of that Commonweale, which was at that time more mightie for the oportunity of ſituation, for the excellent wits and inuentions of men, and for the readie meanes of money, then for greatneſſe and circuite of Lordſhip or dominion: and by reaſon he was lately ioyned by parentage with Pope Innocent the viij. whom he had brought to repoſe almoſt an abſolute faith and credite in his counſels, his name was great through all Italy, and his authority mightie in the deliberation of common affaires. He knew wel that it would be a thing preiudiciall to the Commonweale of Florence, and no leſſe hurtfull to himſelfe, if any of the great Potentates of that nation ſtretched out further their power; and therefore he employed all his deuices, meanes, and directions, that the things of Italy ſhould be ſo euenly ballanced, that they ſhould not weigh more on the one ſide then on the other; a thing which he could not make to ſucceed without the preſeruation of peace, and a perpetuall care, diligence, and watching ouer all accidents, yea euen to the leaſt, baſeſt, and moſt inferiour.

In the ſame inclination to cõmon tranquility, was alſo concurrant Ferdinand of Aragon king of Naples, a Prince for his counſels deliberate, in his actions reſolute, and touching his affections verie moderate, notwithſtanding oftentimes before, he had ſhewed many ambitious thoughts, and farre off from counſell to peace; wherein he was much gouerned in that time by Alphonſo Duke of Calabria, his eldeſt ſonne, who vnwillingly ſuffered that Iohn Galeas Sforce his ſonne in law Duke of Millan, more then twentie yeares of age, but of a iudgement very incapable, and vnapt to great affaires, and retaining onely the name of Duke, ſhould be ſuppreſſed, & as it were kept ſmothered by Lodowike Sforce his vncle, who more then ten yeares afore, by the ignorance and vnchaſt life of Madame Bonne, mother to the ſaid Galeas, was ſeized vpon his minoritie, and by that meanes, had reduced by litle and litle into his power the ſtrong holds, men of warre, tributes and treaſures, and all other the grounds & foundations of the ſtate of Millan, perſeuering in the gouernment, not as a tutor and regent, but (except the onely title of Duke) with all demonſtrations and actions of an abſolute Prince. Ferdinand, with whom was more familiar the impreſſion of preſent vtilitie, then his ancient inclination, or the indignation of his ſonne (how iuſt ſoeuer it were) deſired that nothing ſhould be innouated in Italy, nor the preſent policie fall into alteration: perhaps he had regard to the experience of the yeares before, wherein (to his great danger) he had proued the hate of his Barons and vniuerſall ſubiects: and haplie he had not forgotten (by the memory of things paſt) what affection a great part of his people bore to the name of the houſe of France: which iuſt and wiſe coniectures drew him to ſuſpect leſt the diſcords of Italy might breed occaſion to the French to inuade the Kingdome of Naples: or perhaps, to make a counterſtrength againſt the might of the Venetians (at that time redowted throughout all Italie) he iudged it neceſſarie to allie himſelfe with others, and chiefly with the eſtates of Millan & Florence. Touching Lodowicke Sforce, notwithſtanding he was poſſeſſed with a mind trauelling, buſie, & ambitious, yet by the neceſſity of his condition, he was driuen to embrace the inclination and purpoſe to peace, aſwell for that they which commanded at Millan were no leſſe threatned then others', with the danger which the reſidue feared, touching the greatneſſe of Venice: as alſo for that it was more eaſie for him by the benefite of tranquillitie and peace, to keepe the authoritie he had vſurped, then by the trauels and troubles of warre. And albeit he kept a continuall dread, iealouſie and ſuſpition ouer the thoughts and deuices of Ferdinand and Alphonſo, yet weighing with the diſpoſition of Laurence de Medicis to peace, the iealouſie he had likewiſe of their greatneſſe, and perſwading himſelfe alſo that for the diuerſitie of affections and ancient hatreds betweene Ferdinand and the Venetians, it was a thing vaine to feare that betweene them ſhould be contracted anie amitie firme and well aſſured: he held for certaine that they of Aragon ſhould not be aſſiſted by others to enterpriſe againſt him that, which alone and of their owne power they were not able to obtaine.

What reaſons reſtrained the ambition of Lod. Sforce.

Thus Ferdinand, Lodowike and Laurence, hauing one equall will and deuotion to peace, partly

ly for the perſwaſions aforeſaid, and ſomewhat for other inducements and conſiderations: the league & confederation contracted in the name of Ferdinand king of Naples, John Galeas Duke of Millan, and the Commonweale of Florence, for the defence of their eſtates, was eaſily continued: it was begun manie yeares before, and afterward broken by many accidents, and now eſſoones renewed in the yeare 1480. for xxv. yeares, being competitors and parties therein almoſt all the meaner Potentates of Italy, in whom was any principall end and purpoſe not to ſuffer the Venetians to become great. The Venetians (for their parts) being in deed more mightie then any particular of the Confederates, but farre leſſe and inferior to them altogether, held their councels ſeparate from the common councell of the league, and watching to rayſe and increaſe their Eſtate by the diſcord & trauels of others, they had a continuall prepzration and readineſſe to take the opportunitie of all occurrences which might open vnto them the way to the Empire and Monarchie of all Italy; whereunto it was clearely ſeene that they did aſpire in diuers ſeaſons, but chiefly when abuſing the occaſion of the death of Philip Maria Viſcount Duke of Millan, they attempted vnder colour to defend the libertie of the people of Millan, to make themſelues Lords of that State; conſpiring in like ſort (but of later memory) to bring the Duchie of Ferrara by way of open warre, to their ſeruitude and ſubiection.

A league for 25. yeares betweene the king of Naples, Duke of Millan, and the Commonweale of Florence.

The ambition of the Venetians: and what occaſion they ſought to offend the Confederates.

This confederation did eaſily bridle the couetouſnes of the Senate of Venice; but it could not entirely knit the Confederates in a true and faithfull amitie, for that being indifferently repleniſhed with enuie and iealouſie, they ceaſſed not to keep a continuall care, obſeruation, and eye ouer the thoughts and behauiours of one another, breaking mutually all the reſolutions and plots whereby might come to any one of them enlargement of eſtate or reputation. A thing which made not the peace leſſe ſtable, but reuiued in them all a generall readineſſe to be carefull to quench all ſuch ſparkes as might be the cauſe of new fires.

Such was the eſtate of the affaires, ſuch were the foundations of the tranquillitie of Italy, diſpoſed and counterpeiſed in ſuch ſort, that much leſſe that there was any doubt of preſent mutation, ſeeing the wiſedome of man could not eaſily make coniecture, by what counſels, by what accidents, or with what armies, ſo great a tranquillitie could be troubled; when in the moneth of Aprill 1492. chanced the death of Laurence de Medicis, a death very pitifull for him in reſpect of his age (hauing not yet attained fortie foure yeares) but more bitter and intollerable to his countrey, which, for the wiſedome and reputation of the man, together with the naturall volubility of his wit, raiſed to all things concerning honor and greatnes, flouriſhed plentifully with riches, loue, and ciuilitie, and with all other benefits and felicities, which in the affayres of the world are wont to accompany a long concord and peace. This death hapned alſo very ill for the reſidue of Italy, as well for his generall deuices, cares, and actions for the common ſuretie, as alſo for that he was a meane in particular to moderate and bridle the differences and ſuſpitions, which for diuerſe occaſions, were often kindled betweene Ferdinand and Lodowike Sforce, Princes equall in ambition, and nothing inferiour in power. A few moneths after the death of Laurence (the time preparing euery day occaſions to the calamities to come) chanced the death of the Pope, whoſe life being in other things vnprofitable to the Commonweale, was at the leaſt conuenient in this, that hauing ſodainly left off the warre vnhappily rayſed in the entry and beginning of his Popedome againſt Ferdinand, at the incenſing of many Barons of the realme of Naples, he turned ſoone after all his thoughts and affections to vaine and idle pleaſures, not acquainting his minde (neither for himſelfe nor his friends) with any enterpriſe which might trouble the happy reſt, and good accord of Italy. To Innocent ſucceeded Roderik Borgia borne at Valence, one of the chiefe cities of Spaine: he was an ancient Cardinall, and one of the greateſt in all the Court of Rome: one meane that raiſed him to the ſeate of the Pope, was the difference betweene the Cardinals Aſcanius Sforce, and Iulian S. Petri ad vincla: but the chiefeſt thing that accompliſhed his election, was, that with a new example for that time, he bought by the conſent and knowledge of euery one, partly for money, and partly with promiſes of offices and great dignities, many voyces of the Cardinals; who reiecting the inſtruction of the Goſpell, were not aſhamed to paſſe to him by ſale, an authoritie and power to make merchandize of the holy treaſures, and that with the name of the celeſtiall authority, in the moſt high and eminent part of the temple. To which abominable negotiation many of them were induced by the Cardinall Aſcanius, but that was not more with perſwaſions and ſutes, then with his example: for that being corrupted with the infinite deſire of riches, he agreed with the Pope that for recompence of his ſo great wickednesse, he ſhould haue the office of the Vicechancellorſhip, (the principall office in the Court of Rome) togither with benefices, caſtles, & his pallace of Rome full of moueables of great valure. But the Pope for all this, could not auoide neither for the time to come; the iuſtice and iudgement of God, nor for the preſent, the infamy and iuſt hate of men; in whom for this election, was no ſmall impreſſion of aſtoniſhment and horror, not onely for that it was done by meanes ſo diſhoneſt, but alſo becauſe the nature and conditions of the man choſen, were (for the greateſt part) knowne to many: and amongſt others it is notorious, that Ferdinand King of Naples, (though openly he diſſembled the griefe he had of the election) ſignified to the Queene his wife with teares, which he was wont to forbeare euen in the death of his children, that there was a Pope created, who would be moſt hurtfull to Italy, and the whole Commonweale of Chriſtendome. A iudgement not vnworthy of the wiſedome of ſuch a Prince: for that in Alexander the ſixth (for ſo would this new Pope be called) was a ſubtiltie, ſharpneſſe and expedition of wit moſt ſingular, a counſell excellent, a wonderfull efficacie in perſwaſion, and in all great affayres a iudgement and care incredible. But theſe vertues were marueloufly defaced by his vices; for, touching his manners and cuſtomes, they were very diſhoneſt, in his adminiſtrations he expreſſed little ſinceritie, in his countenance no ſhame, in his words ſmall truth, in his heart little faith, and in his mind leſſe religion. Of the contrary, all his actions were defiled with an inſatiable couetouſneſſe, an immoderate ambition, a barbarous crueltie, and a burning deſire to rayſe and make great (by what meanes ſo euer) his children, who were many in number; and amongſt others, one, no leſſe deteſtable then the father, to whoſe curſed counſels he became a wicked inſtrument. Great was the change in the affayres of the Church by the death of Innocent the eight, but no leſſe reuolution happened in the Commonweale of Florence, by the taking away of Laurence de Medicis, to whoſe greatneſſe (without contradiction) ſucceeded Peter the eldeſt of his three ſonnes, who as well for his age being yet young, as alſo for his other qualities was not fit for the gouernement of ſo heauie a charge, and leſſe capable to manage the affaires with that moderation which his father was wont to vſe in buſineſſe both forrain and domeſticall; and knowing diſcreetly how to temporiſe betweene Princes confederate, he had whileſt he liued augmented greatly the conditions and faculties both publike and priuate, and at his death, left vnto euery one a firme opinion that the peace of Italy was principally preſerued by his meanes.

Peter de Medicis heire to Laurence.

Peter was no ſooner ſucceeded to the adminiſtration of the Commonweale, then with a courſe directly contrary to the counſels of his father, and not communicating with thoſe ancient citizens which were wont to be called to the deliberation of buſineſſe of importance, he ioyned himſelfe ſo ſtraitly with Ferdinand and Alphonſo, perhaps by the perſwaſion of Virginio Vrſin his parent depending wholly vpon them, that Lodowyke Sforce had iuſt occaſion to feare, that as often as the Aragons would annoy him, they ſhould be ayded (by the authority of Peter de Medicis) with the forces of the Commonweale of Florence. This intelligence (ſeminary, and originall of all the troubles) albeit at the beginning it was debated, and kept very ſecret, yet it began by and by to be ſuſpected by Lodowyke, a Prince very watchfull, and of right ſubtill vnderſtanding: for, as it hath bene an ancient cuſtome in Chriſtendome to ſend Embaſſadours to congratulate with the new Pope, as Chriſts Vicar on earth, and to offer him obedience: So Lodowyke Sforce, whoſe property it was to ſtudy to ſhew himſelfe more wiſe then the reſt, with inuentions ſtrange, & vnaduiſed with others, had giuen counſel that the Embaſſadors of the Confederates ſhould all enter Rome in one day, and preſenting themſelues altogether in the publike Conſiſtory afore the Pope, the Oration ſhould be expreſſed by one of them onely in the name of them all: for that by that forme and order of doing, beſides the increaſe of their common reputation, it ſhould appeare to all Italy, that there was amongſt them not onely a good will and confederation, but rather ſo great a coniunction, that they ſeemed as one body, one Prince, and one inueſted corporation. To this he adioyned, that as touching the vtilitie of this counſell, it was not onely expreſſed with the diſcourſe of reaſon, but iuſtified with a late and familiar example; for that (as was beleeued) the laſt Pope taking argument of the diſunion of the Confederates, in that at ſeuerall ſeaſons, and with counſels ſeparate, they had done him obedience, he was the more readie to inuade the kingdome of Naples. Ferdinand approued eaſily the aduice of Lodowike: the Florentines allowed it for the authoritie of the one and other: and Peter de Medicis was not againſt it in open councell, albeit in particular, the deuice was nothing agreeable to him: for that being one of the elect Embassadors for that Commonweale, and having an intention to make his legation glorious with proud and gorgeous demonstrations, he feared that if he should make his entry into the Citie and the Popes presence amongst the other Embassadors of the Confederates, the magnificencie of his traine would not be seene among so great a companie. This vanitie of the yong man was confirmed by the ambitious counsell of Gentill Bishop of Aretze, the other coembassador for Florence, to whom belonged the authority of the oration in the name of the Florentines, by reason of his dignity and profession in the studies of humanitie. And seeing by this manner no lesse vnlooked for then alwaies vnaccustomed, he saw himselfe depriued of the occasion to publish his eloquence in an assembly so honorable and solemne, he complained as if he had suffered wrong in his perpetuall reputation. For this reason, Peter de Medicis, pushed on partly by his owne vanitie and lightnesse, and partly by the pompe and ambition of the other, required the King of Naples (albeit with this caution, to keepe from Lodowike that he did impugne his counsell) to consider, that that forme of legation could not be executed in common without great confusion, and therefore that he would take vpon him to perswade, that the expedition might be separate, and passe according to the examples passed. The king of Naples desiring to gratifie him in his demand (but yet not without the displeasure of Lodowike) satisfied him in the effect, but not in the manner, plainely declaring to Lodowike, that he did not discondescend from the first plot and resolution for the Embassadors, for other occasion then at the instance and solicitation of Peter de Medicis. Lodowike for this sodaine mutation, was more moued in mind then the importance of the thing could deserue, and amid his complaints, he appropriated to himselfe this degree of iniurie, that to diminish his reputation, they reuoked the first deuice, whereof he was author, and alreadie had communicated it with the Pope and the whole Court of Rome. But that which most troubled his mind was, for that in this litle and vaine accident, he perceiued that Peter de Medicis had secret intelligence with Ferdinand; which by the euents that followed he discouered daily more apparently. Langnilare, Ceruetre, and other small holds and villages neare to Rome, were in the possession of Franciſquin Cibo, a Genoway, bastard sonne to Pope Innocent, who after the death of his father being gone to dwell at Florence, vnder the fauour and societie of Peter de Medicis, brother to Magdalen his wife: sold immediatly after his coming thither to Virginio Vrsin by the negotiation of Peter, all those places for the price of forty thousand duckats. A thing resolued on chiefly with Ferdinand, who lent him vnderhand the most part of the money, perswading himselfe that it could not but turne to his profit, if the greatnesse of Virginio, who was his parent and in his pay, should enlarge and stretch farre about the confines of Rome. The king considered that the power of the Popes was an apt instrument to trouble the Realme of Naples (an ancient freeholder and chiefe of the Church of Rome) for that it had large borders vpon the Ecclesiasticall territories; and he had not yet forgotten what differences he and his father had often had with them: and also he wisely foresaw, that there is alwaies some occasion of new contentions about the iurisdiction of Confines, both for tributes and collation of benefices, and for regard of entercourse of Barons, with many other quarrels hapning many times amongst estates borderers, and no lesse oftentimes betweene the vassall and the Lord Peramount: for which reasons, he held alwaies for one of the firme foundations of his securitie, that all, or the greater part of the mightiest Barons of the territory of Rome, should depend vpon him. A thing which in that time he wrought with so much the more care and diligence, by how much the world iudged that the authority of Lodowike Sforce was like to be great with the Pope by the meane of Cardinall Ascanius his brother. And as many beleeued, he was perhaps not the least pushed forward with feare, lest in Alexander were concurrant the couetousnesse and hatred of his vncle Pope Calixtus the third, who (for the immoderate desire of the greatnes of Peter Borgia his nephew) if death had not giuen impediment to his counsels, had immediatly after the decease of Alphonso father to Ferdinand, taken armes to dispoyle him of the kingdome of Naples (reuerted as he said to the Church). He did not remember (so litle force amongst men hath the memorie of benefits receiued) how by the meane of Alphonso (in whose kingdome he was borne, and to whom he had bene a seruant long time) he had obtained other Ecclesiasticall dignities, with a liberall fauour and aide to aspire to the Popedome. But it hath bene alwaies a thing very true, that wise men haue not at all times a discretion or iudgement perfect, seeing it is necessary that the signes of the weaknesse and frailty of mans vnderstanding should many times be discouered. The king of Naples, notwithstanding he

he was recommended for a Prince watchfull, politicke, and foreſeeing, yet did he ouerſee to conſider how much this deliberation deſerued to be reiected, for that it containing no other hope, then of a ſmall vtilitie, it might on the other ſide breed many miſchiefes and harmes irreparable; for that the ſale of theſe ſmall caſtles, was no litle oportunitie to incite to new things, the minds of thoſe to whom it did either appertaine, or might be profitable to looke to the preſeruation of the common peace and concord. For the Pope pretending that by ſuch alienation, made without his knowledge, they were deuolued to the ſea Apoſtolike by the diſpoſing of the lawes, and making ſhew that the Pontificall authoritie was greatly wronged, he looked withall into the ends and purpoſes of Ferdinand, filled all Italy with complaints againſt him, Peter de Medicis, and Virginio; and reſolued that ſo farre as his power would ſtretch, he would not ſpare any thing, nor let paſſe any meanes to preſerue the dignitie and rights of the Sea of Rome. Lodowike Sforce was no leſſe moued, to whom were alwayes ſuſpected the actions of Ferdinand, and who, for the falſe opinion he had that the Pope would be gouerned by the counſels of Aſcanius and himſelfe, eſteemed it his proper loſſe, if any thing ſhould be diminiſhed of the greatneſſe of Alexander. But that which vexed him moſt, was that he could not doubt but that betweene the Aragons and Peter de Medicis was contracted a ſecret and an aſſured league, ſeeing that in that action they had proceeded vniformly and reciprocally: and therefore to raiſe impediments to thoſe plots and determinations as moſt dangerous to his affaires, and to make this an occaſion to winne the Pope the more, he ſtirred him vp as much as he could, to protect his proper dignitie: perſwading him that there was not ſo much neceſſitie to ſet before his eyes things that were done preſently, as to conſider how much it imported him, in the firſt dayes of his pontificacie, to ſuffer the maieſtie of ſuch a degree to be deſpiſed, euen by his proper vaſſals: he told him, he had not to beleeue, that the couetouſneſſe of Virginio, or the importance of the caſtles, or other reaſon of that nature had moued Ferdinand; but a certaine deſire to aſſay his patience and courage, with iniuries at the beginning ſeeming litle; but afterwards (if he would ſuffer ſuch things) he would not be without boldneſſe to tempt him euery day with offences of greater qualitie: he aduiſed him to beleeue, that the ambition of Ferdinand did nothing differ from his anceſtors kings of Naples, and perpetuall enemies to the Church of Rome, who had not forborne to perſecute the Popes with warres and armies, and ſometimes had occupied Rome: That the example is freſh and greene, that the king now reigning, in the perſon of his ſonne, diſpatched two armies at two ſeuerall times againſt two Popes, and made inuaſion euen to the walls of Rome: That he hath bene alwayes exerciſed in malice, conſpiracies, and warres againſt his predeceſſors; And now not onely the example of other kings, not onely his naturall couetouſneſſe to beare rule, did ſtirre him vp againſt him, but rather an old infected deſire of reuenge now burſt out by the memory of iniuries receiued of Calixtus his vncle. Therefore he aduiſed him with great diligence to looke into theſe things, leſt by ſuffering patiently the firſt wrongs, he ſhould ſee himſelfe honoured onely with ceremonies and vaine titles, and in effect deſpiſed and contemned of euery one; and ſhould alſo giue courage and boldneſſe to the partie to conſpire againſt him moſt dangerous enterpriſes: but if he would take this to heart, he ſhould with more facilitie preſerue the ancient maieſtie and greatneſſe, with the true reuerence due by all the world to the Popes of Rome. To theſe perſwaſions he ioyned many offers and promiſes of no ſmall importance, but deeds farre greater in effect; for that he lent him readily fortie thouſand duckets, and leuied with him at their common charge, three hundred men at armes, vnder this condition, that they ſhould be employed where it pleaſed the Pope. Notwithſtanding all this, Lodowike deſirous to ſhun the neceſſitie to enter into new troubles, he counſelled Ferdinand to diſpoſe Virginio to appeaſe the Pope by ſome honeſt meanes, leſt vpon ſo ſlender beginnings, there aroſe not troubles heauie and ſlanderous. But with greater libertie and efficacie, he admoniſhed oftentimes Peter de Medicis, that (conſidering how conuenient it was for the common peace of Italy that his father Laurence was alwayes as the mediator and indifferent friend of Ferdinand and him) he would rather follow the example of his father, ſpecially being a perſonage of ſo great valour, then beleeuing new counſels, to be driuen to giue occaſion to another, to make deliberations, which in the end would proue hurtfull to euery one: he willed him to remember what great reputation and ſuretie the Sforces and Medices had giuen reciprocally to their houſes; and with what wrongs and iniuries the family of Aragon had obtruded vpon his father, his anceſtors, and Common-weale of Florence: and laſtly, by how many meanes and times Ferdinand and Alphonſo his father had conſpired ſometimes by armes and open force, and often by traines and ſubtilties, to make themſelues Lords of Tuskane.

But theſe counſels or aduiſements did rather hinder then further the expectation of the author; for that Ferdinand eſteeming it much to his indignitie to giue place to Lodowike and Aſcanius, by whoſe workings he ſuppoſed the Pope was ſetled into thoſe diſcontentments and indignations which he ſhewed; gaue ſecret counſell to Virginio, by the incitation of his ſonne Alphonſo, not to delay to take by vertue of his purchaſe, the poſſeſſion of the caſtles, promiſing to defend him againſt all diſpleaſures or troubles that might happen. And on the other ſide, gouerning himſelfe with his naturall induſtrie, he communicated with the Pope diuers meanes of compoſition, ſecretly incenſing Virginio notwithſtanding not to conſent to any but ſuch as might keepe the caſtles in his poſſeſſion, ſatisfying the Pope with ſome portion of money: which comforts ſet Virginio into ſuch a courage and reſolution of mind, that many times afterwards he refuſed certaine of the conditions, euen ſuch as Ferdinand (not to incenſe the Pope too much) ſolicited him inſtantly to accept. By theſe actions it was plainly perceiued, that Peter de Medicis perſeuered to follow the authoritie of the King, and that all that was done to draw him away, was in vaine and without fruite: therefore Lodowike Sforce deeply reuoluing how much it imported that the citie of Florence ſhould be at the deuotion of his enemies, whoſe temperature and good gouernment was wont to be the principall foundation of his ſecuritie, and ſeeming to ſee in his ſecret cogitation many impreſſions of dangers threatning him on all ſides, determined to prouide for his proper ſafetie, and to thoſe new perils to appropriate new remedies, ſpecially his conſcience telling him how vehemently the Aragons thirſted to take from him the gouernment of his Nephew: which deſire, albeit Ferdinand (to whom nothing was more familiar then to diſſemble his intentions) had ſought to couer in all his actions; yet Alphonſo, who by nature was more open, could not containe himſelfe, but that he complained publikly of the oppreſſion of his ſonne in law, pronouncing with more great libertie of words, then temperance of diſcretion, many iniurious ſpeeches tending to manifeſt threatning. Moreouer, Lodowike knew well, that Iſabel wife to John Galeas, a woman of high ſtomacke, would vſe perpetuall diligence to incenſe her father and grandfather, that if the indignitie which was done to her husband and her, would not moue them, atleaſt the conſideration of the perils whereunto their owne liues were expoſed, together with the lamentable ruine of their children, might draw them to compaſſion. But that which chiefly troubled his mind, was, that he knew well how hatefull his name was to the ſubiects of the Duchie of Millan, as well for the grieuous and vnaccuſtomed money-tributes which he had impoſed vpon them, as alſo for the compaſſion that euery one had of John Galeas their rightfull Lord. And although he trauelled by all meanes to make them of Aragon ſuſpected of a deſire to make themſelues Lords of that State, as though they did aſſume a title by the ancient rights of the teſtament of Philip Maria Viſcount, who had inſtituted his heire Alphonſo father to Ferdinand, and vnder that pretence meant to wreſt from him the gouernment of his Nephew; yet he found himſelfe vnable by all theſe meanes to remoue the hatreds that were conceiued againſt him, nor yet to hide from the whole world into how great miſchiefes the deſire and diſaſtrous luſt to beare rule doth leade men. Therefore after he had deeply pondered in his mind the ſtate of things preſent, and the dangers likely to happen, caſting aſide all other thoughts, his deuices at laſt brought forth this reſolution, to ſearch new confederates and new friends. Touching this reſolution he found a great oportunitie in the Popes diſdaine againſt Ferdinand, and in the deſire which he beleeued the State of Venice had, that this confederation ſhould change and alter, which of long time had giuen no ſmall impediments to their purpoſes: he made ſolicitation to both theſe, to contract in common a new confederacie for the publike benefite.

But the Pope reiecting all paſſions of anger, and all other affection, had his mind onely poſſeſt with an vnbrideled couetouſneſſe to raiſe and make mightie his ſonnes; in whom hauing ſetled a blind fancie, he was not aſhamed, contrary to the cuſtome of former Popes (who to caſt ſome cloke ouer their infamie, were wont to call them their Nephewes) to call them his children, and expreſſed them to the world for ſuch: and not finding as yet other fit occaſion to giue beginning to his ambitious intention, he made inſtance to marry one of his two ſonnes to the baſtard daughter of Alphonſo, demanding a downie of ſome rich eſtate in the kingdome of Naples; from which hope ſo long as he was not excluded, he hearkned rather with his eare then his heart to the confederation offered by Lodowike. And if in this deſire he had bene ſatiſfied, the peace of Italy had not perhaps fallen into ſo ſodaine alteration and trouble.

Ferdinand haply had not his mind much eſtranged from that motion: but Alphonſo, to whom was hatefull the ambition and pride of the Pope, denied conſtantly his conſent; and therefore making no open ſhew of diſlike to the mariage, but laying all the difficultie vpon the qualitie of the dowrie that was demanded, they ſatisfied not Alexander; who being much offended for this cauſe, reſolued to embrace the counſels of Lodowike, his humors being turned all into diſdaine and ambition, and his mind trauelled with feare: for that not onely Virginio Vrſin was mercenary to Ferdinand, and for the many fauours he had receiued of him and them of Florence, and being withall of the faction of the Guelffes, was at that time very mightie throughout the whole dominions of the Church: but that which more was, Proſper and Fabricius principall heads of the family of the Collonnoys, and the Cardinall of S. Peter ad Vincla, a Cardinall of great reputation (then retired to the Caſtle of Oſtie, which he held as Biſhop of the place, leſt the Pope ſhould dreſſe ſome ambuſh againſt his life,) was now become a great friend to Ferdinand, to whom before he was a profeſſed enemie, and had many times ſtirred the Popes Sixtus and Innocent againſt him. But the Senate of Venice, contrary to the opinion and expectation of the world, made no great ſhew of readineſſe to this confederation. For, albeit the diſunion of others was very agreeable to them, yet the infidelitie of the Pope being euery day more ſuſpected to euery one, made them more ſlow to hearken to the league; the remembrance of the alliances made by them with Sixtus and Innocent the Popes lateſt predeceſſors, ſeruing much to their preſent diſtruſt. This was when the warre was moſt hot againſt the Duke of Ferrara, whereunto after he had prouoked them, and intangled them with the quarrell, receiuing of the one great diſpleaſures without any profit; and for Sixtus, he did not onely change purpoſe, but alſo recompenced them with his ſpirituall curſes, and (together with the reſidue of all Italy) he proceeded againſt them with his temporall corrections. But notwithſtanding all theſe, the induſtrie and diligence of Lodowike continually ſoliciting the Senate, and priuatly working with many in particular, all theſe difficulties were vanquiſhed, and at laſt was contracted in the moneth of Aprill, 1493. betweene the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and John Galeas Duke of Millan (for all expeditions were diſpatched in his name) a new confederation, for their common defence, and particular preſeruation of the gouernment of Lodowike: one of the conditions was, that the Venetians and Duke of Millan, and euery one of them ſhould ſend immediatly to Rome for the ſuretie of the Pope and State Eccleſiaſtike, an hundred men at armes; and as well with thoſe, as with greater forces (if need required) they ſhould ioyne with him for the recouery of the caſtles detained by Virginio.

The moderate and wiſe proceeding of the Venetians.

Confederation betweene the Pope, the Venetians and the Duke of Millan.

Theſe new counſels moued not a litle the minds of all Italy, for that the Duke of Millan remained now deuided from that league, by the which for more then a dozen yeares their common ſecuritie was maintained, being in it expreſly defended, that none of the Confederates ſhould enter any new alliance without conſent of the reſidue. And therefore ſeeing that vnitie was broken with vnequall diuiſion, wherein conſiſted the equalitie of their generall and common buſineſſe; and the minds of the Princes repleniſhed with ſuſpitions and diſpleaſures, there could be no expectation of other ſucceſſe, then that to a generall and common hurt; there would reſort fruites equall and conformable to ſuch ſeeds. Now, the Duke of Calabria and Peter de Medicis, iudging it more for the ſuretie of their eſtates to preuent then to be preuented, inclined eaſily to Proſper and Fabricius Colonne, who being alſo ſecretly incenſed by the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincla, offered to ſurpriſe the towne of Rome with their companies of men at armes and the aid of the faction of the Gibelins, ſo that the Vrſins would follow them, and the Duke of Calabria march ſo neare, that he might reſcue them within three dayes after their entry into Rome.

A practiſe to the ſurpriſe of Rome.

But Ferdinand, who now deſired no more to vexe, but to appeaſe the courage of the Pope, and to correct that which heretofore had bene done by a raſh counſell and without diſcretion, reiected altogether thoſe counſels which he iudged would not breed ſecuritie, but raiſe and nouriſh great troubles and dangers: he determined now, not fainedly, but with all his heart, to do all he could to compound and accord the controuerſie of the caſtles; perſwading himſelfe that that occaſion of ſo great emotion and change being taken away, Italy would ſpeedily returne, with litle or no trauell, to her first estate. But it hapneth not alwayes, that in taking away the occasions, the effects do ceasse, hauing had of them their first beginning: for, as it oftentimes hapneth, that resolutions made by feare, seeme to him that feareth, lesse then the perill; so Ladowike had no great confidence, in that he had found a remedie sufficient for his securitie: but doubting, by reason the Pope and the Venetians had intentions and ends other then his, that his foundation could not long last, which he had laid vpon the confederation lately made with them, and that therefore his affaires by diuers accidents should be in danger to be reduced into hard termes and many difficulties: he applied all his thoughts, more to cure euen to the roote the originall ill that he set before his eyes, then to prouide a salue for such accidents as might happen by it; neither remembring how dangerous it is to vse a medicine stronger then the nature of the disease or complexion of the patient will suffer, nor that to enter into greater perils, can be the onely remedie for dangers present. And to the end to build his suretie vpon forreine strength, seeing he had no confidence in his owne forces, and lesse expectation of trust in the Italian amities, he determined to do all that he could to stirre vp the French king Charles the viij. to assaile the kingdome of Naples, which he pretended to appertaine to him by the ancient rights and descents of the house of Anion.

Ladowike first calleth in forreine armes into Italy.

The kingdome of Naples, which in the inuestitures and buls of the Church of Rome, whereof it is an ancient freehold, is absurdly called the Realme of Sicile on this side the riuer of Far; and being vniustly vsurped by Manfroy bastard sonne to the Emperour Fredericke the second, was giuen in chiefe together with the Ile of Sicile, vnder the title of both Siciles, the one on this side, and the other beyond Far, by Pope Vrbin the fourth, to Charles Earle of Prouence and Anion, brother to that Lewis king of the French, who much renowmed for his power and strength, but more recommended for the holinesse of his life, deserued (according to the vaine affections of the Frenchmen) to be translated after his death into the number of Saints. This Charles with force of armes obtained effectually that, whereof the title was giuen to him by the authoritie of the Church: after his death, succeeded to the kingdome Charles his sonne, called by the Italians (to distinguish him from his father) Charles the second, who left the inheritance of the Realme to Robert his sonne. But becausse Robert died without issue male, Ioane daughter of Charles Duke of Calabria, sonne to Robert, who died in yong age before his father, aspired to the kingdome: but her authoritie began immediatly to be deiected, no lesse for the infamie of her life and conditions, then for the common imbecillitie of that sexe; whereupon, with the increase of time, the Realme being throwne into many discords and warres, not with strangers, but amongst the selfe successors of Charles the first, descending of diuers children of Charles the second, Ioane despairing not to be able to defend her selfe, adopted for her sonne, Lewis Duke of Anion, brother to the French king Charles the fift: he to whom the Frenchmen gaue the surname of wise, for that he had obtained many victories without feeling the power of Fortune. This Lewis, after he had passed into Italy with a mightie armie (Ioane being aforehand deceassed by violent meanes, and the kingdome transferred to Charles called Durazzo, descending likewise of Charles the first) died of a feauer in Apulia, euen when he was almost in possession of the victorie: so that there came no other thing to them of Anion by his adoption, then the Earldome of Prouence, which had bene alwayes possessed by the issues of Charles the first. But yet of that arose the originall of the colour, vnder the which afterwards both Lewis of Anion, sonne to the first Lewis, and at another time a sonnes sonne of the same name, both stirred vp by the Popes, being then in variance with the same kings, to make many inuasions vpon the kingdome of Naples, but with great misfortune and preiudice. Touching Charles Durazzo, Ladislao his sonne succeeded him, who dying without issue in the yeare 1414. the crowne deuolued to his sister Ioane the second; a name very vnfortunate for the kingdome of Naples, and no lesse vnhappie to both the one and other of the women, resembling one another in dissolute gouernment and wanton customes of life: for this Ioane putting the policie and direction of the Realme into the hands of those persons with whom she communicated vnchastly her body, was immediatly brought into such straits and difficulties, that being tormented by Lewis the third, with the aide of Pope Martin the fift, she was at last constrained, for the last refuge, to make Alphonso king of Aragon and Sicile, her sonne by adoption. But entring soone after into contention with him, she brake that adoption vnder colour of ingratitude, and made a new adoption, calling to her succours the selfe Lewis, who by persecuting her with warre, had compelled her to make the first adoption: and hauing by force chased Alphonso wholly out of the kingdome, she enioyed it in peace all the residue of her life: then dying without issue, she instituted for her heire (as the brute went) Rene Duke of Anion and Earle of Prouence, brother to Lewis her sonne adoptiue, who perhaps died the same yeare. But the succession of Rene displeasing much the Barons of the Realme, (besides a brute running that the testament was forged by them of Naples) Alphonso was reuoked by a part of the Barons and people: and from thence kindled the fire of the warres betweene Alphonso and Rene, which for many yeares brought great affliction to that noble Realme; and the actions of the said warre, were more by the proper forces of the Realme, then by the strength of the parties. In this sort (the wils of men being different and contrary) were kindled the factions not yet altogether quenched betweene the Aragons and them of Anion, their titles and colours of right changing with the time; for that the Popes following more their couetousnesse, or the necessitie of times, then iustice or equitie, consented diuersly to the inuestitures of them. But touching the warres betweene Alphonso and Rene, the victorie remained to Alphonso, a Prince for his valure more renowmed, and for his power more mightie: who dying soone after without lawfull heires, and without making any mention of Iohn his brother and successor to the realme of Sicile and Aragon, bequeathed by testament the kingdome of Naples to Ferdinand his bastard sonne, as a thing conquered by himselfe, and therefore not appertaining to the Crowne of Aragon: who notwithstanding he was inuaded by Iohn the sonne of Rene immediatly after the death of his father, and that by the support of the principall Barons of the realme; yet with his fortune and vertue he not onely defended himselfe, but also so chased his aduersaries, that neuer after during the life of Rene (surviuing many yeares his sonne) he neither had to debate with those of Anion, nor yet stood in feare of their inuasions. In the end Rene died, and hauing no issue male, he established as heire ouer his whole Estates, Charles the sonne of his brother; who dying soone after without children, left by his will his inheritance to the French king Lewis the xj. to whom did not onely returne as to his Lord soueraigne the Duchie of Anion, (which suffereth no succession in women, for that it is a member of the Crowne) but also he put himselfe in the possession of Prouence, notwithstanding the Duke of Lorraine descending of one of the daughters of Rene, iustified the inheritance of his Estates to appertaine vnto him. And the said Lewis by iust vertue of the same testament, had good power to pretend that the rights which those of Anion had to the kingdome of Naples, should be appropriated to him. All which inheritances being passed and continued after his death to the person of Charles the viij. his sonne, Ferdinand king of Naples began to haue a mightie enemie, and great oportunitie was offered to whomsoeuer desired to annoy him. For at that time, this was the estate of the realme of France: it was very populous in multitudes of men, for wealth and riches euery particular region most fertill and plentifull, for glorie in armes most flourishing and renowmed: a policie well directed, discipline administred, an authoritie dreadfull, and in opinion and hope most mightie; lastly their generall conditions and faculties so well furnished, as perhaps it was not more happie in these mortall felicities since the dayes of Charlemaine. It was newly amplified in euery one of the three parts, wherein all Gaule stood deuided by the ancients: for, fortie yeares before vnder Charles the seuenth (a Prince for his victories obtained with great dangers called happie) Normandie and the Duchie of Guyen holden by the English, were reduced to the obedience of the French Crowne. And in the last dayes of Lewis the xj. the Earldome of Prouence, the Dukedome of Burgondie, almost all Picardie, together with the Duchie of Britaine, were by a new mariage inuested in the power of Charles the viij. There was no want of inclination in this King to aspire to conquer by force of armes the kingdome of Naples, as iustly appertaining to him: which continuing from his infancie by a certaine naturall instinct, was entertained and nourished by such as were about him, and for the conformitie of humors, very agreeable with him; who raised his mind into vaine thoughts, and told him that this was an occasion to make him surmount the renowme of his predecessors; for that the Realme of Naples being conquered, it would be easie for him to bring vnder his subiection the Empire of the Turks.

A right description of parasites.

These things being knowne to many, brought many hopes to Lodowike Sforce to perswade easily the thing he desired, who also relied much on the friendship and familiaritie which the name of Sforce had in the French Court: for, both he and his brother Galeas before him, had continued by many demonstrations and good offices, the amitie begun by Francis Sforce their father, ther, who thirtie yeares before hauing receiued in fee of Lewis the xj. (whose mind abhorred alwayes the things of Italy) the citie of Sauone, with the right which he pretended to haue to Genes possessed aforetime by his father, neuer failed him in his dangers, neither with counsell, succors, nor affection.

But Lodowike to solicite in France with more credite and authoritie, and iudging himselfe vnable alone, both for the importance and danger of the thing, to handle so great an enterprise: sought first to communicate and perswade all things with the Pope, in whom he knew had most dominion, ambition and disdaine: he told him, that not by the fauours of the Princes of Italy, and much lesse by the meanes of their armies and helpes, he should be reuenged of Ferdinand, nor haue hope to compasse estates worthy and honorable for the aduancement of his sonnes. He found the Pope to beare a ready will to the matter, either for a desire to innouate things, or else to obtaine of the Aragoni by feare, that which willingly they would not accord to him. After they had communicated their counsels, they dispatched secretly into France personages of trust, to sound the will of the King and such as gouerned him: who shewing themselues not farre from their intention; Lodowike turning his whole wits to the deuice of this enterprise, sent in the sight of all the world (but shadowing it with other occasions) one Charles Balbian Earle of Bel-ioyeuse, who soliciting the King certain dayes in priuate audience, and working particularly with sundry of his principall fauorites, was at last introduced into open Councell, the King present, where in a publike hearing of the Prince, his Lords and Prelates of the Court, he deliuered this forme of discourse:

The Embassador of Millan perswades the French king to the voyage of Naples.

Most Christian King, The experience of the disposition of hearts diuersly inclined, makes me doubtfull, whether vnder a direct and absolute forme, I should begin my discourse; or vsing the custome of Orators, bring into question such obiections as may be opposed against the present matter: for, in causes of perswasion, the one with the other must orderly concurre, left for want of due office in the speaker, the matter seeming to suffer imperfection and error, do not bring forth resolution and effect according to the expectation of the parties for whom he soliciteth. And albeit the vniuersall coniecture and opinion of your Maiesties many vertues, and the graue aspect and face of your right wise Councell here assembled, promise no lesse ready consent and liking, then the matter is iust and innocent: yet for your Maiesties better inducement, and generall satisfaction of your Lords and Prelates assisting, I will ioyne my selfe to the refutation of that generall doubt, which in negotiations of this nature, are commonly obiected, more by custome then iust cause arising. If therefore (right Christian King) any man for what occasion soeuer, will hold for suspected the integritie of mind and faith, with the which Lodowike Sforce comes to counsell you to beare armes to conquer the kingdome of Naples: he may easily deliuer his mind of that ill grounded suspition, if he either looke into the offers, offices and conditions wherewith he doth accompanie his perswasion and counsell, offering you the commoditie of his treasures, men, and all other oportunities: or at least will call to his memorie with what deuotion both he, Galeas his brother, and originally Francis his father, did honor the late king Lewis your father, continued with no lesse constancie, faith and pietie to the glorious name of your Maiestie. Let him consider also that by this enterprise, Lodowike stands possible to many great dangers, with a very naked hope of any profit: yea in this is contained the onely benefit he shall haue, to see a iust reuenge of the ambushes and wrongs done by them of Aragon: where your Maiestie by meanes of the victorie, shall haply aspire to a most flourishing kingdome, bringing with it a greater glorie and oportunitie of farre more high and honorable merite; an action whereunto the thoughts of mightie Princes ought to be fashioned. And on the other part, if it happen that you come not to the end of this enterprise, yet your Maiestie loseth no reputation, nor your greatnesse the more diminished: for that onely the fortunes of Princes are subiect to opinions, but not their estate and maiestie empaired. But for Lodowike, he is of nothing more sure then to suffer generall ill will and contempt; and of nothing more vnsure then to find remedie in his perils: for that if him would concurre all the displeasures and slanders which may concerne his estate, life or reputation. And therefore I see not how it could be suspected the counsels of him, whose conditions and fortunes are so vnequall and inferiour to yours. But there be reasons stirring you to this honorable condition, which for the simplicitie, roundnesse and innocencie they containe, will admit no doubt: for that in them are liberally conteined all the grounds and foundations, which in consulting of enterprises, vse to

" would obiect themſelues againſt you; what are they againſt ſo great a power, compounded vp-

noble minds of the French reach vnto greater ends; and that the high and excellent thoughts of ſo valiant and glorious a King, regard not ſo much profits priuate or particular, as they behold the vniuerſall greatneſſe of the whole Commonweale of Chriſtendome: wherein touching this, what oportunitie more greater, what more ample occaſions, what ſeate of countrey more proper or conuenient to manage warre againſt the enemies of our religion? The ſea that deuides the kingdome of Naples and Greece, containes not in ſome part aboue lxx. miles in largeneſſe: a prouince ſo oppreſſed and torne in peeces with the tyrannies of the Turks, that they deſire nothing with more generall gladneſſe then to ſee the banners of Chriſtians and men of warre marching for their deliuerie. There is nothing more eaſie then to runne euen into the intrails of that Nation, and to batter Conſtantinople the ſoueraigne reſidencie of that Empire. This enterpriſe, for the maieſtie and nature of it, doth moſt worthily become your perſon and greatneſſe, with whoſe high and aſpiring thoughts it ſeemes to haue a certaine liuely affinitie. And for the reaſon and neceſſitie of it, it cannot ſo iuſtly appertaine to any as to you, bearing the ſurname of Moſt Chriſtian, a title wherein your predeceſſors haue flouriſhed with no ſmall examples of triumph and glorie, they iſſuing in armed maner out of this Realme, ſometimes to deliuer the Church of God from the oppreſſion of tyrants, ſometimes to inuade the infidels, and recouer the holy ſepulcher, haue raiſed euen to the third heauen their names and maieſtie of the French kings. With theſe counſels, with theſe meanes, with theſe actions, with theſe ends that mightie and triumphant Charles became great and Emperour of Rome, of whom as you beare the name, ſo now the time offereth you occaſion to communicate with his glorie and titles. But it is a time vainly ſpent, to ſtand long vpon the recapitulation of theſe reaſons, as though it were not more conuenient and more agreeing with the order of nature, to conſider how to keepe, then how to get: for, conſidering the oportunitie of ſo many and great occaſions calling you, it could not but intangle your greatneſſe with apparent infamie and diſhonor, to ſuffer any longer Ferdinand to vſurpe vpon you ſuch a kingdome, which for almoſt two hundred yeares hath had continuall poſſeſſion in the Kings of your bloud. And ſeeing by cleare iuſtice and all iudiciall courſe of lawes, it appertaines vnto you, who doubts how iuſtly it agreeth with your dignity to recouer it: but ſpecially how much it concernes your pietie to deliuer from the cruell tyrannie of thoſe Catilines, thoſe people which beare deuotion to your name, and do craue by right to beare you the dutie and office of ſubiects? Thus moſt high and glorious King, is the enterpriſe proued iuſt, eaſie and neceſſarie, and withall no leſſe glorious and holy, as well for it ſelfe in particular, as for that it openeth the way to other enterpriſes worthy of a right Chriſtian King of France: whereunto not onely the reaſons of men, but euen the ſelfe voice of God, doth call you with great and manifeſt occaſions, aſſuring you afore, the beginning of a moſt great happineſſe and fortune, ſince no greater worldly happineſſe can happen to no Prince, then to ſee his deliberations and counſels (bringing glorie and greatneſſe) to be accompanied with ſuch circumſtances and conſequences, that they concerne not onely the benefite and vniuerſall ſafetie, but much more do conſider the exaltation of the whole communitie of Chriſtendome.

The Nobilitie of France miſlike the iourney into Italy.

This propoſition had no willing paſſage into the eares or hearts of the great Lords of France, but ſpecially of ſuch, who for their nobilitie and opinion of wiſedome held greateſt authoritie. They iudged that ſuch a warre, whereof he had opened the way and entrie, could not but containe many difficulties and dangers, both for the conduct of armies into a countrey ſtrange and farre remoued from the realme of France, and alſo againſt enemies bearing reputation of valour, policie and diſcipline: for, for wiſedome, forecaſt, and ſtayed diſcretion, Ferdinand bare a high recommendation: and for valour, conduct and direction in warre, his ſonne Alphonſo was no leſſe renowmed. Beſides, they made this coniecture, that Ferdinand hauing reigned thirtie yeares, and ſacked and confiſked at ſundry times many of the Barons, had heaped together no ſmall treaſure: on the behalfe of the King, they conſidered that his capacitie was too greene to ſuſtaine alone ſo heauie a burden; and for the direction of warres and eſtates, the counſell weake, and the experience leſſe aſſured of ſuch as he beleeued moſt in. To theſe they added the want of money, whereof they eſteemed to need a great quantitie. They wiſhed that the deceits and ſubtilties of the Italians might be deeply looked into, aſſuring themſelues that it could not be pleaſing neither to others nor to Lodowike Sforce himſelfe (a man confeſſed by all the Italians to be of litle faith) that the kingdome of Naples ſhould paſſe into the power of

of a King of France: they iudged it hard to winne, and leſſe eaſie to keepe thoſe things that ſhould be wonne. For that reaſon (ſaid they) Lewis the father of Charles (a Prince in all his actions following more the truth then the apparence of things) would neuer accept the hopes which were offered him of the matters of Italy, and much leſſe make reckoning of the rights fallen to him in the Realme of Naples: no, he ſaw in his iudgement, that to ſend armies beyond the mountaines, was no other thing then to ſearch enemies and dangers with the waſte of infinite treaſure and bloud of the Realme of France. They held it neceſſary afore all things (if this expedition ſhould proceed) to reunite controuerſies with the Kings borderers; for that with Ferdinand king of Spaine, was no want of occaſions of quarrels and ſuſpitions; and with Maximilian king of the Romaines, and Philip Archduke of Auſtrich his ſon, not onely many heart-burnings and iealouſies, but alſo diſpleaſures & iniuries: whoſe minds albeit they could not be reconciled without condeſcending to ſome things hurtfull to the Crowne of France, yet neuertheleſſe ſuch reconcilements would be more by demonſtrations then effects: for, ſay they, if any ill accident happen to the Kings armie in Italy, what accord can be ſo well aſſured, which will hold them from inuading the Realme of France; ſeeing this is familiar with Princes, to hold for ſuſpected the greatneſſe and fortunes of their neighbours, and are ouer nothing ſo watchfull, as ouer opportunities and occaſions? And touching the King of England, Henrie the vij. it was not to be doubted that the naturall hate of the Engliſh toward the French, had not more force then the peace made with him two moneths before; for that it is manifeſt, that no one thing brought him more to the compoſition, then that the preparations of the King of Romaines anſwered not the promiſes wherewith he had induced him to lay ſiege to Bollogne. Of this nature were the reaſons alleaged by the Lords, partly debated amongſt themſelues, and partly diſputed in the preſence of the King. The chiefeſt of thoſe that iuſtified theſe arguments afore the King, was one Iames Grauille Admirall of France, whoſe greatneſſe albeit was ſomewhat diminiſhed, yet his authoritie ſuffered no alteration, for the ancient name and credit of his wiſedome, roving liberally through all the Realme of France. But the Kings mind with a wonderfull greedineſſe was wholy inclined to the contrary aduice; what with the greenneſſe of his yeares aſpiring now to two and twentie, and by his vnſtayed nature, not yet experienced in the affaires of the world, he was caried into a wonderfull ambition to enlarge his Empire, following an appetite of glorie, founded rather vpon a light will and furie of youth, then vpon maturitie of counſell, ſeeing that either by his proper nature, or rather the examples and admoniſhments of his parents, he repoſed litle faith in his Lords and Nobles of his Realme. And ſince he came forth of the tutorſhip and iuriſdiction of Anne Ducheſſe of Burbon his ſiſter, he bare no more care to the counſels of the Admirall, nor to others that had bene great in the gouernment; but gaue himſelfe ouer to the directions of certaine men of baſe condition, trained vp almoſt alwayes in the ſeruice of his perſon: of theſe, ſuch as had moſt fauour and place with him, perſwaded him greatly to embrace the enterpriſe, being partly corrupted (for the counſels of Princes are oftentimes mercenarie) with the promiſes and preſents of Lodowikes Embaſſadour, by whom was not forgotten any diligence or art to draw the fauours of ſuch as might do moſt in this action. They were partly puſhed on by certaine hopes, either to be raiſed to eſtates in the kingdome of Naples, or to obtaine of the Pope dignities and penſions in the Church. The principall of all theſe, was one Stephen de Vers, borne in Languedocke, of baſe place, but bred vp of long time with the King, in whoſe chamber he vſed to lie, and by the Kings creation made Seneſchall of Beucaire: with this man did communicate one William Briconnet, who of a merchant created firſt Generall of France, and after made Biſhop of S. Malo, had not onely the charge and adminiſtration of the Kings reuenue (which the French call Superintendent of the Finances,) but alſo hauing confederacie with Stephen, had by his meanes a great entrie into all the affaires of importance, albeit he had no great inſight in the policie and gouernment of matters of eſtate. To the helpe of this enterpriſe, were adioyned the perſwaſions of Antonell of S. Seuerin, Prince of Salerne, and of Bernardin of the ſame family, Prince of Biſignan, together with many other Barons baniſhed the Realme of Naples; who being withdrawne many yeares before into France, had continually ſolicited the King to that enterpriſe, laying before his eyes the great calamitie, or rather generall deſpaire of the whole kingdome, and the factions, and many followers, which they promiſed themſelues to haue in the ſame.

A true ſaying of King Lewis the xi.

Iuſt reaſons by the Nobility alleaged.

King Charles led by baſe men, and ſuch as by money were corrupted

The counſels of exiles are alwayes deſperate.

In this diuerſitie of perſwaſions, the deliberation remained ſuſpended for certaine dayes; others others being not onely in doubt what to determine, but also the Kings will wauering and vncertaine, for that sometimes inclining to his ambition and glory, and sometimes restrained with feares and dangers, he would often be irresolute, and ofttimes turne to the contrary of that which he had afore determined. But in the end, his first inclination, together with the cursed destinie of Italy, being of more force then any thing that could be said to the contrary, the well gouerned and peaceable counsels of his Nobles were altogether reiected, and communicating onely with the Bishop of S. Malo, and the Seneshall of Beaucaire, and partaking nothing with the assent and priuitie of all others, there was an agreement made with Lodowikes Embassador, whose conditions albeit were holden secret for many moneths, yet this is the capitulation and summe of them.

Confederation betweene the king of France and Lodowike Sforce.

The King Charles either going in person into Italy, or sending thither an armie for the conquest of Naples, the Duke of Millan was bound to giue him passage through his iurisdictions: To send thither with his men, fiue hundred men at armes payed: To suffer him to arme at Genes so many vessels as he will: And to lend him before he departed out of France, two hundred thousand duckets.

Touching the King, he was bound to the defence and protection of the Duchie of Millan against all men, with particular mention to preserue the authoritie of Lodowike: to entertaine during the warre within the citie of Ast, belonging to the Duke of Orleance, two hundred Lances to giue succours to the necessities of that Duchie. Lastly, he promised either at that time or soone after, by a writing subsigned with his owne hand, that hauing once conquered the realme of Naples, he should giue to Lodowike the principalitie of Tarente.

Great promises slenderly performed.

But let vs looke somewhat into the variation of times and things of the world: albeit Francis Sforce father to Lodowike, a Prince of rare wisedome and valour, was a professed enemie to those of Aragon, for the many displeasures he had receiued of Alphonso, Ferdinands father, and an ancient friend to the house of Anjow: yet this was his moderation in the actions concerning those two families, that in the yeare 1457. when Iohn the sonne of Rene inuaded the kingdome of Naples, he ministred succours to Ferdinand, with such a wonderfull diligence and readinesse, that the victorie was acknowledged to happen wholy by his helpe: he was stirred to this, for no other reason, then that he saw it was too perillous for his Duchie of Millan, that the French his neare neighbours should make themselues Lords ouer so mightie an Estate. The same reason induced Philip Maria Viscount (abandoning them of Anjow, to whom he had alwayes before borne fauor) to deliuer Alphonso his enemy, who taken of the Genoways in a battell at sea neare to Caiette, was brought to him prisoner to Millan, with all the Nobilitie of his realmes. On the other side, Lewis the xj. father to Charles, being oftentimes perswaded by many, and not with light occasions, to hearken to the things of Naples; and being withall with great instance called by the Genoways to be Lords ouer their countries as Charles his father had bene afore him, did alwayes refuse to intangle himselfe with the doings of Italy, as matters full of expences and difficulties, and in the end hurtfull to the Realme of France. But now the opinions of men being changed, but perhaps the reason of things not changed, we see how Lodowike cals the French ouer the mountaines, not fearing by so mightie a King (if Naples should fall into his hands) that danger which his father (no lesse valiant in armes then he) would haue feared, if but a litle Earle of Prouence had conquered it. And on the other side, we see Charles now reigning, inflamed with a desire to make warre in Italy; preferring the rashnesse of men of base place and vnexperienced, afore the counsell of his father, a Prince of singular wisedome, temperance and forecast. It happeth too often, that new Princes haue new counsels, and of new counsels commonly resort new effects; euen such as in a ship, when a raw man is put to the helme, the course must needs alter.

Wise considerations of Francis Sforce not followed.

Mens mindes often change, but the reason of things alters not.

It is not vnlike that Lodowike was drawne to so great a deliberation by Hercules de Este Duke of Ferrara, his father in law, who nourishing a vehement appetite to recouer Polesine de Rouigne, a countrey confining, and importing much the suretie of Ferrara, which the Venetians had taken from him in the warres ten yeares past; foresaw that the onely meanes to recouer it, was to set all Italy in trouble, and innouate the States with most great emotions. Besides this, many beleeued, that albeit in Hercules appeared a disguised apparence and will to wish well to his sonne in law, yet in secret he followed him with an extreme hatred; for that in the same warre, all the residue of Italy which had taken armes for him, being farre more mightie then the Venetians;

Lodowike gouerning then the State of Millan, and regarding his proper respects and particular interests, constrained the others to make peace, with condition that Polesine should remaine to the Venetians. And therefore Hercules hauing no meanes to reuenge so great an iniurie by armes and warre, sought to execute his long smothered malice by giuing him a dangerous counsell; such are the operations of malice, working in minds mightie, who seldome hold it any breach of iustice to be reuenged of him that offereth the first iniurie.

But now Italy being possessed with a brute of those things which were in practise on the other side the mountaines, and whose first authors at the beginning were vncertaine, many thoughts and discourses appeared in the vnderstandings of men. For to many (weighing the power and strength of the French King, and the readinesse of that Nation to new broiles and innouations, with the present diuisions and factions of the Italians) it seemed a businesse of great qualitie and importance: and others, by reason of the Kings greennesse in age, and also considering the negligence naturall to that nation, and lastly, looking into the impediments which great enterprises haue; construed all not to a counsell well grounded, but to a hot and vnbridled affection of youth, which after it had a litle throwne out his fume and fire, would easily vanish & dissolue. Ferdinand himselfe (against whom all this businesse was conspired) shewed litle appearance of feare, saying, it was an enterprise intangled with many difficulties; for that if they made their inuasion by sea, they should find him furnished with a plentifull nauie, armed able to giue him battell in the plaine sea, his ports being furnished, and his forts well manned and victualled: neither was there any Baron in the Realme able to receiue them, as had bene done afore to Iohn of Anion, by the Prince of Bossane, and other great ones of the land. And touching their expedition by land, it was full of incommodities, suspitious to many, and a painfull march farre off; for that their way lying all along the length of Italy, the residue of the Princes could not be without their particular feares, and perhaps Lodowike Sforce more then others, notwithstanding he made shew of the contrary; seeming as though a common perill brought interest to euery particular: for that the proximitie and neighborhood of Millan with France, gaue vnto the King a greater oportunitie, and in true likelihood, a greater desire to possesse and occupie that Duchie. And seeing the yong and true Duke of Millan was of neare kindred to the King, Lodowike could not other waies assure himselfe; but that the King caried an intention to deliuer him from his oppression; hauing not many yeares before protested openly, that he would not endure that Iohn Galeas his cousin should be so vnworthily restrained and kept vnder: That the state of them of Aragon stood not vpon such termes and conditions, as the hope of their weakenesse might induce the courage of the French to make inuasions vpon them; for that they were plentifully furnished with many numbers of valiant men at armes, great troupes of horses of seruice, many stores of munitions and artilleries, and all other necessary things for the warre, together with so rich a mint of money, that it suffised against all wants, prouisions and fortunes: That besides many honorable Captaines trained and experienced, he had for the conduct of his armies, his eldest sonne, Duke of Calabria, a Leader of great renowme, and no lesse vertue, growne into a mind resolute, a counsell stayed and well aduised, and an assured experience, by following all the warres in Italy for many yeares before. To these forces he added the powers of his kindred and allies, of whose ready aide and assistance he nothing doubted, hauing speciall expectation to receiue plentifull succours from the King of Spaine his cousin, and brother to his wife, not onely in respect of the double knot of parentage, but also for that in good policie it stood him vpon, to hold for suspected the neighbourhood of the French men to Sicile.

The thoughts of Ferdinand King of Naples.

Ferdinand doth flatter himselfe.

This was the glorious humor of Ferdinand, bringing forth in publike many brags touching his owne power and greatnesse, and to the contempt and lessening of the forces and meanes of his aduersaries. These be properties oftentimes familiar with Princes, to whom there cannot be a more sensible and apparent token of their aduersitie or ruine, then when they esteeme themselues more then they are, and make their enemies lesse then they find them.

But Ferdinand, as he was a Prince of singular wisedome, and well assured experience; so in himselfe he found his mind tormented with many very grieuous thoughts, beholding with a fresh memory the troubles he had receiued of the French nation in the beginning of his raigne: he debated deeply, that he should haue to do with enemies warlike and mightie, for their troupes of horsmen farre aboue him; in footmen infinite, in ensignes well appointed, trained and disciplined: for prouisions at sea, nothing wanting to an army royall: for artilleries plentifull, full, ſundry, and terrible: for money, his Mines and mintings furniſhed aboue all wants that could happen: and of men, infinite in multitudes, reſolute in minds, for ſeruice apt, of faith aſſured, of wils tractable, for commandement obedient; and laſtly, bearing all one common deſire to commit their liues to any danger for the glory and greatneſſe of their naturall King. But of the contrary, touching himſelfe, all things were ſuſpected of him, his Realme being full of hatred againſt the name of the Aragons, or at leaſt of no litle inclination to commotion, and the moſt part of the reſidue, of an ordinary deſire to haue new kings, wherein fortune may be of more power then faith: his ſtrength was mightier in opinion then in true forces: his treaſure laid vp and reſerued, not ſufficient to carry the neceſſary expences for his defence, ſince all things by the warre being turned into rebellion and tumults, his reuenues would conuert to nothing in a moment. He ſaw that in Italy he had many enemies, and with none any friendſhip firme or well aſſured; hauing at ſome times bene grieuous to all, either by armes, or other violent meanes. And for Spaine, according to the examples paſt, and conditions of the ſame Realme, he had no expectation of other ſuccours for his perils, then large promiſes, with a great name of operations, but very ſlender and ſlow effects. Laſtly, his feares were augmented by the vnfortunate predictions that went of his houſe, come to his knowledge at ſundry times, partly by ancient writings found out of new, partly by the interpretations and words of men for the moſt part vncertaine of the preſent, whom he eſteemed certaine touching things to come: which things in proſperitie we beleeue but litle, and in aduerſitie too much, ſpecially if there ariſe any apparence.

What Ferdinand feared.

The maner of the Spaniards.

The King of Naples wandring in theſe conſiderations, and his feares being greater without compariſon then his hopes, he ſaw there were no better remedies againſt ſo great dangers, then either with all ſpeed poſſible to remoue by ſome agreement, ſuch thoughts from the French Kings mind, or at leaſt to take from him part of the foundations which ſtirred him to the warre. And therefore hauing ſent Embaſſadors into France, to treate of a marriage betweene the King of Scots and Charlot daughter of Dom Federicke his ſecond ſonne; the diſpoſition of which marriage was gouerned by the French King, for that the yong Ladie was nouriſhed in his Court, and borne of a ſiſter of the mother of King Charles: he diſpatched new commiſſions for the matters preſent and running; he ioyned with them in deputation and aſſiſtance, Camille Pandon, hauing bene vſed in negotiation for him there before, the better to labour priuatly ſuch as were chiefeſt guiders of the Kings counſels, and others bearing inclination to profit, promiſes, and corrupt offers: and if they could not by other meanes appeaſe or remoue the Kings intention to the warre, then to offer him conditions of tribute, and other ſubmiſſions; and ſo, if it were poſſible, to obtaine peace. Beſides this, he applied not onely all his thoughts, diligence and authoritie to compoſe the difference of the Caſtles bought by Virginio, (to whoſe intractabilitie and obſtinacie he referred the chiefe occaſion of all theſe diſorders) but alſo he ſtudied to giue a new life to the practiſes of parentage, commuued vpon before betweene the Pope and him. But aboue all others, his deepeſt care and thought was, to appeaſe and aſſure Lodowike Sforce (firſt author and mouer of all the miſchiefe,) perſwading himſelfe, that feare, more then other occaſion, led him to ſo dangerous a counſell. And therefore (according to the neceſſities that followed him) preferring his particular ſuretie afore the naturall reſpect and intereſt of his Neece, or the ſafetie of the ſonne borne of her: he offered by many embaſſages to referre himſelfe wholly to his will, touching the things of John Galeas, and the Duchie of Millan. In which offers, more generall then honorable, he had no regard to the aduice of his ſon Alphonſo; who to amaze, confuſe and threaten Lodowike, iudged it the readieſt meanes to make him giue ouer thoſe new counſels: wherein albeit he might take courage of the naturall fearfulneſſe of Lodowike, yet we often ſee, that no leſſe eaſily is the timorous man caried by deſpaire into deliberations headlong and hurtfull, then the raſh man, by credulitie, fury and want of conſideration, runneth into enterpriſes that bring forth danger, diſhonor and ſhame.

Ferdinand is wiſe, but too late.

At laſt were appeaſed the controuerſies of the Caſtles, after many difficulties proceeding more of Virginio then of the Pope; to the concluſion of which compoſition, came Dom Federike, ſent to Rome by his father for that effect. The accord ranne, that they ſhould remaine in the poſſeſſion and right of Virginio, repaying to the Pope equall proportion of money, which he had giuen at firſt to Franceſquin Cibo: together with this, was knit vp the mariage of the Ladie Sances baſtard daughter to Alphonſo, with Dom Geffray yongeſt ſonne to the Pope, (both the one and other, by reaſon of their greene age, vnable to conſummate or accompliſh the marriage.) Theſe were the conditions: That Dom Geffray ſhould go to remaine at Naples after a few moneths: that he ſhould receiue in dowry and reſpect of the mariage, the principalitie of Squillace, valued at ten thouſand duckats in yearly reuenue; and that Ferdinand ſhould giue to him a company of an hundred men at armes. This confirmed the opinion of many, that all that the Pope ſolicited in France, bare no other meaning, then by feare to draw them of Aragon to theſe agreements. This was one argument to approue their coniectures; that Ferdinand laboured to make a confederation with him for their common defence: but the Pope obiected ſo many difficulties, that there was no other thing obtained of him then a very ſecret promiſe by writing to defend the kingdome of Naples, ſo that Ferdinand would equally promiſe to protect the eſtate of the Church.

Theſe things diſpatched, the companies of men at armes which the Venetians and the Duke of Millan had ſent to the Pope for his ſuccours, retired with licence and fauour out of the Church dominions. Ferdinand alſo began now with no leſſe hope of happie ſucceſſe to treate with Lodowike Sforce, who with a wonderfull ſubtiltie and art, ſhewed himſelfe ſometimes ill contented with the inclination of the French King to the matters of Italy, and ſometimes excuſed and iuſtified himſelfe vpon his neceſſitie, for that by reaſon of his chiefe of Genes, and the ancient confederation with the houſe of France, he was conſtrained to hearken to the requeſts made to him (as he ſaid) by the ſame King. But ſometimes he promiſed to Ferdinand in publike, and ſometimes to the Pope and Peter de Medicis apart and ſeuerally, to do all he could to moderate the Kings deſire, aſſaying to lull them aſleepe in this hope, to the end they conſpired or dreſſed nothing againſt him, before the affaires of France were well proceeded and eſtabliſhed: wherein they were the more eaſie to beleeue him, by how much they iudged the reſolution to bring the French King into Italy, ſo ill for his owne ſuretie, that in conſideration of his particular perill, and the common intereſt of Italy, they ſuppoſed he would vtterly diſclaime and ſhake it off. All this Sommer paſt in this nature of doings, Lodowike working vnder ſuch diſguiſed formes and maners, that without giuing any ſuſpition to the French King, neither Ferdinand, the Pope, nor the Florentines deſpaired of his promiſes, nor yet altogether truſted him.

The ſubtilties of Lod. Sforce.

But in this meane while were laid in France with no ſmall ſtudy, the foundations of the warre and expedition to come, whereunto (contrary to the counſels of moſt of the greateſt) inclined more and more the affection of the King; who, to be more at libertie, accorded the differences he had with Ferdinand and Iſabel King and Queene of Spaine, Princes in thoſe times of great report and name for gouernment and wiſedome, both for that they had drawne their Realmes out of great troubles into a ſetled tranquillitie, and alſo had recouered to Chriſtianitie (with a warre of ten yeares continuance) the kingdome of Granado, vſurped by the Moores of Affrica ſor almoſt eight hundred yeares. It was expreſſed in this recapitulation (ſolemnly iuſtified by publike oath of both parts in the Church) that in Ferdinand nor Iſabel (for Spaine was gouerned vnder their common name) ſhould be no action of aid to the Aragons directly nor indirectly: no contract of any new affinitie or alliance: nor that in no ſort they ſhould oppoſe againſt King Charles for the defence of the Realme of Naples. The King, in counterchange and recompence of theſe, (beginning by a loſſe certaine, for a hope of gaine vncertaine) reſtored without any repaiment of money, Parpignian, with all the Earldome of Roſſellion, pawned many yeares before to Lewis his father, by John King of Aragon and father to Ferdinand: an exchange altogether againſt the will and liking of the whole Nation of France; for that that Earldome ſeated at the foote of the hils Pyrenei, and conſequently according to the ancient diuiſion, part of Gallia, gaue alwayes neceſſary impediments to them of Aragon for entring into France on that ſide.

Preparations in France for the warres of Italy.

The King, for the ſame occaſion made peace with Maximilian King of the Romaines, and with his ſonne Philip Archduke of Auſtrich, in whom was no want of occaſion either of old or new hatreds againſt him: but ſpecially for that his father Lewis, by the death of Charles Duke of Burgondie and Earle of Flanders, with many other countries conioyning, did impatronize himſelfe vpon the Duchie of Burgondie and Earldome of Arteys, with many other places which the ſaid Duke poſſeſſed: whereof growing no ſmall warres betweene King Lewis and Marie the onely daughter of Duke Charles, married after the death of her father to Maximilian: there was made at laſt (Marie being dead, and Philip the common ſonne of Maximilian and her, ſucceeding to the inheritance of his mother) an accord amongſt them, more by the wils of the people of Flanders, then readineſſe of Maximilian. The better to confirme this accord, Margaret the ſiſter of Philip, was married to Charles the ſonne of Lewis, and (notwithſtanding ſhe was very yong) led into France; where after ſhe had remained many yeares, Charles refuſed her, and tooke to wife Anne, to whom by the death of Francis her father leauing no iſſue male, the Duchie of Brittaine was deſcended. This was a double iniury to Maximilian, being at one time made fruſtrate the mariage of his daughter, and his owne, hauing by procuration afore married the ſaid Anne: and yet, for that he was not able of himſelfe to ſuſtaine the warre recontinued by occaſion of this iniury, and that the people of Flanders (gouerning themſelues by their proper counſell and authoritie, by reaſon of the minoritie of Philip) would not dwell in warre with the Realme of France; and laſtly, ſeeing that the Kings of Spaine and England had diſſolued their armies which they had leuied againſt the French, he conſented to the peace; by the which King Charles reſtored to Philip his ſiſter Margaret detained in France till then, together with the townes of the Earldome of Artoys, reſeruing to himſelfe the Caſtles, but vnder bond to render them at foure yeares end; at what time Philip being riſen to his maioritie, might in good validitie confirme the accord paſt. Thoſe townes when the peace was made by King Lewis, were acknowledged by cõmon agreement as the proper right of the ſaid Margaret. The generall peace thus eſtabliſhed with all the neighbours to the Realme of France, the reſolution of the warre againſt the kingdome of Naples, was confirmed for the yeare following: in which time were prepared all prouiſions neceſſary, continually ſolicited by Lodowike Sforce; who (the thoughts of men aduancing from degree to degree) occupied his wits now not onely how to aſſure the gouernment to him, but lifting vp his mind to higher conceits, he had an intention to transferre to himſelfe the Duchie of Millan, vnder the occaſion of the warre againſt the Aragons; wherein to giue ſome colour of iuſtice to ſo great an iniuſtice, and with more firme foundations to aſſure his affaires againſt all fortunes that might happen, he married Blanche Marie ſiſter to John Galeas, and his Neece to Maximilian newly aſpired to the Empire of Rome, by the death of Federike his father: to him he promiſed in dowry to be paid within a certaine time foure hundred thouſand duckats of ready mony, with iewels and other ornaments to the value of fortie thouſand duckats: and of the other part, Maximilian thirſting more after money then affinitie by his mariage, bound himſelfe to endow Lodowike (to the preiudice of John Galeas, his new brother in law) with the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, for him, his children and ofſpring, as though that Eſtate had remained without lawfull Dukes euer ſince the death of Philip Maria Viſcount. At the latter paiment of the money, he promiſed to giue him all the priuiledges and prerogatiues accompliſhed in moſt ample forme.

Mariage of Blanche Mary Sforce with the Emperour Maximilian.

The Viſcounties, gentlemen of Millan, during the bloudy factions in Italy betweene the Gebelins and Guelffes, and after the Guelffes were ſuppreſſed: of principall men of one part of Millan, became Lords and abſolute maſters of the whole Citie, (ſuch fruits for the moſt part are bred by ciuill diſcords.) And in this greatneſſe, after they had continued many yeares, they ſought (according to the common aduancement of tyrannies, the better to diſguiſe their vſurpation with a ſhew of right) to ſtrengthen firſt colours lawfull, and after to ſet out their fortune with moſt ample titles: therefore after they had firſt obtained of the Emperours (of whom Italy began to know rather the name then the power) the title of Captains, and then of Vicars of the Empire; in the end, John Galeas (who for that his father in law John king of France had giuen him the Earldome of Vertus, called himſelfe Earle of Vertus) obtained of Vinceſlao king of Romaines, for him and his iſſue males, the dignitie of Duke of Millan; in which ſucceeded him the one after the other, John Maria and Philip Maria his ſonnes. But the line maſculine being determined by the death of Philip, albeit by his teſtament he had inſtituted as his heire Alphonſo king of Aragon and Naples, partly for the recompence of the amitie he ſhewed at his deliuery, but more for that the Duchie of Millan defended by ſo mightie a Prince, ſhould not fall into the ſubiection of the Venetians aſpiring manifeſtly to it: yet Francis Sforce at that time a Captaine valiant, and equally ſeene in affaires of peace and warre, being aſſiſted with many occaſions then occurrent, and more eſteeming to reigne then to keepe faith, held with armes the ſaid Duchie as appertaining to Blanche Maria his wife, the baſtard daughter of Philip: and albeit it was ſuppoſed, that ſoone after with a ſmall portion of money he might haue purchaſed of the Emperour Federike the inueſtiture of that State; yet truſting he was able to keepe it by the ſame meanes wherewith he had wonne it, he made ſmall reckoning of that office in the Emperour.

Thus without inueſtiture continued Galeas his ſonne, and Iohn Galeas his latter ſonne; by reaſon whereof Lodowike bearing himſelfe wickedly at one time againſt his Nephew liuing, and doing wrong to the memory of his father and brother deceaſſed, maintained that not one of them were lawfull Dukes of Millan; procuring himſelfe, as of an Eſtate deuolued to the Empire, to be inueſted by Maximilian; and by that reaſon bare the title, not of the ſeuenth, but of the fourth Duke of Millan: which things (ſo long as his Nephew liued) were not ſuffered to come but to a few mens knowledge. Beſides, following the example of Cyrus, yonger brother to Artaxerxes king of Perſia, (which alſo he confirmed with the authoritie of many Lawyers) he auouched that he was before his brother, not in yeares and age, but for that he was the firſt borne after their father became Duke of Millan. This reaſon, together with the firſt, was beſtowed amongſt the Imperiall priuiledges; wherein to cloke with a vaine couer the ambition of Lodowike, there was alſo written in letters ſeparate, that it was not the cuſtome of the holy Empire to conſent or paſſe any Eſtate to any that afore had holden it vnder the authoritie of another; for which cauſe Maximilian had kept no reckoning of the petitions made by Lodowike to obtaine the inueſtiture for Iohn Galeas, hauing afore acknowledged the ſame Duchie of the people of Millan.

Ridiculous reaſon confirmed by force.

In this mariage made by Lodowike of his Neece with Maximilian, Ferdinand tooke increaſe of hope, that Lodowike would eſtrange himſelfe from the amitie of the French King: theſe were the reaſons and arguments of his hope; for that he had knit himſelfe with Maximilian enemy and corriuall to the French king by many occaſions: the departing with ſo great a ſumme of mony might induce the Kings ſuſpition againſt him: and laſtly, this new coniunction miniſtring occaſion of courage and heart, he ſuppoſed he would not be fearfull to diuide himſelfe from the French doings. This hope Lodowike nouriſhed with great cunning; and with the veile of the ſame ſo blinded all others, that at one time he communicated with Ferdinand and the other Potentates of Italy, and withall entertained the King of Romaines, and yet kept the French from iealouſie. Ferdinand alſo iudged that it could not but be diſpleaſing and intollerable to the Senate of Venice (to whom he had ſent Embaſſadors) that a Prince ſo mightie aboue them, ſhould enter the heart of Italy, wherein they had the chiefeſt place, opinion and authoritie: beſides, he fed much of the hopes in the King and Queene of Spaine, who had promiſed him great ſuccours, if neither by perſwaſions, offers nor authoritie, he could not breake the enterpriſe. On the other ſide, the French king hauing taken away all impediments on that ſide the mounts, began to practiſe to remoue ſuch difficulties as might fall to his hinderance on the other ſide the hils: In that action he ſent Peron de la Bache, a man not ignorant in the affaires of Italy, by the experience he had there vnder Iohn of Anion; who after he had made knowne to the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and the Florentines, the reſolution of his King to recouer the kingdome of Naples, he made petition to them all to enter ſocietie, fellowſhip and communitie with him: but he reaped no other fruite then fraile hopes and generall anſwers; for that the warre being not to be executed till the next yeare, euery one refuſed to diſcouer ſo long before his intention. In like ſort, the King required of the Embaſſadours of Florence (ſent to him a litle before by Ferdinands conſent, to excuſe themſelues of the imputation that they inclined to the partie of the Aragons) to haue paſſage and victuals for his armie in their iuriſdictions at reaſonable rate; and that to accompanie him to the kingdome of Naples, they would furniſh him with an hundred men at armes, which he ſaid, he required as a ſigne, that the Commonweale of Florence ſtood with him in amitie. Albeit they anſwered him with many reaſons and declarations, that they could not in that ſort proteſt without great peril, vntil his armie were paſſed into Italy; and albeit they affirmed, that he might be well aſſured that in all accidents and fortunes, that Citie ſhould not faile to miniſter to him all thoſe conuenient effects, of office, obſeruance and deuotion which of long time they had borne to the Crowne of France; yet they were conſtrained, according to the French importunities, to promiſe all thoſe things, otherwiſe they were threatned to ſuffer priuation of that great Mart and traffike of merchandize which the Florentine Nation had in that Realme. It was knowne after, that theſe compulſions were enforced by Lodowike, at that time the principall diſpoſer of all the French practiſes with the Italians.

Peter de Medicis laboured much to perſwade Ferdinand, that thoſe demaunds imported ſo little the ſubſtance of the warre, that it would be more for his profit if the Commonweale and he continued amitie with the French King, hauing by that meanes good way and oportunitie

to make ſome compoſition, then in refuſing thoſe ſmall demands, to declare themſelues his enemies, and ſo ſuffer no poſſibilitie to do good to him. He alleaged withall the generall complaints and hatreds which he ſhould heape vpon himſelfe, if the traffike of Florence were reſtrained in France; or that the entercourſe there, ſo neceſſary to the vpholding of the Citie, ſhould ſuſpend, and perhaps come in time to loſe his libertie and practiſe. He told him, it was conuenient, in good faith and meaning (the principall ground of confederations) that euery confederate ſhould ſuffer patiently ſome incommoditie, to the end the other runne not into more greater harmes. But Ferdinand, who conſidered how much of his reputation and ſuretie would diminiſh if the Florentines were deuided from him, was not ſatisfied with theſe reaſons, but complained grieuouſly, that the faith and conſtancie of Peter began ſo ſoone not to anſwer his owne promiſe and the expectation he had conceiued of him: by reaſon whereof, Peter reſolutely diſpoſed aboue all things to continue in amitie with them of Aragon, vſed many meanes to ſuſpend and deferre the anſwer importunatly demanded by the French; referring them in the end to vnderſtand the full wils and intentions of the Commonweale by new Embaſſadors.

Good reaſons alleaged by Peter Medicis and by him not executed.

About the end of this yeare, the alliance made betweene the Pope and Ferdinand, began to wauer and ſhake, either for that the Pope in obiecting new difficulties, aſpired to obtaine of him greater things then he had; or elſe that he perſwaded himſelfe to induce him by this meanes to bring again to his obedience the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula, whom (offering firſt for his ſecuritie, the faith of the Colledge of Cardinals, of Ferdinand, and of the Venetians) he deſired much to ſee returned to Rome: he held his abſence much ſuſpected, for the importance of the rocke of Oſtia; holding in his hands about Rome, Roncillon and Grotaferrata, by the fauours, opinion and authoritie which he had in the Court: but chiefly he was iealous ouer him, for that naturally he was deſirous of innouation, and obſtinate to hazard rather all danger, then to be cut off from one point of his counſels and purpoſes. Ferdinand excuſed himſelfe much, that he had no power to apply the Cardinall thereunto, whoſe ſuſpition was ſo great, that all ſuretie ſeemed to him leſſe then the perill: he complained to the Pope of his hard fortune, that on him alwayes was laid the imputation of things which in truth proceeded from others: he was ſory that the Pope had beleeued, that by his motion and by his money, Virginio had bought the Caſtles, being indeed bought without his priuitie or medling. Indeed he had diſpoſed Virginio to the compoſition; and for that effect had furniſhed him with the money which was giuen in repaiment and recompence of the Caſtles. The Pope receiued not theſe excuſes, but with hard and bitter words complained of Ferdinand, and ſo gaue ſhew that there could be laid no firme ground of their reconciliation.

With ſuch a diſpoſition of minds and confuſion of things, ſo apparently drawing to new troubles, began the yeare 1494. (I interprete the yeare according to the vſe of Rome.) A yeare very vnhappie for Italy, and indeed the firſt of the vnfortunate and miſerable yeares, for that in it was made open the way to infinite and horrible calamities, whereof we may well ſay, a great part of the world by many accidents hath taſted euer ſince. In the beginning of this yeare, King Charles refuſing to heare ſpeake of any agreement with Ferdinand, enioyned his Embaſſadours as meſſengers of a King enemy, to depart with ſpeed out of the Realme of France: and almoſt in the ſame concurrence of time, the ſaid Ferdinand died ſuddenly of an Apoplexie, being more trauelled with cares and perplexities of mind, then loaden with yeares, or weaked with old age: he was a Prince of ſingular wiſedome and induſtrie, with the which (accompanied with happie fortune) he kept himſelfe in the kingdome newly obtained by his father, againſt many difficulties appearing euen in the beginning of his raigne; and brought to it much more amplitude and greatneſſe, then was done vnder any other King perhaps long before: A good King, if he had continued to raigne in the ſame maner he began: but either with the variation of times, or change of manners, becauſe he knew not (with moſt Princes now adayes) how to reſiſt the fury of dominion and rule; or perhaps according to the iudgement of euery one, his nature and inclination beginning now to diſcloſe, which he had couered afore with great cunning: he was eſteemed a man of litle faith, and of ſuch violent and cruell moods, that euen by his owne followers he was iudged worthy of the name of inhumanitie. The opinion was, that the death of Ferdinand hapned very inconuenient for the common affaires; for that where he would haue proued all remedies to hinder the deſcending of the French men, it was not now to be doubted but it would be more hard to make Lodowike aſſure himſelfe of the haughtie and immoderate nature of Alphonſo, then it was to diſpoſe him to renew amitie with Ferdinand, in whom was for the moſt part expreſſed a ready inclination (the better to auoid all quarrels with the State of Millan) to yeeld and condeſcend to his will. And amongſt other things, it is manifeſt, that when Iſabel Alphonſoes daughter was brought to John Galeas her husband, Lodowike at the firſt ſight ſuffered himſelfe to ſlide into ſo great affection towards her, that he deſired her of Alphonſo for his wife; and to that end (according to the vniuerſall opinion of Italy) he did ſo much by magicke and enchantments, that John Galeas for many moneths was made vnable to the action of mariage. Ferdinand was not intractable to this mariage; but Alphonſo ſo refuſed and reſiſted it, that Lodowike making no hope of it, tooke another wife, by whom hauing children, he turned all his ſtudies and thoughts to transferre to them the Duchie of Millan. Some ſuppoſe and write, that Ferdinand being determined (for the auoiding of the preſent warre) to ſuffer all indignities and incommodities, had an intention, as ſoone as the calmneſſe of the time would ſuffer, to go by ſea to Genes, and from thence by land to Millan, to ſatisfie Lodowike in all his deſires, and to bring againe to Naples his Neece, hoping that not onely with effects, but alſo with this publike confeſſion, by the which he acknowledged to hold all his eſtate and well doing by him, he ſhould remoue his mind from the warre, or at leaſt ſomewhat moderate his conſpiring intentions; the rather for that it was ſeene to all men of obſeruation, with what wonderfull ambition and deſire he aſpired to be noted the onely arbitrator and oracle of all Italy. Alphonſo immediatly after the death of his father, diſpatched foure Embaſſadors to the Pope, who albeit he ſhewed manifeſt ſignes that he was returned to the firſt inclination of amity with the French; and had at the ſame time by Bull ſubſigned by the colledge of Cardinals, promiſed at the French Kings requeſt, the eſtate of Cardinall to the Biſhop of S. Malo, and retained in common with the Duke of Millan Proſper Colonne, whom the King afore had taken to his pay, together with other Captaines and leaders of men of warre: yet he made no great difficultie to accord, in regard of the profitable conditions offered by Alphonſo, who deſired much to be aſſured of him, and to bind him to his protection and defence. They made theſe open agreements; That there ſhould be betweene them a confederation for the defence of their Eſtates, with equall leuies of men by both: That the Pope ſhould conferre vnto Alphonſo the inueſtiture of the kingdome, with diminution of tribute obtained by Ferdinand of other Popes for his life onely: That the Pope ſhould ſend a Legat to crowne him: That he ſhould create Cardinall Lodowike ſonne of Henrie, baſtard brother to Alphonſo, who afterwards was called Cardinall of Aragon: That King Alphonſo ſhould pay immediatly to the Pope thirtie thouſand duckets: That he ſhould endow the Duke of Candia with Eſtates within the Realme of twelue thouſand duckets reuenue yearly, together with the firſt of the ſeuen principall offices that ſhould be void: That he ſhould entertaine him ſo long as the Pope liued in his pay with three hundred men at armes, with the which he ſhould be bound to ſerue the one and the other equally and indifferently: That he ſhould giue to Dom Geffray (who for the pawne of his fathers faith, was now to go to his father in law) the eſtate of Pronotorie and one of the ſeuen offices, ouer and beſides the promiſes of the firſt contract: That he ſhould beſtow the reuenue of benefices in the Realme vpon Ceſar Borgia the Popes ſonne, who a litle before was created Cardinall by his father; wherein to auoid impediments of being a baſtard (to whom it hath not bene accuſtomed to grant ſuch dignities) he made proofe by ſuborned teſtimonies, that he was the ſonne lawfull of another. Beſides all this, Virginio Vrſin (who by the Kings ſending for, came to this capitulation) promiſed that the King ſhould aid the Pope to recouer the rocke of Oſtia, if the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula refuſed to come to Rome: which promiſe King Alphonſo affirmed to be made without his cõſent or priuitie, knowing that in ſo dangerous ſeaſons, it would bring no litle preiudice to him to be deprined of the Cardinal, whoſe authoritie was not ſmall in the towne of Genes, which he determined to ſurpriſe by the ſetting on of the Cardinall. And becauſe amidſt ſo great troubles and emotions, there might perhaps be treaties of Councels, or other matters preiudiciall to the ſea Apoſtolik, he did what he could to vnite him with the Pope, who not ſatisfied with any condition, if the Cardinall returned not to Rome; and the Cardinall being moſt obſtinate to hazard his life vnder the faith of thoſe Catilines, as he termed them, the diligence of Alphonſo was in vaine, and his deſire of no effect: for after the Cardinall with many diſſembled and flouriſhing ſhewes, had giuen almoſt aſſured hope to accept the conditions, he ſtole away by night from Oſtia in a brigantine well appointed, and at a time when was leaſt reaſon to doubt any ſuch euaſion, leauing

uing the rocke armed with ſufficient garriſon; and repoſing certaine dayes at Saone, and ſpending ſome litle time at Auignion, (of which citie he was Legat) he went laſtly to Lyons, where King Charles was come a litle before, to prepare with better oportunitie and reputation the prouiſions of the warre which he publiſhed he would execute in perſon: he was receiued of the King with great ioy and honor, and immediatly ioyned himſelfe to thoſe that ſtudied to trouble Italy.

In this meane while Alphonſo, more by feare then proper inclination, forgot not to continue with Lodowike Sforce that which had bene begun by his father, offering him the ſame ſatisfactions. But Lodowike, to whom nothing was more familiar then to diſſemble, deuiſed to entertaine him with diuers hopes, but with demonſtrations that he was conſtrained to proceed in ſuch exact order and conſideration, leſt the warre determined againſt others, tooke not his beginning againſt him. He left not for all this to ſolicite and vrge the preparations in France; wherein to expreſſe the deuotion of his mind with better effect, and to reſolue all particularities occurrent in that expedition; and laſtly, leſt the execution of all things determined ſhould ſuffer ſuſpence or haue ſlow action, he ſent thither (colouring it with a brute of the Kings pleaſure) Galeaz of S. Seuerin, husband to one of his baſtard daughters, and in whom he repoſed great confidence and truſt. According to the counſels of Lodowike, King Charles ſends to the Pope foure Embaſſadors, with charge that in paſſing by Florence, they ſhould make inſtance for the declaration of that Commonweale. The Embaſſadors were Eberar d'Aubignie a Scottiſh Captaine of nation, the Generall of France, the Preſident of the Parliament of Prouence, and the ſame Peron la Bache that had bene with them the yeare before. They according to their inſtructions (ſet downe chiefly at Millan) recounted in both the one and other places, the rights which the French king (as ſucceſſor to the houſe of Anion, and for want of iſſue in Charles the firſt) pretended to the Realme of Naples, together with his royall determination to paſſe that yeare into Italy in perſon, not to intrude into any thing that belonged to another, but to reobtaine that which iuſtly was his owne: And to giue his voyage a more plauſible paſſage in the minds of men, they ſaid, his mind and meanings were not ſo much fixed vpon the conqueſt of Naples, as that afterwards he would turne his forces againſt the Turks, for the ſeruice of Ieſus Chriſt, and glory of his name. They declared to the Florentines, how much their King aſſured himſelfe of that Citie, hauing bene reedified by Charlemaine, and fauoured alwaies of the Kings his predeceſſors, and lately of King Lewis his father, in the warres vniuſtly managed againſt them by Pope Sixtus, by Ferdinand laſt dead, and Alphonſo now raigning. They willed them to looke into the great profits coming to their nation by traffike and entercourſe in the realme of France, where they were fauoured with familiaritie and offices, as if they were naturall of the region it ſelfe. And with that example they might hope to haue in the kingdome of Naples (if he became Lord of it) the ſelfe ſame libertie of trade, ſuretie and benefit; where, of them of Aragon they neuer receiued other things, then damage, dangers and diſpleaſures. They recommended to their good counſels the conſiderations of theſe things, and to proteſt by ſome token, that they would ioyne with him in this enterpriſe. But if they were reſtrained by ſome iuſt impediment, reaſon or excuſe, at leaſt that they would grant libertie of paſſage to his army through their territories, and refreſhing, and victuals for his money. They debated theſe things with the Commonweale and generall State; but they recommended particularly to Peter de Medicis the reſpect of many good turnes and honours done by Lewis the xj. to his father and anceſtors; how he in very iealous and dangerous ſeaſons, had made many demonſtrations for the preſeruation of their greatneſſe, and in ſigne of amitie, had honored them with the Scutchions and Armes proper to the houſe of France: where, Ferdinand not ſatisfied to perſecute them with open and violent warres, did alſo with a mind ſworne to their ruine, take part with the ciuill conſpiracies, wherein Iulian his vnkle was killed, and Laurence his father ſore hurt. The Embaſſadors went out of Florence without reſolution, and being at Rome, they preferred to the Popes remembrance the ancient merits and perpetuall deuotion of the Crowne of France to the Sea Apoſtolike, whereof were authentike teſtimonies, all records both ancient and preſent; and of the contrary, they inſinuated the ordinary contumacie and diſobedience of them of Aragon, and referred the proofe to the view and conſtruction of their actions paſt. Then they demanded, that the Realme of Naples might be inueſted in the perſon of their King, as iuſtly appertaining to him. They allured him with many hopes, and made many offers, ſo that he would be fauourable to the enterpriſe which their King had taken vpon him, as much by his perſwaſions and authoritie,

The French king ſendeth Embaſſadors to the Pope, Florentines and Venites

as for other occaſions. To this demand, the Pope anſwered, that the inueſtiture of that Realme hauing bene granted by ſo many his predeceſſors to three Kings of the houſe of Aragon ſucceſſiuely, (for in the inueſtiture granted to Ferdinand, Alphonſo was comprehended by name) it was not conuenient to giue it to King Charles, afore it was declared by forme of iuſtice, that he had good right, whereunto the inueſtiture granted to Alphonſo was not preiudiciall, for that for ſuch conſideration it contained expreſſe mention, that it was meant without the preiudice of any perſon: he told them that the Realme of Naples did directly belong to the ſea Apoſtolike, whoſe authoritie he knew was farre from the Kings will to violate, and no leſſe contrary to the intentions of his anceſtors, who had bene alwayes the principall defenders of the ſame. But if he ſhould do any violent action vpon Naples, it could not be without manifeſt intruſion and tranſgreſſion of the holy Sea, and bring diſhonor to the reputation and merits of his elders: it would better become his dignitie and vertues to ſeeke to iuſtifie his pretence of right by courſe of iuſtice and moderate equitie, wherein as Lord, Patron, and onely Iudge of ſuch a cauſe, he offered himſelfe ready to adminiſter to him: And that a Chriſtian King ought not to demand more of a Pope, whoſe office was to reſtraine and forbid, and not to entertaine and nouriſh warres betweene Chriſtian Princes. And though he ſhould ſo farre incline to the Kings will, yet he ſhewed many difficulties and dangers, both by the neighbourhood of Alphonſo and the Florentines, whoſe vnitie all Tuskane followed; and alſo for the conſanguinitie and alliance of ſo many Barons holding of the King of Naples, whoſe Eſtates ſtretched euen to the gates of Rome. Notwithſtanding all this, he enforced himſelfe not to cut off their hope altogether, albeit he bare priuatly this ſetled reſolution, not to depart from the confederation made with Alphonſo. At Florence the inclination was great and generall to the houſe of France, for the liberall Mart and traffike which that State had with the French: for an old opinion (but vntrue) that Charlemaine was the reedifier of their citie deſtroyed by Totila King of the Gothes; for the ancient coniunction and amitie which their anceſtors the Guelffes haue had long time with Charles 1478. the firſt, king of Naples, and with many of his line, protectors of the faction of Guelffes in Italy: And laſtly, for the memory of the warres, which the old Alphonſo, and after him Ferdinand in the perſon of his ſonne, had raiſed againſt that Citie. By the reaſon, recordation and memory of theſe things, the commonaltie and multitude cried to conſent to free conduct and paſſage, deſiring no leſſe the beſt authorized and wiſe citizens in that Commonweale, to whom it ſeemed a great partialitie and ouerſight to pull vpon the countrey of Florence (for the controuerſies of another) ſo preſent and dangerous a warre: they held it no policie to oppoſe themſelues againſt ſo mightie an army, managed in the perſon of a king of France, deſcending into Italy with the fauour of the State of Millan, and no reſiſtance of the gouernment of Venice, though they publiſh no manifeſt conſent. This counſell they confirmed with the authoritie of Coſmo de Medicis (eſteemed in his time one of the wiſeſt in Italy) who in the warres betweene Iohn of Anion and Ferdinand, gaue alwaies this counſell, that the citie of Florence ſhould not obiect it ſelfe againſt Iohn, notwithſtanding the Pope and Duke of Millan were ioyned with Ferdinand. They remembred withall the example of Laurence father to Peter, who was of the ſame aduice vpon euery brute of the returne of them of Anion: yea ſo much was he amazed with the power of the French, ſince the ſame King obtained Britaine, that he would oftentimes ſay, that great troubles were prepared for all Italians, if the King of France knew his owne ſtrength. But Peter de Medicis, who meaſured things more by will then by wiſedome, abuſed himſelfe too much with his owne opinion, beleeuing that theſe emotions would rather reſolue into brutes, then into effects: wherein being gouerned by ſome his ſpeciall fauorites, corrupted perhaps with the preſents of Alphonſo, determined reſolutely to continue in amitie with the Aragons; whereunto in the end, all the reſidue of the Citizens muſt condeſcend, by reaſon of his greatneſſe. Ambition " is an vnquiet humour in man. It may be that Peter not content with the authoritie which his father had got in the Commonweale (and yet ſuch, by his diſpoſing, that though Magiſtrates were created, yet they determined no matters of importance without his aduice) aſpired to a power more abſolute, euen to the title of Prince: he did not debate with diſcretion the conditions of that Citie, who at that time being populous in multitudes, and mightie in riches, and nouriſhed by many ages with an apparence of a Commonweale, the principall citizens being accuſtomed to participate in the gouernment, rather in forme of companions then ſubiects, would hardly endure ſo great and ſudden mutation: and therefore Peter knowing that to the

holding vp of his ambition, muſt be ioyned foundations extraordinary: and the better to haue a mightie pillar to ſupport his new principalitie, he reſtrained himſelfe immoderatly to the Aragons, determining in their courſe to communicate with their fortunes. This perhaps was furthered by this accident; not many dayes before the Embaſſadors of the French arriued at Florence, there came to light certaine practiſes, which Laurence and Iohn de Medicis, yong men, rich, and neare in bloud to Peter, and lately become his enemies vpon certaine light occaſions of youth, conſpired with Lodowike Sforce, and by him with the French King, directly againſt the greatneſſe of Peter: but being arreſted by the Magiſtrates, they were with light puniſhment returned to their houſes in the countrey, for that the temperance of the Magiſtrates preuailing with Peter not without ſome difficulties, induced him not to ſuffer the lawes to execute any extreme action vpon his kindred and bloud: but receiuing warning by this accident, that Lodowike Sforce thirſted after his ruine, he eſteemed it ſo much the more needfull to remaine ſtill in his firſt purpoſe. At laſt the Embaſſadors were anſwered, but much to their diſcontentment, and more contrary to their deſire: in place of the concluſion they hoped for, they were told with words reuerent and reſpectiue, with what naturall deuotion the people of Florence honored the houſe of France, together with their common deſire to ſatisfie ſo great a King: on the other ſide, they made declaration of their impediments, as that there could be nothing more vnworthy of Princes and Commonweales, then not to keepe faith promiſed; which vnleſſe they ſhould apparently defile and breake, they could not now ſatisfie his demands, and content the time together: They ſaid, as yet was not ended the confederation which by the authoritie of King Lewis his father was made with Ferdinand, with couenant, that after his death it ſhould ſtretch to Alphonſo; wherein they were bound by ſpeciall condition, not onely to defend the Realme of Naples, but alſo to giue no paſſage through their countries to any that went about to inuade it: Laſtly, that it brought no ſmall griefe to them, that there was ſuch difference betweene their deſires and wils; and that they had no power to make other reſolutions, then ſuch as muſt either make the King diſpleaſed, or bring great preiudice to their whole Eſtate; onely they hoped that the King being wiſe and iuſt, would interprete them according to their good wils, and referre to thoſe reaſonable impediments that which they could not promiſe.

The Florentines anſwer the French Embaſſadors.

The King made angry with this anſwer, commanded immediatly the Embaſſadors of Florence to depart out of France; and following the counſell of Lodowike Sforce, he baniſhed out of Lyons, not the generall merchants, but onely the factors and bankers of Peter de Medicis, to the end that they might iudge at Florence, that he acknowledged this iniury particularly vpon Peter, and not vpon the body of the State.

The French king angrie with the Florentines anſwer.

The other Potentates of Italy being diuided amongſt themſelues, ſome bearing fauour to the French, and ſome fearing calamities and extreme fortunes, the Venetians onely determined to remaine newters, and with an idle eye to behold the iſſue of all things; perhaps they were not much troubled that Italy ſhould fall into garboile, hoping that the long warres of others would giue them oportunitie to enlarge their Eſtate; or perhaps the opinion of their greatneſſe would not ſuffer them to be doubtfull of perils: and therefore not fearing that the victors could haue any fortune ouer them, they iudged it a folly to make proper to them the warres of others, hauing no apparent neceſſitie. And yet Ferdinand ceaſſed not to ſolicite them continually; and the French king the yeare before, and euen then had ſent to them Embaſſadors, who forgat not to declare, that betweene the houſe of France and that Commonweale, was alwayes amitie and good will, and as occaſion offered, mutuall effects and offices expreſſed. The which diſpoſition, the King ſeeking to augment and ratifie, he deſired of that wiſe Senate counſell and fauour in this enterpriſe. Whereunto they anſwered with this moderation and breuitie; That the King for himſelfe was ſo wiſe and foreſeeing, and enuironed with a Councell ſo graue and ripe, that it could not be without too much preſuming to ioyne to him their opinions and counſels: They would be alwayes glad of his proſperities and good fortunes, for the obſeruances which they had alwayes borne to the Crowne of France: They were not a little grieued that they could not accompany the readineſſe of their minds with thoſe effects they deſired, for that by the ſuſpition wherein the Turke kept them continually, wanting neither deſire nor oportunitie to vexe them, neceſſitie compelled them to keepe alwayes with great charges many Iles and coaſt townes fronting vpon him; the ſame being the cauſe that they could not make themſelues parties to the warre of another. But the preparations which were made on all ſides, as well by land land as by ſea, were of farre greater importance, then either the orations of the Embaſſadors, or the anſwers made to them: for king Charles had ſent Peter d'Vrſe, his great Eſquire, to Genes (ouer which Citie the Duke of Millan commanded by the aide of the faction of Adorne and of Iohn Lewis de fieſco) to rig vp a mightie army of ſhips and gallies, cauſing alſo to be armed other veſſels in the ports of Ville Franche and Marſelles. This was the cauſe of the brute in his Court, that he determined to enter the kingdome of Naples by ſea, as had done afore time Iohn ſon of Rene againſt Ferdinand. In France albeit many beleeued, that what for the youth of the king, and the baſe condition and ſlender conduct of ſuch as ſtirred him to this expedition, together with the want and neceſſitie of money, theſe preparations in them would diſſolue and vaniſh into ſmoke: yet to ſatisfie the deſire of the King, who by the aduice of his fauourites had newly taken vpon him the title of King of Ieruſalem and both Sicilies, (then the title of the Kings of Naples) there was generall and diligent order giuen on all parts for the prouiſions of the warre; as making of muſters, gathering of money, remouing of men, with other induſtries due to ſuch expeditions: and no counſell had but with Galeas de S. Seuerin, who held incloſed in his mind all the ſecrets and purpoſes of Lodowike Sforce. On the other ſide, Alphonſo, in whom had wanted no policie or diligence to fortifie himſelfe by ſea and by land, (iudging now there was no more time to ſuffer himſelfe to be mocked with the hopes of Lodowike Sforce, and that it ſerued better for him to amaze and vexe him, then to trauell to aſſure or appeaſe him) commanded the Embaſſador of Millan to retire out of Naples, and reuoked his that was reſident at Millan: he ſequeſtred alſo, and tooke into his poſſeſſion the reuenues of the Duchie of Barie, which Lodowike had enioyed many yeares by the gift of Ferdinand. And not content with theſe things, which were rather demonſtrations of open hatred then of wrongs or offences, he diſpoſed al his wits to turne from the Duke of Millan the citie of Genes, a matter of right great importance for the preſent affaires, for that by the reuolt and change of that Citie, would happen many meanes to trouble Lodowike in his gouernment of Millan, and from the French King ſhould be taken away all oportunities to moleſt the realme of Naples by ſea. Therefore hauing made ſecret pact with Cardinall Paul Fregoſe, afore times Duke of Genes, and ſtill followed with many of the ſame family; and with Obietto de Fieſco, two principall men both for the towne and ſea, together with ſome particulars of the Adorneys, all baniſhed out of Genes for diuers occaſions: he determined to aſſay with a ſtrong armie at ſea, to ſet them all in the towne againe (following that he was wont to ſay, that warres are ouercome either in preuenting the enemie, or diuerting him:) he determined in like ſort to go himſelfe into Romagnia with a mightie army, and to make ſudden inuaſion vpon the lands of Parma; where publiſhing the name of Iohn Galeas, and diſplaying his banners, he hoped that the people of the Duchie of Millan would riſe againſt Lodowike. And be it that in this were found many difficulties, yet he iudged it profitable that the warre ſhould begin farre from his Realme: he eſteemed it alſo to be of great importance for the ſubſtance of the warre, that the French men ſhould be ſurpriſed with the Winter in Lombardie; wherein hauing great experience in the warres of Italy, (whoſe armies attending the riping of graſſe and forrage for the feeding of horſes, were not wont to take the field afore the end of Aprill:) he iudged that to eſchue the ſharpneſſe of Winter, they would be conſtrained to ſtay in a countrey of their friends till Spring time: in which intermiſſion and reſpite of time, he hoped that ſome occaſion for his benefite might happen. Beſides, he ſent Embaſſadours to Conſtantinople, to demand ſuccours, as in a common danger, of Baiazet Ottoman Prince of the Turks, for that it was reſolued in the French kings intention to paſſe into Greece after he had won Naples: which danger he knew well the Turke would not deſpiſe, for that by the memory of the warres made in times paſt againſt the Infidels in Aſia by the French Nation, the feare which the Turks had of their armes was not a litle.

Whileſt theſe things were thus ſolicited on all parts, the Pope ſent his men to Oſtia, vnder the gouernment of Nicholas Vrſin Count of Petillane, to whom Alphonſo ſent ſtrength and ſuccours both by ſea and land: he tooke the towne without difficultie, and then began to batter the Caſtle, (which by the meanes of Fabrice Colonne, and conſent of Iohn de la Rouere Prefect of Rome, and brother to Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula) was eaſily rendered to him by the caſtle-keeper, with this condition, that the Pope neither with cenſures of the Church, nor temporall armes, ſhould purſue the Cardinall nor the Prefect, if they gaue him no new occaſions: and it was ſuffered to Fabrice, in whoſe hands the Cardinall had left Grotta Ferrata, to continue the poſſeſſion of the ſame with the ſonde rights, paying to the Pope ten thouſand duckats. But Lodowike Sforce (to whom the Cardinall when he paſſed by Sauona, had made knowne that which Alphonſo by his meanes and counſels negociated ſecretly with the exiles of Genes) declared to King Charles what a great impediment that would giue to his enterpriſe, and therefore induced him to ſend to Genes two thouſand Swiſſers, and diſpatch into Italy with ſpeed three hundred lances, to be ready vnder the gouernment of Monſieur d'Aubigny, (who returning from Rome, ſtayed by the Kings commandement at Millan) both to aſſure Lombardie, and to paſſe further according to occaſions and neceſſities. To theſe ſhould be ioyned fiue hundred men at armes, Italians, entertained at that time in the Kings pay vnder John Francis de S. Severin Count of Caiazze, Galeot Pico Count of Myrandola, and Radolph of Gonſague, together with fiue hundred which the Duke of Millan was bound to furniſh: who not leauing his old ſhifts and ſubtilties, continued to confirme in the Pope and Peter de Medicis his inclination to the peace and ſuretie of Italy, nouriſhing them with varietie of hopes, which were not without their apparent demonſtrations.

It cannot almoſt be, but that which men make great ſuretie of, ingendreth ſome doubt, euen in the minds of ſuch as haue determined to beleeue the contrary. For albeit there was no great faith giuen to the promiſes of Lodowike, yet it happened not for all that, that their determined enterpriſes ſuffered in any ſort ſlow ſucceſſe of proceedings; and the Pope and Peter de Medicis could haue bene well content that the enterpriſe had bene proued to ſurpriſe Genes. But becauſe in the action they ſhould directly offend the Eſtate of Millan, the Pope (Alphonſo requiring his gallies, and to ioyne his men with him in Romagnia) conſented to the ſeruice of his men for the common defence in Romagnia, but not to paſſe further. And touching the gallies, he made difficultie, ſaying, it was not yet time to put Lodowike ſo much in deſpaire. The Florentines being required to receiue Alphonſoes armie by ſea in the port of Liuorne, and to refreſh them, remained in ſuſpence vpon the matter; for that making excuſes to the demands of the French King, and being acquited vnder the pretence of the confederation paſſed with Ferdinand, they were very vnwillingly diſpoſed to do more without neceſſitie, then they were bound vnto by that confederation.

The king of Naples ſendeth out his forces.

But matters being now not able to ſuffer any longer delay, Alphonſoes army by ſea departed at laſt from Naples vnder the charge of the Admirall Dom Federike: and Alphonſo in perſon aſſembled his army in Abruzze to paſſe into Romagnia: but afore any further action was done, he thought it neceſſary to communicate with the Pope, who had the ſame deſire, the better to eſtabliſh all things that were to be done for their common ſafetie.

The Pope and Alphonſo met together the thirteenth of Iuly at Vicouare, a place appertaining to Virginio Vrſin; where after they had ſpent three dayes, they returned well agreed. In this meeting and conſultation, it was determined by the counſell of the Pope, that the perſon of the King of Naples ſhould paſſe no further. His army contained litle leſſe then a hundred ſquadrons of men at armes, accounting twentie men to a ſquadron; and very neare three thouſand croſſebow ſhot and light horſemen. Of this army it was agreed, that one part ſhould ſtay with him vpon the frontiers of Abruzze, for his ſafetie and ſuretie of the ſtate Eccleſiaſtike; and that Virginio ſhould remaine in the towne of Rome, to make head againſt the Colonnoys: for dread of whom alſo it was agreed, that two hundred of the men at armes of the Pope, and a part of the light horſemen of the King, ſhould not ſtirre out of Rome: That the expedition into Romagnia, ſhould be performed in the perſon of Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, (that was the title of the eldeſt ſonne to the King of Naples) a yong Prince of great hope, leading with him lxx. ſquadrons with the reſidue of the light horſmen, and moſt part of the Popes companies, ſuch as he erected for defence. There were ioyned with him (as moderators of his youth) John Iaques Triuulce gouernour of the ſouldiers of the King of Naples, and the Count Petillane, who from the Popes pay was become mercenary to the King of Naples, both Captaines of great experience and reputation: and ſeeing they meant to leade an armie into Lombardie, it was thought good that it ſhould paſſe in the perſon of Ferdinand, for the ſocietie of bloud and double kindred which he had with John Galeas husband to Iſabel his ſiſter, and ſonne of John Galeas brother to Hippolita, who was mother to Ferdinand. But touching the actions of this parley betweene the Pope and Alphonſo, that of moſt importance was concerning the Colonnois; for that it was diſcerned by manifeſt ſignes that they aſpired to new intelligences, ſeeing that Proſper and Fabri- cius hauing ſerued in the pay of the late king of Naples, and by him recompenced with eſtates and honorable places: Proſper (the King being dead) after many promiſes made to Alphonſo to reenter into his pay, was by the working of Cardinall Aſcanius, entred into the common pay of the French King and the Duke of Millan, refuſing afterwards to take the Popes pay, being much ſolicited: and Fabricius who had continued in the ſeruice of Alphonſo, hauing regard to the diſdaine of the Pope and the King of Naples againſt Proſper; made difficultie to go with the Duke of Calabria into Romagnia, if firſt by ſome conuenient meanes were not reeſtabliſhed and aſſured the affaires of Proſper and all the family of Colonne. This was the colour of their difficulties: but ſecretly they both were become mercenary to the French King, partly drawne by the great amitie they had with Cardinall Aſcanius, who forſaking Rome a few dayes after for ſuſpition of the Pope, was retired to their lands; and partly for hope of larger payes; but much more moued with diſpleaſure, that Virginio Vrſin chiefe of the contrary faction, bare greateſt rule with Alphonſo, and participated more then they in his proſperities. But to keepe this thing concealed vntill they might with ſuretie declare themſelues his ſouldiers, they treated continually with the Pope and Alphonſo, by whom was made great inſtance, that Proſper taking pay of them, would leaue the wages of the Duke of Millan, for that otherwiſe they could not be aſſured of him. The Colonnois made ſhew of deſire to accord with them, but to the end to determine nothing, they moued one time one difficultie, and ſometimes another, vpon the conditions that were offered.

In the Italian and French copies, it is read, of the Pope and the Duke of Millan.

In that practiſe there was diuerſitie of wils betweene Alexander and Alphonſo; for that Alexander deſiring to deſpoile them of the places they held about Rome, cheriſhed the occaſion to aſſaile them: and Alphonſo who had no other intention then to aſſure them, was not inclined to the warre but for a laſt remedy; but he durſt not oppoſe againſt the couetouſneſſe of the Pope. At laſt they determined to conſtraine them by armes, and appointed forces and orders how it ſhould be done, aſſaying notwithſtanding afore, if within few dayes their controuerſies might be accorded.

The king of Naples ſendeth out an army to take the citie of Genes.

Theſe things, with many others, were debated on all parts, mens wits wandring, and their mindes vnreſolute; their feares generall, but their hopes full of ſuſpitions and vncertainties; in their wils no conſent or vnitie, and all their coniectures and iudgements full of errour; no, none that could moderate their expectation, and much leſſe iudge what would be the end of thoſe tragicall preparations: but at the laſt the warre of Italy tooke beginning by the going of Don Federike to the enterpriſe of Genes, leading an army no doubt of greater proportion and better prouiſion then had beneſeene of a long time before to paſſe ouer the ſea of Tyrrhennum: for it contained fiue and thirtie light gallies, eighteene ſhips, with many other leſſer veſſels, a great quantity of artillery, and three thouſand footmen to put on land. By reaſon of which great preparation, and for that the exiles went with them, the army departed out of Naples with great hope of the victory: but their lingring and ſlow departing (cauſed by thoſe difficulties which commonly follow great enterpriſes, and partly abuſed by the cunning hopes which Lodowike gaue them, and partly for that they ſtayed in the ports of Sienna to leuie to the number of fiue thouſand footmen) made hard and dangerous that, which being aſſayed one moneth afore, would haue bene eaſie and without perill. For, the enemies (by their ſlow proceedings) had leiſure to dreſſe a ſtrong prouiſion, putting within Genes the Bailiffe of Dion with two thouſand Swiſſers leuied and paid by the French, and already ordered and rigged a great part of the ſhips and gallies which were armed in that port, and one part of the veſſels furniſhed at Marſeilles, being there arriued alſo. Beſides, Lodowike for his part ſpared for no expences, but diſpatched thither Gaſper de S. Seuerin, called Fracaſſe, and Anthonie Maria his brother, with many footmen: and (becauſe he would compound his ſtrength no leſſe vpon the good wils of them of Genes then of forraine forces) he confirmed with gifts, penſions, and promiſes of many recompences the courage and intention of John Lewis de Fieſque brother to Obietto, the Adornes, and many other gentlemen and populars, much importing to keepe that Citie in his deuotion: he had alſo called to Millan many factions of the baniſhed men, as well of the towne as riuers of Genes. To theſe prouiſions, mightie enough of themſelues, did giue great reputation and ſuretie the perſon and preſence of Lewis Duke of Orleance, who about the ſame time that the Aragons fleete was diſcouered in the ſea of Genes, entred that Citie by commiſſion of the French king, hauing firſt communicated in Alexandria vpon the common affaires with Lodowike Sforce, who (as the doings of mortall men are full of thicke darkneſſe) had receiued him with great

gladneſſe and honour, but as a companion, not knowing how ſoone his whole eſtate and life would fall into his power.

Theſe accidents were the cauſes why the Aragons (determined before to preſent their fleete afore the port of Genes, vnder hope that the parties and confederates with the exiles would draw into ſome inſurrection) changing now counſell with the occaſion, reſolued to aſſaile the riuer: and after ſome diuerſitie of opinions, whether in the riuer of Leuant or the Weſt were beſt to begin, the aduice of Obietto preuailed, who promiſing himſelfe much vpon them of the waters of Leuant, they addreſſed themſelues to the towne of Portouenere, to the which they gaue aſſault for many houres in vaine; for that it was refurniſhed from Genes with foure hundred footmen, and the courages of the inhabitans well reſolued and confirmed by Iohn Lewis de Fieſque lately come thither: ſo that being out of hope to carry the towne by aſſault, they retired to the port of Liuorne, to re-victuall their ſhips, and refurniſh their companies of footmen: for, when they vnderſtood that the townes and peeces vpon the riuer were in good condition of defence and prouiſion, they iudged that to that action was neceſſary a greater ſupply of force. At Liuorne, Federike (being aduertiſed that the French army inferiour to his in gallies, but mightier in ſhips, was in preparation to fall out of the port of Genes) ſent backe againe to Naples his ſhips, to be able with more readineſſe by the ſwiftneſſe of his gallies to keepe aloofe from the enemy, if with their ſhips and gallies together they ſhould ſet on him, hoping notwithſtanding to vanquiſh them if their gallies were ſeparated from their ſhips, either by aduenture, or by will.

At the ſame time the Duke of Calabria marched towards Romagnia with the armie by land, with intention to paſſe afterwards into Lombardie, according to the firſt reſolutions. But to haue his paſſage more free and eaſie, and to leaue no impediments or perils behind his back, it was needfull to ioyne to him the ſtate of Bolognia, and the cities of Imola and Furly: for Ceſena a citie immediatly ſubiect to the Pope, and the citie of Faenſa, belonging to Aſtor de Manfreddi a yong gentleman, penſionary and gouerned vnder the protection of the Florentines, were to giue willingly all commodities to the Aragons army. Octauian ſonne to Ieronimo de Riare, was Lord of Furly and Imola, with a title of Vicar of the Church, but in minoritie, and vnder gouernment of Katherine Sforce his mother, with whom many moneths before, the Pope and Alphonſo had practiſed to entertaine Octauian in their common pay, with condition to defend his Eſtates: but the matter remained vnperfect, partly by the difficulties ſhe alleaged, to the end to get better conditions; and partly for that the Florentines dwelling ſtill in their former purpoſe not to exceed the bonds they had with Alphonſo to the preiudice of the French King, could not be reſolued to be concurrent in this practiſe, to the which their conſent was neceſſary, becauſe the Pope and the King would not alone ſuſtaine the charge; but much more for that Katherine would not put in danger that Citie, vnleſſe with the others, the Florentines would be bound to the gard and defence of the Eſtates of her ſonne. Theſe difficulties were taken away by the meeting and ſpeaking together, which Ferdinand (drawing his army by the way of Marrechia into Romagnia) had with Peter de Medicis in the village of S. Sepulcher, where he offered him in the name of his father King Alphonſo, franke power to diſpoſe of him and his army in all the ſeruices which he had intentiõ to execute for the affaires of Florence, Sienna and Faenſa: theſe offers giuing a new life to the ancient courage of Peter, as ſoone as he was returned to Florence, he ordained (notwithſtanding the diſſwaſions of the wiſeſt Citizens) that the accord ſhould be ſubſigned, for that Ferdinand had inſtantly deſired him. This being diſpatched at the common charges of the Pope, Alphonſo and the Florentines, not many dayes after, they had the Citie of Bolognia at their deuotion, entertaining Iohn Bentiuole (vnder whoſe authoritie and direction the Citie was gouerned) in the ſame maner the Pope promiſed, hauing withall the faith of King Alphonſo and Peter de Medicis, to create Cardinall Anthonie Galeas his ſonne, then Pronotory Apoſtolike.

Theſe things gaue to the army of Ferdinand a great reputation, which yet had bene more great, if with thoſe ſucceſſes he had ſooner entred into Romagnia: but by his ſlow ſpeed to march out of the kingdome, and the diligent care and watching of Lodowike Sforce, Ferdinand was no ſooner arriued at Ceſena, then Monſieur d'Aubigny, and the Count Caiazze, gouernour ouer the companies of Sforce, together with a great part of the army appointed to make head againſt the Aragons, being paſſed without let by Bolognia, entred the conntrey of Imola; by meanes whereof Ferdinand hauing loſt his firſt hopes to paſſe into Lombardie, was compelled to ſettle the warre in Romagnia, where (other Cities following the partie of the Aragons) Rauenna and Cerua, cities of the Venetian iuriſdiction, bare fauour to neither ſide. This litle countrey ſtretching along the riuer of Paw, and in the poſſeſſion of the Duke of Ferrara, ſpared no one commoditie to the companies of the French and Sforce. Touching Peter de Medicis, neither the difficulties hapning in the enterpriſe of Genes, nor the impediments occurring in Romagnia, could bridle his raſhneſſe: for, being bound by a ſecret agreement without the knowledge of the Commonweale, made with the Pope and Alphonſo, to oppoſe himſelfe openly againſt the French King; he had not onely conſented, that the Neapolitan anny at ſea ſhould be receiued and refreſhed in the hauen of Liuorne, with power to leuie footmen through the whole territory of Florence, but alſo reſtraining his raſhneſſe to no limite, he ſo wrought, that Annibal Bentiuole, ſonne of John, mercenary to the Florentines, went with his charge, and the companies of Aſtor de Manfreddi, and ioyned with the campe of Ferdinand, as ſoone as he entred into the countrey of Furly; and ſent beſides to the ſaid Bentiuole a thouſand footmen with artilleries. Such a like diſpoſition was alwayes diſcerned in the Pope, who, beſides the prouiſions of warre, not contented to haue exhorted King Charles by writing the yeare before, not to paſſe into Italy, but to proceed by way of iuſtice and not armes, reenioyned him eftſoones by another Briefe, the ſelfe ſame things, vpon paine of the Church-cenſure: and by the Biſhop of Calagorre his Nuncio at Venice, (whither for the ſame effect were gone the Embaſſadors of Alphonſo, and they of Florence, who notwithſtanding made not ſuch open demands) he perſwaded much that Senate, that for the common benefit of Italy they would proteſt publike reſiſtance againſt the French purpoſes, or at leaſt to giue Lodowike roundly to vnderſtand that he was much diſcontented with this innouation. But the Senate anſwered by the Duke, that it was farre from the office of a wiſe Prince, to pull the warre vpon his owne houſe, and take it from another, nor to conſent to do (either by demonſtration or effect) any thing that may diſpleaſe either of the parties: And becauſe the King of Spaine (ſolicited inſtantly by the Pope and Alphonſo) promiſed (for the ſuccours of Naples) to ſend into Sicile an army by ſea well furniſhed, and at laſt made excuſe, that it could not be ſo ſoone ready for want of money; the Pope gaue conſent (beſides a certaine portion which Alphonſo ſent him) and power, that he might conuert into that vſe, the moneys gathered in Spaine by the Apoſtolike authoritie, vnder colour of the Croyſade, which ought not to be employed againſt others then the enemies of the Chriſtian faith. Alphonſo alſo, beſides thoſe which he had already ſent to the great Turke, diſpatched of new Camillo Pandon, with whom was ſent ſecretly by the Pope George Bucciardo a Genoway, whoſe ſeruice Pope Innocent had vſed there afore; who being receiued with great honor of Baiazet, and diſpatched with no leſſe expedition, brought home large promiſes of ſuccours: which although confirmed a litle after by an Embaſſador ſent by the Turke to Naples, yet either for the diſtance of places, or for the diſtruſt he had of the Chriſtians, thoſe promiſes brought no effect. In this time, Alphonſo and Peter de Medicis ſeeing their armies ſucceeded not happily by land nor ſea, they laboured to beguile Lodowike Sforce, vſing his owne crafts and cunnings; but their induſtrie brought forth no better iſſue then their forces. It was the opinion of many, that Lodowike, for the conſideration of his proper danger, was not content that the French King ſhould conquer Naples; but his plot was, that as ſoone as he was made Duke of Millan, and that the French army had paſſed into Tuſcan, to worke ſome accord, by the which Alphonſo ſhould acknowledge himſelfe tributary to the Crowne of France, with aſſurance to the King of office and obſeruancie, and ſo the King (the places which the Florentines held in Lunigiane, reuerting perhaps out of their hands) to returne into France: ſo that the Florentines by this meanes ſhould remaine battered, the King of Naples diminiſhed of force and authoritie, and he, become Duke of Millan, ſhould haue got for his ſuretie ſo much as was ſufficient, without feare to fall into the dangers which might happen by the victory of the French: he had hope alſo that the Winter coming on, the King would ſuffer ſuch difficulties as would let the courſe of his victory. Laſtly he iudged, that weighing with the impatience of the French, the Kings ſlender prouiſion of money, and the wils of many of his people eſtranged from the enterpriſe, there would not want meanes to worke compoſition.

The Pope commandeth the French kyng not to paſſe into Italy.

The Venetians neuters.

Vaine hopes of Lod. Sforce.

This was a groſſe error in his policie, to breed the ſtorme, and leaue the defence to poſſibilities doubtfull: it is too dangerous to broach a veſſell of poiſon, and haue the vertue of the antidote

tidote vncertaine: fire ſuffered to runne, burnes without limite, euen to the conſuming of ſuch as firſt kindled it. But whatſoeuer was his ſecret intention, it is certaine, that albeit at the beginning Lodowike ſtudied to ſeparate Peter de Medicis from the Aragons, yet after he perſwaded him ſecretly to perſeuere in his opinion, promiſing him ſo to worke, that the French king ſhould not march at all; or at leaſt if he did paſſe, he ſhould with the ſame ſpeed returne afore he did any action on that ſide the mounts. This he did often reiterate by his Embaſſador reſident at Florence, either for that ſuch was his iuſt intention, or elſe hauing determined to ruinate Peter, he deſired that he might bring him to do ſo much againſt the King, as there might be no meanes to reconcile them. But Peter determining, by the conſent of Alphonſo, to make theſe behauiours knowne to the French King, called one day into his houſe the Embaſſador of Millan, vnder colour of being ill diſpoſed of his perſon; afore he came, he cauſed to hide ſecretly the French Embaſſador reſident at Florence, in a place where he might eaſily heare their communication. There Peter repeated to the Embaſſador plainly, diſtinctly, & at large, the perſwaſions and promiſes of Lodowike, and that for his authoritie he was vnwilling to conſent to the demands of the French King; taking occaſion to complaine grieuouſly, for that with ſo diligent inſtance he ſolicited the King to paſſe: he concluded, that ſeeing the effects anſwered not his words, he was conſtrained to ioyne himſelfe to the enterpriſe, to auoid his proper and preſent perill. The Embaſſador of Millan anſwered, that he ought not to doubt of the faith of Lodowike, if for no other reaſon, at leaſt for this, that in compariſon and conſideration of things, it was no leſſe dangerous to Lodowike then to any other, that the French ſhould enioy Naples: and therefore with all the counſell, courage and reaſons that he could, he perſwaded him to perſeuere in his firſt opinion, leſt by ſuch hurtfull alteration of mind, he were not the cauſe to bring himſelfe and all Italy into perpetuall ſeruitude. This diſcourſe, with all his actions and circumſtances, the French Embaſſador with preſent ſpeed communicated with the King his maiſter, aſſuring him that he was betrayed by Lodowike, whoſe deuice tended all to his particular purpoſe and profit, and all his intentions were diſſembled and diſguiſed.

This policie and priuate maner of Peter, bred not the effect which Peter and Alphonſo hoped for; but on the contrary, the matter and maner being reuealed to Lodowike, euen by the French themſelues, the diſdaine and hate conceiued afore againſt Peter, redoubled and tooke a ſtronger qualitie; and Lodowike with a new diligence and quickneſſe, ſolicited the French King to conſume no more time vnprofitably.

Foreſhewes of the calamities of Italy.

But now, not onely the preparations that were made in ſo great plentie both by ſea and land, but alſo the conſent of the heauens and of men, pronounced to Italy their calamities to come: for that ſuch as made profeſſion to haue iudgement either by ſcience or diuine inſpiration in the things to come, aſſured with one voice that there were in preparing, both more great mutations, and more ſtrange and horrible accidents, then for many ages before had bene diſcerned in any part or circuit of the earth. There were ſeene in the night in Pouille, three Sunnes in the middeſt of the firmament, but many clouds about them, with right fearfull thunders and lightnings. In the territory of Aretze were viſibly ſeene paſſing in the aire infinite numbers of armed men vpon mightie horſes, with a terrible noiſe of drums and trumpets: The Images and figures of Saints did manifeſtly ſweate in many parts of Italy: In euery place were brought forth many monſters of men and other creatures, with many other things againſt the order of nature, concurring all at one time, but in diuers places; by meanes whereof the people were carried into incredible feares, being already amazed with the brute of the French powers and fury of that Nation, with the which according to the teſtimonie of hiſtories, they had aforetime run ouer all Italy, ſacked and made deſolate with fire and ſword the citie of Rome, and ſubdued in Aſia many Prouinces; and generally no part of the world which had not felt the vertue of their armes. But albeit theſe iudgements are oftentimes fallible, and rather coniectures vncertaine then effects hapning, yet the accidents that drew on, brought to them, in the ſpirits of fraile men, an abſolute faith, credite and religion: for King Charles holding his firſt purpoſe, was now come to Vienna in Dauphine, and would not ſuffer himſelfe to be ſtayed from his perſonall expedition into Italy, neither by the iuſt and generall petitions of his whole Realme, nor with the conſideration of his vniuerſall wants of money, which were ſuch, as he had no meanes to furniſh the neceſſities preſent, but by pawning for a great ſumme of money, certaine iewels lent him by the Duke of Sauoy, the Marqueſſe of Montferrat, and other great Lords of the Court: of the ſummes he had gathered before of the reuenues of France, and ſuch as were lent to him by Lodowike, he had employed a great quantitie vpon the armies at ſea, wherein at the beginning was repoſed a great hope of the victory; and of the reſidue, he had made many indiſcreet liberalities to diuers perſons before he went from Lyons: And his Princes and Noblemen, hauing at that time not ſo ready wayes to exact money of their peoples, as ſince (without regard to God or men) auarice & immoderate couetouſnes haue taught them, it was not eaſie for him to leuie new tributes: ſo ſlender were the prouiſions and grounds of ſo great a warre, fury and raſhneſſe guiding the King more then wiſedome and counſell.

But as it often hapneth in the execution of things new, great and difficult; that (albeit all things are ordained and foreſeene) the reaſons that may be conſidered on the contrary, come then to appeare in the vnderſtanding of men, when the enterpriſe is toward his action and beginning: ſo the King being vpon the point to depart, yea his ſouldiers marching towards the mounts, there aroſe a great murmure throughout the Court; ſome brought into conſideration the difficulties ordinary in ſo great an enterpriſe, and ſome diſputed of the generall dangers and infidelitie of the Italians; but ſpecially there was an vniuerſall iealouſie of Lodowike Sforce, both for the aduertiſement lately come from Florence, and alſo certaine money expected from him, remained yet behind; ſo that not onely ſuch as had alwayes reproued this enterpriſe, roſe vp eftſoones to reſiſt it with more audacitie, (as hapneth in thoſe caſes when counſell is confirmed by the euent of things) but euen thoſe that had bene the principall workers, as chiefly the Biſhop of S. Malo, began ſo to ſhake, that the brute coming to the eares of the King, and the whole Court inclining to murmure and confuſion of opinions, cauſed ſuch an inclination in the King to paſſe no further, that ſuddenly commandement was giuen to make ſtay of all the bands and companies of ſouldiers; by meanes whereof many that were already on their way, returned with willing ſpeed to the Court; following a report publiſhed, that it was a reſolution ſet downe, that the campe ſhould not paſſe into Italy. It was then beleeued that all had turned into alteration and change, if the Cardinall of S. Peter ad Vincula (the fatall inſtrument, both at that time, before, and after, of all the miſeries of Italy) had not with his authoritie and vehemencie giuen a new life to the expedition, recomforted the hearts of the Noble men, and brought againe the ſpirit of the King to his firſt determination: he laid before him not onely the reaſons that had firſt ſtirred him vp to ſo glorious an enterpriſe, but alſo with a ſharpe and quicke eloquence willed him to looke into the infamy which might runne throughout all the world for ſo light a mutation of ſo noble a counſell: he asked his Maieſtie for what occaſion, in reſtoring the places in the Countie of Artoys, he had weakened on that ſide the frontiers of his Realme? Why had he with ſo great diſpleaſing of his Nobilitie and populars, made open to the King of Spaine one of the ports of France, in giuing him the Countie of Ruſſillon? Other Kings his predeceſſors had not wont to conſent to ſuch things, but either to be deliuered from great and imminent perils, or at leaſt, in counterchange of profits more importing: he made not thoſe reſtitutions by any neceſſitie; his perils were but reaſonable; and for fruite or recompence, there was no other expectation, then that with a great price he had bought a preſent loſſe, which would perpetually nouriſh griefe, diſhonour and infamy. What new accidents haue appeared (ſaith he) or what ſtrange dangers and difficulties are diſcloſed ſince the enterpriſe hath bene publiſhed throughout all the world? No, rather the hope of the victory is increaſed, the foundations being ſhaken whereupon the enemy hath built all the hopes of his defence; for that if both the army at ſea of the Aragons ſhamefully retired to the port of Liuorne after they had giuen a vaine aſſault to Portouenere, was able to attempt no further action againſt Genes, ſo well defended with ſouldiers and a nauie more mightie then theirs; and alſo in their army by land ſtayed in Romagnia, by the reſiſtance of ſmall numbers of the French, was left no courage to paſſe further: what would be their feares when they ſhould heare throughout all Italy, that the King was to paſſe the mounts with an army royall? Townes would fall into tumults, men would draw into mutinie, hauing their minds amazed: how could they be ſtayed or contained? The Pope would not be a litle amazed, when he ſhould ſee from his proper Pallace the armes of the Collonoys at the gates of Rome: no leſſe would be the aſtoniſhment of Peter de Medicis, who hauing for his enemies his owne bloud, knoweth what affection the towne of Florence beareth to the name of the French, and is not ignorant how deſirous it is to recouer the libertie which he holds oppreſt: That there was no impediment, no difficultie, no danger to ſtay the furious deſcending of the King vpon the

the confines of Naples, which he ſhould no ſooner approch, then he ſhould find all things diſpoſed to flight or rebellion. He told him, the feare was vaine to doubt want of money, for that his artillery ſhould be no ſooner heard thunder, then the Italians with a ſwift liberalitie would ſupply him from all parts: and if he ſhould find any reſiſtance or defence, the ſpoiles, the booties, the riches of the vanquiſhed would ſuffice to nouriſh his army; for that Italy for many yeares hauing bene more accuſtomed to apparences of warre, then trained in the true experience of warres, there was no ſtrength, foundation nor power to ſuſtaine the fury of the French. In a matter debated with ſo long counſell, and prepared ſo neare to his action; in an enterpriſe ſo poſſible, and bringing ſo many profits; in an expedition ſo haughtie and glorious, and giuen ouer, ſo vile and infamous, he aduiſed him to be firme and reſolute; and for feares, ſuſpitions and iealouſies, he willed him to thinke them as dreames riſing vpon ſome ſuperfluous humor, or as ſhadowes, to whom can be aſſigned no bodies: he told him, it became iuſtly his name and greatnes, to march on with the ſame magnanimitie and courage, wherewith not foure dayes ſince, he vaunted to be able to vanquiſh Italy being vnited all together. He ſaid, he had to conſider, that his counſels were now no more in his owne power; and that things had got to great forwardnes by reaſon of the alienation he had made of many lands and territories; for the Embaſſadors he had heard, ſent, and baniſhed; for the great charges he had ſuſtained for ſo many and mightie prouiſions; and laſtly, for the renowne that ranne through the world, and his perſon being brought almoſt to the top of the Alpes. And finally, ſaith he, albeit the enterpriſe were neuer ſo perillous, yet neceſſitie conſtrained him to follow it, ſeeing betweene glory and infamy, betweene diſhonor and triumph, betweene the opinion to be eſteemed a King, and a man vile, priuate and abiect, there remained no meane. Theſe ſpeeches in ſubſtance deliuered by the Cardinall, but according to his nature, in more graue and vehement geſture, kindled ſuch a new life and courage in the King, that without hearing any then ſuch as perſwaded him to the warre, he departed the ſame day from Vienna, accompanied with all the Barons and Captaines of the Realme, except the Duke of Burbon, to whom in his abſence he left the adminiſtration of the kingdome, and the Admirall, with certaine others appointed to the gouernment and guard of Prouinces moſt importing: himſelfe with the army paſſing into Italy by the mount Geneura, which yeelds a farre more eaſie paſſage then the mount Cenis, and by the which (but with incredible difficulties) Hannibal of Carthage made his way into Italy, entred into the towne of Aſt the ninth of September, a thouſand foure hundred ninetie and foure, leading with him into Italy the ſeeds of innumerable calamities and moſt horrible accidents, with a change almoſt and innouation of all things: for of his paſſage, did not only take beginning, muration of Eſtates, ſubuerſion of Realmes, deſolation of Countries, deſtruction of Cities, and moſt cruell murders; but alſo he brought with him new faſhions of habits, new cuſtomes, new and bloudy manners of making warres, and diſeaſes till thoſe times vnknowne; yea he did ſo diſorder the inſtruments of peace and concord in Italy, that being neuer able ſince to reorder and reduce them, other Nations ſtrange and barbarous, haue had good meanes to oppreſſe them miſerably. And for the increaſing of the infelicitie (becauſe their ſhame and diſhonor ſhould not be diminiſhed by the valour and vertues of the victor) he whoſe coming brought all thoſe calamities (albeit he lacked nothing of the liberalities and fauours of fortune) was void almoſt of all the gifts of nature and the mind: for it is moſt certaine, that King Charles from his infancie was of complexion very delicate, and of body vnſound and diſeaſed, of ſmall ſtature, and of face (if the aſpect and dignitie of his eyes had bene taken away) foule and deformed, his other members bearing ſuch equall proportion, that he ſeemed more a monſter then a man: he was not onely without all knowledge of good ſciences, but ſcarcely he knew the diſtinct characters of letters: his mind deſirous to command, but more proper to any other thing, for that being enuironed alwayes with his familiars and fauourites, he retained with them no maieſtie or authoritie: he reiected all affaires and buſineſſe; and yet if he did debate and conſider in any, he ſhewed a weake diſcretion and iudgement: And if he had any thing in him that carried apparence of merite or praiſe, yet being throughly weighed and ſounded, it was found further off from vertue then vice. He had an inclination to glory, but it was tempered more with raſhneſſe and fury, then with moderation and counſell: his liberalities were without diſcretion, meaſure or diſtinction: immoueable oftentimes in his purpoſes, but that was rather an ill grounded obſtinacie then conſtancie; and that which many call bountie, deſerued more reaſonably in him the name of coldneſſe and ſlackneſſe of ſpirit.

The ſame day the King arriued in the towne of Aſt, the fauours of fortune began to appeare to him with a ioyfull token or prediction. For, there came from Genes glad newes, That Dom Federicke (who after his retire from Portouenere to the hauen of Liuorne, and that he had refreſhed his army by ſea, and leuied new companies of land-men, was eſtſoones returned into the ſame riuer) had put on land Obietto de Fieſco with three thouſand footmen, who without difficultie had made himſelfe Lord of the towne of Rapalle, which is twenty miles from Genes, and then ſent companies to eſpie and ſpoile the countrey there about: That ſuch a beginning being of no litle importance (for that touching the affaires of the towne of Genes, all emotions, how litle ſoeuer they were, would be dangerous, conſidering the contagiouſneſſe and multitude of parties and factions) thoſe within the towne eſteemed it not good that the enemies ſhould haue further aduantage: and therefore leauing part of their companies to the guard of Genes, the two brethren S. Seuerins, and Iohn Adorne brother to Auguſtine the Gouernour of the towne, with the Italian footmen, put themſelues on the way to go to Rapalle; and the Duke of Orleance with a thouſand Swiſſers, leading thither the army by ſea, which contained eighteene galleys, ſixe gallions, and nine great ſhips, and being all ioyned neare to Rapalle, they furiouſly aſſailed the enemies that made head at the bridge, which is betweene the ſuburbes of Rapalle and a litle ſtraite plaine that ſtretched to the ſea. That beſides the proper forces of the Aragons, the ſeate of the place fought with aduantage for them, by whoſe ſteepneſſe and ſharpneſſe, more then other munition, the places of that riuer are well fortified: and therefore the beginning of the skirmiſh ſeemed proſperous to the enemy, for that the Swiſſers being in a place very vnproper to beſtow their Ordenance, began almoſt to retire: but by the continuall flocking of peſants running after the faction of the Adornes, for their agilitie and experience in thoſe ſtony and mountenous places, men of ſpeciall merit in ſeruice, and the Aragons beaten in flanke with the artilleries of the gallies of France, which were brought as neare the bankes as could be, they began very hardly to ſuſtaine the charge: And that laſtly, as they were beaten from the bridge, Obietto was aduertiſed (in whoſe fauour his partakers did not yet ſtirre) that Iohn Lewis de Fieſco was at hand with a troupe of footmen; and therefore fearing to be charged on the backe, they fled to the mountaines, Obietto being the firſt, according to the cuſtome of rebels: That there was ſlaine of them in this encounter, partly by fighting, and partly by flying, more then a hundred bodies; a ſlaughter not litle, conſidering the maner of the warre in Italy in thoſe times. With theſe aduertiſements came accompanied the report of the priſoners taken, amongſt whom was Iulius Vrſin, who with fortie men at armes, and certaine croſſe-bow ſhot on horſebacke, had followed the ſea army of Alphonſo, in whoſe pay he was. Fregoſin ſon to the Cardinall Fregoſe, and Orlandin of the ſame family, remained alſo priſoners. This victory aſſured altogether the affaires of Genes, for that Dom Federicke (who as ſoone as he had put his footmen on land, ſpred himſelfe vpon the maine ſea, as not to be conſtrained to fight with the enemy in the gulfe of Rapalle) deſpairing to do any profitable ſeruice at that time, retired his army once againe to the port of Liuorne; where albeit he furniſhed his numbers with new ſouldiers, and had many plots to aſſaile the riuers in ſome other place, yet (by vnfortunate beginnings of enterpriſes oftentimes men loſe both courage and counſell) he attempted no other action of conſequence, leauing a iuſt occaſion to Lodowike to vaunt, that with his induſtry and his counſels he had giuen the bay to his aduerſaries; ſeeing there was no other thing that ſaued the State of Genes, but their too ſlow ſpeed to depart, whereof Lodowike was the cauſe, by his cunning and vaine hopes breeding their deceitfull ſecuritie.

Lod. Sforce goeth to viſit the French king in Aſt.

At this time went Lodowike Sforce to viſite the King at Aſt, whither he carried with him Beatrix his wife, followed with great pompe, and a traine of the moſt honorable and faireſt Ladies within all the Duchie of Millan: he was alſo accompanied with Hercules Duke of Ferrara. There they debated of their common affaires; and by generall counſell it was reſolued, that the army ſhould march with as much ſpeed as was poſſible; wherein for the more diligence and expedition of things, Lodowike who had not a litle feare, that the hard ſeaſon of the yeare happning, they would ſoiourne all the Winter in the territories of his Duchie, lent eſtſoones to the King a great quantitie of money, whereof he had not a litle neceſſitie and want: Notwithſtanding, the King falling into the diſeaſe which we call the ſmall pox, he remained about a moneth within the towne of Aſt, the army being diſperſed into quarters & places thereabouts. Touching the

the numbers of his army (as may be truly gathered out of ſo many diuerſities) it contained (beſides the two hundred gentlemen for his guard, and reckning the Swiſſers gone before to Genes, and the companies entertaining the warre in Romagnia vnder Monſieur d'Aubignie) ſixteene hundred men at armes, allowing to euery one of them according to the cuſtome of France two Archers; ſo that vnder euery Lance (for ſo they call their men at armes) are comprehended ſixe horſes: of the Swiſſers ſix thouſand footmen, and ſix thouſand of the realme of France; whereof the one halfe were Gaſcoine ſouldiers, for their furniture gallant and well appointed, and for their naturall aptneſſe to the warres, a people aboue all others ſooneſt trained to ſeruice. And to ioyne to this army, there was carried to Genes by ſea, a huge proportion of artilleries of ſundry natures, both for battery and ſeruice of the field, but of ſuch ſort as Italy neuer ſaw the like. The number of the French kings army.

This hell or torment of artillery being deuiſed many yeares ſince in Germanie, was brought firſt into Italy by the Venetians, hauing warre about the yeare 1380. with the Genowayes: wherein the Venetians vanquiſhed by ſea, and much afflicted by the loſſe of Chioze, were ready to receiue ſuch conditions as it pleaſed the victors, if in ſo good an occaſion there had not bene want of moderate counſell. The greateſt ſort was called Bombards, which, after the inuention was ſpred through Italy, were employed to the battering of townes; ſome of them were of iron, and ſome of braſſe, but containing ſuch groſſe and huge proportion, that for their weight, and ignorance of men, and inſtruments vnapt, they were carried ſlowly, and with great difficultie; and being with intollerable trauels planted afore townes, yet there was ſo much reſpite between one ſhot and another, that in compariſon of their vſe at this day, they gaue litle fruite or ſucceſſe to the ſeruice, but left to the defenders leiſure and oportunitie at will, to reenforce their rampiers and fortifications: and yet by the violence of the Salt-peter, with the which their powder had his mixture, the bullets flew into the aire with ſuch horrible noiſe and fury, that that inſtrument (yea afore he had his perfection) put to ſcorne and ſilence all thoſe engines and deuices wherewith the ancients were wont to pull downe townes, to the great fame of Archimedes and other notable enginiſts. But the French men forging peeces of farre greater facilitie, and of no worſe mettall then braſſe, which they called Cannons, vſing bullets of iron in place of thoſe of ſtone of the firſt inuention, vſed to draw them vpon wheeles, not with oxen (as was the cuſtome in Italy) but with horſes, and with ſuch agilitie of men and inſtruments appointed to that ſeruice, that they almoſt kept march with the army: and being brought afore townes or walls, they were braked and planted with an incredible diligence, and with a very ſmall intermiſſion between the ſhots: they battered with ſuch violent fury, that what before was wont to be done in Italy in many dayes, they diſpatched it in few houres. Theſe diuelliſh inſtruments they vſed alſo in the field, making ſometimes the Cannon ſeruiceable there, and ſometimes peeces of leſſer forge, haled according to their proportion, with the ſelfe ſame ſpeed and nimbleneſſe. Thoſe artilleries were the cauſe that all Italy ſtood in great feare of the Kings army, which was alſo holden more redoubted and dreadfull, not by the numbers, but for the valour of the ſouldiers: for the men at armes being almoſt all of the Kings ſubiects, gentlemen, and not of the popular ſort, were not ſimply vnder the direction and diſcipline of Captaines, nor payed by them, but by the Kings officers: by which meanes, companies and bands had not onely their complete numbers, but they were men of choiſe, and in good point for horſe and armor, being well able to make their owne furnitures, and contented in ſeruice, as well for the deſire of honour (which naturally is nouriſhed in the hearts of men of noble race) as alſo that by their actions in armes and fight, they might aſpire to recompence, as well out of warre as the warre during, and by degrees riſe worthily to the name and places of Captaines. The ſame reſpects puſhed forward the Captaines, Barons and great Lords, or at leaſt ſuch as did communicate in honorable deſcent and bloud, for the moſt part ſubiects of the Crowne of France, who hauing their numbers ſet and limited; for according to the warres of that Realme, there is in no company aboue a hundred Lances, and had no other intention then by ſeruice to merite well of their King: ſo that there was not amongſt them any humour of inconſtancie, either by ambition or couetouſneſſe to change their Lord, or for enuie to exceed other Captaines in numbers of men at armes: cuſtomes meere contrary to the ordering of the men at armes in Italy, where many of the men at armes are either peſants or populars, ſubiects of another Prince, and depending wholly of their Captaines, with whom they contract for their pay, and ſerue vnder their arbitration: they How & when great ſhot came firſt into Italy.

haue neither by nature nor by accident, any extraordinary ſpurre or prouocation to ſerue well. The Captaines are very rarely vaſſals of him that entertaines them: they haue for the moſt part diuers intereſts, purpoſes and ends; full of enuie and hatreds: and being bound to no tearme fixed for their payes, and abſolute commanders ouer their companies, they oftentimes beguile the ſeruice with leſſe numbers then they are payed for: and ſometimes not contented with honeſt conditions, they put their patrons vpon euery occaſion to ranſome. At their pleaſures they will paſſe from the ſeruice of one, and enter into the pay of another; ambition, couetouſneſſe, or other particular intereſts, making them not onely inconſtant, but alſo vnfaithfull. There was alſo ſeene no leſſe difference betweene the footmen of Italy, and thoſe that ſerued vnder King Charles; for that the Italians fought not in ſquadrons ſet and ordered, but in troupes, and diſperſed in the field, and oftentimes retiring to the aduantages of hils and ditches: but the Swiſſers (a nation warlike, who by the long vſe of warre and many victories, had renewed their ancient glory and hardineſſe) vſed to fight with bands ordered, and diſtinct in numbers certaine: and neuer forſaking their ranks, they vſed to ſtand againſt their enemies as a wall, firme, and almoſt inuincible, ſo farre forth as they fought in a plaine or place large to ſtretch out their battell: euen with the ſame diſcipline and orders, but not with the like courage and vertue, did fight the footmen of the French and Gaſcoines.

Whileſt the King by reaſon of his ſickneſſe ſoiourned in the citie of Aſt, there hapned a new tumult about the borders of Rome: for the Colonnoys (notwithſtanding Alphonſo had accorded to all their moderate demands) as ſoone as Monſieur d'Aubigny was entred Romagnia, declared themſelues for the French King without more diſſembling, and tooke the rocke of Oſtia by intelligence they had with certaine Spaniſh footmen left there in garriſon. This raiſed the Pope into paſſion, and made him bitterly complaine to all Princes in Chriſtendome, of the iniuries done to him by the French: he addreſſed his complaints chiefly to the King of Spaine, and Senate of Venice, of whom (but in vaine) he prayed aide and ſuccors, according to the contract of confederation made betweene them the laſt yeare before: and turning altogether his wits, authoritie and courage, to the prouiſions of the warre, after he had cited Proſper and Fabricius, (whoſe houſes he cauſed to be razed in Rome) and aſſembled his companies with part of thoſe of Alphonſo, vnder Virginio, at the riuer of Tyueron, neare Tiuoly; he ſent them all vpon the lands of the Colonnoys, whoſe ſtrength was no greater then two hundred men at armes, and a thouſand footmen. But afterwards the Pope doubting leſt the French army at ſea, ſuppoſed to come from Genes to the ſuccours of Oſtia, ſhould be receiued into the port of Neptune, belonging to the Colonnoys: Alphonſo after he had gathered at Terracina all the companies that the Pope and he had in thoſe quarters, eſtabliſhed his campe there, hoping to haue it eaſily. Notwithſtanding the Colonnoys defending it with great frankneſſe of courage, and being alſo paſſed into their countries without impediments, with the companies of Camille Vitelli of the citie of Caſtello, and the bands of their brethren, which the French King had newly taken into his pay, the Pope reuoked to Rome part of his people which were in Romagnia with Ferdinand, whoſe affaires continued not with that felicitie and fortune which they ſeemed to ſhew in the beginning. For, as he was arriued at Villefranche, betweene Furly and Faenza, and from thence was entred into the high way of Imola, the army of the enemy encamped neare to Villefranche, ſeeing their forces inferior, retired betweene the forreſt of Lugo and Columbare, neare the foord of Geniuola, a place very ſtrong by nature, and appertaining to Hercules d'Eſte, out of whoſe countries they were victualled: ſo that Ferdinand ſeeing that by the ſtrength and ſituation of the place he could not charge them, but with manifeſt and generall perill, iſſued out of Imola, and went to encampe in Toskanella, neare the village of S. Peter, in the countreys of Bolognia: for, being deſirous to fight, by the ſhew he made to go towards Bolognia, he ſought to put the enemies (to whom he would not leaue libertie to paſſe further) in neceſſitie to encampe in places not ſo ſtrong: but they approching certaine dayes after neare Imola, pitched their campe vpon the riuer of Santerno, betweene Lugo and S. Agathe, the place being well fortified, and had for their backe the riuer of Paw. The ſame day Ferdinand encamped ſixe miles from them vpon the ſame riuer, neare Mordane and Bubane, preſenting his army the day after in battell ranged within a mile of them, where after he had looked for them in vaine for certaine houres, the place miniſtring all commodities to fight, by reaſon of his ſcope, largeneſſe and plainneſſe; and ſeeing he could not ſet vpon them in their trenches without abſolute danger, went to encampe at Balbiana, not holding any any more the way of the mountaine, as he had done till then; but accoasting the enemy, he marched alwayes with this intention, to constraine them, if he could, to forsake their trenches, so full of aduantage and strength.

It hath seemed till now, that the affaires of the Duke of Calabria, carried good estate and fortune, and a gouernment with reputation, seeing the enemies had apparently refused to fight, defending themselues more with the strength and situation of their trenches, then with actions of armes; and in all encounters of the light horsemen, the Aragons carried away alwaies the best: but the campe of the French and Sforce, receiuing continuall strength by supplies of companies, which at the beginning remained behind, the estate of the warre began to change: for that the Duke, whose heate and forwardnesse was moderated by the counsell of the Captaines that followed him, to the end he would not commit all to fortune without aduantage, retired to S. Agathe a towne of the Duke of Ferrara, where finding diminution of his footmen, and of that part of the horsemen of the Church, which the Pope had called backe, and lastly in the middest of the countries of the Duke of Ferrara, began to looke to fortifie himselfe: but after he had remained there certaine dayes, he vnderstood by espiall, that there was expectation in the enemies campe, of two hundred Lances, and a thousand Swisser footmen, which the French King had caused to march as soone as he entred into Ast: and therefore he retired to the waste of Faenza, a place betweene the walls of the same towne, and a ditch which reculeth about a thousand paces from the towne, and enuironing it round about, makes that situation very strong. And by reason of his retreit, the enemy came to S. Agathe, which he had abandoned. Surely both these armies shewed great tokens of courage, when they saw their enemy inferiour: but when things were brought to an equalitie, the place apt, their forces indifferent, and all other oportunities consenting, each one eschued to assay the fortune of battell, and in them both was approued that which very rarely happeneth, that one counsell was pleasing to two armies, being enemies. For the French thought they should accomplish their intention, for the which they were come out of Lombardie, if they hindered the Aragons for passing further: and Alphonso iudged it greatly to his benefite, if he could amuze and hold backe the enemies vntill Winter; and therefore gaue expresse charge to his sonne, and Iohn Iaques Triuulce, with the Count de Petillane, that without great occasion they should not put into the power of fortune the Realme of Naples; which was vtterly lost, if that army were defeated. But these remedies sufficed not for safetie, for that King Charles, whose forwardnesse could not be restrained, neither by the season of the time, nor any other difficulties, marched into the field with his army as soone as he had recouered his health: and because Iohn Galeas Duke of Millan, and his cousin germaine (for the King and he descended of two sisters, daughters to Lewis the second, Duke of Sauoy) lay sore sicke in the Castle of Pauie, he went with great humanitie to visit him, making his way by the towne, and lodging in the same Castle. The speeches he vsed to him were generall, for the presence of Lodowike, onely expressing how much grieued he was for his sickenesse, and perswaded him to take hope and courage to recouer his health: but touching the effect of the mind, the King with all those that were with him, had great compassion on him; euery one iudging for certaine, that the yong Gentleman, by the wickednesse of his Vnkle, had not long to liue. This compassion was much increased by the presence of Isabel his wife, who not onely full of many sorrowes for the infirmitie of her husband, and estate of her litle sonne borne by him, but also much afflicted for the perill of her father and her other kindred, she fell with great griefe, in the publike presence, at the feet of the King, recommending to him with pitifull teares, her father, and his house of Aragon: towards whom, albeit the King, for her age, her beautie, and her present fortune, expressed an apparent inclination to pitie; yet being not able to stay the course of so great a matter for so light an occasion, he answered her with signes of will to do that he could not, saying, The enterprise being so farre aduanced, he was constrained to prosecute and continue it.

The French king visites Iohn Galeas Duke of Millan.

From Pauia the King marched to Plaisance, and during the abode he made there, newes came of the death of Iohn Galeas; by which occasion, Lodowike that had followed him thither, returned in no small diligence to Millan, where by the principals of the councel, which the Duke had suborned, it was propounded, that in regard of the greatnesse of that Estate, and the dangerous times that prepared now for Italy, it would be a thing preiudiciall, that the sonne of Iohn Galeas (hauing not fiue yeares in age) should succeed his father: and therefore, as well to keepe the

the liberties of the State in protection, as to be able to meete with the inconueniences which the time threatned; they thought it iuſt and neceſſary (derogating ſomewhat, for the publike benefite, and for the neceſſitie preſent, frō the diſpoſition of the laws, as the laws themſelues dō ſuffer) to conſtraine Lodowike, for the better ſtay of the Commonweale, to ſuffer that vnto him might be tranſported the title and dignitie of Duke, a burden very weightie in ſo dangerous a ſeaſon: with the which colour, honeſtie giuing place to ambition, the morning following (making ſome ſhew of reſiſtance) he tooke vpon him the name and armes of the Duke of Millan; hauing ſecretly proteſted before, that he receiued them as appertaining to him by the inueſtiture of the King of Romaines. It was publiſhed, that the death of Galeas happened by immoderate cohabitation; but the vniuerſall iudgement of Italy was, that he died not of infirmities naturall, nor by incontinencie, but by poiſon and violent compulſion, whereof Theodor de Pauia, one of the Phyſitions aſſiſting when the King viſited him, aſſured the King to ſee moſt apparent and manifeſt ſignes: And if he were diſpatched by poiſon, there was none that doubted that his Vnkle was innocent either directly or indirectly, as he, who not content with an abſolute power to be gouernor of the State, but aſpiring according to the common deſires of great men, to make themſelues glorious with titles and honors; and ſpecially he iudged, that both for his proper ſuretie, and the ſucceſſion of his children, the death of the lawfull Prince was neceſſary, and therefore ſought to eſtabliſh in himſelfe the power and name of Duke; wherein ambition and couetouſneſſe preuailed aboue conſcience and law of nature, and the iealous deſire of dominion, enforced his diſpoſition (otherwiſe abhorring bloud) to that vile action. It was beleeued of many wiſe men, that ſuch had bene his intention euer ſince he began to ſolicite the French kings iourney into Italy, iudging the occaſion and the time would well concurre to aduance the effect; for that the French houering vpon the borders of that State with a maine armie, it would alter mens coniectures and humors, and carry their wits from remembrance of an act ſo wicked. But ſome hauing opinions more particular, ſuppoſed both for the ſuddenneſſe of his death, and diligent transferring of the impery to the other, that it happened by a new thought proceeding of feare, leſt the King (the counſels of the French are ſodaine) would turne himſelfe with a contrary courſe to deliuer his couſin Galeas from ſo great a ſubiection; being induced thereunto, either for reſpect of kindred and compaſſion of his age, or that he might thinke it was a thing more ſure for himſelfe, that the Duchie of Millan was in the power of his couſin, rather then commanded by Lodowike, whoſe fidelitie many of his great Lords laboured continually to make ſuſpected with him. But becauſe Lodowike had got the yeare before the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, and a litle before the death of his nephew, had diſpatched with diligence the Imperiall priuiledges, it makes a congruent conſtruction, that it was a deliberation voluntary and foredeuiſed, and not ſodaine, nor in reſpect of the preſent danger. The King ſtayed certaine dayes at Plaiſance, not without inclination to returne into France, for that as well the want of money, which being the more generall, was ſo much more intollerable, as not ſeeing any new thing in Italy diſcouer in his fauour, he had many doubts of his ſucceſſe, hauing withall no litle ſuſpition of the new Duke of Millan, who notwithſtanding when he parted, ſaid, he would returne; yet the iudgement was, that he would not come againe at all. It is alſo very likely, that though the wicked cuſtome to poiſon men, which is a practiſe very common in moſt parts of Italy, were vnknowne to the nations on the other ſide the mounts; yet that the King and all his Court, beſide the ſuſpition they had conceiued againſt the faith of Lodowike, had his name in horror; yea that the King eſteemed it a great iniury, that he had ſolicited his coming into Italy, to be the better able without danger to execute an act ſo abhominable: yet in the end, the reſolution was to march on, Lodowike continually labouring him thereunto, with promiſe to returne, and to viſite the King within few dayes; for that both the Kings abode in Lombardie, and his haſtie returne into France, were wholly contrary to his intentions.

Lod. Sforce Duke of Millan by vſurpation.

Laurence and Iohn de Medicis with the French king.

The ſame day that the King departed from Plaiſance, Laurence and Iohn de Medicis came to him; who being ſecretly ſlipt from their houſes in the countrey, made great inſtance that his Maieſtie would come neare Florence, aſſuring him much of the good will of the people towards the houſe of France, and no leſſe of their hate againſt Peter de Medicis, againſt whom the diſpleaſure of the King was aggrauated by new occaſions. For, the King hauing ſent from Aſt an Embaſſador to Florence, to propound many offers, if they would grant him paſſage, and abſtaine hereafter from aiding of Alphonſo; and on the other ſide, to pronounce threatnings to them, them, if they perſeuered in their former counſell; with expreſſe charge to his Embaſſador (to the end to daunt them the more) to returne immediatly if they would not giue ſpeedy reſolution. He was anſwered with excuſes to deferre and expect, for that the chiefeſt Citizens of the gouernment being withdrawne to their houſes of ſolace in the countrey, according to the cuſtome of the Florentines in that ſeaſon, they could not with ſuch ſpeed giue him an anſwer certaine, but would with all diligence aduertiſe the King of their intention, by a particular Embaſſador. It is moſt certaine, that it was agreed in the Kings Councell without contradiction, that the army ſhould rather take the way that leades through Tuskane, and the territories of Rome directly to Naples, then that which lying along Romagnia and la Marque, paſſing the riuer of Troute, entred into Abruzze; not for that they did diſtruſt to giue the chaſe to the bands of the Aragons, which with difficultie reſiſted Monſieur d'Aubigny: but for that it ſeemed a thing vnworthy of the greatneſſe of ſuch a King, and no leſſe infamous to the glory of his armies, (the Pope and Florentines being declared againſt him) to giue occaſion to men to thinke that he eſchued the way for diſtruſt, that he was not able to force them; but much more becauſe they eſteemed it dangerous to make warre in the Realme of Naples, and leaue as enemies at their backes, the ſtate Eccleſiaſtike and Tuskane: and therefore the army turning to the way of Tuskane, it was determined to paſſe rather the Appenin by the mountaine of Parma, then to march the direct way to Bolognia. This was Lodowikes direction when he was at Aſt, for that he had a deſire to make himſelfe Lord of Piſa. So that the vant-guard, ouer whom was gouerner and leader Gilbert de Montpenſier, of the houſe of Bourbon, and Prince of the bloud, and the King following, with the reſidue of the army, paſſed to Pontreme, a towne of the Duchie of Millan, ſet at the foote of the Appenin, vpon the riuer of Magre, which deuides the countrey of Genes (anciently called Liguria) from Tuskane. From Pontreme Monſieur Montpenſier entred the countrey of Lunigiana, a part of which obeyed the Florentines, certaine Caſtles belonged to the Genoways, and the reſidue were ſubiect to the Marquis of Maleſpina, who maintained their ſmall Eſtates vnder the protection ſometimes of the Duke of Millan, ſometimes of the Florentines, and ſometimes of the Genoways. About thoſe quarters ioyned with Monſieur Montpenſieur, the Swiſſers which had bin at the defence of Genoway, together with the artillery which was come by ſea to Spetia; and being come neare the towne of Fiuiſana, belonging at that time to the Florentines, whither they were guided by Gabriel Maleſpina Marquis of Podiſmone, who was recommended to them, they tooke it by force, and ſackt it, making ſlaughter of all the ſouldiers ſtrangers that were within, and many of the inhabitants: a maner of making warre very new, and ſo much the more terrible to all Italy, accuſtomed ſot many yeares paſt to warres rather flouriſhing in pompes and fine furniture, like to warres ſhewed by maskers in ſtage playes, then to skirmiſhes bloudy and dangerous. The Florentines were determined to make their principall reſiſtance at Serezana, which they had greatly fortified, but not with ſtrength ſufficient and neceſſary to reſiſt ſo mightie an enemy, becauſe they had not furniſhed it with any Captaine of warre, that had authoritie to miniſter diſcipline, nor with ſouldiers either reſolute or ſeruiceable, other then ſuch as loſt heart at the firſt voice of the approch of the French army: yet they of Florence were of opinion that it could not be eaſily taken, ſpecially the Caſtle, and much leſſe the rocke of Serezana, both well furniſhed, and bearing his ſituation vpon the hill aboue the towne. Beſides, it was not poſſible that the army ſhould remaine long time in thoſe places; the countrey being barren and ſtrait, and being incloſed betweene the ſea and the mountaines, was not ſufficient to nouriſh ſo great a multitude, and their victuals coming farre off, could not obſerue ſuch iuſt time and oportunitie, as to ſerue their preſent neceſſities: by reaſon whereof, it ſeemed the Kings affaires began to fall into hard termes, and that his army ſtood poſſible to many dangers and diſtreſſes: for, albeit he could not with conuenient impediments be let from aſſailing Piſa, leauing behind him the towne and caſtle of Serezana, and the rock, nor kept by the country of Lucques (which City, by the working of the Duke of Millan, had ſecretly determined to receiue them) that he entred not another part of the territory of Florence; yet he could hardly be brought to that deliberation, and would not condeſcend to it, becauſe he had a perſwaſion in his ſecret fancie, that if he wonne not the firſt towne that reſiſted him, it would diminiſh much his reputation, and leaue a dangerous example to others to vſe inſolencie againſt him.

The way that the French armie tooke to Naples.

M. Montpenſier leader of the vant guard

But ſo it was ordained, that either by the grace and bleſſing of fortune, or by an ordinance of more high power, (if at the leaſt the indiſcretions and faults of men deſerue ſuch excuſes) to ſuch an impediment hapned a ſudden remedy; ſeeing that neither the courage nor conſtancie of Peter de Medicis were greater in his aduerſities, then had bene his modeſtie and diſcretion in his proſperities. By this muſt be vnderſtood, that the diſpleaſures which the citie of Florence had receiued from the beginning, for the impediments which were giuen to the King, were continually multiplied, both for a new chace and baniſhment of their Merchants out of all parts of the Realme of France, and alſo for feare of the power of the French; which did ſo much the more grow riſing in the hearts of men, by how much they heard that the army had begun to paſſe the Appenin mounts: but ſpecially they fell all into dread and feare, by the crueltie ſhewed at the taking of Fiuiſana. For theſe cauſes euery one did publikly deteſt the raſhneſſe of Peter de Medicis, who, without neceſſitie, truſting more in his owne weening, and the counſels of certaine raſh miniſters, men arrogant in times of peace, and vnprofitable, and cowards in times of warre; then following the directions of thoſe citizens that were friends to his father, and had alwayes inſtructed him with no leſſe graue counſels; had ſo indiſcretly prouoked the armes of ſo mightie a King, aſſiſted with the Duke of Millan: ſeeing withall, he was ignorant in the affaires of warre, leauing the Citie, and other places of their obedience not fortified, but ill furniſhed with ſouldiers and munitions neceſſary to make defence againſt ſo great a force: beſides that there had as yet appeared none of thoſe Aragons, for whom they had expoſed themſelues to ſo great danger: ſo that their countrey abandoned of euery one, remained in the deepe hatred of ſo mightie a King, and was ready to fall as a manifeſt prey to him, who with ſo great inſtance had ſought not to fall into occaſion and neceſſitie to hurt it.

This diſpoſition which was almoſt in all thoſe of the towne, was further kindled by many noble Citizens, much diſpleaſed with the preſent gouernment, and that one onely family had riſen ſo much in preſuming, as to appropriate to it ſelfe the rule of the whole Commonweale: inſomuch as one increaſing the feares of another, and all labouring in one common dread, and miniſtring ſtomacke and courage to ſuch as deſired new things, they had ſo ſtirred the braines and ſpirits of the people, that there was generall feare of ſome tumult in the towne; whereunto the multitude was the rather prouoked by the pride and immoderate behauiours of Peter, who in many things forſaking the ciuill cuſtomes and modeſtie of his anceſtors, had bene followed from his infancie with a perpetuall hatred and ill will, by the generalitie of the Citizens: ſo that his father ſeeming to haue a great ſpeculation in his vices and vile conditions, would often ſay to his ſecret friends, That the indiſcretion and arrogancie of his ſonne, would one day be the cauſe of the ruine of his houſe. It is a good propertie of wiſedome in fathers to find out the diſpoſitions of their children; but it is a principall effect of their iudgements, to cut off with diſcipline all courſe of humors that feed and miniſter to their naturall corruptions: which is an office no leſſe iuſt in parents, then it belongeth to the art of the Phyſition, firſt to ſeeke out the humor that offends, and then to apply the remedie proper to cure, and not to leaue the bodie to a ſetled infection.

Peter being now amazed with the perill, which with raſhneſſe he contemned afore, and ſeeing he failed of the ſuccors and aides which were promiſed by the Pope and Alphonſo, who as well for the loſſe of Oſtia and ſiege of the port Neptune, as for feare of the French army by ſea, had euen their hands and heads full; determined with a counſell ſudden and particular, to go ſearch of the enemy that ſafetie, which he hoped no more to find in his friends; following therein the example of his father, who, in the yeare 1479 being brought to deſperate termes of danger, by a warre which Pope Sixtus and Ferdinand king of Naples managed againſt the Florentines, went to ſeeke Ferdinand in the towne of Naples, from whom he brought to Florence publike peace and priuate ſuretie. But it is a thing very dangerous for men to gouerne themſelues by examples, if there be not a concurrence of the ſame reaſons, not onely in generall, but euen in all particularities; and if things be not ruled with the ſame wiſedome: and if laſtly, ouer and beſides all other foundations, the ſelfe ſame fortune haue not her part. Being parted from Florence in this deliberation, and not farre on his way, he had aduertiſement that the horſemen of Paul Vrſin, and three hundred footmen ſent by the Florentines to enter Serezana, were broken by certaine companies of the French, which were come ſcouring euen on this ſide the riuer of Magre, the moſt of them either ſlaine or made priſoners. This made him tarry for the Kings ſafe conduct at Pietraſanta, whither went for his conduct and ſuretie the Biſhop of S. Malo, with

certaine Lords of the Court, in whoſe companie he atriued at the campe the ſame day that the King (with the reſidue of his ſtrength) ioyned himſelfe to the vaunt-guard, which incamping before Serezanella, battered that rocke, but not with ſuch ſucceſſe as there was hope to carry it. After he was preſented to the King, who entertained him with good countenance, but more in apparence then in affection; he appeaſed immediatly all his diſpleaſures, in conſenting to his whole demaunds, which were great and immoderate; namely, that the fortreſſes and Caſtles of Pietraſanta, Serezana and Serezanella, which were (as it were) the keyes of the dominions of Florence on that ſide, and the fortreſſes of Piſa, and the port of Liuorne (members principall of their Eſtate) ſhould be all put into the hands of the King, who (for his part) ſhould bind himſelfe by promiſe and by his proper ſigniture, to redeliuer them as ſoone as he had conquered the kingdome of Naples: That Peter ſhould do ſo much, that the Florentines ſhould lend to the King two hundred thouſand duckats, and that then he would receiue them into his alliance and protection. Touching the ratification of which promiſes, made with ſimple words, it was ſaid, there ſhould be leters diſpatched to Florence, by the which the King meant to paſſe: but the conſignation of the caſtles and fortreſſes was not deferred: for, Peter ioyning meaning to his words, cauſed to be deliuered (without tarrying) to the King thoſe peeces, Serezana, Pietraſanta, and Serezanella; and not many dayes after, according to the agreement, the like was done of the peeces of Piſa, and port of Liuorne.

Peter de Medicis cometh to the French king.

Peter de Medicis accords with the French king.

The French men wondred, that Peter with ſo great facilitie accorded to things of ſo great importance; for that there was no doubt but the King would haue bene contented with farre meaner conditions. I will not let paſſe in this place without report, that which was ſubtilly anſwered to Peter de Medicis, by Lodowike Sforce, arriuing the day following at the campe. As Peter in going to meet him to do him honour, excuſed himſelfe that he had miſcaried, for that Lodowike was ſomewhat gone out of the way: he anſwered very properly: That the one of them two went out of the way, but perhaps (ſaith he) it lights vpon your ſelfe; as reproching vnto him that he was fallen into ſo great difficulties and dangers, for not giuing faith to his counſels. But the euents of things falling out afterwards, did well declare, that they had both gone out of the right way; but it was with a greater infamie and calamitie to him, who raiſed into greater degree, made profeſſion with his wiſedome, to be the guide of all others.

This reſolution and accord of Peter de Medicis, did not onely aſſure the King of the things of Tuskane, but it tooke out of his way all blocks and obſtacles in Romagnia, where the Aragons began now much to decline: for, as it is a thing very hard to him that ſcarcely defends himſelfe from dangers imminent, to prouide in one ſeaſon for the perils of another; ſo, whileſt Ferdinand remained in ſuretie within the ſtrong fort of Faenza, the enemy returned to the countrey of Imola, where, after they had with a part of the army aſſailed the burrough of Bubane, but in vaine, becauſe by his litle circuite, ſmall ſtrength ſufficed to defend it, and for his baſe ſituation, the countrey ranne ouer with waters: they tooke by force the towne of Mordane, notwithſtanding it was very ſtrong, and plentifully furniſhed with ſouldiers to defend it: but ſuch was the fury of the artillery, and ſuch the deſperate hardineſſe of the French in the aſſault, (many being drowned as they paſſed ouer the watery ditches) that there was no abilitie of reſiſtance by thoſe that were within, againſt whom the victors accompanied their fortune with ſuch bloudy crueltie, without regard to age or ſexe, that they filled all Romagnia with generall feares and aſtoniſhments. By reaſon of this accident, Katherine Sforce deſpairing of ſuccours, accorded with the French men, to auoid the perill preſent, and promiſed to their army all commodities of the Eſtates ſubiect to her ſonne: the ſame being the cauſe that Ferdinand (now doubting of the wils of them of Faenza, yea and held it ſo much the more dangerous to remaine in the midſt of Imola and Furly, by how much he was well aduertiſed of the going of Peter de Medicis to Serezana) retired neare to the walls of Ceſena, ſhewing ſo great a feare, that becauſe he would not paſſe neare to Furly, he led his army by the hils (a way more long and cumberſome) neare to Caſtrocare, a burrough of the Florentines. And within few dayes after, hearing of the agreement which Peter had made with the French, for which cauſe the bands of the Florentines forſooke him, he tooke the way to Rome: Like as alſo Dom Federike being parted from the port of Liuorne, retired with his army towards the kingdome of Naples, where begun to be neceſſary for Alphonſo, thoſe armies which he had ſent abroad with ſo great hopes to inuade the Eſtates of others: for, his affaires were full of many aduerſities on his ſide, ſeeing that the ſiege of the port of Neptune not ſucceeding, he had led backe his army to Terracina: and the army by ſea for the French, whereof were leaders the Prince of Salerne, and Monſ. de Serenon, was diſcouered aboue Oſtia; but yet giuing it out that they would not offend the States of the Church, they put no men on land, nor ſhewed any token of diſpleaſure to the Pope, notwithſtanding their King many dayes before had refuſed to heare Francis Piccolhomini Cardinall of Sienna, Legat, ſent by the Pope to his Maieſtie.

But to returne to Peter de Medicis; after the Florentines were aduertiſed of the agreements he had made, ſo greatly to the diminution of their territories, and with ſo ſlanderous and dangerous a wound and gall to the Commonweale, there was no litle diſpleaſure and diſcontentment throughout all the Citie: beſides their great loſſes, their hearts were moued againſt him, for that with a new forme and order of dealing, and contrary to the examples of his predeceſſors, he had alienated, without the counſell of his Citie, and ſolemne decree of the Magiſtrates, ſo great a part of the State of Florence; inſomuch, that to the bitter complaints made againſt him, were ioyned the murmures and ſecret grudgings of the people, incenſing one another to riſe and recouer their libertie, without that any of thoſe that in their hearts bare fauour to the doings of Peter, durſt either with force or perſwaſion, ſet themſelues againſt ſo great an inclination. But though the Florentines hauing no ſtrength to defend Piſa and Liuorne, had no hope to turne the Kings will from hauing them; yet becauſe they would ſeparate the counſels of the Commonweale from the counſels of Peter, or at the leaſt that that ſhould not be attributed to one in particular, which appertained to them all in publike, they addreſſed to him many Embaſſadors of thoſe families, which were ill contented with the Medices. But Peter knowing that that was a beginning of a mutation of Eſtate, to the end to prouide for his affaires afore greater diſorders hapned, applied his deliberations to the time, and tooke leaue of the King, vnder colour to giue perfection to that he had promiſed. At this time alſo the King parted from Serezana, to go to Piſa, and Lodowike Sforce returned to Millan, hauing obtained for money that the inueſtiture of Genes, granted by the King a few yeares before to John Galeas for him and his iſſue, ſhould be transferred to him and his poſteritie: he went away very much diſcontented, for that the King wold not leaue in his keeping (as he ſaid he had promiſt) Pietraſanta & Serezana, which places ſeruing him as a ladder to raiſe him to the Citie of Piſa, he demanded, as vniuſtly taken from the Genoways a few yeares before by the Florentines. But when Peter was returned to Florence, he found the Citie eſtranged from him, and the minds of his chiefe friends in ſuſpence, for that againſt their counſell, and againſt the oportunitie of the time, he had vndiſcreetly gouerned all things. The Commonaltie alſo was drawne into ſuch an vprore and mutinie, that as the next day after his returne, he would haue entred into the Pallace, wherein reſted the authoritie and great magiſtracie of the Commonweale, it was forbidden him by certaine Magiſtrates which kept the gate armed, of whom the chiefeſt was Iaques de Nerly a yong man of equall nobilitie and riches. This being ſpread abroad through the Citie, the people ranne with ſwift tumult to armes, being the more moued to this vprore, for that Paul Vrſin, whom Peter had ſent for, was at hand with his band of armed men. The aſpect and conſideration of theſe dangers, cauſed Peter (eſtſoones returned to his houſe, and hauing loſt both courage & counſel, and whileſt the State declared him rebell) to flee in great haſte out of Florence, following him Iohn Cardinall of the Church of Rome and Iulian his brethren, vpon whom in like ſort were impoſed the paines ordained againſt rebels: he went directly to Bologna, where Iohn Bentiuole deſiring in an other that conſtancie and reſolution of courage which he could not ſhew ſince in his owne aduerſities, reproued him bitterly at the beginning, for that not onely to his owne preiudice, but alſo to the ill example of all that oppreſſed the libertie of their countreys, he had ſo cowardly, without the death of one man, abandoned ſuch a greatneſſe. In this ſort, by the raſhneſſe of one yong man, did at that time fall the houſe of Medicis from that rule and power, which (vnder the name and apparence almoſt of a ciuill adminiſtration) it had obtained in Florence threeſcore yeares: it began in Coſmo his great grandfather, a Citizen of ſingular wiſedome and infinite wealth, and for thoſe regards very notable through all the parts of Europe; but much more was he recommended, for that with a wonderfull magnificence and heart truly royall, regarding more the eternitie of his name then the profit of his poſteritie, he employed more then foure hundred thouſand duckets in building of Churches, erecting of Monaſteries, with other buildings of ſumptuous coſts, not onely in his owne countrey, but alſo in many places of the world: and

and his ſonnes ſonne Laurence, a man for vnderſtanding and iudgement excellent, in counſell graue and ſingular, in liberalitie equall with his grandfather, and for greatneſſe of heart nothing inferiour, for miniſtration in the Commonweale, of authoritie more abſolute, but for wealth of leſſe abilitie, and of life farre more ſhort; got a generall reputation throughout Italy, and with many ſtrange Princes, which after his death, was turned into a cleare monument and memory, for that it ſeemed that the concord and felicitie of Italy ended with his life.

But the ſame day that the State of Florence fell into change, the French king being in the citie of Piſa, it hapned that the townesmen in popular troupes with cries ran to him, and demanded libertie, complaining grieuouſly of the oppreſſions and wrongs which they ſaid they had receiued vnder the gouernment of the Florentines: certaine of the Kings Councell aſſiſting, aſſured him that their demand was iuſt, for that the Florentines held them in too hard ſeruitude. The King not ſeeing into the importance of their requeſt, nor how farre it was contrary to the contract of Serezana, told them, they ſhould haue libertie. With the which anſwer, the Piſans ran to armes, and throwing downe to the earth all the enſignes and armories of the Florentines, they put themſelues into an abſolute libertie, ſo long deſired. Notwithſtanding, the King, contrary to himſelfe, and no leſſe ignorant in the things he had accorded, would that the Florentine officers ſhould ſtill adminiſter their accuſtomed iuriſdictions; and on the other part, left the old citadell in the hands of the Piſans, and kept to himſelfe the new, of farre more importance. In theſe accidents of Piſa and Florence, may be well diſcerned a true experience of the old ſaying, or common prouerbe, as we call it: That men when their aduerſities approach, loſe chiefly that » wiſedome, with the which they might haue hindred or auoided the ils that happen: and this is » common to men and kingdomes that draw towards their deſtinies, that when their ill fortune » comes, it blindes their eyes that they cannot diſcerne it, and bindes their hands that they cannot helpe it, making them inſtruments againſt themſelues in the execution of their miſhaps. For » both the Florentines, who in all times had held the fidelitie of the Piſans ſuſpected, ſeeing ſo dangerous a warre at their gates, forgat to reuoke to Florence the principall citizens of Piſa, as for their better ſuretie they had wont to call home a great number of them, vpon neuer ſo light occaſion or litle accidents: and Peter de Medicis, ſeeing a concurrence of ſo many great difficulties together, was too much ouerſeene, that he did not arme the place and publike Pallace with ſuch ſtrength of ſtrangers, as he had oftentimes done before in farre leſſer ſuſpition: foreſight hauing kept him ſtill in his Eſtate and rule, and ſuch prouiſions much hindred thoſe great mutations. But touching the affaires of Piſa, it is manifeſt, that that which gaue them greateſt encouragement to make this commotion (naturally hating the name of the Florentines) was the authoritie of Lodowike Sforce, who to that end had entertained certaine intelligences and practiſes with ſome Citizens of the place, baniſhed for priuate offences: and the day preſent of the reuolt, Galeas de S. Seuerin, whom he had left to be alwayes about the King, incenſed the people to the tumult; by which meanes Lodowike perſwaded himſelfe, that the dominion of Piſa would fall ſpeedily into his hands, not knowing that ſhortly after ſuch a matter would be the cauſe of all his miſeries. It is alſo manifeſt, that certaine of the Piſans communicating the night before with the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula, what they had deſire and reſolution to do: the Cardinall, who perhaps till that day had neuer bene author of peaceable counſels, admoniſhed them with words graue and well inſtructing, that they ſhould not conſider onely the ſuperficies and beginning of things, but looke more deeply vnto that which in time may happen. He told them, libertie was a thing precious, and of very vehement deſire, well meriting that men ſhould oppoſe themſelues to all dangers, hauing a true and ſenſible hope to be able to defend » it on all ſides: but as touching their Citie, naked of peoples, and drained of wealth and » ſubſtance, he ſaw very weake poſſibilities to maintain it againſt the power of the Florentines; and » to promiſe to themſelues that the authoritie of the French King ſhould be turned to their pro- » tection, were hopes deceitfull, and an expectation too full of vncertainties and doubts; for that » albeit the moneys and treaſures of Florence ſhould do litle with him, (as it is like they may pre- » uaile a great deale, ſpecially looking into the contract of Serezana) yet his armies would not be » alwayes in Italy, according to the experience and iudgement of examples paſt. Beſides, it were » too great an indiſcretion to bind themſelues to a perpetuall perill, vpon foundations fraile and » not perpetuall; and for moſt vncertaine hopes, to leuie againſt enemies farre more mightie then » they, a warre certaine and abſolute, wherein they could promiſe themſelues no ſuccours, ſee- »

In this generall confuſion of things, the King departeth from Piſa towards Florence, and is not reſolued what forme he would giue to the affaires of the Piſans; he ſtayed in a place called Signa, ſeuen miles from Florence, to be aduertiſed afore he entred the Citie, whether the tumult of the people were in any ſort appeaſed, who had not diſcontinued their vprores ſince the day that Peter de Medicis was chaſed out of the Citie: he had withall this intention, to giue time to Monſieur d'Aubigny, whom he had ſent for (to the end his entry might ſo much the more aſtoniſh the Florentines) with direction to leaue the artillery at Caſtrocare, and giue leaue to the fiue hundred men at armes Italians, which were with him in Romagnia, together with the men at armes of the Duke of Millan, except the Count Caiazze, which followed Monſieur d'Aubigny with three hundred light horſemen. It was ſuppoſed by many tokens and coniectures, that the intention of the King was to draw the Florentines by feare of his power, to yeeld vnto him the dominion abſolute of the Citie: a thing which himſelfe could not diſſemble with their Embaſſadors, hauing often recourſe to Signa, to make perfect the accord that was contracted. It was without doubt, that the King bare a mind inflamed againſt them, and nouriſhed many ill diſpoſed meanings againſt their Citie, for that they ſought to hinder him in his enterpriſe. And albeit it was manifeſt, that that reſiſtance proceeded not of the will of the Commonweale, which in reaſonable ſort had iuſtified themſelues; yet he could not eaſily forget and diſſolue the impreſſion of the offence, being (as it was ſuppoſed) much induced to their diſfauours, by many of his Councell and Lords; who iudging it not meete to let paſſe the oportunitie to make himſelfe Lord ouer the Citie, or perhaps puſhed forward with their proper ambition and couetouſneſſe, were loth to loſe the occaſion to ſacke a Citie, abounding in ſuch treaſures and wealth: in ſo much as there ranne a brute through the campe, that the Citie had deſerued to be puniſhed, to ſerue as an example to others, being the towne in Italy that had preſumed to oppoſe againſt the power and army of France. There were alſo of the chiefeſt of his Councell, that ſolicited him to reſtore Peter de Medicis to his former degree: for whom, with a peculiar diligence aboue the reſidue, did labour Philip Lord of Breſſe, brother to the Duke of Sauoy, being induced to that office by the priuate friendſhips and promiſes that had paſſed betweene them: in ſo much, that either by the perſwaſions of them that could do moſt, (notwithſtanding the Biſhop of S. Malo counſelled the contrary) or by a hope to make the Florentines more inclined to his wil by this feare; or laſtly to haue occaſion to take vpon the ſodaine what part or way he would. The King wrote to Peter, cauſing alſo the Lord Philip to do the like, and aduiſed him to come neare to Florence, for that for the ancient friendſhip that had bene betweene their houſes, and for his owne particular readineſſe and good will ſhewed in the conſignation of the fortreſſes, he was determined to redreſſe him and reſtore him to his firſt authoritie. But theſe letters found him not at Bologna, according to the Kings weening; for that what by the rough words of John Bentiuole, and doubt he ſhould be purſued by the Duke of Millan, and haply alſo by the French king, he was for his misfortunes retired to Veniee, whither they were ſent to him by his brother the Cardinall remaining then at Bologna. At Florence they doubted much of the Kings will; and yet, not ſeeing with what force or with what hopes they might reſiſt him, they agreed (as a counſell leaſt dangerous) to receiue him into their Citie, hoping there would ſome meanes ariſe to appeaſe him. And yet making the beſt of their perils, and becauſe they would be prouided for all fortunes, they ordained that the houſes of moſt of the Citizens ſhould be ſecretly repleniſhed with men naturall of the dominion of Florence; and that the Captaines which were in the pay of the Commonweale (diſſembling notwithſtanding the occaſion) ſhould enter the

Citie with many of their bands and ſouldiers; and that euery one within the towne and places about it, ſhould ſtand vpon ready guard to take armes at the alarme of the great bell of the publike pallace. After this the King marched to Florence with his army, wherein was expreſſed no litle pompe; as well by the glory and magnificence of thoſe of his Court, as by them of the towne: he entred in ſigne of victory, armed himſelfe and his horſe, with his Lance vpon his thigh, and immediatly began to ſpeake of compoſition, but that was not without many difficulties: for, beſides the immoderate fauours which ſome of the French Court bare to Peter de Medicis, and the demands of money intollerable made by the King, he demanded openly the impery of Florence, alleaging that according to the orders of warre in the Realme of France, he had lawfully wonne it, ſeeing his entry was armed according to the cuſtomes of conquerours. From which demand albeit he went in the end, yet ſought hetto leaue at Florence certaine men of the long coate (ſo are called in France Lawyers, Doctors, and men of Iuſtice) as his Embaſſadors, with ſuch authoritie, that according to the inſtitutions of France, he might pretend to be giuen to him for euer no litle iuriſdiction. But on the contrary, the Florentines were obſtinate to preſerue their full libertie, hapning what perils ſoeuer; inſomuch that communicating together with ſuch a contrarietie of wils, albeit the minds of both parts were continually kept in hot and angry moods, yet neither faction ſhewed readineſſe to determine the difference by armes: for, the people of Florence giuen of long to the following of merchandize, and not to the exerciſe of warre, ſuffered no ſmall feares, hauing within their owne walls one ſo mightie a King with his army full of nations vnknowne and furious. And to the French men was no litle amaze the conſideration of the great multitude of peoples, who, ſince the dayes that the gouernment changed, had gathered boldneſſe and audacitie aboue expectation: They were aſtoniſhed beſides at the common brute, that at the alarme of the great bell, there would flocke infinite troupes of people from all parts confining. In which common feare on both ſides, at the noiſe of euery falſe alarme that was heard, either part for his proper ſuretie tooke armes, but not one did aſſaile or prouoke another. The foundation which the King ſought to worke by Peter de Medicis, was ſupplanted; for that Peter wauering between the hope that was promiſed him, and the feare that he ſhould be giuen vp as a prey to his aduerſaries, asked counſell of the Senate of Venice touching the Kings letters. Truly there is nothing more neceſſary in great deliberations, and on the other ſide nothing more dangerous then to demand counſell: And albeit counſell is leſſe neceſſary to men diſcreet, then to ſuch as are not tempered, yet no doubt the profits are not few which wiſe men reape by counſels, ſeeing no man hath that perfect wiſedome to conſider alwayes, and know all things of himſelfe; and in reaſons contrary or different, is able alwayes to diſcerne the better part. But what aſſurance hath he that asketh counſell, to receiue counſell, according to the faith he repoſeth? ſeeing if there be no equall fidelitie nor affection, but regard to particular intereſts, as profit, reuenge, or ſome other motion; he that giueth the counſell, dreſſeth it to that end which beſt anſwereth his purpoſe: ſo that thoſe ends being for the moſt part vnknowne to him that comes to askes counſell, he perceiueth not (if he be not wiſe) the treaſon and infidelitie of the counſell. The experience was ſeene in the condition of Peter de Medicis: for, the Venetians iudging, that if he returned into his countrey, it would be a cauſe to giue the King a greater facilitie to his demands and deſires of the Florentines, (a thing preiudiciall to them, and contrary to the courſe of their affaires) perſwaded him by many liuely reaſons (counſelling rather for themſelues then for him) that he ſhould not put himſelfe in the power of a King of France, holding himſelfe iniured by him: Wherein the better to encourage him to the following of their counſell, they offered him to embrace his affaires, and as time and neceſſitie required, to miniſter to him all meanes and fauours conuenient for his reſtitution; wherefore the better to be aſſured that he ſhould not then depart Venice, they ſet vpon him (if the common brute be true) very ſecret eſpiall and guard. But now for Florence, in this meane while mens hearts were inflamed on all parts, and almoſt carried into manifeſt contention: the King would nothing abate of his later demands, nor the Florentines be bound to ſummes of money ſo intollerable, and much leſſe conſent to any iuriſdiction or preheminence in their Eſtate. All which difficulties not being able almoſt to be diſſolued without armes, were euen preſently decided by the vertue of Peter Capponi, one of the foure deputed to treate with the King: this Capponi was a man of ſpirit and great courage, and ſpeciall reputation in Florence, as well for his parts and qualities, as for that he was of an honorable family, and deſcended of perſonages who had borne great rule in the Commonweale. As he and his companions were one day in the preſence and audience of the King, and that one of the Kings Secretaries read the vnreaſonable capitulations offered by the King, at the laſt he in a great fury ſnatched the articles out of the Secretaries hands, and tare them before the eyes of the King, ſaying with a heart reſolute, and loud voice: Seeing you demand of vs things ſo diſhoneſt, ſound you vp your trumpets, and we will ring our bells, let all things be ruled by the ſentence of the ſword; and in the ſame heate flings with great ſuddenneſſe out of the chamber, being followed of his companions. The words of this Citizen, whom the King and his Court had already knowne, for that a few moneths before he had bene in France in legation for them of Florence, aſtoniſhed them all in ſuch ſort (ſpecially for that they could not beleeue that ſuch a boldneſſe was without occaſion) that they called him backe againe, and without ſpeaking more of demands, whereunto the Florentines had no will to condeſcend, the King and the Citie fell to compoſition in this ſort: That all quarrels and iniuries forgotten and cancelled, the Citie of Florence ſhould be friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the Crowne of France: That for the ſiuretie of the King, the citie of Piſa and towne of Liuorne, with all their caſtles, ſhould remaine in his hands: And that he ſhould be bound to reſtore them to the Florentines, without any expences or charges, as ſoone as he had brought to end his enterpriſe of the kingdome of Naples; the which ſhould be conſtrued to be at an end whenſoeuer he ſhould haue conquered the citie of Naples, or accorded the warre by meanes of peace or truce for leſſe then two yeares, or that for any other occaſion his perſon ſhould be gone out of Italy: That thoſe that at that time had the keeping of the ſaid Caſtles, ſhould be ſworne to render them in the caſes aforeſaid: That in the meane while the impery, the iuriſdiction, the gouernment, and the reuenue of the townes ſhould be in the adminiſtration of the Florentines, as they were accuſtomed: That the like ſhould be of Pietraſanta, Serezana and Serezanella; but (for that the Genoways pretended right to them) the King ſhould procure either by compoſition or iuſtice, ſome reaſonable end between them; and if within the time aforeſaid he could not determine the titles, that then he ſhould reſtore them to the Florentines: That the King might leaue at Florence two Embaſſadors; and that during his expedition for Naples, there ſhould be nothing debated concerning that action, without their priuitie and calling them to it; and that during the ſaid time, they ſhould not chuſe a Captaine generall ouer their companies, without communicating with the ſaid Embaſſadors: That all the other peeces taken away or reuolted from the Florentines, ſhould be immediatly rendred, and that they might be ſuffered to recouer them by armes, where deniall was made: That, to aide the King in his enterpriſe, they ſhould giue him fiftie thouſand duckets within fifteene dayes, fortie thouſand in the moneth of March, and thirtie thouſand in Iune next comming: That the Florentines ſhould pardon the Piſans their rebellions, and other faults committed during their reuolt: That they ſhould deliuer Peter de Medicis and his brethren from condemnation and confiſcation, with this condition notwithſtanding, that Peter ſhould not come by a hundred miles neare the confines of the dominion of Florence, (that was becauſe he ſhould not remaine at Rome) nor his brethren nearer then a hundred miles of the citie of Florence. Theſe were the articles of moſt importance in the capitulation made betweene the King and the Florentines; which after they were lawfully paſſed and contracted, were in great ceremonie publiſhed in the great Church at diuine Seruice, where the King in perſon (at whoſe requeſt this was done) and the Magiſtrates of the Citie, promiſed by ſolemne oath vpon the high altar, in the preſence of the Court and the whole face of Florence, to obſerue the contents of the ſame. Within two dayes after the King left Florence, and went to Sienna, which Citie being confederate with the King of Naples, and with the Florentines, had followed their authoritie, vntill the going of Peter de Medicis to Serezana warned them to looke to their proper ſafetie.

Sienna a Citie well peopled, and planted in a region very fertill, and which (of antiquitie) had beene the moſt renowmed and mightie towne of Tuſcane next to Florence, was gouerned by a peculiar policie proper and particular to it ſelfe, but ſo, as it knew rather the name of libertie then the effects: for that being diuided into many factions or members of Citizens, which they call orders, it obeyed that part which according to the accidents of times and fauours of forrein Potentates, was more ſtrong then the others; at that time held moſt rule and authoritie the order of Monte-Noue. After the King had taried a very few dayes at Sienna, he planted a garriſon there, (for that hauing bene alwayes at the deuotion of the Empire, he held it ſuſpected) and tooke his way to Rome, rising euery day more insolent then other, for his succesſe and fortunes, which were alwayes greater then euer were his hopes: And being also fauoured with the aire and weather, more then the naturall temperature of that season had wont to shew, he determined to put diligence to his fortune, and vse those prosperities not onely as terrible to his enemies manifest and professed, but euen to those that were conioyned with him, or at least had not prouoked him in any thing. Therfore the Senate of Venice and the Duke of Millan, no lesse astonished with these successes, then doubtfull that the Kings thoghts wold not be at rest by the conquest of Naples, (specially seeing him possest of the fortresses of the Florentines, and to leaue a garrison at Sienna) began for a remedy of their common danger, to make a new confederatiõ; whereunto they had with more speed and ease giuen perfection, if there had bene made that resistance to the King at Rome that was hoped for; the intention of the Duke of Calabria (with whom were ioyned in one strength the bands of the Pope, and Virginio Vrsin, with the residue of the Aragons army) being to incampe at Viterba, to giue impediment to the King for passing further. To this he was drawne, besides many occasions, by the oportunitie of the place, enuironed with townes of the Church, and neare the States of the Vrsins: but all the circumference and countreys about Rome, drawing into tumult by the incursions which the Colonnoys made beyond the riuer of Tiber, and for the impediments of victuals (by meanes of Ostia) which should come to Rome by sea, he durst not abide there: he doubted withall the intention of the Pope, for that since he vnderstood that Peter de Medicis was turned, he had begun to open his eares to the demands of the French, for the which, and the reasons of them, Cardinall Ascanius went to him, after the Cardinall of Valence (in pledge of his suretie) was come to Marina, a towne of the Colonnoys. And albeit Ascanius was gone without resolution certaine, for that Alexander distrusted much the intention of the King, and on the other side was in great feare of his forces, which bred no small torment and conflict in his heart; yet after the King was parted from Florence, they returned eftsoones to commune of the accord: wherein for the better accomplishment of things, the Pope dispatched to the King the Bishops of Concorde, and Ternie, and Maister Gratian his Confessour, with commission that they should compound as well for the affaires of Alphonso, as for his owne. But the King was of a contrary meaning, hauing setled his resolution to accord onely and particularly with the Pope: and for that cause he sent to him Monsieur Trimouille, and the President of Ganuay being there also for the same occasion: the Cardinall Ascanius and Prosper Colonne, who were no sooner come to Rome, then the Pope (for what cause I know not) changing aduice, bestowed the Duke of Calabria within Rome, with all his army, and caused to be arrested Ascanius and Prosper, hauing restrained them within the tower of Adrian, of old called the castle of Crescence, and now named the castle of S. Ange, and demanded of them restitution of Ostia. In this tumult also the French Embassadors were made prisoners by the Aragons: but the Pope caused them with speed to be deliuered, and within a few dayes after restored to libertie Ascanius and Prosper, constraining them notwithstanding to depart suddenly out of Rome. After this, he sent to the French king lying then at Nepi, Cardinall Federike of S. Seuerin, beginning to treate onely of his proper affaires, and yet in great doubt and declining of mind, for that sometimes he determined to stand to the defence of Rome, and therefore gaue sufferance to Ferdinand and the Captaines to looke to fortifie it in the parts most weake; and earst againe, he iudged it a matter very difficult to defend it, for the impediments of victuals restrained by those of Ostia: in which respects, weighing also with the infinite numbers of strangers, being of minds and wils different, the diuersitie of factions euen amongst the Romaines, he began to thinke to go from Rome, requiring in the Colledge that euery Cardinall would promise by a writing subsigned, to follow him: and euen standing amazed with the dangers and difficulties imminent, vpon euery one of his deliberations he turned his mind to accord. But whilest his mind wauered in these ambiguities, the French men forbore not to ouerrunne the whole country on this side Tiber, making themselues Lords of one towne after another, no place offering resistance to their incursions; no, not one peece or fort which gaue not place to their importunate fury, according to the example of the others; no, not such as had good occasion to oppose themselues against them, as Virginio Vrsin, drawne by so many bonds of faith, office, and honor to the house of Aragon, Captaine generall of the army of Alphonso, grand Constable of the realme of Naples, and very neare of kindred to Alphonso, for that John Iordan his sonne had maried a bastard daughter of the late king Ferdinand.

But

had borne great rule in the Commonweale. As he and his companions were one day in the presence and audience of the King, and that one of the Kings Secretaries read the vnreasonable capitulations offered by the King, at the last he in a great fury snatched the articles out of the Secretaries hands, and tare them before the eyes of the King, saying with a heart resolute, and loud voice: Seeing you demand of vs things so dishonest, sound you vp your trumpets, and we will ring our bells, let all things be ruled by the sentence of the sword; and in the same heate flings with great suddennesse out of the chamber, being followed of his companions. The words of this Citizen, whom the King and his Court had already knowne, for that a few moneths before he had bene in France in legation for them of Florence, astonished them all in such sort (specially for that they could not beleeue that such a boldnesse was without occasion) that they called him backe againe, and without speaking more of demands, whereunto the Florentines had no will to condescend, the King and the Citie fell to composition in this sort: That all quarrels and iniuries forgotten and cancelled, the Citie of Florence should be friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the Crowne of France: That for the suretie of the King, the citie of Pisa and towne of Liuorne, with all their castles, should remaine in his hands: And that he should be bound to restore them to the Florentines, without any expences or charges, as soone as he had brought to end his enterprise of the kingdome of Naples; the which should be construed to be at an end whensoeuer he should haue conquered the citie of Naples, or accorded the warre by meanes of peace or truce for lesse then two yeares, or that for any other occasion his person should be gone out of Italy: That those that at that time had the keeping of the said Castles, should be sworne to render them in the cases aforesaid: That in the meane while the impery, the iurisdiction, the gouernment, and the reuenue of the townes should be in the administration of the Florentines, as they were accustomed: That the like should be of Pietrasanta, Serezana and Serezanella; but (for that the Genoways pretended right to them) the King should procure either by composition or iustice, some reasonable end between them; and if within the time aforesaid he could not determine the titles, that then he should restore them to the Florentines: That the King might leaue at Florence two Embassadors; and that during his expedition for Naples, there should be nothing debated concerning that action, without their priuitie and calling them to it; and that during the said time, they should not chuse a Captaine generall ouer their companies, without communicating with the said Embassadors: That all the other peeces taken away or reuolted from the Florentines, should be immediatly rendred, and that they might be suffered to recouer them by armes, where deniall was made: That, to aide the King in his enterprise, they should giue him fiftie thousand duckets within fifteene dayes, fortie thousand in the moneth of March, and thirtie thousand in Iune next comming: That the Florentines should pardon the Pisans their rebellions, and other faults committed during their reuolt: That they should deliuer Peter de Medicis and his brethren from condemnation and confiscation, with this condition notwithstanding, that Peter should not come by a hundred miles neare the confines of the dominion of Florence, (that was becaus he should not remaine at Rome) nor his brethren nearer then a hundred miles of the citie of Florence. These were the articles of most importance in the capitulation made betweene the King and the Florentines; which after they were lawfully passed and contracted, were in great ceremonie published in the great Church at diuine Seruice, where the King in person (at whose request this was done) and the Magistrates of the Citie, promised by solemne oath vpon the high altar, in the presence of the Court and the whole face of Florence, to obserue the contents of the same. Within two dayes after the King left Florence, and went to Sienna, which Citie being confederate with the King of Naples, and with the Florentines, had followed their authoritie, vntill the going of Peter de Medicis to Serezana warned them to looke to their proper safetie.

Sienna a Citie well peopled, and planted in a region very fertill, and which (of antiquitie) had bene the most renowmed and mightie towne of Tuskane next to Florence, was gouerned by a peculiar policie proper and particular to it selfe, but so, as it knew rather the name of libertie then the effects: for that being diuided into many factions or members of Citizens, which they call orders, it obeyed that part which according to the accidents of times and fauours of forrein Potentates, was more strong then the others; at that time held most rule and authoritie the order of Monte-Noue. After the King had taried a very few dayes at Sienna, he planted a garrison there, (for that hauing bene alwayes at the deuotion of the Empire, he held it suspected) and

The Pope is iealous of his owne safetie.

But

But he turning all things into forgetfulneſſe, and as vnthankfull for the ſtates and fauours he had receiued in the kingdome of Naples, as vnmindfull that the calamities of the Aragons were firſt kindled for his occaſions, and nouriſhed chiefly in his particular intereſts; conſented that (his perſon continuing ſtill in the pay of the king of Naples) his children ſhould compound with the French, and be bound to giue them paſſage and libertie of victuals and other friendſhips, through all the Eſtates which he held of the dominions of the Church, leauing the French men not a litle amazed with his example and forme of dealing, being not acquainted with theſe ſubtill and vnaccuſtomed diſtinctions of the ſouldiers of Italy: he ſuffered withall that Campagnane and certaine other places were put in deputation into the hands of the Cardinall of Gurcie, who promiſed to reſtore them ſo ſoone as the army was out of the territories of Rome. This forme of agreement was vſed alſo by the Count de Petillane, with all the reſidue of the family of the Vrſins. Immediatly vpon theſe accords, King Charles went from Nepi to Bracciane a chiefe towne of Virginio, and ſent to Oſtia Lewis the Lord of Ligny, and Tues Lord of Alegre, with fiue hundred Lances, and two thouſand Swiſſers, to the end that paſſing Tyber, and ioyning with the Colonnoys, they might make a ſtrength to enter Rome, and that ſo much the better, by how much the Colonnoys (by the meanes of their factions and partakers within Rome) had a reſolute hope to make their entry in what ſort ſoeuer it were, notwithſtanding by the ſeaſon of the time being rough and ſtormy, the difficulties were much increaſed. By this time Ciuitauecche, Cornette, & in the end almoſt all the territories of Rome, were brought to the deuotion of the French, when a man might haue ſeene all the Court amazed, all the Cardinals doubtfull, and all the communaltie of the Citie full of feares and emotion, demanding vehemently peace: inſomuch that the Pope driuen to dangerous termes, ſeeing the foundations which he had laid for his defence, ſhaken on all ſides, was not ſuſtained with any other thing then with the remembrance that he was one of the firſt that ſtirred the French King to the enterpriſe of Naples; and had ſince (without occaſion giuen) obſtinately reſiſted him with authoritie, with counſels, and with force: the ſame making him iuſtly doubt, that the faith which he ſhould receiue of the King, ſhould be like that the King had receiued of him. To theſe feares he felt another torment nothing inferior, vnderſtanding the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula was very gracious in the Kings ſight, with many other Cardinals his enemies, bearing no litle authoritie and rule in the Kings doings; by the perſwaſions of whom, and for the regard of the title of Right Chriſtian, which the Kings of France beare, and for the ancient name which that nation hath to be very religious; and laſtly for that in ill men the conſcience guiltie and infected ſuſpecteth not onely the worſt, but alſo their minds carried in ſhadowes, they expect and dread great things of thoſe that are knowne to them by name onely; he feared leſt the King would turne his wits (according to a vaine brute) to reforme the gouernment of the Church: the ſame being a right trembling thought and coniecture to him, when he remembred with what infamy he was come to the Popedome, performing his miniſtration with manners of life and meanes not differing from ſo foule and vile a beginning. But he was cleared immediatly of theſe ſuſpitions by the diligence and promiſes of the King, full of efficacie and deſire to aduance aboue all things his going to the Realme of Naples: and for that cauſe letting nothing paſſe that might take out of the way the blockes and impediments of the Pope, ſent to him eftſoones as Embaſſadours, the Seneſhall of Beucaire, the Marſhall of Giè, and the ſaid Preſident of Gannay. They laboured to perſwade the Pope that the Kings intention was not to meddle with any thing that appertained to the authoritie of Popes; and that his demands ſtretched not but to things reaſonable and neceſſary for the ſuretie of his paſſage. They required him inſtantly to agree with good will to the Kings entry into Rome, aſſuring him that it was a holy and peculiar deſire in his Maieſtie (not that it was not in his power to make his entry by armes, but becauſe he would not be conſtrained to forbeare) to vſe thoſe actions of reuerence, which had bene alwayes done by his elders to the Popes of Rome: They aſſured him that as ſoone as his Maieſties perſon were poſſeſſed of the preſence of the Pope within Rome, all thoſe quarrels that had bene raiſed betweene them, would be conuerted into reconcilement, vnitie and coniunction. It ſeemed to the Pope a hard compulſion, to deſpoile himſelfe afore all things of the aide of his friends, and committing his eſtate and life into the power of an enemie, to receiue him within the wals of Rome afore he had compounded or aſſured his affaires: notwithſtanding, making election of the danger that was of leaſt qualitie, he conſented to all their demands, and cauſed to depart out of Rome the Duke of Calabria, for whom albeit albeit he obtained of the French King a safe conduct for his safe passage through all the dominions of the Church, yet the Duke accounting it a diminution of his reputation and courage, refused it, and issued out of Rome by the gate S. Sebastian, the last day of the yeare 1494. at the same houre that at the gate de S. Maria de Popolo entred with the army of France the French king armed, with his Lance vpon his thigh, as he entred Florence. At the same time the Pope full of incredible feares and perplexities, was withdrawne to the castle S. Ange, not accompanied with other Cardinals then Baptista Vrsin, and Oliuer Caraffe a Neapolitan. But now began the Cardinals, ad Vincula, Ascanius, Colonne and Sauelle, with many others, to solicite the King with vehement instance, that taking from the Sea a Pope full of vices, and abhominable to all the world, he would create and set vp another: they told him, it would be no lesse vertuous in him to deliuer the Church of God from the tyrannie of a wicked Pope, then it was great glory to Pepin and Charlemaine his predecessors, to take the Popes of holy life out of the persecutions of those that did vniustly oppresse them: That the action was no lesse necessary for his securitie, then greatly concurring for his glory: for, there was no expectation of faith or trust in the promises of the Pope, being a man naturally full of fraud, insatiable in ambition, shameless in all his doings, and according to the testimonie of experience, extremely hating the French, with whom the reconciliation that now he made, was more by necessitie and feare, then of inclination or good will. Partly by these perswasions, and partly for that the Pope in the conditions that were debated, refused to let the King haue the castle of S. Ange, for the suretie of those things he promised him; the artillery was drawn twice from the Pallace of S. Mark where the King was lodged, to be planted before the castle. But the King bearing no inclination to offend the Pope, the presents and promises of Alexander working much with those that gouerned most the kings counsels, they fell to accord in this sort: That there should be betweene the Pope and the King a perpetuall amitie and confederation for their common defence: That the Pope should giue to the King, to hold for his suretie till he had conquered the kingdome of Naples, the Citadels of Ciuitauecchia, Terracine, and Spolete, and yet this last was not put into his hands: That the Pope should keepe no remembrance of any offence or iniury of the Cardinals or any Barons subiects to the Church, that had followed the Kings partie: That the Pope should inuest him in the kingdome of Naples: That he should giue to the King Gemin Ottoman, brother to Baiazet, who after the death of their father, had bene persecuted by the said Baiazet, according to the barbarous customes of the Ottomans, seeking to establish their succession in the Empire, with the bloud of their brethren, their neareſt kinne and competitors; in which perill for safetie of his life he was fled to Rhodes, from whence he was brought into France, and lastly past ouer into the power and custodie of Pope Innocent: by which occasion Baiazet (seruing his turne of the couetousnesse of the Vicars of Christ, as instruments to hold in peace the Empire enemy to the Christian faith) payed euery yeare (vnder the name of allowance toward his maintenance and keeping) fortie thousand duckets to the Popes, to the end they should be lesse ready to deliuer him into the hands of other Princes to serue their turnes against him. The King was so much the more desirous to haue him, by how much he supposed to turne him to many vses and oportunities for the aduancing of his pretended enterprise against the Turkes, (being greatly carried into glory by the vaine flatteries of many of his fauourites) which he meant to begin as soone as he had accomplished the conquest of the Aragons: and because the last fortie thousand duckats sent by the Turke, were taken at Sinigalle by the Prefect Rome, he required that the Pope would remit both the punishment and restitution. To these capitulations were added, that the Cardinall of Valence should follow the King three moneths as Legate Apostolike, but in meaning, it was to stand as hostage for the promises of his father. The accord thus made and past, the Pope returned to the Vatican, where is his Pallace Pontificall: and after, with pompes and ceremonies accustomed at the receiuing of great Kings, he receiued the King in the Church of S. Peter, and there (according to the maner) hauing kissed his feete kneeling, was afterward receiued to kisse his cheek. Another day he assisted in presence the Popes Masse, where he had his place the first after the first Bishop Cardinal, and according to the ancient custome, gaue water to the Pope celebrating Masse: which offices, humilities and ceremonies, the Pope (to continue the memory to all posterities) caused to be curiously drawne in a table pourtrayed, and hung vp in a gallerie of the Castle S. Ange. In this action, the Pope to gratifie the King, created and published Cardinals the Bishop of S. Malo, and the Bishop of Mans, of the house of Luxemburg, burg; forgetting nothing that might expresse how sincerely and vnfainedly he was reconciled.

The King parteth frō Rome and draweth towards Naples.

The King remaining in Rome about a moneth, forgat not to send bands and troupes of souldiers euen vpon the confines of the kingdome of Naples: where was already such generall commotion, that Aquila and almost all Abruzza displayed ensignes afore he parted from Rome, as also Fabricius Colonne occupied the quarters of Albe and Taille Cosse. The residue of the whole kingdome was almost in no more peaceable estate, for that as soone as Ferdinand was parted from Rome, the fruites of the hatreds which the people had long borne to Alphonso, began to appeare, helping much the remembrance of many rigors which his father Ferdinand had vsed against them. Vpon these they raised ready occasions to complaine vehemently of the iniquities of the gouernments passed, together with the cruelties and pride of Alphonso, expressing in these humors apparent desire that the French might come. And that in such sort, as the contemplation of the ancient relikes and monuments of such as held with the house of Anjow, albeit they were ioyned to the memory of so many Barons as had bene chased and imprisoned at sundry times by Ferdinand, (things of themselues of great consideration, and of no litle power to worke a change) did litle in this time, in regard of the other occasions: so vehemently were the hearts of all the kingdome inflamed against Alphonso; who for his part, as soone as he vnderstood that his sonne was gone out of Rome, entred into such present feares and astonishments, that turning all memory or regard to the great renowne and glorie which with so long experience he had got in many warres in Italy, into a present despaire, not to be able to resist this fatall storme, he determined to abandon the kingdome, and leaue to Ferdinand the name and authoritie royall. In this deuice perhaps he had hope, that taking away with himselfe the generall hatred, and leauing to the people for their King a yong Prince of great expectation, not yet hauing offended any of them, but gracious and plausible to the vniuersall multitude, he should make lesse in his subiects their desire to haue the French. Which counsell, if it had bene sooner taken, would haply haue wrought to better purpose; but being deferred till things were not onely in motion and shaking, but euen beginning to fall, it was not able to stay so great a ruine. It was said also (if it be lawfull not to despise such things altogether) that the spirit of Ferdinand appeared three times in sundry nights to Iames chiefe Surgeon of the Court, charging him first with soft and milde words, and after with many threatnings, to warne Alphonso from him, not to hope to be able to resist the French king, because it was a resolution in destinie, that his race trauelled with infinite aduentures and fortunes, and depriued at last of so large a kingdome, should now end and determine. He said, their enormities began now to appeare in iustice, and the many tyrannies by them committed were the causes, but aboue all others that which by his perswasion he had done in the Church of S. Leonard in Chiaia neare Naples, comming from Pozzolo; and for that he expressed them not particularly, men supposed that Alphonso had in that place perswaded Ferdinand to put to death secretly many Barons, whom he held prisoners long time before. But of what nature soeuer the occasion was, it is most certaine that Alphonso vexed with his owne conscience, liued day and night in a discontented spirit, for that in his sleepes the shadowes and ghosts of those dead Lords were liuely afore him, and on the dayes he beheld the people prepared greatly to insurrections, for reuenge of his rigorous dealings. In which perplexitie of mind applying his counsels to his fortunes, he communicated onely his intention with the Queene his mother in law, keeping it from his brother or his son; and departed from Naples accompanied with foure light gallies loaden with implements rich and precious: he was so afflicted with dread and confusion, that at the earnest instance of his mother, he would not stay two or three dayes (to end the whole yeare of his reigne,) and at his departure expressing some timorous disposition of mind, as if he had bene enuironed with the French men: he sailed to a towne in Sicile called Mazare, which Ferdinand the king of Spaine had giuen him the yeare before: but his feares left not to follow him no more then his fortunes, shewing at euery brute or small noise, no lesse perplexitie and terror, then if the heauens and elements had conspired against him.

The kingdome of Naples beginneth to conspire.

As the French King departed out of Rome, he receiued aduertisement of the flying of Alphonso; and as soone as he was arriued at Vellitre, the Cardinall of Valence fled secretly from him: with the which albeit the Pope shewed himselfe much discontented, offering to giue the King such assurance as it pleased him; yet wise men beleeued that it was not without his practise and commandement, as one that sought to haue in his power to obserue or not obserue the agreements he had made with his Maieſtie: an action agreeing with his ambition, which moſt gouerned him, but far from the office of his profeſſion, which he leaſt eſteemed, making nothing vnlawful, for that he challenged to himſelf to haue power to diſpenſe with all things. From Veltra the vantguard marched to Montfortin, a towne of the Church ſeated in the plaine countrey, ſubiect to Iaques a Romaine gentleman, who had at firſt followed the pay of the French King, but ſince (the hate he bare to the Colonneys prouailing more with him then his proper honour) he became mercenary to Alphonſo: and after the place was well ſhaken with the artillery, it was taken (notwithſtanding the ſtrong ſituation) within few houres by the French, who put to the ſword all that were found within it, except his three ſonnes, and certaine others, who being retired into the Caſtle, yeelded themſelues priſoners as ſoone as they ſaw the artillery planted. From thence the army marched to Mount S. Iohn, a towne of the Marqueſſe de Peſcaire, ſeated in the ſame plaine, vpon the confines of the kingdome: which beſides that it was ſtrong by nature and induſtry of men, was alſo well furniſhed with ſouldiers to defend it; hauing in it three hundred footmen ſtrangers, and fiue hundred of the inhabitants well appointed for all dangers: ſo that it was not thought pregnable, but by a hard and long ſiege. But after the Frenchmen had ſomewhat battered the walls with their Cannons, they gaue in the preſence of the King (then come from Veruli) ſo hot and violent an aſſault, that vanquiſhing all difficulties, they tooke it by force the ſame day. And following their naturall fury, as alſo to warne others by this example, not to be ſo obſtinate as to reſiſt, hauing made lamentable ſlaughters, without ſparing any ſort of barbarous crueltie, they ſet the houſes on fire: which maner of making warre, not vſed in Italy in many ages before, filled the whole Realme with great feares and terrors. For in Italy in all victories obtained in what ſort ſoeuer, the moſt extreme and laſt action wherein the Victor would ſtretch out his crueltie, was to diſarme the ſouldiers, and ſo let them go vanquiſhed: and for townes taken by force, to put them to ſacke and pillage, and the inhabitants to ranſome, pardoning alwayes the life of men not ſlaine in the heate and fury of the fight.

This was all the reſiſtance and paines which the French King had to conquer ſo noble and populous a kingdome: for the defence whereof, there was not ſhewed in any ſort any vertue, any counſell, any faith, nor any deſire of honor. For, after that the Duke of Calabria (who after his going out of Rome, was retired to the borders of the kingdome) being called to Naples by the flying of his father, had taken vpon him the authoritie and title of King, with the ſolemnities accuſtomed, (but without any pomp) and that he had aſſembled his army containing fiftie ſquadrons of horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen of choiſe, led by the beſt reputed Captaines in Italy; he encamped himſelfe at S. Germain, to ſtop the enemy for paſſing further, being drawne thither by the oportunitie of the place, enuironed on the one ſide with high and rough mountaines, and on the other with a countrey full of mariſhes and waters, and had in the front the riuer of Garillan, which the Ancients called Liri, albeit it was not ſo deepe in that place, but at ſome times it was paſſable at a foord; by reaſon whereof, and that the paſſage is very narrow and ſtraight, they ſay (with good reaſon) that S. Germain is one of the keys of the kingdome of Naples. He ſent alſo bands and troupes to the next mountaines, to keepe the way of Cancella. But his army being already terrified with the onely name of the French, ſhewed no more tokens of courage; and the Captaines partly tendring the ſafetie of themſelues and their owne eſtates, diſtruſting already of the defence of the kingdome, and partly deſiring innouations, began to wauer no leſſe in faith then in courage: and laſtly, all the kingdome being in inſurrection, it was not without feare that at their backes ſhould happen ſome perillous diſorder. Therefore counſell giuing place to cowardize, vnderſtanding after the taking of Mount S. Iohn, that the Marſhall de Gie was at hand with three hundred lances and two thouſand footmen, they diſcamped with ſhame from S. Germain, and retired to Capua with ſuch confuſion and feare, that they left by the way eight great peeces of artillery without guard, giuing the enemy a meanes to helpe forward their deſtruction with their owne weapons. This Citie, the new King (repoſing much in the amitie of the Towne towards the houſe of Aragon, and in the ſtrong ſeate of the place) hoped to defend, and to keepe alſo Naples and Caietta, not making diſtribution of his forces to other places. The French men went after; but diſperſed and out of order, marching more after the maner of trauellers then like men of warre, and without all regard either to keepe vnder their enſignes, or to be ruled by the direction of their Captaines, they tooke libertie to go where ſoeuer they thought to find pillage; and one part of them moſt often lodged in the nights in places where the Aragons were dislodged in the mornings. Neither in Capua was any greater demonstration of vertue or fortune, for that after Ferdinand had there bestowed his army, much diminished in numbers since the retrait from S. Germain, he was sent for by letters from the Queene, expressing that since the losse of S. Germain, there were such murmures and mutinies within Naples, as without his presence, there was manifest danger of a generall tumult: for which cause he went thither with a small companie, by his presence to giue impediment to the perill present, promising to returne eftsoones to Capua the day following. But Iohn Iaques Triuulce, to whom he had left the guard of the Citie, had secretly sent to the French King for a Herald, to come vnder suretie to speake with him; which being granted, Triuulce with certaine gentlemen of Capua, went to Calui, where the same day the King was entred. This did Triuulce, notwithstanding that many others of the Citie well disposed to keepe their faith to Ferdinand, did speake against it with many braue and haughtie words: but being presented to the King all armed as he came in, he told him in the name of the Capuans and souldiers; That they seeing their forces to defend, to faile in Ferdinand, whom they had faithfully serued whilest there remained any apparence of hope, were now come to make offer of their seruices to him, bringing minds to follow his fortunes wheresoeuer he will employ them, vnder honest conditions; adding withall, that he doubted not to bring him Ferdinand himselfe, so that he would entertaine and acknowledge him as appertained. The King made him this gracious answer, That he accepted the offers of the Capuans and souldiers; as also the coming of Ferdinand should be no lesse welcome: onely that he should retaine no portion of the kingdome of Naples how litle soeuer it were, but that he should endue him with estates and honors in the Realme of France.

Iohn Iaques Triuulce goeth to the French king.

It may be doubted what moued Triuulce, being a valiant Captaine, and one that made profession of honor, to reuolt, and leaue his King. Touching himselfe, he affirmed that he went by the direction of Ferdinand to solicite some composition with the French; and being out of all hope to preuaile, and seeing that the kingdome of Naples could be no longer defended by armes, he thought it not onely lawfull, but also allowable to prouide at one time for the safetie of the Capuans, and securitie of the souldiers. But the common opinion of men was otherwise: for they referre his reuolt to a desire he had that the French King might be Victor; for that he hoped when he had made a conquest of Naples, he would looke into the meanes by the which he might in like sort make himselfe maister of Millan: in which Citie, he being borne of a most noble family, and because for the priuie fauours which the house of S. Seuerin had with Lodowike Sforce, and with other occasions, he had not place according to his vertues and merites; he was wholly estranged from Lodowike. For those occasions many wise men iudged that he had counselled Ferdinand to proceed in the actions and seruice of Romagnia, more temperately then perhaps the occasions required. But in Capua, afore the returne of Triuulce, the souldiers had sacked the Pallace, armories, and stables of Ferdinand, the men at armes made diuisions of them selues, and were bestowed in sundry quarters; and Virginio and the Count Petillane were retired with their companies to the Citie of Nola, belonging to the said Count by the donation of the Aragons, sending first to the French King to demand safe conduct for them and their people. Ferdinand returned according to his promise, hauing somewhat appeased (according to the time) the humors of the Neapolitans, by giuing them hope of the defence of Capua; and he was come within two miles of the Citie, all ignorant of the change that happened since his departure: but the Towne hearing of his returne, the people wholly exclamed against his re-entry, drew into armes, and by a common voice and counsell sent forth to meete him certaine of the Nobilitie, to aduertise him to passe no further; for that the Citie, seeing he had left it abandoned, that Triuulce gouernour of the men of warre was gone to the French, his owne souldiers had made a spoile of his pallace, and Virginio and the Count Petillane had left them to their fortunes, and that almost all his army was broken; they were constrained for their owne safetie to giue place to the Conqueror. With these newes, no lesse heauie then troublesome, Ferdinand (after he had made vaine instance euen with teares to be receiued) returnes to Naples, being wel assured that the example of Capua would draw the residue of the kingdome to reuolt; whereby the Citie of Auerse, seated betweene Capua and Naples, was moued to dispatch present Embassadors to offer themselues to the French King: and the Neapolitans consulting also manifestly to do the like, the infortunate King determined not to resist so sodaine a violence of fortune; and therefore assembling vpon the place of the new Castle, being the Kings seate, many of the

Nobilitie and people, he deliuered to them this laſt and lamentable ſpeech:

I may call God to witnes, and the conſciences of all thoſe men that heretofore haue had any information of my thoughts & conceits, that no deſire made me more to aſpire to the Crown, then to expreſſe to the world with what griefe I miſliked the rigorous gouernments of my father and grandfather, and to reclaime by moderation and benefites thoſe hearts and affections which they had loſt by their hard dealing and crueltie: but the infelicitie of our houſe would neuer ſuffer that I ſhould receiue this fruit, which I eſteem more excellent and honorable then the kingdome it ſelfe: ſeeing that to be a King, is a thing that oftentimes depends vpon fortune; but to be ſuch a King as to turne all his thoughts to the welfare and felicitie of his people, that depends onely of himſelfe and his proper vertue. Now I ſee our affaires ſuffer hard fortunes, and the extremity wherein they are fallen, is of that nature, that we may complaine more to haue loſt the kingdome by the infidelitie and feares of our armies and Captaines, then our enemies can vaunt to haue wonne it by their proper vertue: and yet our fortune leaueth vs not altogether without hope, if we ſuſtain yet a litle time, for that both by the King of Spaine and all the Princes of Italy, is preparing a mightie ſuccor, their eyes being now opened that afore could not conſider, that the fire which burnes our Realme, muſt in like ſort (without prouidence) caſt his flames into their ſeuerall Eſtates. And for me, at the leaſt, courage ſhould not want to determine together the kingdome and my life, both with that glory which becomes a yong King deſcended by ſo long ſucceſſion of ſo many Kings, and alſo anſwering the expectation which hitherunto you haue had of my merits and vertues. But becauſe things cannot be put to triall, without committing the cõmon patrimony to deſperate perill, I am determined rather to giue place to fortune, and keepe hid my vertue, then in ſtriuing not to loſe the kingdom, to be the cauſer of effects contrary to thoſe ends for the which I haue deſired to be king. Therefore with teares I giue you this counſell, that ſtanding no more againſt the fury of the time, you ſend with ſpeed to make your accord with the French king. And to the end you may be in better power, to do it without ſtaine to your honors, I abſolue you willingly of the homage and oath which you made to me a few daies paſt: wherein I exhort you according to the neceſſitie of your fortune, not to deferre your obedience, humilitie and readineſſe to receiue him, as by that meanes to ſtay the courſe of your owne aduerſities, and helpe to moderate the naturall pride of that nation. If at any time their barbarous cuſtomes and manners cauſe you to hate their rule and impery, and deſire my return, I will remaine in place apt to miniſter aid to your will, and be ready to offer vp my life for the redreſſe of your oppreſſions and harmes. But if their gouernment content you, this Realme ſhall neuer receiue vexation or trauell by me, your well doing & benefit ſeruing as a perpetuall conſolation to my miſeries; and that ſo much the rather, if I may know that there remaine in you any memory, that neither in the perſon of an eldeſt ſon to a King, nor in the power of a King, I haue done no wrong to any creature. My thoughts were neuer ſubiect to motions of ambition, my mind neuer defiled with inclination to crueltie, mine owne ſins bring me not this affliction, but by a diuine iuſtice I ſuffer for the wickednes of my parents. I am determined not to be the cauſe, that either to preſerue the Realme, or to recouer it, any ſubiect of the ſame be oppreſſed: No, it is more ſorow to me to loſe the meanes to make amends for the tranſgreſſions of my parents, then to forgo the royall dignitie and kingdome it ſelfe: for, albeit I ſhall be eſtranged from you, and baniſhed from my patrimony, yet I wil not hold my ſelfe altogether wretched, if to the memory of theſe things, you ioyne a ſtedfaſt beliefe, that I wold haue bin King rather like to old Alphonſo my great grandfather, then to Ferdinand, or the laſt Alphonſo. It cannot be that theſe words were deliuered without great compaſſion: but albeit they wrought many ſorowfull impreſſions in the hearts of the hearers, yet it did nothing to the ſtay of the tumult, ſo hateſull was the name of the two laſt Kings to the people, and ſo ſweet the deſire of the French gouernment to the Nobilitie. He was no ſooner retired into the Caſtle, then the multitude began to ſacke his pauilions and tents then pitched in the place: which being an indignitie far vnworthy his merits, and more then he could endure, he returned with great courage to the place to driue them from the ſpoile, the maieſtie and preſence of a King being yet of ſuch authoritie in a citie rebelled, that the ſouldiers reſtraining their fury, euery one abſtained from pillage: but as ſoone as he was returned to the Caſtle, and had ſet on fire and ſunk moſt of the ſhips in the hauen, (hauing no other way to depriue the enemy of them) he began by tokens certain to doubt that the Lance-knights, which were the guard of the caſtle, containing in number fiue hundred, conſpired to take him priſoner; and therefore the danger being preſent, he vſed this ſodain counſel, to giue them his wardrobes, goods and furnitures that were within the Caſtle; and whileſt they were buſie to diuide and ſhare them, he ſlipt out of the caſtle by the gate of ſuccors, deliuering firſt out of priſon all thoſe Barons that had bin reſtrained by the crueltie of his father: he mounted vpon the light gallies that attended him in the hauen, accompanied with Dom Federike, and the old Queene wife to his grandfather, who carried with her Iane her daughter; and being followed with very few of his people, he ſailed into the Ile of Yſchia, called by the ancients Enaria, diſtant thirtie miles from Naples. On his way, ſo long as his eyes were fed with the proſpect and ſight of the kingdome, he made many repetitions with a pitifull voice, of this verſe of the Pſalme, That they watch in vaine which keepe the citie, if it be not kept by the Lord. But finding now no more comfort of fortune, then when he was amidſt the dangers of Naples, it fell to him to make triall of his vertue in Yſchia, together with an experience of the ingratitude and infidelity of ſuch as riſe vp againſt thoſe wretched perſons that are perſecuted by fortune: for the caſtle-keeper of the place refuſing to receiue him but with one man onely, when he was within, he fell vpon him with ſuch fury, that what by his agilitie and valour, and the impreſſion of a King and maieſty royall, he brought immediatly vnder his power both the caſtle and the keeper. After Ferdinand was gone out of Naples, euery one gaue way (as to a violent land-floud) to the onely name and renowne of the victors, and that with ſuch cowardize, that two hundred horſemen of Monſieur de Lignies went to Nola, whither Virginio and the Count Petillane were retired with foure hundred men at armes, and tooke them priſoners without reſiſtance: either they had confidence in the ſafe conduct that was granted them, or elſe their feares were no leſſe then the others, ſeeing without triall or ſhew of valour, they ſuffered themſelues to be led captiues to the rocke of Mondragon, and all their companies to be ſtripped. In this meane while, the Embaſſadors whom the Neapolitans had ſent to preſent to the French king the keyes of the Citie, found him at Auerſe, from whence after he had accorded to them with great liberalities, many priuiledges and exemptions, he went to Naples, and made his entry the xxj. of February: he was receiued with generall reioycing of all ſorts, no perſon of any ſexe, age, condition, qualitie, nor faction, ſparing to runne to behold him, as if he had bene their patron and firſt founder of the Citie: yea, there was a plentifull and willing preſence of thoſe, who either in themſelues, or in their anceſtors, had bin raiſed to honors and eſtates by the houſe of Aragon. With this affluence and concourſe of people, after he had viſited the great Church, he was led (becauſe the new caſtle was yet kept by the enemies) to be lodged in the caſtle of Capua, the ancient habitation and reſidence of the Kings of France; hauing with a wonderfull courſe of felicitie, farre aboue the example of Iulius Cæſar, rather vanquiſhed then ſeene his enemy, and that with ſo ready fortune and facilitie, that during the whole expedition, he neuer had need to diſplay one pauilion or tent, and much leſſe to breake a lance: and touching his prouiſions, he had ſo great plentie and ſuperfluitie, that his army at ſea prepared with ſo great expences, being caried by violence of weather into the Ile of Corſica, was ſo long in approching the ſhores of the kingdome, that the King had accompliſhed his conqueſt afore their arriuall.

The yong king Ferdinand ſpeaks in great ſorow to the multitude.

The French king entereth Naples.

Thus by ciuill diſcords which ſo long had blinded the notable wiſedome of the Princes of Italy, to the great diſhonor and ſcorne of the men of warre of that nation, and common danger and ignominy of euery region of the ſame, was transferred one of the moſt goodly and mighty parts of Italy, from the Empery of Italy to the Empery and gouernment of a nation beyond the mounts: for, albeit old Ferdinand was borne in Spaine, yet, for that from his youth he had his training in Italy, either King, or the ſonne of a King, and holding no other principalitie elſewhere, whete together that his ſonnes and ſonnes ſonnes were bred vp in Naples, they were by good right reputed Italians.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE historie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

The Argvment.

THE Piſans continue their rebellion againſt the Florentines: The French King takes the caſtles of Naples: The Pope, the Venetians and other Princes, make league againſt the King, who returning into France, is fought withall neare the riuer Taro. Ferdinand winnes againe Naples. Nouaro is beſieged by the Confederates. The King makes peace with the Duke of Millan, and returnes into France.

WHileſt things went in this courſe at Rome and the kingdome of Naples, there kindled in another part of Italy ſparks of a litle fire, wherein was nouriſhed a ſmothering heate, ordained to burſt out to a great burning, to the hurt of many, but ſpecially to the ruine of him, who, by too great a deſire of dominion and rule, firſt kindled it and ſet it on flame. For, albeit the King was bound by the contract of Florence, that Piſa remaining in his hands till he had conquered the Realme of Naples, the iuriſdiction and reuenues ſhould be adminiſtred by the Florentines; yet, at his departure, he had ſet no order for the execution of his word and promiſe: inſomuch that the Piſans (preſuming much of the Captaines and ſouldiers left by the King for the guard of the Citie) determined no more to returne to the obedience of Florence, but expulſed their officers and others that ſolicited there for the Citie, and made the reſidue priſoners, with confiſcation of all their goods; and fully confirmed their rebellion, both by demonſtrations and actions. In this reuolt, to be the better able to continue it, they not onely diſpatched Embaſſadors to the King, to pray him of defence and protection to their doings, but alſo (for their ſtay and ſtrength more aſſured) they recommended their cauſe to the cities of Sienna and Lucques, who being ancient enemies to the name of Florence, could heare of nothing more to their liking then the reuolt of the Piſans; and therefore they ſent them forthwith in a cõmon proportion of mony, and Sienna apart furniſhed them with an aid of horſemen. In like ſort the Piſans ſent Embaſſadors to Venice, to ſound the will of that Senate; of whom albeit they were graciouſly receiued, yet they brought away nothing but hopes doubtfull and vncertaine. But they repoſed their chiefeſt confidence in the Duke of Millan, for that as he was the firſt breeder of their rebellion, ſo they hoped he would not faile to ſupport them. The Duke, albeit he made other ſhewes and demonſtrations to the Florentines, yet he tooke care ſecretly for the confirmation of this reuolt, breathing courage into them with many offers and perſwaſions, and dealt vnderhand with the Genoways, to furniſh the Piſans with armor and munitions, and to ſend to them a commiſſioner, with three hundred footmen. There hath bin ancient quarell betweene the Florentines and Genoways, riſing at firſt by the conqueſt of Piſa, and continued by many degrees of diſpleaſures, both for buying the port of Liuorne of their Duke Thomaſin Fregoſa, which they poſſeſſed, and alſo the taking away of Pietraſanta and Serezana. The memory of theſe, ioyned to the occaſion offered, was ſufficient to arme them with a wonderfull readineſſe to do all things that might annoy the Florentines; occupying euen already many of their places in the countrey of Lunigiana, and were become Lords of the borders of Pietraſanta, vnder colour of a letter obtained from the French King for the reſtitution of certaine goods confiſked. The Florentines complaining of theſe actions at Millan, were anſwered by the Duke, that according to the capitulations which he had with them of Genes, he could not well do any thing to reſtraine them; and labouring to content them with words and diuerſitie

Beginning of the warres of Piſa.

Two particular cauſes of quarrell betweene Florence and the Genoways.

ſitie of hopes, he forbare not to practiſe the quite contrary, as one that nouriſhed an ambitious expectation to draw Piſa to his obedience, if the Florentines did not eſtſoones recouer it; a thing much deſired by him, no leſſe for the qualitie of the Citie, then oportunitie of the ſituation. Neither was this deſire new, but had bene nouriſhed in him euer ſince he was expulſed Millan, a litle after the death of Galeas his brother, for a iealouſie which the Lady Bonne (mother and tutor to the litle Duke) had of him; and confined for many moneths vnto the citie of Piſa. He was further ſtirred vp by the memory, that Piſa (afore it came into the iuriſdiction of the Florentines) had bene poſſeſſed by John Galeas Viſcount, firſt Duke of Millan: by reaſon whereof, he thought it would be an increaſe of his glory, to recouer that which had bene poſſeſſed by his anceſtors, and iudged that he might pretend a colour of right, in not making it lawfull for John Galeas to leaue by teſtament (to the preiudice of the Dukes of Millan his ſucceſſors) to Gabriel Maria his baſtard ſonne, the State of Piſa, which he had gotten, albeit with the treaſures and forces of the Duchie of Millan. And the Piſans, not content to haue drawne their Citie from the obedience of the Florentines, ſought to obtrude vpon all the places and peeces of the generall demaine; all which for the moſt part (as the manner of the countrey is) followed the authoritie of the Citie, and receiued their commiſſioners, euen in the firſt daies of the rebellion; the Florentines making no reſiſtance in the beginning, for that they were otherwiſe buſied in affaires of greater importance, not hauing as yet compoſed with the French King, and did perhaps expect that he would apply remedy to thoſe harmes, according to his bond, proteſted by publike and ſolemne oath. But perceiuing that he deferred to giue order, they ſent their bands and companies, who eſtſoones recouered partly by force, and partly by compoſition; all that was occupied, except Caſine, Buti and Vicopiſan, into which places the Piſans (being not ſtrong enough to make reſiſtance on all ſides) had withdrawne their forces.

Touching the King, the doings of the Piſans did nothing diſpleaſe him, their cauſe being apparently fauoured by many of his Court, ſome of them being induced by a compaſſion, that they had bene ſtraightly gouerned by the Florentines; others to the end to oppoſe themſelues againſt the Cardinall of S. Malo, being wholly for the Florentines: of theſe was principall the Seneſhall of Beaucaire, with whom the money of the Piſans had much preuailed, but much more the diſcontentment he had for the greatneſſe of the Cardinall, from whom (according to the variations of Court) he began to be eſtranged and ſeparate, being moued with the ſelfe ſame ambition to embaſe him, with the which he had raiſed him in the beginning. Theſe men not hauing reſpect to that which concerned the honor & promiſed faith of ſo great a King, perſwaded that it agreed beſt with the profit and eſtate of his other enterpriſes, to keepe the Florentines in this neceſſitie, and not to moderate the doings of the Piſans, at the leaſt till he had conquered the Realme of Naples. The King carried with theſe perſwaſions, framed himſelfe to entertaine both the one and the other partie with ſeuerall hopes; and therefore whileſt he remained at Rome, he called for the Embaſſadors of Florence to heare in his preſence the complaints made to him by the Piſans, for whom ſpake Burgundio Loli Citizen of Piſa, and aduocate of the Conſiſtory in the Court of Rome: He complained bitterly, that the Piſans had bene holden foure ſcore yeares in ſuch an vniuſt and cruell ſeruitude, that that Citie, which with many honorable victories heretofore had ſtretched out her iuriſdiction euen to the parts of Leuant, and had bin alwayes one of the moſt mightie and glorious members of all Italy, was now by the ſeueritie and couetouſneſſe of the Florentins, come to her laſt deſolation: That the towne of Piſa was almoſt made naked of inhabitants, for that the moſt part of the naturall and free borne Citizens, not able to beare ſo heauie a yoke, had willingly abandoned it, whoſe counſell hath bene proued wiſe by the miſeries of others, whom the loue of their countrey hath retained; who by reaſon of the great exactions of the Magiſtrates, and inſolent robberies of priuate perſons of Florence, were diſpoyled almoſt of all their ſubſtance, hauing no meanes left to maintaine themſelues, for that with a tyrannie and iniuſtice ſtrange and barbarous, they were forbidden to manage trades of merchandize, or to excerciſe any art except of the hand; and were not admitted into any office of qualitie, nor in the adminiſtration of the gouernment of Florence, no not in things which were transferred to ſtrangers: That the Florentines exerciſed all ſorts of cruelrie againſt their health and their liues; and to haue a more ready way to their generall deſtruction, they haue of late yeares ſhaked off an ancient and neceſſary care to preſerue the banks and cauſſeys of the country of Piſa, maintained alwayes from age to age by the Lords of that country

country with no ſmall ſtudy, for that otherwiſe it was impoſſible (ſeeing the ſhallowneſſe of the country, ſubiect to inundations and water-flouds) that they ſhould not be euery yeare ſtricken with diuerſitie of diſeaſes: that by this decay, were made ruinate euen flat with the earth, Churches, Pallaces, with many honorable buildings both publike and priuate, erected by their predeceſſors, with no litle expence and charge: That it was no ſhame to famous Cities or townes, if, after the courſe of many ages they fell into ſeruitude, for that all mortall things by deſtiny are ſubiect to corruption: but that the memory of their nobilitie and greatnes, ought to breed in the ſpirits of conquerors more compaſſion then rigor; chiefly euery one hauing to conſider, that it is not onely in the power of time, but alſo incident to the iuſt courſe and deſtiny of earthly things, to bring vpon them the ſelfeſame end which is ordained to happen to all other cities and Empires: That in the Piſans there reſted no more, wherein the inhumanitie and inſatiable couetouſneſſe of the Florentines could be exerciſed with further ſcope; and therefore the yoke of thoſe burdens bearing a weight aboue their ſtrength, and the varietie of their miſeries ſo infinite and intollerable, they had with one mind determined, rather to abandon their country, and to giue vp their liues, then to returne eftſoones vnder ſo vniuſt and ſo tyrannous a gouernment: Beſeeching laſtly the King with teares (which he beſought him to imagine to be the plentifull teares of the whole people of Piſa miſerably proſtrate at his feet) to remember, that with the ſame pietie and with the ſame iuſtice, he had reſtored them to that libertie, of the which they had bin ſo vniuſtly diſpoiled; he would eſtſoones as a Prince reſolute and conſtant, defend and keepe them in the ſame benefite, chuſing rather to beare the name of the father and defender of this Citie ſo ancient and innocent, then in redeliuering it vp into a ſeruitude ſo wretched, to become the infamous miniſter of the robberies, oppreſſions and tyrannies of the Florentines. To theſe accuſations anſwered, with no leſſe vehemency, Francis Soderin Biſhop of Volterre, afterwards made Cardinall, and at that time one of the Embaſſadors for Florence; He ſhewed, that the title of his Commonweale was iuſt, for that they had bought it Piſa in the yeare 1404. of Gabriel Maria Viſcount the lawfull Lord, by whom they were no ſooner put in poſſeſſion of their purchaſe, then the Piſans redeliuered themſelues by force: by which occaſion they were driuen to ſeeke to conquer it by a long warre, whoſe end was no leſſe proſperous then the occaſion was iuſt, and no leſſe praiſe-worthy the humanitie of the Florentines, then the victory glorious; for that hauing in their diſcretions to let periſh the people of Piſa, (languiſhing already with hunger) when they entred with their army into the Citie, they brought with them a greater quantitie of victuals then of weapons; and ſo in place to take away their liues by iuſt law of conqueſt and victory, they breathed new liues with their refreſhing and victuals, into bodies miſerable and not worthy of life: That the Citie of Piſa at no time had obtained any greatnes in the firme land, and much leſſe had bin able in power to win forrain & ſtrange peeces, ſeeing they could neuer make themſelues Lords ouer Lucques, a Citie communicating with them in neare neighborhood and borders: but they ſtood alwayes reſtrained and incloſed in a ſtraight territory, not ſeeking to make their fortune greater then was their vertue. And for their power at ſea, neither hath it bin ſo mightie as there is left any monument of it, nor of ſuch continuance as it hath any preſcription of time: for that, by the iuſt iudgement of God, whom they had prouoked by many acts of prophane impietie, and for a ſcourge of the long ciuill diſcords amongſt themſelues, it was long time before the purchaſe of the Florentines, fallen from all eſtate and greatneſſe, drained of all wealth and inhabitants, and at laſt reduced to ſuch a naked weakneſſe, that one Iaques d'Appian a ſimple notary of the country, was of power to make himſelfe Lord ouer them, leauing the Citie and territory as a ſucceſſion to his children: That the land & country of Piſa was of litle importance to the Florentines, except for the opportunitie of the ſituation, and conueniency of the ſea; ſeeing the reuenues that were drawne from thence were of litle conſideration, the exactions being ſo eaſie and light, that they exceed very litle the neceſſary expences, and yet the moſt part were leuied vpon merchant-ſtrangers, and by the meanes of the port of Liuorne. That touching the trade of merchandize, arts and offices, the Piſans were not bound with other lawes then did regulate all other cities ſubiect to the Florentines, who acknowledging to liue vnder a moderate and eaſie policie, had no deſire to change Lords, not hauing indeed that obſtinacie and pride of mind which is naturall in the Piſans, nor yet infected with a diſloyaltie ſo notorious, as it is made generall and famous by the ancient prouerbe of all Tuſcane. And albeit, ſince the Florentines had gouernment in Piſa, ſundry of the

« tects iuſtly their owne proud ſtomacke and impatiencie, bearing no minds to accommodate « themſelues to their owne forces nor fortune. And much leſſe that vnder the gouernment of the « Florentines, Piſa is diminiſhed either in treaſure or inhabitants, ſeeing on the contrary they « haue at a great charge recouered the hauen of Liuorne, without the which their Citie would be « no leſſe vnprofitable then inconuenient. They haue alſo introduced the publike ſtudy of all ſci-« ences, together with many other benefites; and laſtly, diligently continued the reparations of « the banks, the better to repleniſh them with inhabitants. The truth of which things were ſo ma« niſeſt, that the clouds of falſe complaints were not able to ouerſhadow and darken it: He ſaid,
« it was ſuffered to euery one to deſire to aſpire to a better fortune; but withall it was an office « iuſt in all inferiour degrees, to beare without grudging the ordinance and ſentence of their lot;
« otherwiſe there would be confuſion of all Empires and gouernments, if it were ſuffered to eue-« ry one that is ſubiect, to aſpire to libertie. Laſtly he told the King, that to the Florentines it was « neither neceſſary nor any way appertaining to their office, to perſwade Charles a Chriſtian King « of France what he had to do; for that being a Prince wiſe and iuſt, they were perſwaded that he « would not ſuffer himſelfe to be carried by ſo vaine complaints and ſlanders: That of himſelfe
« he would remember himſelfe of his promiſe made afore his army was receiued into Piſa, toge« ther with his word and oath of a King publiſhed ſolemnly at Florence; for that by how much a « King is mightie and great, by ſo much is it more glorious to him to vſe his power for the pre« ſeruation of his faith and iuſtice. The King hearing the differences thus diſcloſed by both the Embaſſadors, bare an inclination partiall to the Piſans, and wiſhed that during the warre of Naples, there might be a ſurceaſſing of armes betweene the two parties, or at leaſt that the Florentines would conſent that he might hold the whole country, aſſuring them that as ſoone as the conqueſt of Naples was accompliſhed, he would make perfect all his promiſes giuen at Florence.
This the Florentines refuſed, holding euen now for ſuſpected all the Kings words, and yet they forbare not with great conſtancie to preſſe him to keepe his promiſe: wherein, to make ſhew that he would ſatisfie them, (his intention indeed being to haue of them before the time the lxx. thouſand duckets which they had promiſed him) he diſpatched at the ſame inſtant he departed from Rome, the Cardinall of S. Malo as Embaſſador to Florence, making as though he ſent him thither to ſatisfie their demands; but in ſecret he charged him, that nouriſhing them with hopes till they had made paiment of the money, he ſhould leaue things in the ſame eſtate:
of which deceit, albeit the Florentines made ſufficient doubt, yet they aduanced forty thouſand duckets afore the tearme; which as ſoone as the Cardinall had receiued, he went to Piſa, pro-miſing to recontinue the poſſeſſion of the Eſtate to the Florentines: but he made a ſpeedy returne, without any effect of his promiſe, and leſſe anſwering the expectation of them of Florence, afore whom he excuſed himſelfe by the obſtinacie of the Piſans, and that being not able of himſelfe to diſpoſe them, his authoritie was leſſe ſufficient to conſtraine them, hauing no expreſſe commiſſion from the King. Laſtly it was not conuenient for him, being of holy profeſſi-on, to take or follow any counſell whereof might riſe effuſion of Chriſtian bloud: yet he beſtowed a new garriſon within the new Citadell, and had done the like in the old Caſtle if he could haue got the conſent of the Piſans, who grew dayly more and more in courage and forces by the ſecret helping of the Duke of Millan; who iudging it neceſſary that there ſhould be within Piſa a greater ſtrength, and a Leader of experience and valour, had ſent to them (couering himſelfe notwithſtanding, as he was wont, with the name of the Genoways) Luke Malvezze with new bands and companies: and letting paſſe no occaſion that might keepe the Florentines in buſineſſe, the better to hold them from offending the Piſans, he entertained into pay in common with the Sienneys, Iaques d'Appian Lord of Plombin, and John Sauelle, the rather to encourage the ſaid people of Sienna to defend Montpulcian, a place newly reuolted from the Florentines, and accepted by them of Sienna, without hauing regard to the confederation which they had together. At the ſame time alſo the Florentines were in no leſſe care and trauell for ſo-daine buſineſſe newly happened within the Citie: for immediatly after the King was departed from Florence, the better to reeſtabliſh their gouernment, they had in their Parliament (which in their cuſtome is a congregation aſſembled of all the Citizens in the place before the townehouſe, who deliberate with free voice vpon matters propounded by the great Magiſtrate) inſtituted a kind of policie, which vnder the name of a gouernment popular tended in many things more to the power of a few then of euery one in generall. The which being grieuous to many, who fashioned in their minds a greater libertie, and hauing the priuate ambition of some one of the principall Citizens concurring, there was necessitie to dispute vpon a new forme of gouernment, wherein as it was communed vpon one day amongst the principall Magistrates and persons of greatest reputation, Paul Anthony Soderin, a Citizen wise and much respected, deliuered his opinion in this sort:

P. Anth Soderin reasoneth touching a forme of gouernment for Florence. Causes of popular gouerment.

» Albeit those that haue written of ciuill matters, do lesse esteeme of the popular State, then of » that wherein things are referred to one alone, or gouerned by the directions of graue men; yet,
» for that the desire of libertie is a desire ancient and almost naturall in this Citie, and the con» ditions and estate of our Citizens are equally proportioned, which is a necessary ground of po» pular gouernments: I might maintaine by easie and reasonable discourse, that it ought to be » preferred before all other, were it not that the disputation would be superfluous, seeing in all » our assemblies since the Parliament, it hath bin alwayes determined by a consent vniuersall, that
» the Citie should be gouerned in the name and with the authoritie of the people. But the diuer-» sitie of opinions is risen vpon this, that certaine particulars, in things ordained in the Parlia» ment, seeke to come neare and resemble that forme of Commonweale, vnder the which the Ci-
» tie was gouerned before our libertie was oppressed by the family of the Medices and others, » (of which number I confesse I am) supposing that the gouerment so established, bare in many » things rather the name then the effects of a policie popular; and fearing the accidents which » often happen by like gouernments, desire a forme more perfect, and more regarding the preser» uation and protection of the concord and suretie of the Citizens: a thing which neither by rea» son, nor experience of times passed, can be hoped for in this Citie, but vnder a gouernment de» pending altogether vpon the power of the people, so that it be well and duly ordained and re» gulated, which thing consists principally in two foundations: The first is, that all ministrations
» and offices, as well in the Citie as through the whole demeane, be giuen (for a certaine time)
» by a Councell vniuersall, which according to our lawes may participate in the gouernment;
» without the approbation of which Councell, new lawes cannot be established: by this meane,
» not being in the power of priuate Citizens, nor of any particular faction or intelligence, to di» stribute dignities and authorities, no man shall be excluded by passion or partialitie of others, » but offices shall be bestowed according to the vertues and merits of men: and vertue bearing
» this propertie to transferre dignities to those persons to whom her selfe is conioyned, it will be a » meane and encouragement to euery one to striue by his vertues and good parts, with the aide » publike and priuate, to open his way to honors and reputation; it shall be necessary that euery
» one abstaine from vices, and forbeare to hurt one another, and finally eschue both the study » and action of all hatefull things in a Citie well instituted. And it cannot be in the power of one » or a few, to introduce with new lawes, or with authoritie of a Magistrate, another gouernment, » this being not to be changed, but by the will and priuitie of the Councell vniuersall. The second » ground is, that the deliberations and counsels of importance, such as appertaine to peace and » warre, to the construing and examination of new lawes, and generally to all things necessary » for the administration of such a Citie or Empire, be managed by Magistrates particularly ap» pointed to that charge, and by a Councell more priuate, compounded of wise and experienced » Citizens, to be deputed and ordained by the Councell popular: for that the knowledge and » iudgement of such affaires, falling not familiarly into the vnderstanding of euery one, it is neces» sary they be gouerned by such as are capable of them, and requiring oftentimes diligence and » secrecie, they are not to be consulted or communicated with the multitude, as not being ne» cessary for the preseruation of the publike libertie, that such things be handled in too great au» dience and company, seeing the libertie is assured as often as the distribution of magistracies, » and deliberation of new lawes, depend on the vniuersall consent. These two foundations thus » laid, you haue a true popular gouernment ordained, the libertie of the Citie grounded, and a » perpetuall and commendable forme of Commonweale confirmed. There be many other things » which tend to make this gouernment more perfect, but they are referred more conueniently to » another time, to the end not to confound in this beginning the minds of men, which both suspi» cious by the memory of tyrannies past, and not accustomed to manage gouernments free, can » not wholly know all things necessary to be ordained for preseruation of the libertie: and there » be things, which for their litle importance and consideration, may without danger be deferred

" vntill a time more apt, and better occaſion. No doubt, the citizens will embrace more and more
" this forme of Commonweale; and being by experience made dayly more capable of the truth,
" they cannot but deſire that their gouernment be poliſhed and brought to his full perfection:
" Neither can it but be ſuſtained and holden vp by theſe two foundations, which, how eaſie it is " to lay and eſtabliſh, and what fruite they bring, is not to be proued onely by many reaſons, but
" alſo appeares plainly by examples. For, albeit the gouernment of the Venetians ſtands properly
" vpon gentlemen, yet thoſe gentlemen are no other then Citizens priuate, and ſo many in num" ber, and of ſo diuers conditions and qualities, as it cannot be denied, but that it doth much par" ticipate with a gouernment popular, and that in many things it cannot be imitated of vs: and
" yet it is principally founded vpon theſe two pillars and baſes, by the which hauing bin conti" nued by many ages, together with a libertie, vnitie, and concord ciuill, it is riſen to the glory and " greatneſſe which the world ſeeth. The vnitie and ſtrength of the Venetians hath not growne, as " many ſuppoſe, by their ſituation, for that in the ſame may be and haue bin many diſcords and
" ſeditions: but it hath proceeded for that they had a forme of policy ſo well ſorted and propor" tioned to it ſelfe, that neceſſarily it brought forth precious and wonderfull effects. Our owne ex" amples ought to moue vs no leſſe then ſtrangers, if we conſider on the contrary, that becauſe
" our Citie neuer had a forme of gouernment like vnto this, it was the cauſe that our eſtate and
" affaires haue bin ſo ſubiect to ordinary mutations, ſometimes troden vnder feet by the violence " of tyrants; and ſometimes rent and diſmembred by the ambitious and couetous diſcords of cer" taine particulars; and ſometimes confounded by the vnbridled libertie of the communalty. And
" whereas cities were built for the reſt and happie life of the inhabitants, our felicities and our
" ioyes haue bin the confiſcation of our goods, the baniſhment, and execution of our miſerable " Citizens. The gouernment brought into the Parlament, differeth not from the policies here" tofore ordained in this Citie, which being all infected with diſcords and calamities, after infinite
" trauels, both publike and priuate, they finally ingendred tyrannies: for which cauſe, and for no
" other, did the Duke of Athens oppreſſe the libertie in the times of our anceſtors; and in the " times ſucceeding, Coſmo de Medicis followed his example; whereof it is not to be maruelled: for,
" when the diſtribution of Magiſtracies, and deliberation of the lawes, haue not communitie with
" the common conſent, but depend vpon the arbitration of the leſſer number: then the Citizens
" not carefull of the publike benefite, but ſeeking their profites and ends priuate, riſe into ſects
" and conſpiracies particular, whereunto are ioyned the diuiſions of the whole Citie; a plague
" moſt certaine to all Commonweales and Empires: ſo that it cannot but be a better diſcretion
" to eſchue thoſe formes of gouernment, which by reaſons and examples in our ſelues we find to " be hurtfull, and draw neare to thoſe policies which with the reaſons and examples of others, we " diſcerne to be wholſome and happie. And thus much I take boldneſſe to auouch (the truth of " the matter enforcing me) that the policie of our Citie running alwayes in that order, that a few
" Citizens ſhall haue an vnmeaſured authoritie, will proue to be a gouernment of a few tyrants,
" who will be ſo much more dangerous then one tyrant alone, by how much the ill is great, and
" hurts more, when it is much multiplied. And though there ſhould be none other miſchiefe at all,
" yet at leaſt wiſe; what for the diuerſitie of opinions, and for the ambition and different cou-
" touſneſſe of men, there could be no expectation of long concord: And diſcord, as it is hurtfull
" in all ſeaſons, ſo would it be moſt dangerous at this time, wherein you haue ſent into exile ſo
" mightie a Citizen, by whom you ſtand depriued of one of the principalleſt parts of your Eſtate,
" and when Italy hauing euen in her bowels forraine armies, ſtands on all ſides enuironed with
" manifeſt perill. Very ſeldome, or poſſible neuer, it hath bin abſolutely in the power of all the Ci-
" tie to put order to it ſelfe according to our owne liking; the which power ſeeing God of his " goodneſſe hath giuen you, loſe not the occaſion (to your owne detriment, and to the perpe" tuall blemiſh of the name of the Florentine wiſedome) to inſtitute a free gouernment, and ſo
" well digeſted, as that during your owne liues it may not onely procure you happineſſe, but alſo
" promiſe the ſame to your poſteritie, and ſo leaue as an inheritance to your children, ſuch a trea-
" ſure and felicitie, as your anceſtors neuer had nor knew.

Againſt this opinion reaſoneth Guid. Anth. Veſpucci.

To the contrary of this, did reaſon Guid Anthony Veſpucci, a lawyer notable for his iudge-
" ment, and no leſſe ſingular for his facilitie and ſharpneſſe of wit: If the gouerment (ſaith he) in" ſtituted in the forme of Paul Anthony Soderin, would as eaſily bring forth the fruits that are deſi-
" red, as he hath liberally recounted them: ſure we ſhould ſhew great corruption in iudgement,

if we would wish in our country any other sort of policie; and should seeme most dangerous Citizens, if we would not embrace a forme of Commonweale, wherein the vertues, merites, and valours of men, should be aboue all other things honored and recompenced. But I cannot see how it may be hoped, that a gouernment put wholly in the power of the people, can bring forth so many benefits: seeing no man doubts but it is a lesson in reason, a triall in experience, and an authoritie confirmed by great men, that in so great a multitude cannot be found that discretion, that experience, nor that order, which may promise that they will preferre the wise afore the ignorant, the good afore the ill, and the experienced afore such as neuer knew what it was to manage affaires. For, like as of a Iudge incapable and ignorant, can be no expectation of iust iudgement: so, in a people full of confusion and vanitie, is no hope (but at aduenture) of election or deliberation wise or reasonable: and that which in publike gouernments, wise men and such as follow the study of no other affaires, can hardly discerne, let vs neuer beleeue that a multitude vnexperienced, ignorant, compounded of so great diuersitie of spirits, conditions and customes, and wholly giuen to things that concerne them particularly, can distinguish and know. Besides, the immoderate perswasion that euery one will haue of himselfe, will kindle in euery one a couetousnesse of honors, not sufficing to men in popular gouernment to enioy the honest fruits of libertie, but they will aspire all to the degrees principall, and seeke to haue place in the counsels of things of most importance and hardnesse, for that lesse in vs then in any other Citie, reigneth the modestie to giue place to such as know most, and deserue best. And so nourishing our selues with perswasion, that of right we ought to be all equall in all things, (the power resting in the multitude) places of vertue, valour, and merite will be confounded; and this couetousnesse stretched out into the greatest part, will bring to passe, that such may do most as know least and merite lesse; for that being most in number, they will haue most power, opinions being rather counted then considered. These things well weighed, what assurance can there be, that contenting themselues with the forme which now you would bring in, they would not immediatly fall to disorder, and confound with inuentions new and lawes vndiscreet, which wise men could not resist, the wayes to gouerne a Commonweale, which had bin wisely deliberated and established? Which things being dangerous at all times in such a sort of Commonweale, would bring farre more perill at this present; seeing it is the nature of men, when they come out of one extremitie, wherein they haue bin holden by force, to runne with a swift course to another extremitie, without staying in the midst: euen so, men drawne out of a tyranny, if they be not restrained, runne headlong into an vnbridled libertie, which iustly may be called a tyranny: because in these actions a people and multitude is like vnto a tyrant, when he giueth where is no cause of merite, and taketh from him that hath well deserued, confounding the degrees and distinctions of persons; yea haply their tyranny is so much the more hurtfull, by how much their ignorance (containing neither weight, measure nor law) is greater then the malignity, although it be gouerned by some rule, with some bridle, or some limites. And we ought not to be moued by the example of the Venetians, for that in their behalfe both the situation makes something, and the forme of gouernment receiued of long time may do much, together with the order and disposition of things ruled in such sort, that the counsels of importance rest more in the power of a few then of many, and their spirits haply not being by nature so subtile as ours, they are more easie to be kept quiet and contented. Besides, the policie of the Venetians stands not only vpon the two foundations that haue bin considered, but for their perfection and firmnesse it imports much that they haue a Duke perpetuall, with many other ordinances, which whosoeuer would introduce into this Commonweale, should seeme to bring in innouations, and find many resistances, seeing our Citie takes not now her being, nor at this present the first time of her institution. And therefore ancient customes impugning oftentimes common profit, and men suspecting that vnder colour of preseruation of the libertie, there would be raised a new tyranny, wholsome counsels will be of litle force; euen as in a body infected and repleniished with ill humors, medicines are not of that seruice, as in a body purged. For which reasons, and for the nature of humane things which commonly go impairing, it is more to be feared, that that which in this beginning shall be imperfectly ordained, will be wholly disordered with time, then to hope that by time and with occasions it may be reduced to perfection: we haue examples of our owne, and need not fetch them from others. For, tell me, at what time hath the people gouerned absolutely this City, that it hath not bin full of discords, that it hath not suffered dismembring, bring, and lastly that the State hath not immediatly changed? And if we stand so much vpon the examples of others, why do we not remember, that the gouernment wholly popular, bred in Rome so many tumults, that had it not bin for the science and discipline of warre, the life of that Commonweale had bin short? Let vs remember that Athens a most flourishing and mighty Citie, lost not for other occasion her Empire, and so fell into seruitude of her owne citizens and strangers, then for that they did dispose of great affaires with the deliberations & counsels of the communaltie. But I see not for what occasion it may be said that in the forme introduced in the Parlament, the libertie is not there wholly found, seeing all things are referred to the disposition of Magistrates, and they not perpetuall, but changing, are not elected of a few, but approued of many, and ought according to the ancient custome of the Citie, to be referred to the arbitrement of the lot; then they cannot be distributed by factions, or by the appetite of Citizens particular. We shall haue a farre greater assurance when the affaires of most importance shall passe by the examination and direction of the most wise, the most practised, and most graue men, who will manage and gouerne them with another order, another secrecie, and another iudgement, then would be expressed in a multitude or communaltie vncapable of such things, who sometimes when is least need are most prodigall in expences, and ciniones in weightie businesses so sparing and niggardly, that oftentimes for sauing a litle, they fall into very great expences and dangers. Indeed as Paul Aethenie hath said, the infirmitie of Italy, and particularly of our country is very great, and of no litle consideration. Then what folly is greater, then when we haue need of Phytitions experienced and wise, to put our bodies into the hands of such as haue least skill and experience? And lastly, you haue to consider, that you shall maintaine your people in greater rest, and leade them most easily to counsels wholesome both for themselues; and to the benefite of euery one, in giuing them in the Commonweale a moderate part and authoritie; seeing if you referre all things to their arbitration, there will be danger that they will become insolent, and wholly disagreeing from the counsels of your wise, carefull, and affectioned Citizens.

In this Councell, whereunto was not admitted the great number of Citizens, the aduice then tending to a forme of gouernment not so large and popular, had preuailed, if amongst the deliberations of men, there had not bene mixed authoritie diuine, pronounced by the mouth of Ieronimo Sauonarola, a religious man of the order of Frier Preachers. This man hauing bin continually exercised for many yeares in the publike preaching of Gods word at Florence, and hauing ioyned to his singular doctrine a generall brute of holinesse of life, had gotten in the opinion of most part of the people, the name and authoritie of a Prophet: for that at times wherein in Italy was no other apparence in mans reason, then of common tranquillitie, he would in his Sermons propheſie of the coming of forreine armies, with so great astonishment of men, that neither wals nor campes were able to resist them: which things, with many others of other nature, he would assure that he did not foretell by discourse humane, or knowledge of the Scriptures, but simply did foresee them by reuelation diuine; and so would sometimes touch the mutation of the state of Florence. But at that time he detested publikly the forme of gouernment agreed vpon in the Parlament, affirming that it was the will of God, that they did erect a policie meerly popular, in such sort that it should not be in the power of a few citizens to alter neither the suretie nor the libertie of the residue: insomuch that for the reuerence of one of so great a name, ioyned to the desire of many, such as were of the other opinion, should not be able to resist so great an inclination. Therefore this matter being many times propounded and debated, it was lastly determined, that there should be held a Councell of all the Citizens, wherein should haue no accesse (so it was spread in many places in Italy) the dregs of the people, but onely such as by the ancient lawes of the Citie might participate in the gouernment: In this Councell they should not meddle with, nor dispose of other things, then of the election of all the Magistrates for the Citie and for the dominion, and of the confirmation of prouisions of money, together with all the lawes ordained before by the Magistrates, and other Councels more priuate and strait. And to the end that the occasions of ciuill discords should be taken away, and the spirits of euery one the more assured, it was prohibited by decree publike, according to the example of the Athenians, not to remember the errors and transgressions committed in times past in the affaires of Estate. Vpon which foundations, might perhaps haue bene constituted a well ordered and stable gouernment, if at the same time they had introduced all the ordinances which then came into the conſideration of wiſe men: but ſuch things being not able to be deliberated without the conſent of many, who for the memory of things paſt were full of ſuſpitions, it was iudged and determined, that for the preſent the grand Councell ſhould be eſtabliſhed, as a ground and foundation of the new libertie, referring to accompliſh that which wanted, vntill a better opportunitie of time, and vntill (by the meanes of experience) the publike vtilitie ſhould be knowne of ſuch, as had no capacitie to know it by reaſon and iudgement. This was the courſe and condition of the affaires of Tuskane.

But in this meane while, the French King, after he had conquered the Citie of Naples, to giue a full perfection to his victory, he had principally to looke to remoue two impediments: The one, how he might get new Caſtle, and the Caſtle of the Egge, which are two fortreſſes of Naples, holding good yet for Ferdinand; but for the towne of S. Vincent, built for the guard of the hauen, he had it without much reſiſtance: His other conſideration was, how he might reduce the whole kingdome to his obedience. In which two things fortune ſtill followed him with a full faile. For, new Caſtle the habitation of the Kings, ſeated vpon the banke or ſhoare of the ſea, by the couetouſneſſe and cowardize of fiue hundred Lance-knights holding garriſon there, after a ſlight defence was rendred, with condition that they might depart in ſafetie with all the goods they were able to carry. In this Caſtle was found great quantities of victuals, whereof the King without conſideration to that might happen, made prodigall liberalities to certaine of his owne people. And touching the Caſtle called the Egge, built within the ſea vpon a rocke, aforetime parcell of the firme land, but now deuided from it by the operation of Lucullus, was ioyned with a narrow bridge to the next brinkes or ſhoares of Naples: they within the rocke, ſeeing themſelues battered without ceaſſing with the artillery, which might well ſhake the wals, but nothing moue the rocke, agreed to yeeld vp the place, if within eight dayes they were not ſuccoured. The Barons alſo and gouernours of the communaltie, went many dayes iourneys to meet the French Captaines and companies of ſouldiers ſent into ſundry parts of the Realme, ſtriuing who ſhould be the firſt to receiue them, with ſuch inclination or aſtoniſhment of all, that almoſt all the places of ſtrength were rendred by thoſe that kept them, without any reſiſtance at all: yea the rocke of Caietta notwithſtanding it was made ſtrong with men, and all things neceſſary for defence, yet after a few light aſſaults, it yeelded to the diſcretion of the victors: ſo that within a few dayes, and with a wonderfull facilitie, all the kingdome was brought into the obedience of King Charles, except the Iſle of Iſchia, the Caſtles of Brunduſia and Gallipoli in Powilla, and in Calabria the rocke of Reggi, ſituate in the point of Italy right ouer againſt Sicile, the Citie holding for the King: and except alſo Turpia and Mantia, who in the beginning diſplayed the banners of France, but refuſing to liue vnder the ſubiection of other then the King himſelfe, who had already diſpoſed them to certaine of his fauourites, they changed coũſell, and returned to their firſt Lord. The like was done within a little time after by the Citie of Brunduſia, to the which the French King hauing ſent no men, but vſing negligence where was neceſſitie of care and counſell, did ſcarcely heare their Magiſtrates ſent to him to Naples to capitulate: by which occaſion ioyning with the opportunitie offered, thoſe that kept the Caſtles in the name of Ferdinand, had good meanes by perſwaſions to draw againe the Citie to the deuotion of the Aragons: by which example alſo, the Citie of Otrante lately declared for the French, and no creature ſent thither to receiue them, continued not long in their affection: All the Lords and Barons of the Realme (except Alphonſo d'Aualo Marquis of Peſcaire, who left within new Caſtle by Ferdinand, was gone to him when he perceiued the inclination of the Lance-knights to yeeld: and except two others, who (for that the French King had giuen away their eſtates, were fled into Sicile) came to do homage to the new King: who, deſiring to aſſure wholy ſo great a conqueſt by way of concord, called afore him vnder ſafe-conduct afore he had wonne the rocke of the Egge, Dom Federicke, who, as well for that he had remained many yeares in the Court of France in the time of the Kings father, as alſo for that he touched his Maieſtie in kindred, was much fauoured of all the Lords of France. The King told him, he would endue Ferdinand (ſo that he would leaue all that was his in the Realme of Naples) with eſtates and large reuenues in France: and touching him, to recompence him liberally with all that he poſſeſſed there. But Federicke knowing that his nephew was determined to accept no condition, except he might haue Calabria, anſwered with words graue and wiſe: That ſeeing God, fortune, and the good wils of men, had concurred in his preſent felicities, to giue him the king-

dome of Naples, Ferdinand was not determined to make reſiſtance againſt ſo fatall a diſpoſition, but, rather eſteeming it no ſhame to giue place to ſo great a King, he would no leſſe then others, remaine in his obedience and deuotion, ſo that his Maieſtie would contribute to him ſome part of the kingdome, (ſecretly meaning Calabria) to the end that dwelling therein not as a King, but in the condition of one of his Barons, he might honour the clemency and magnanimitie of the French King, in whoſe ſeruice he hoped to haue once occaſion to ſhew that vertue which his malicious fortune would not ſuffer him to expreſſe in the action of his owne ſafetie: That, nothing could turne more to the glory of King Charles then that counſell, bearing reſemblance and affinitie with the counſels of thoſe Kings whom antiquitie hath ſo much recommended vnto vs, who by ſuch meanes raiſed their names to immortalitie, and obtained amongſt the people diuine honours: That, it was a counſell no leſſe for his ſuretie then for his glory; for that Ferdinand brought to his deuotion, the Realme would be aſſured to him, that he ſhould not hereafter feare the change of fortune, who had this common propertie: that as often as victories were not aſſured with moderation and diſcretion, ſhe would blemiſh by ſome accident vnlooked for, the reputation of the glory gotten. But the King doubting that if he communicated any part of the kingdome with his competitor, he ſhould expoſe the reſidue to manifeſt perill, Dom Federicke parted from him without any thing doing: and Ferdinand vnderſtanding of the rendring of the Caſtles, ſailed into Sicile with fourteene light galleys ſlenderly appointed, wherein he paſſed from Naples: This he did to be ready vpon all occaſions, leauing the guard of the rocke of Iſchia to Ianicke d'Aualo brother to Alphonſo, both men of great valour, and of ſingular faith towards their Lord. But the French King, to take from the enemy that receptacle, very conuenient to trouble the Realme, ſent thither his army by ſea, which arriued at length in the port of Naples; and finding the towne abandoned, they forbare to aſſaile the rocke, wherein, for his inuincible ſtrength by ſituation, they diſcerned many impoſſibilities to preuaile: and therefore the King determined to ſend other ſhips from Prouence and from Genes, to take Iſchia, and aſſure the ſea which Ferdinand vexed ſometimes. But their counſell and diligence were not equall to their fortune, ſeeing that all things went ſlowly forward, and were guided with moſt great negligence and confuſion. For, the French by reaſon of ſo great felicitie, became more inſolent then of cuſtome, and let go at aduenture the affaires of importance, hauing no other thoughts then of feaſting and pleaſures: and ſuch as were great about the King, cared not but for their owne particular, and to draw of the victory all the profite they could, without any reſpect either to the dignitie or profite of their Prince.

The death of Gemin Otto. a Turke kept in refuge by the Pope.

About this time died at Naples Gemin Ottoman, to the great diſpleaſure of the King, who layd vp in him many foundations and opportunities for the warre he determined to make againſt the Turke: and it was beleeued his death was brued in a cup of poyſon, which the Pope had giuen him, to worke his end in a certaine time: or that hauing deliuered him againſt his will, and ſo depriued of the forty thouſand duckats which his brother Baiazet payed him yearely, he tooke for conſolation, that he that had taken him away, ſhould receiue by him no commodity or profite: or at leaſt for enuie he bare to the glory of the French King: or laſtly for feare that things ſucceeding happily with him againſt the Infidels, he would afterwards turne his thoughts to reforme the abuſes of the Church, which being wholly altered from the ancient cuſtomes, made euery day of leſſe authority the Chriſtian Religion; euery one withall hauing an aſſured expectation that they would further decline before the end of his reigne; which being gotten by wicked meanes, was haply neuer in the memory of man adminiſtred with worſe orders: And there were that beleeued (for the corrupt nature of the Pope made credible in him all wickedneſſe) that Baiazet after he vnderſtood that the French King prepared to paſſe into Italy, practiſed by the meanes of George Bucciardin corrupted with money, to oppreſſe the life of Gemin. And yet the King nouriſhing ſtill his inclination to the warres of the Turkes, (more vpon a greene humour of youth and volubility of mind, then by maturitie of counſell) ceaſſed not for his death to ſend into Greece the Archbiſhop of Duraz, of the nation of Albania, who put the King in hopes, by the meanes of certaine factions of the baniſhed, and other vaine intelligences, to ſtirre vp ſome commotion in that prouince: but new accidents conſtrained him to turne his ſpirits to new thoughts.

It hath bene ſhewed before, how the deſire to vſurpe the Duchie of Millan, ioyned to a feare that Lodowike Sforce had of the Aragons and Peter de Medicis, induced him to procure the

the French King to passe into Italy; by whose comming, after he had obtained his ambitious pretence, and that the Aragons were brought into those necessities, that there was no abilitie remaining to defend their proper safetie: a second feare, both more great and more reasonable then the first, began to present it selfe before his eyes; and that was the seruitude houering ouer him and all the Italians, if the kingdome of Naples were ioyned to the power of the Crowne of France: and for that cause he desired that by the Florentines should be obiected many difficulties and impediments against the resolution of his enterprise. But when he saw his Maiestie was easily ioyned with that Commonweale, and with the same facilitie had ouercome all the impediments of the Pope, and lastly without resistance had preuailed ouer the Realme of Naples, the danger seemed euery day so much the greater to him, by how much the course of the French victories aduanced more and more with facilitie, fortune and felicitie. Alike feare also began to stirre in the minds of the Senate of Venice, who in all their counsels hitherunto had constantly perseuered in neutrality, gouerning their abstinence with so great discretion, no lesse in action then in demonstration, that there was no meanes to suspect their inclination more to one partie then to another. So that hauing chosen for Ambassadours to the King, Anthonie Loredan and Dominicke Treuisan, (yet not vntill they vnderstood that the King had passed the mounts) they lingred so long to send them, that the King was arriued at Florence afore them. But now the Senate perceiuing the violent course of so great felicitie, and that the King like a thunderbolt, without any resistance ran through all Italy, they began to esteeme as their owne the damage of their neighbours, and to feare lest in the ruine of others their destruction were also conspired; chiefly for that the King hauing made himselfe Lord of Pisa and other fortresses of the Florentines, and hauing left garrison in Sienna, and after done the like in the State of the Church, it seemed to them a signe and argument that his thoughts stretched further then the Realme of Naples. For these causes the Senate gaue willing eare to the perswasions of Lodowike Sforce, who as soone as the Florentines had yeelded to the King, had begun to solicite them to ioyne with him in a common remedy against common dangers: and it was beleeued, that if the French King had met with any impediments either at Rome, or at his entry into the Realme of Naples, they had al together take armes against him: but the Kings victory was so sodaine, that it preuented all the impedimēts that could be obiected. And now the king doubting the practises of Lodowike, had retained in his pay since the conquest of Naples, Iohn Iaques Trtuulce with an hundred lances, & with an honorable pension, ioyning vnto him with many promises the Cardinall Fregosa and Obietto de Fiesquo: these, for that they were mighty instruments to trouble and raise emotions in the towne of Genes; the other, for that being a chiefe leader of the Guelfes faction at Millan, he caried a minde much deuided from Lodowike; to whom as yet the King refused to giue the principalitie of Tarenta, saying that he was not bound to do it vntill he had reduced into his power all the Realme of Naples. Which things being very displeasing to Lodowike, he stayed twelue galleys which were armed for the King at Genes, and forbad the appointing of any more vessels there for the French seruice; which the King complained of, as the cause why he did not eftsoones reassaile with a new supply the rocke of Tschia.

Lodo. Sforce beginneth too late to feare the greatnesse of the French.

Then suspitions and disdaines growing on all parts, and the sodaine conquest of Naples representing to the Venetians and the Duke of Millan the present perill of their estates: they were constrained to deferre no longer to put their thoughts in execution. And that which furthered their resolution and courage, was the consideration of the mightie company of Confederates: for that to this the Pope was no lesse ready, to whom the greatnesse of the French was fearfull, then Maximilian the Emperour, to whom for many occasions of hatred to the Crowne of France, and for the many iniuries receiued by the King reigning, the prosperities of France, were alwayes, aboue all other, most displeasing. But the chiefe grounds and foundations whereupon the Venetians and Lodowike wrought, were the King and Queene of Spaine, who being a litle before bound to the French King (not for other respect then to draw from him the Earledome of Rossillion) not to hinder him in the conquest of Naples, had cunningly reserued to themselues till that time a free power to do the contrary. For, (if their bruites be true) there was a clause annexed to the capitulations made for restitution of the Earledome of Rossillion, which bare, that they should not be bound to any thing that touched the preiudice of the Church: of which exception they inferred, that if the Pope, for the interest of his chiefe, desired them to succour the Realme of Naples, they had good right so to do, without breaking their faith, or contradicting their promises. And to this they added afterwards, That by the same capitulations they were forbidden to oppose themselues against King Charles, in case it appeared that the same kingdome did iudicially appertaine vnto him. But what difference soeuer was betweene the truth and their construction of things, it is certaine, that hauing got that they desired, they began not onely to giue hope to the succours of them of Aragon, and secretly to solicite the Pope not to abandon their cause; but also, as they had in the beginning exhorted the French King with words moderate, as louers of his glory and zealous to Religion, to conuert his armies rather against Infidels then the Christian nations: so they continued eftsoones that course, but with so much more efficacie, and with words so much the more suspitious, by how much the victory of the King aduanced: and to the end they might haue the better meanes to nourish in greater hopes the Pope and the Aragons, giuing out neuertheless that they had regard onely to the guard of Sicilie, they were ready to send thither an army by sea; which arriued there after the losse of Naples, but yet with equipage and furniture more in demonstrations then in effects, for that it contained not aboue eight hundred horsemen mounted vpon Iennets, and a thousand footmen Spaniards. They vsed these apparences vntill the taking of Ostia by the Colonnoys, and the threats of the French against the Pope, gaue them a more honest occasion to aduance that which they had resolued in their minds: And following their deuice to action, they protested openly to the King whilest he was at Florence, by their Ambassadours, that according to the office of Christian Princes, they would take the defence and protection of the Pope, and the Realme of Naples (a chiefe of the Church of Rome:) and hauing already begun (as soone as they vnderstood of the flying of the Aragons) to negotiate with the Venetians and the Duke of Millan for confederation, they eftsoones solicited them with a new instance, to communicate with them for their common suretie against the French men.

A confederate league against the French king.

So that at length, in the moneth of Aprill and in the Citie of Venice, where were the Ambassadors of all those Princes, was contracted a confederation betweene the Pope, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan; the title and publication whereof was onely for the defence of the estates of one another, reseruing place to whosoeuer would enter it with conditions reasonable. But they all being of opinion that it was necessary so to tẽper things as the French King might not hold Naples, it was agreed in capitulations more secret, that the bands of Spaniards arriued in Sicilie, should be a succour for the recouering of that kingdome to Ferdinand of Aragon, who with a great hope of the good wils of the people, laboured to enter into Calabria: That the Venetians at the same time with their army by sea should assaile the sea coasts of the said kingdome: That the Duke of Millan (to hinder succours that might come out of France) should do what he could to get the Citie of Ast, wherein was the Duke of Orleans with a very small strength: That to the Emperour and King of Spaine should be contributed by the other Confederates a certaine quantitie of money, to the end that either of them should make warre vpon the Realme of France with a puissant army. The Confederates also desiring that all Italie would be vnited in the same concord of will, made instance to the Florentines and Duke of Ferrara to participate with this league. But the Duke being dealt withall after the league was published, refused to take armes against the French King; and yet, with an Italian subtiltie he consented that Dom Alphonso his eldest sonne should take pay of the Duke of Millan for an hundred and fifty men at armes, with the title of Lieutenant ouer all his companies. But the cause of the Florentines was otherwise, hauing no lesse iust occasion to leaue the French King, then allured to the confederation with many great offers: for that immediatly after the publicatiõ of the league, Lodowike offered them in the name of all the Confederates (so that they would communicate in the league) all their forces to resist the King, if, in his returne from Naples, he would offend them, and to ioyne with them as soone as might be for the recouering of Pisa and Liuorne. And on the other side, the King making no reckoning of the promises he had made at Florence, had not in the beginning restored them to the possession of their townes, nor since the conquest of Naples redeliuered the Castles of the same: making his faith and oath inferiour to the counsels of those, who fauouring the cause of the Pisans, perswaded him that the Florentines, as soone as they were restored, would vnite with the other Italians: and notwithstanding the great summes of money which they had bestowed vpon the Cardinall S. Malo, yet he resisted coldly such as incensed the King against them, as one that would not for the loue of the Florentines come to contention with the great ones of the kings Court. Further not only in theſe but alſo in many other things the king had made manifeſt, that he made no reckoning of his faith, neither did he conſider how important the amitie of the Florentines might be to him in thoſe times; inſomuch that one day their Ambaſſadours complaining of the rebellion of Montpulcian, and ſummoning him, according to his bond, to compell them of Sienna to render it: he anſwered as in ſcorne; What haue I to do if your ſubiects rebell, becauſe they are ill intreated? Yet notwithſtanding, the Florentines not ſuffering diſdaine to carrie them againſt their proper profite, determined not to hearken to the requeſts of the Confederates: aſwell not to prouoke againſt them of new the armie of France in the kings returne, as for that they might the ſooner hope to haue reſtitution of their places by ſuch as kept them: and laſtly, for that they truſted but litle in thoſe promiſes, knowing that they were hated of the Venetians, for the impediments which at ſundry times they had giuen to their enterpriſes; and knowing manifeſtly that Lodowike aſpired to the Lordſhip of Piſa.

But ſo it is, that about theſe times the reputation of the French began to diminiſh in the kingdome of Naples, for that giuing themſelues to their pleaſures, and gouerning all things at aduenture, they looked not to chaſe the Aragons out of thoſe few places yet holden by them, which they might eaſily haue done, if they had followed their fortune. But much more began they to decline in opinion, affection, and friendſhip: for, albeit the king ſhewed himſelfe very fauourable and liberall towards the people, in granting throughout the Realme ſo many priuiledges and exemptions, as they amounted to more then two hundred thouſand duckats by yeare, yet other things were not directed nor gouerned with ſuch order and diſcretion as appertained: for that the king would not take the paines to heare the complaints and ſuites of men, but referred ouer the whole charge of the affaires to ſuch as gouerned himſelfe; who partly by incapacitie, and partly by couetouſneſſe, confounded all things: ſo that the Nobility were not embraced with that humanitie they looked for, and much leſſe had recompences equall to their merits; but found many difficulties to enter into the chambers and audience of the king: there was made no diſtinction of perſons: the merits and ſeruices of men were not conſidered but at aduenture: the minds of ſuch as naturally were eſtranged from the houſe of Aragon were not confirmed: many delayes and difficulties were ſuborned touching the reſtitution of the ſtates and goods of thoſe that were of the faction of Aniow, and of the other Barons that had bene baniſhed by the old Ferdinand: fauours and graces were imparted to ſuch as procured them by corruption and meanes extraordinary: from many they tooke without iuſtice or reaſon, and to many gaue without occaſion or deſeruing: Almoſt all offices and dignities were transferred to the French, in whom were alſo inueſted (to the great griefe of the natural Lords) all the townes of the demaine (ſuch they call thoſe that are wont to obey immediatly the king:) things ſo much the more grieuous, by how much they had bene vſed to the wiſe and well ordered gouernments of the kings of the houſe of Aragon, and for that the king had promiſed there ſhould be no alteration of thoſe gouernments. But that which added much to this diſcontentment, was the naturall arrogancie of the French, aggrauated much by the facilitie of the victorie, which carried them into ſuch opinions of themſelues, that they eſteemed nothing of the whole Monarchie of Italie. Much more alſo was added by their inſolence and violence in taking vp their lodgings, no leſſe at Naples then in other parts of the Realme, where their companies were diſtributed, who did euery where ill intreate their hoſts: inſomuch that the ardent deſire which before they had of them, was now turned into extreme hate: and on the contrary in place of the malice they bare to the Aragons, there was inſinuation of compaſſion to Ferdinand, no leſſe for the generall expectation of his vertue, then for the memory of the gracious ſpeech which with ſo great ſweetneſſe and conſtancie he deliuered to the Neapolitans the day of his departure: the fame ſo working that that Citie and almoſt all the kingdome expected with no leſſe deſire, an occaſion to call backe the Aragons, then a few moneths before, they had deſired their deſtruction. Now began to be agreeable to them the name ſo hatefull of Alphonſo, calling iuſt ſeueritie, that which they had wont to note in him for crueltie; and interpreting to true ſinceritie of minde, that which wrongfully they had wont to conſter pride and fierceneſſe: ſuch is the nature of the people, inclined to hope more then they ought, and endure leſſe then is neceſſary, alwaies thirſting after innouations, and neuer contented with the time preſent: but chiefly of the inhabitants of Naples: who, of all the regions in Italie are moſt noted of inconſtancie, and deſire of new things.

Before this new league was made, the French king had determined to returne into France with ſpeed, moued more with a light fancie, and a vehement deſire of his Court, then with conſiderations diſcreet or well tempered: ſeeing that in the kingdome of Naples remained vndecided many and great affaires of Princes and eſtates, and the parts of the Realme being not fully conquered, his victory had not yet her iuſt perfection. But after he knew that ſo many Princes were drawne into league againſt him, he was much moued in his minde, and fell to deuiſe with his Lords what he were beſt to do in ſo great an accident; ſpecially euery one aſſuring him that of a long time before the Chriſtian Princes had not made ſo puiſſant a league. And thoſe of his Counceil were of aduice, that he ſhould diſpatch his departure, doubting that by how long he taried, by ſo much the more would the difficulties increaſe, ſeeing the Confederats would winne time to make greater prouiſions; and the bruite ranne already, that by their direction a great leuie of Almaines ſhould paſſe into Italie, and men began to ſpeake much of the perſon of the Emperour: They perſwaded that the king would prouide that there might paſſe with diligence out of France, new bands of ſouldiers to the towne of Aſt, both to guard that Citie, and to keepe the Duke of Millan in neceſſitie to defend his owne countrey; and withall to be in readineſſe to paſſe further according to the occaſions of his Maieſties ſeruices. It was alſo determined in the ſame councell, to labour with all diligence, and with very great offers, to ſeparate the Pope from the other Confederates, and to diſpoſe him to transferre to the kings perſon the inueſtiture of the Realme of Naples, which (notwithſtanding he had promiſed abſolutely at Rome,) yet he had denied it till that day, and with declaratiõ that that grant or conceſſion ſhould not beare preiudice to the title and rights of another. In a deliberation ſo graue, and amongſt ſo many thoughts of ſuch importance, was not loſt the memory of the affaires of Piſa. For, the king deſiring for many regards, that in him might remaine power to diſpoſe of that eſtate, and doubting leſt by the ayde of the Confederates the people of Piſa would bereaue him of the Citadell, he ſent thither by ſea together with the Ambaſſadours of the towne which were with him, ſixe hundred French footmen, who being arriued there, conceiued the ſame affection which others that had bene left there, had apprehended: and being puſhed forward with a deſire to ſpoyle and prey, after they had receiued money of the Piſans, they went with their companies to encampe afore the towne of Librafatta, where the Piſans (whoſe Captaine was Luke Maluezze) had bene in campe certaine daies afore, vpon an aduertiſement that the Florentines had ſent part of their bands to Montpulcian, and hearing of the approch of their enemies, were raiſed and gone the day before: but returning thither eſtſoones with the ſupply of the French men, they tooke it in few daies; for the Florentine armie ſent to ſuccour it, could not paſſe the riuer of Sercle for the violence of waters, neither durſt they take the other way by the walls of Lucques, for the ill diſpoſition of that people, who were much moued, and fauoured greatly the liberty of the Piſans. Theſe bands with thoſe of the French that remained of the conqueſt of Librafatta, ran ouer the whole countrey of Piſa, as enemies manifeſt to the Florentines: who, when they complained, the king gaue no other anſwer, then aſſoone as he ſhould come into Tuskane, he would redeliuer all thoſe places he had promiſed, deſiring them to beare with patience that little reſpite. But the meanes of departure were not ſo eaſie to the king, as his deſire was ready: for that his armie was not ſo great, as, being deuided into two parts, it was able to bring him into Aſt without danger, and to ſuffice both to auoyd the impediments of the Cõfederates, and defend the kingdome of Naples againſt ſo many agitations as were then in preparing.

The French king taketh counſell of his Lords what to do againſt the league of Confederates.

In theſe difficulties he was conſtrained (to the end the Realme ſhould not be naked of defence) to diminiſh the prouiſions reſerued for his owne ſafety; and yet to keepe his perſon from manifeſt perill, his neceſſities enforced him not to leaue in the kingdome ſo ſtrong an army as was needfull. Therefore he determined to leaue there halfe of his Swiſſers, and a part of the French footmen, eight hundred lancemen of France, and about fiue hundred men at armes of the Italians which were in his pay, deuided partly vnder the enſignes of the Prefect of Rome, & partly vnder the Colonnois and Anthonie Sauelle, Captaines who had taſted plentifully of his liberalities, in the diſtribution of the townes and eſtates of the kingdome, but ſpecially the Colonnois: for that to Fabricius he had giuen the countrey of Alba and Taillecoſſa poſſeſſed before by Virginio Vrſin: and Proſpero he had indued with the Duchie of Tracetta and the Citie of Fondi, with with many hamlets which belonged to the familie of Caetane and Montfortin, together with many other peeces adioyning, taken from the houſe of the Comtes. To theſe forces, he made reckoning that in all neceſſities he ſhould vnite the forces of thoſe Barons, who for their owne ſuretie, were conſtrained to deſire his greatneſſe: but ſpecially the powers of the Prince of Salerne, whom he had reſtored to the office of Admirall, and of the Prince of Biſignian. He created as Lieutenant generall ouer all the Realme, Gilbert de Bourbon Duke of Montpenſier, a Captaine more eſteemed for the greatneſſe of his houſe, and that he did participate in the bloud royall, then for his proper vertue: he aſſigned other Captaines in many parts of the Realme, on whom he had beſtowed eſtates and reuenues; of theſe the chiefe was Monſieur d'Aubigny, whom he had made great Conſtable of the Realme for Calabria: In Caietta, the Seneſhall of Beaucaire, whom he had raiſed to the office of high Chamberlaine: And in Abruzze, Gracian a valiant Captaine of great reputation: promiſing them to ſend them ſpeedy reſcue of money & men. But in the meane while to entertaine the warre, he left them no other prouiſion, then the aſſignation of thoſe moneys which ſhould be daily gathered of the reuenues of the Realme, which began already to wauer and ſhake, for that the name of the Aragons began to reuiue in many places: For, at the ſame time that the king would depart from Naples, Ferdinand accompanied with the Spaniſh armie that came by ſea into the Iſle of Sicile, was deſcended into Calabria, to whom flocked with a ſwift readineſſe many troupes of the countrymen, the City of Regge rendring it ſelfe to him, whoſe Caſtell had bene alwaies kept in his name. At the ſame time was diſcouered about the ſhoares of Pouilla the Venetian army by ſea, ouer whom was Captaine Anthonie Grimany, a man in that commonweale of great authoritie: But neither for theſe, nor any other ſignes of changes towards, the king did not forbeare, nor once ſuſpend or linger his deliberation to go his way. For, beſides that haply they were driuen by neceſſitie, the deſire was incredible in the king and all his Court to returne into France, as though fortune that was ſufficient to make them get ſo great a victorie, had bene ſtill able ſo to preſerue it for them. In this time alſo held good to Ferdinand, the Iſles of Iſchia and of Lipara, which albeit they were nearer to Sicile, yet are they members of the kingdome of Naples: he held Regge which he had newly recouered, and euen in Calabria, he commanded Villeneufue with the Caſtell, and places about Brunduſia where Federik was retired; alſo Galipoli, Mantia, and Turpia.

Gilbert Bourbon Duke of Montpenſier the kings Lieutenant in Naples.

The Realme of Naples beginneth to reclaime the name of the Aragons.

Now before the king departed from Naples, many things were in negociation betweene him and the Pope, not without great hope of concord: In which action was ſent from the Pope to the king, and after returned to Rome the Cardinall S. Denis, and for the French king, M. Franci. For the king deſired greatly the inueſtiture of Naples, and that the Pope, if he would not ioyne with him, at the leaſt that he would not be for his enemies, and that he would receiue him into Rome as a friend. To which demands, albeit at the beginning the Pope bare ſome inclinatiõ, yet, diſtruſting much in himſelfe of the king, and eſteeming that to ſeparate himſelfe from the Confederates, and conſent to the inueſtiture, would be ſuppoſed a meane ſufficient to make a faithfull reconciliation with him, he obiected many difficulties to the other demands; and to that of the inueſtiture, (albeit the king would condeſcend to take it vnder this condition, not to be preiudiciall to the rights of another) he anſwered, that he wiſhed the lawes might be looked into afore, to ſee to whom the right appertained: And on the other ſide, ſeeking to giue impediment by force to the kings entry into Rome, he ſent to the ſtate of Venice, and to the Duke of Millan, to furniſh him with ſuccours and ſtrength of ſouldiers; who, immediatly ſent him a thouſand light horſemen, and two thouſand footmen, with promiſe of an aide of a thouſand men at armes: with which bands, ioyned to his owne forces, he hoped to be able to make reſiſtance. But the Venetians and the Duke of Millan conſidering afterwards, that it was a thing too dangerous to ſend their ſtrength and companies ſo farre from their owne eſtates, ſeeing that the whole armie agreed vpon was not yet in order, and that part of their people were occupied in the enterpriſe of Aſt; and withall remembring the infidelitie of the Pope, who when king Charles paſt that way, called Ferdinand into Rome with his armie, and ſuddenly changing aduice, made him iſſue forth againe: they began to perſwade him to withdraw himſelfe to ſome place of ſuretie, rather then to aduenture his perſon to ſo great a danger in ſtriuing to defend Rome; ſeeing that when the king ſhould enter the citie, he would as quickly be gone, without leauing any body therein; which would ſo much the more increaſe the kings hopes to come to ſome compoſition with him.

The French king departed from Naples the twentieth day of May: but for that he had not yet taken the Crowne with the ceremonies accuſtomed, a few dayes afore his departure, he was ſolemnly crowned in the Cathedral Church, and receiued with great pompe and glory the honours, oathes, and homages, accuſtomed to be done to new kings. At this coronation, the oration was pronounced in the name of all the people of Naples by Iohn Iouian Pontan, to whoſe prayſes very cleare and ſhining for the excellency of his doctrine, his life, and ciuilitie of manners, this action brought no ſmall diſgrace; for that hauing bene of long a principall Secretarie to the kings of Aragon, and in very great authoritie with them, and the teacher and maiſter of Alphonſo, he ſeemed (whether it were to obſerue iuſtly the parts proper to Oratours, or to ſhew his affection to the French) to take too great libertie to ſpeake in the diſpraiſe and derogation of the kings by whom he had bene ſo much aduanced. So hard it is ſometimes for a man to keepe in himſelfe that moderation and thoſe rules, which he flowing with ſo great doctrine, had taught vnto others, writing of morall vertues, and by his wit and knowledge had made himſelfe wonderfull to the world in all kind of learning. The king led with him eight hundred French lances, the two hundred Gentlemen of his guard, an hundred lances vnder the Lord Triuulce; three thouſand Swiſſers footmen, a thouſand French men, and a thouſand Gaſcoins; hauing ordained that in Tuſkane Camilla Vitelli & his brethren ſhould ioyne with him with two hundred & fiftie men at armes, and that the armie by ſea ſhould draw towards Liuorne. Virginio Vrſin and the Count Petillane followed the king without other guard then their faith giuen not to go away without leaue: & for that they reaſoned that they were not iuſtly made priſoners, their cauſe had bene diſputed in the kings Councell, afore whom they alledged, that at the time they yeelded themſelues, the king had not onely granted to thoſe that they ſent, but alſo ſet downe in writing vnder his owne ſignature, their ſafeconduct; whereof being aduertiſed by their ſolicitors, which attended the diſpatch of the Secretaries, they had vnder that truſt, at the ſummons of the firſt Herald that went to Nola, diſplaied the enſignes of the king, and giuen the keyes to the firſt Captaine hauing with him but a few horſemen, when as they hauing more then foure hundred men at armes might eaſily haue made reſiſtance. Further, they alledged the ancient deuotion of the family of Vrſins, who taking part alwaies with the faction of the Guelffes, had euer borne both in themſelues and in all the predeceſſors of that houſe, perpetuall impreſſions of honour, reuerence, and ſeruice, to the Crowne of France: That for thoſe regards it came to paſſe, that with ſo great a readineſſe they had receiued the kings Maieſtie into their eſtates bordering vpon Rome: and therefore it was neither conuenient nor iuſt, both in regard of the faith giuen by the king, and of their deportments, that they ſhould be holden priſoners. But they were anſwered with no leſſe roundneſſe by Monſieur de Ligny, whoſe ſouldiers tooke them within Nola: That the ſafeconduct, albeit it was determined and ſubſigned by the king, yet it is to be vnderſtood, that it was not perfectly giuen, but when it was confirmed with the kings ſeale, and with the ſeale of the Secretarie, and ſo deliuered to the partie: That in all grants and letters pattents ſuch was the ancient cuſtome in all Courts, to the end that if any thing were inconſideratly paſſed the mouth of the Prince, by reaſon of many thoughts and affaires, or for not ſufficient information of things, it might ſo be moderated: And that the confidence of that moued them not to yeeld to ſo ſmall a company of ſouldiers, but they did communicate in the generall neceſſitie and feare, for that there remained no meane either to defend or to flie, the whole countrey about them ſwarming with the armies of the victors: That what they alledged of their merits was falſe, which if it ſhould be affirmed by another, themſelues ought to denie it for their honour: for that it was manifeſt to all the world, that not of will or free conſent, but to auoyd danger (leauing in aduerſity the Aragons, of whom in proſperitie they had receiued great benefits) they agreed to giue the king paſſage through their lands: ſeeing therefore they were in pay of the enemy, and bare minds eſtranged from the name of the French, and that they had perfectly no ſafeconduct or ſuretie, they were made priſoners by good law and right of armes. Theſe reaſons thus auouched againſt the Vrſins, and ſuſtained by the power of Monſieur de Ligny, and authoritie of the Colonneys, who aſwell for ancient enuies, as for the diuerſitie of the factions, quarrelled them openly: there was no reſolution nor ſentence, onely they were commanded to follow the king, yet giuing them hope to be deliuered when his Maieſtie was come to Aſt.

The French king crowned king of Naples.

Virginio Vrſin and the Count Petillane being the kings priſoners ſhew reaſons to be redeliuered.

Their reaſons are diſproued by Monſieur de Ligny.

But the Pope, (the Confederates hauing counſelled him to go his way) though he were not without without inclination to be reconciled with the king, with whom he negotiated continually: yet in the end ſuſpition and ielouſie preuailing with him, though he had nouriſhed the king with hopes that he would attend him; after he had beſtowed a ſufficient garriſon within the Caſtell S. Ange, two dayes before the king ſhould enter Rome, he went to Oruiette, accompanied with the Colledge of Cardinals, and two hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and three thouſand footmen: and he left behind him as Legat, the Cardinall of S. Anaſtaſio, to receiue and honour the king, who entred by that quarter on the further ſide of Tyber, to the end to auoid the Caſtell S. Ange: and refuſing the lodging that was offered him by the Popes commiſſion in the Pallace of the Vatican, he went and lodged in the ſuburbes. And when the Pope vnderſtood that the king came neare to Viterbe, notwithſtanding he entertained him with new hopes to meete with him in ſome place conuenient betweene Viterbe and Oruiette, he left Oruiette and went to Perouſe, with intention (if the king tooke that way) to go to Ancona, the better to haue meanes, by the commoditie of the ſea, to retire to ſome place abſolutely aſſured. And yet the king although he were very angry with him, rendred the Caſtels of Ciuitauecchia and Terracina, reſeruing Oſtia, which when he came out of Italie, he gaue vp to the power of the Cardinall of S. Peter ad vincula, who was Biſhop thereof. He paſſed in like ſort by the countreys of the Church, as through the dominions of a friend; ſauing that they of Tuskanella refuſing to receiue into their towne his vanrguard, the ſouldiers tooke it by force, and ſacked it, not without the ſlaughter of many.

After this, the king remained without any occaſion at Sienna ſixe dayes, not conſidering (neither of himſelfe, nor by the earneſt aduertiſements of the Cardinall of S. Peter ad vincula, and of Triuulce) how hurtfull it was to giue time to his enemies to make their prouiſions and vnite their forces: neither did he recompence the loſſe of time, with the profite of counſels or deliberations. For there was debated at Sienna the reſtitution of the fortreſſes of the Florentines promiſed by the king at his departure from Naples, and many times after confirmed on the way: and therefore, the Florentines, beſides that they were ready to pay the thirty thouſand duckats remaining of the ſumme agreed at Florence, offered to lend ſeuenty thouſand more, and to ſend with him till he were arriued at Aſt, Franciſco Secco their Captaine with three hundred men at armes, and two thouſand footmen: ſo that the neceſſity which the king had of money, the great commodity to augment his army, and the conſideration of his faith and othe, induced almoſt all thoſe of his Councell to perſwade effectually the reſtitution of the Caſtels and peeces of ſtrength, reſeruing Pietraſanta and Serezana, as fit meanes to draw more eaſily to his deuotion the hearts of the Genowais. But it was a reſolution in deſtinie, that the matter of new calamities ſhould remaine kindled in Italie. For, Monſieur de Ligny, a man both yong and wanting experience, but being borne of one of the ſiſters of the kings mother, and of no ſmall fauours with him, puſhed forward either by his lightneſſe, or elſe with diſdaine for that the Florentines addreſſed themſelues to the Cardinall of S. Mallo; hindered this deliberation, alledging no other reaſon then the pitie and compaſſion of the Piſans: And touching the offer of the forces which the Florentines made, he deſpiſed them, vanting that the army of France was able to fight with all the men of warre in Italie knit in one ſtrength: and Monſieur de Pienes was a ſupporter of his opinion, for that he thought the king would beſtow vpon him the iuriſdiction of Piſa and Liuorne. There was debating alſo at Sienna of the gouernement of that City, for that many of the orders of the people and of the reformers (to plucke downe the brotherhood of the order of Montenoue,) made inſtance, that erecting a new forme of gouernement, the guard which they of Montenoue kept at the publike Pallace might be taken away, and the place ſupplied by a guard of French men vnder the leading of Monſieur de Ligny: And albeit this counſell was reiected in the councell of the king, as a thing of litle continuance, and impertinent to the time preſent; Monſieur de Ligny who had laid a vaine plot to make himſelfe Lord of it, obtained that the king would take into his protection that City vnder certaine conditions, binding himſelfe to the defence of it & all the dependances except Montpulcian; which he ſaid he would not intangle himſelfe withall, neither for the Florentines nor for the Siennois: And the communaltie of Sienna (albeit no mention was made of any ſuch thing in the capitulation) choſe, by the conſent of the king, Monſieuer de Ligny for their Captaine, promiſing him twenty thouſand duckats by yeare, vpon condition, that he would keepe there a Lieutenant with three hundred footmen for the guard of the place; which ſtrength he left there culled

out of ſuch as were of the French army. The vanitie of which deliberations appeared immediatly, for that the Order of Montenoue hauing eftſoones reconquered with armes their authority accuſtomed, chaſed out of Sienna the guard, and diſmiſſed Monſieur de Liſle whom the king had left there for his Ambaſſadour.

But there were now great ſtirres and emotions in Lombardie: for the Venetians, and Lodowike Sforce (who had euen then receiued from the Emperour with much ſolemnity the priuiledges of inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, and made publike homage and oath of fidelity to the Ambaſſadours that brought them) raiſed great preparations to ſtop the king that he ſhould not returne into France, or at leaſt to aſſure the Duchie of Millan, to come to the which he muſt paſſe ouer ſo great a circuit of countreis. To theſe ends, euery of them readdreſſed their forces, and leauied of new, partly in cõmon, & partly at expences ſeparate, many men at armes, obtaining after many difficulties, that John Bentiuole whom they had taken into their common pay, ſhould ſticke to the league with the City of Bolognia. Lodowike armed at Genes for the guard of the ſame City, ten gallies at his owne charge, and foure great ſhips at the common expences of the Pope, the Venetians, and himſelfe: and being at the point to execute that whereunto he was bound by the couenants of the confederation touching the towne of Aſt, he ſent into Germanie to leauie two thouſand footmen, and conuerted to that enterpriſe Galeas S. Seuerin with ſeuen hundred men at armes, and three thouſand footmen: inſomuch as aſſuring him of the taking of that towne, and to atchieue all things to his honour, (as he was naturally very inſolent in his proſperities) he ſent this meſſage to the Duke of Orleans the more to terrifie him: That hereafter he ſhould forbeare to vſurpe the title of Duke of Millan, which title Charles his father had taken ſince the death of Philip Maria Viſcounte: That he ſhould not ſuffer new bands to paſſe out of France into Italie: That he ſhould cauſe to returne home againe ſuch as were already within the towne of Aſt: And that for the aſſurance of theſe things, he ſhould put the towne of Aſt into the hands of Galeas S. Seuerin, in whom the king might repoſe truſt as well as in him, hauing the yeare before bene receiued by the king into the brotherhood and Order of S. Michael in France; magnifying beſides, and boaſting of his forces; of the prouiſions the Cõfederates made to make head againſt the king in Italie; the great preparations of the Emperour and the king of Spaine to moue warre beyond the Mounts. But the Duke of Orleans was made nothing afraid with theſe vaine threats: for as ſoone as he vnderſtood they were about to make a new confederation, he purpoſed to fortifie Aſt, and ſolicited with great inſtance to ſend out of France new ſupplies; who, vnderſtanding that they were to be employed in the proper ſuccours of the kings perſon, began with great diligence to paſſe the mounts. By reaſon whereof the Duke of Orlans not fearing his enemies, marched into the field, and tooke in the Marquiſdome of Saluce the towne and Caſtell of Galſinieres which Anthony Maria of S. Seuerin poſſeſſed. Which being knowne to Galeas, who had a litle before taken certaine ſmall villages, he retired with his army to Anon, a towne of the Duchie of Millan neare to Aſt, neither hauing hope, to be able to offend, nor feare to be offended. But the nature of Lodowike being much inclined to entangle himſelfe with enterpriſes which required great expences, and on the contrarie, to ſhun euen in the greateſt dangers the ſame coſts and charges, was the occaſion to bring his eſtate into right great dangers: for that by reaſon of his very ſpare and needy paiments, a very few footmen came out of Germany, and for the ſame niggardneſſe, the bands that were with Galeas diminiſhed daily: on the contrary the ſupplies of France increaſed continually, who for that they were called to the reſcue of the kings perſon, marched with ſuch diligence, that the Duke of Orleans had already aſſembled three hundred lances, three thouſand Swiſſers footmen, and three thouſand Gaſcoines. And albeit the king had preciſely commanded him, that abſtaining from all enterpriſe, he ſhould ſtand vpon continuall readineſſe to meete him whenſoeuer he ſhould be ſent for; yet (it being hard for a man not to make reckoning of his proper profite) he determined to accept the occaſion to poſſeſſe himſelfe of the citie of Nouare, wherein he was offred to be put by two of the Opizins, Gentlemen of the ſame citie, hating much the Duke of Millan, for that as well from them as from many other of the towne, he had by falſe accuſations and vniuſt iudgement, vſurped certaine conduits of waters and other poſſeſſions. The enterpriſe and the manner of it being reſolued vpon, the Duke of Orleans paſſed by night the riuer of Po at the bridge Sturo, within the iuriſdiction of the Marquis of Montferrat, hauing in his company the Marquis of Saluce: he was receiued by the conſpiratours of the enterpriſe into the towne with all his forces, and found no reſiſtance: and from thence making ſuddaine incurſions with part of his horſemen euen vntil Vigeuena, it was beleeued that if he had drawne his whole army with ſpeed towards Millan, there would haue riſen no ſmall inſurrections; for that the loſſe of Nouaro kindled in the Millanois a wonderfull inclination to reuolt and change; and Lodowike, no leſſe timerous in aduerſitie, then inſolent in proſperitie, was ſeene with teares vnprofitable to acknowledge his cowardize (as for the moſt part inſolency is ioyned with timerouſneſſe:) they alſo that were with Galeas, in whom onely conſiſted his defence, remaining behind, ſhewed themſelues in no place to his reſcue. But becauſe the conditions and diſorders of an enemy, are not alwaies knowne to the Captaines, it happeneth often in warres that many goodly occaſions are loſt; there being alſo no apparence that ſo ſudden a mutation could ſucceed againſt ſo great a Prince. The Duke of Orleans, to aſſure the conqueſt of Nouaro, determined to haue the Caſtel, which the fifth day accorded to yeeld, if within foure and twenty houres it were not ſuccoured: during which time, Galeas de S. Seuerin had leaſure to conuey his companies to Vigeuena; and the Duke (who the better to reconcile the minds of the people, had by proclamation called in many exactions impoſed afore vpon the communalty) good reſpite to increaſe his army. And albeit the Duke of Orleans hauing ranged his bands neare the walles of Vigeuena, offered battell to his enemies, on whom fell ſo generall aſtoniſhment, that they were vpon the point to abandon the towne, and paſſe the riuer of Theſin by a bridge they had made vpon boates, and other matter neceſſary to their ſuccours in the paſſage; the enemy refuſing to fight, the Duke of Orleans retired to Trecas. From this time the affaires of Lodowike Sforce began to proſper, many ſupplies of horſemen and footmen arriuing in his army. For the Venetians being content that the charge to meete the French King, ſhould be in effect to them alone, cõſented that Lodowike ſhould call backe part of thoſe bands he had ſent vpon the coaſts of Parmeſan, and withall they refurniſhed him with foure hundred light horſe: ſo that the meane to paſſe further, was taken from the Duke of Orleans, who making a road with fiue hundred horſemen euen to Vigeuena, and the horſemen of the enemy encountring with them, a great loſſe light vpon the Duk of Orleans. This encounter gaue courage to Galeas de S. Seuerin, both ſuperiour in forces, and nothing inferiour in fortune, to preſent battell to the Duke at Trecas. At length all the army being aſſembled (wherein beſides the Italian ſouldiers, was arriued a thouſand horſemen, and a thouſand footmen of Almains) incamped within a mile of Nouaro, whither the Duke of Orleans was retired with all his companies.

The newes of the reuolt of Nouaro, procured the King being then at Sienna, to come forward: and therefore to auoid all occaſions that might hinder his departure; and knowing well that the Florentines, warned by the perils paſt, and falne into new iealouſies, for that Peter de Medicis followed him, albeit they had determined to receiue him into Florence with great honours, yet for their more ſurety, had filled their towne with men of armes and piked bands; he drew to Piſa by the lands of the Florentines, leauing the City of Florence on the right hand: and in the towne of Poggibonſe met him Ieronimo Sauonarola, who according to his cuſtome, vſing the name and authority of God to his purpoſe, told him roundly that he ought to reſtore to the Florentines their townes, ioyning to his perſwaſions, threatnings abſolute and terrible, that if he obſerued not that he had ſworne with ſo great ſolemnity, vpon the holy Goſpels, and as it were afore the eies of God, a ſeuere puniſhment would ſhortly follow vpon him. The King made him ſundry anſwers, according to his inconſtancy; now promiſing to make reſtitution as ſoone as he was come to Piſa; and immediatly (wreſting his promiſe and oath) he ſaid he had ſworne to the Piſans, to protect their libertie, afore he made any oath at Florence: and yet he gaue hopes alwaies to their Embaſſadours for the reſtitution of their peeces as ſoone as he was come to Piſa. At Piſa the matter was eſtſoones proponed in the kings Councell, for that the bruite of the preparations, vnity and ſtrength of the Confederates about the bordets of Parma increaſing daily, they began to looke into the difficulties to paſſe through Lombardy: for which cauſe many deſired the moneys and other ſuccors offered by the Florentines. But to their aduice were contrary euen thoſe Captaines and gentlemen who had reſiſted it at Sienna: alledging, that albeit there happened by the oppoſition of the enemy, any diſorder or difficulty to paſſe through Lombardy, yet it were better to haue in their power the City of Piſa (whither they might retire) then to leaue it in the hands of the Florentines, who, hauing once reobtained the places they demanded, would be of no better faith, then had bene the other Italians; and adding withall, withall, that for the more ſurety of the kingdome of Naples, it was very conuenient to hold the port of Liuorne: for that the plot laid to alter the ſtate of Genes ſucceeding well to the King, (whereof the hope could not be doubtfull) he ſhould be ſoueraigne Lord almoſt of all the ſeas, from the port of Marſeils euen to the hauen of Naples. Certainly theſe reaſons were able to do much in the mind of the King, as yet little capable to chuſe the beſt counſel: but of farre greater power were the petitions and teares of the Piſans, who in great concourſe of men, women, and children, ſometimes proſtrate at the Kings feete, and eftſoones recommending to euery one (yea euen the leaſt of his Court, and the ſouldiers, with lamentable cryings and complaints bewailed their miſeries to come) the inſatiable hatred of the Florentines, and the laſt deſolation of their countrey: which ſhould not haue cauſe to lament for any other thing, then for that his Maieſtie had put them in liberty, and promiſed to protect them in it; in aſſurance whereof, they beleeuing the word of a right Chriſtian King of France, to be a word firme and reſolute, had taken boldneſſe ſo much the more to prouoke the hatred of the Florentines. With theſe complaints and exclamations they ſo moued the hearts of euery man, that all ſorts of people were ſtirred vp, euen to the archers and Swiſſers; ſo that one day after dinner the Gentlemen and ſouldiers went in great numbers and tumult to the King, whom (Salzart one of the Penſioners ſpeaking in the name of them all) they beſought with great inſtance, that for the honor of his perſon, for the glorie of the Crowne of France, and for the conſolation of ſo many of his ſeruants, prepared alwaies to put their liues in hazard for him, and who perſwaded him with a faith more loyall, ſimple, and innocent, then ſuch as were corrupted with the money of the Florentines, he would not take from theſe poore and naked Piſans, the benefite which ſo graciouſly he had beſtowed vpon them: offering him, that if for want of money, he ſuffered himſelfe to be carried into a deliberation ſo infamous, he ſhould rather take their chaines, their iewels, and their treaſures, yea and retaine in his hand their paies and penſions which they were to receiue of him. This vehement affection of the ſouldiers proceeded ſo farre, that a ſimple Archer had the boldneſſe to threaten the Cardinall of S. Malo; and others with braue ſpeeches to quarrell the Marſhall of Gié, and the Preſident of Gannay, whom they knew to labour the redeliuerie of the Piſans to the ſeruitude of Florence. Inſomuch that the King confuſed with ſo great contrariety among his people, let things hang in ſuſpence, and was ſo farre from taking any certaine reſolution, that at the ſame time he promiſed the Piſans againe neuer to paſſe them into the power of the Florentines and to the Embaſſadors of Florence attending at Lucques, he gaue intelligence, that that which he did not at that preſent for iuſt occaſions, he would do immediatly after he was arriued in Aſt, willing that their Commonweale ſhould ſend Embaſſadours thither.

The King departed from Piſa after he had changed the Captaine, and left ſufficient garriſon within the Citadell, doing the like in the other fortreſſes & peeces of defence: and being of himſelfe inflamed with an incredible deſire to conquer the towne of Genes, being ſet on by the Cardinals of Rouere and Fregoſe, and by Obietto de Fieſque, and others of the baniſhed, who gaue him hopes of a ſudden mutation there; he ſent with them from Serezana to this enterpriſe (contrary to the opinion of all his Councel, who allowed not to diminiſh the forces of the army) the Lord Philip de Breze, brother to the Duke of Sauoy, with ſixe hundred lances, and fiue hundred footmen newly arriued out of France by ſea, ordaining that the men at armes of the Vitellies, coming behind with a ſlow march, and therefore not able in time to ioyne with him, ſhould follow them: and that certaine others of the baniſhed, together with the bands ſupplied by the Duke of Sauoy, ſhould enter the riuer of the Weſt: and laſtly, that the army by ſea, reduced to ſeuen gallies, two gallions, and two foiſts led by the Captaine Mielans, ſhould go to backe the army by land.

The king aſpireth to the ſurpriſing of Genes.

By this time the vantgard guided by the Marſhall of Gié, was come to Pontrema, which towne, after it had diſmiſſed three hundred footmen ſtrangers left there for the guard of the place, did yeeld ſuddenly by the meane of Triuulce, with couenant, that they ſhould not be vexed, neither in their perſons, nor in their goods. But the faith giuen by the Captaines did little auaile for the ſurety of the towne; for that the Swiſſers being violently entred, and taking occaſion of reuenge, becauſe when the army going to Naples paſſed through Lunigiana, about forty of their nation (for a quarrell happening at aduenture) were ſlaine by them of Pontrema; they ſacked and burnt the towne, after they had cruelly ſlaughtered all the inhabitants.

In

In theſe times the army of the Confederates aſſembled diligently about the borders of Parma, in number about two thouſand and two hundred men at armes, eight thouſand footmen, and more then two thouſand light horſemen, the moſt part Albanois and of the prouinces neare to Greece; who brought into Italy by the Venetians, retained the ſame name they had in their countrey, and were called Stradiots. Of this army the ſinewes and principall ſtrength were the bands of the Venetians, for that thoſe of the Duke of Millan (he hauing turned moſt of his forces to the ſeruice of Nouaro) made not the fourth part of the whole army. Ouer the bands of the Venetians, wherein were many notable Captaines, commanded as generall Francis Gonzague Marqueſſe of Mantua, a man albeit very yong, yet what for his great courage and naturall deſire of glorie, his expectation ſurmounted his age: and with him were ioyned as commiſſioners, two of the chiefeſt of the Senate, Luke Piſan and Melchior Treuiſan. Ouer the regiment of Lodowike Sforce, commanded vnder the ſame title of Generall, the Count Caiazze, in whom Lodowike repoſed much: but for that he was nothing equall in armes to the glory of Robert de S. Seuerin his father, he had rather got the name of a ſubtill and politicke warriour, then of a hardy and reſolute Captaine; and with him was Commiſſioner Francis Bernardin Viſcount chiefe of the faction of the Gibelins at Millan, and therefore vſed as oppoſite to Iohn Iaques Triuulce. Among theſe Captaines and principals of the army, conſulting whether they ſhould go incampe at Furnoue, a little village at the foote of the mountaine; it was determined, for the ſtraightneſſe of the place, and perhaps (as was afterwards ſpred abroad) to giue occaſion to the enemy to deſcend into the plaine; that they ſhould lodge in the Abbey of Guiarnola diſtant three miles from Furnoue. This aduice was the cauſe that at Furnoue was lodged the vantgard of the French, which had paſſed the mountaine much afore the reſidue of the army, being hindred by the great artillery, which with many difficulties was drawne ouer that ſharpe mountaine of the Appenin, and had paſſed with farre greater troubles, if the Swiſſers (deſiring to wipe away the offence they had done to the Kings honour in the ſacke of Pontremi) had not applied a wonderfull diligence and promptitude to force the paſſage. The army of the Confederates.

The vantgard being arriued at Furnoue, the Marſhall of Gié ſent a trumpet to the Italian campe, to demand paſſage by their army in the name of the King, who without offence to any perſon, and receiuing victuals at conuenient prices, would paſſe that way to returne into France, diſpatching at the ſame inſtant certaine light horſemen to view the enemy and the countrey; who were broken and put to flight by certaine Stradiots which Francis Gonzague ſent againſt them. If vpon this occaſion the Italians had aduanced themſelues euen to the place where the French were, they had eaſily (by all coniecture) broken the vantgard, and ſo taken away all poſſibilities of the Kings paſſage: this occaſion remained in their fauour alſo the day following, notwithſtanding that the Marſhall after he had conſidered the danger, had retired his people into a place more high. But the Italian Captaines had not the boldneſſe to aſſaile them, aſwell for the aduantage of the place whither they were retired, as for that they feared the ouergreatneſſe of the vantgard, and that they were more neare to the maine army: and it is certaine, that as yet they had not aſſembled all the bands of the Venetians, who were ſo ſlow to ioyne in one ſtrength at Guiarnola, that it is manifeſt, if the King had not dallied ſo long vpon the way, at Piſa, Sienna, and other places without all occaſion, he might haue paſſed without impediment or encounter of the enemy: who being ioyned at laſt to his vantgard, lodged the day after with all his army at Furnoue.

The Princes confederate neuer beleeued that the King durſt haue paſſed the Appenin by the high way with ſo ſmall an army; for at the firſt they were of opinion, that leauing the greateſt part of his people at Piſa, he would returne into France with the reſidue by ſea: and afterwards vnderſtanding that he continued his way by land, they ſuppoſed, that to eſchue their army, he would lay his plot to paſſe the mountaine by the way of the borough of Vaudetar, and by the hill Centeroix, very ſharpe and difficult, from thence to paſſe to Tortonnis, hoping to meete the Duke of Orleans vpon the confines of Alexandria. But when it was certainely knowne that he was coming ſtraight forward to Furnoue, the Italian army (very well reſolued afore, both for the ſhew of courage in ſo many valiant Captaines, and for the report of the little number of the enemies) loſt ſome part of their courage, conſidering the valour of the men at armes of France, and the vertue of the Swiſſers, to whom without all compariſon, the Italian footmen were eſteemed much inferiour; they conſidered alſo the agilitie of ſuch as managed the great artilleries;

but ſpecially (which moueth much the minds of men when they haue taken a contrary impreſſion,) they redoubted greatly the vnexpected hardineſſe of the French, who, though their numbers were much inferiour to theirs, durſt yet approch ſo neare them. For theſe conſiderations, the courage euen of the Captaines being well moderated, they held a councell amongſt themſelues what anſwer they ſhould make to the trumpet ſent by the Marſhall of Gié: on the one ſide it ſeemed too dangerous to put the ſtate of all Italie in the diſcretion of fortune; and on the other ſide that it would bring great preiudice to the valour of al the ſouldiers and men of ſeruice in Italie, to ſhew that they had no courage to oppoſe againſt the army of the French, who, being farre inferiour in numbers, and leſſe expectation of other oportunities in a country ſtranger, durſt yet offer to paſſe euen in the face and eies of them. In this councell the aduice of the Captaines being diuerſe, after many diſputations, they laſtly agreed to ſend aduertiſment to Millan of the Kings demand, and to execute that which ſhould be determined by the Duke and the Embaſſadours of the Confederates; who being drawne into councel, the Duke and the Embaſſadours of Venice being moſt neare the danger, were both of this opinion, not to ſtop the way of the enemy, ſeeing he would go, but rather (according to an old prouerbe) to make him a bridge of ſiluer: otherwaies (according to many ancient examples) there might be danger, that neceſſity turned into deſpaire, he would make his owne way with great effuſion of bloud of ſuch as vndiſcreetly would hinder him. But the Spaniſh Embaſſadour, deſiring that without the danger of his King, they would make a triall of fortune, perſwaded vehemently and almoſt with proteſtation, not to let paſſe the King, nor to loſe the occaſion to breake that army, which paſſing in quiet, the matters of Italy would remaine notwithſtanding in greater dangers then before: for that the French King keeping Aſt and Nouare, all Piemont would obey his commandements: and hauing at his backe the realme of France, a realme mighty and rich, and the Swiſſers his neighbours ready to come into his pay in what numbers he would; and finding himſelfe increaſed in reputation and courage, if the army of the league, ſo farre aboue him in numbers, would conſent ſo cowardly to his paſſage; he would eftſoones torment Italy with greater courage, knowing that the Italians either would not or durſt not fight with the French men. All this notwithſtanding, the ſure opinion preuailing moſt in this councell, they determined to write to Venice, with whom bare rule the ſame aduice.

But now they conſulted in vaine, for the Captaines of the army after they had written to Millan, conſidering that they could not haue returne of anſwer in ſeaſon conuenient, and how much it would touch in diſhonour all the men of warre in Italy, to leaue the paſſage free to the French men, ſent backe the trumpet without any anſwer certaine, being reſolued to aſſaile the enemy, and charge them in the paſſage: the Commiſſioners of Venice being of the ſame aduice, but Treuiſan much more then his companion. The French men on the other ſide marched on with great arrogancie and boldneſſe, as they that till that time hauing encountred no reſiſtance in Italie, were perſwaded that either the army durſt not oppoſe any impediment, or at leaſt if they did, they ſhould eaſily put them to flight: ſo ſmall account made they of the Italian army. But when in deſcending from the mountaine, they deſcouered the army lodged in infinite numbers of tents and pauilions, and in a place ſo large that (according to the cuſtome of Italy) they might range themſelues in battell: and weighing their great numbers, and that if they had not meant to fight, they would not haue lodged ſo neare them: their great arrogancy began to take another habite, ſo that they would haue receiued it for a good newes, to heare that the Italians would be content to let them paſſe: and ſo much the more, for that the King hauing written to the Duke of Orleans to meete him with all the power he could make, and to march with ſuch ſpeed as he failed not at the day and place appointed: but the Duke returned aduertiſement, that the army of Sforce (oppoſed againſt him, ſtanding vpon a ſtrength of nine hundred men at armes, twelue hundred light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen,) was ſo mighty, that without manifeſt perill he could not aduance to obſerue his Maieſties appointment; conſidering beſides, that he muſt be enforced to leaue part of his bands for the guard of Aſt and Nouare. Theſe neceſſities conſtraining the King to turne his mind to new counſels, he commanded Monſieur d'Argenton (who, a little before, had bene his Embaſſadour at Venice, where Piſan and Treuiſan, now their deputy Cõmiſſioners, perſwaded him to diſpoſe the Kings mind to peace) to ſend a Trumpet to the ſaid Commiſſioners, to let them vnderſtand that he would commune with them for the common benefite: who accepted his deſire, and appointed the next morning to meete in a place conueniene betweene both the armies. But the King, either for that in that place there was want of victuals, or for some other occasion, changed aduice, and would not in that place attend the issue of the conference.

The front of the tents and trenches of the one and the other army, was distant little lesse then three miles, stretched out along the right shore of the riuer Taro, which is rather a land-flood then a riuer, for that falling from the hill Appenin, after it hath run through a little valley inclosed with two little hils, it descends into the large plaines of Lombardie, and so falles into Po. Vpon one of these two litle hils, which was that of the right hand, descending, euen to the shore of the riuer, was lodged the army of the Confederates, incamped by counsell of the Captaines rather on that side, then on the left shore (where must be the way of the enemies,) to the end they should not haue the meane to turne to Parma, of which City for the diuersitie of factions, the Duke of Millan was not without suspition, the rather for that the French King had by the appointment of the Florentines for his conduct to Asti, Francis Secco, whose daughter was maried into the house of the Torelli, a family noble & mighty in the territory of Parma. The lodgings of the Confederates were fortified with ditches and rampiers, well furnished with artillery, by the mouth of the which, the French men going to Asti, must of necessity passe Taro, on the side of Fornoue, and march, no other thing remaining betweene them and the Italians, then the riuer. All the night the French were in great trauell for the vexations of the Italians, who caused their estradiots to make incursions euen into their campe; which was so troubled at euery bruite, as if there had bene a continuall alarme: to this was much helping a sodaine and most thicke raine mixed with lightnings and fearefull thunders, with many horrible crackes and flashes, which they tooke as a foreshewing of some sorrowfull accident, and which did more amaze them then the army of the Italians, not onely for that being in the midst of mountaines and enemies, and in a place which (if they preuailed not by fight) fauoured them with no hopes or meanes of safety; they were brought into great difficulties, and therefore had iust occasion of extreame feares: but also for that it seemed to them that the threatnings of heauen, which vse not to appeare but for great causes, were directed most to that part where was present the person of the King, of so great maiesty and power.

The morning following, being the sixth day of Iuly, the French army began by the peepe of day to passe the riuer: afore, marched the most part of the artillery, being followed with the vantgard, wherein the King (supposing that against it would be bent the greatest forces of the enemy) had put three hundred and fifty French lances, Trimulce with his company of an hundred lances, and three thousand Swissers which were the sinewes and hope of that army, and with them on foote Engilbert brother to the Duke of Cleue, and the Bayliffe of Dion that had leuied them: to these, the King adioyned three hundred archers, and certaine crosse-bowmen on horsebacke of his guard, whom he made alight on foote, and almost all the footmen which he had with him. After the vantgard marched the battell, in the middest whereof was the person of the King armed at all parts, and mounted on a fierce courser: and neare to him, (to gouerne with his counsell and authority that part of the army) was the Lord of Trimouille, a leader much renowned in the Realme of France. Then followed the arearegard guided by the Count de Foix: and in the last place was bestowed the baggage of the army. Notwithstanding this marching of the army, and the present readinesse to fight, yet the King, who could haue bene contented with some accord, solicited Argenton to go and negociate ettsoones with the Venetian Commissioners, euen at the same time that the campe began to moue. But the Venetian army being all in armes, and the Captaines determined to fight, the shortnesse of the time and neareneſſe of the enemy, left no respite or space of time to entertaine Parley: for, now began the light horsemen on both sides to skirmish, the artillery from all quarters to shoote off with a noise horrible, and the Italians issued out of their tents, had spred vpon the shoare of the riuer their squadrons prepared to the battell. These things notwithstanding, the French men forbare not to march, partly vpon the sand of the riuer, partly by the skirts or length of the little hill, for that in so straight a plaine they could not display their ordinance; and the vantgard being now led straight vpon the campe of the enemies, the Marquesse of Mantua with a squadron of sixe hundred men at armes of the gallantest of all the army, and with a great band of estradiots and other light horsemen, followed with fiue thousand footmen, passed the riuer at the backe of the arearegard of the French, leauing vpon the banke on the other side Anthony of Montfeltre bastard to Federike

late Duke of Vrbin, with a great ſquadron, to paſſe when he ſhould be called to refreſh the firſt battell: he ordained beſides, that when the fight was begun, another part of the light horſemen ſhould charge the enemy in flanke, and the reſidue of the eſtradiots paſſing the riuer at Fornous, to giue vpon the baggage of the French, which either for want of men, or (as was bruited) by the counſell of Trimulce, was left without guard to who would make prey of it. On the other ſide, the Count Caiazzo with foure hundred men at armes (amongſt whom, was the company of Dom Alphonſo d'Eſte, come to the campe without his perſon, for that his father would it ſo) and with two thouſand footmen, paſſed the riuer of Taro to aſſaile the French vantgard: hauing in like ſort left on the banke on the other ſide Annibal Bentiuole with two hundred men at armes, to giue reſcue when he ſhould be called. And for the defence of their lodgings and tents, remained two great companies of men at armes, and a thouſand footmen, for that the Commiſſioners of Venice would reſerue in all fortunes a whole ſuccour for their ſafety. But the King ſeeing that (contrary to that his Captaines had perſwaded him) ſo great a ſtrength came to charge the areareguard, he turned his backe to the vantgard, and began to draw neare to the areareguard with the battell, haſting ſo diligently with a ſquadron afore the reſt, that when the charge began, he was in the forefront with the firſt that fought. Some haue written, that the companies of the Marqueſſe paſt the riuer not without diſorder, both for the height of the bankes, and for the impediments of trees, of blockes, and boughs, whereof commonly the riuers of land-flouds are full. To this others haue left in memory, that his footmen for the ſame difficulty, and becauſe the water was ſwelled with the raine that fel in the night, either came late to the ſeruice of the battell, or at leaſt all were not there, a great part remaining on the other ſide the riuer. Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine, that the charge which the Marqueſſe gaue was reſolute and furious, and was no leſſe valiantly anſwered by the French, the ſquadrons on both ſides entring the conflict Pell-mell, and not according to the cuſtome of the warres of Italy, which was to fight one ſquadron againſt another, and in place of him that was weary and began to retire, to ſupply the fight with a freſh, making in the end but one great ſquadron of many ſquadrons, inſomuch as for the moſt part the skirmiſh or triall of armes wherein commonly died but a very few people, endured almoſt a whole day, and oftentimes the ſudden coming of the night was the cauſe that they brake off without victory certaine on either partie. The lances being broken, at the encounter of whom fell to the earth as wel on the one part as on the other, many men at armes, and many horſes, euery one began with the ſame fury, to lay hands vpon their battell axes, rapiers, and other ſhort weapons, the horſes fighting with their feete and their teeth, and with the ſhocke, no leſſe then the men that gouerned them. And truly the vertue of the Italians made an excellent ſhew in the beginning, chiefly for the valour of the Marqueſſe, who being followed with a valiant company of yong gentlemen and Lancepezzades, (theſe are braue & approued ſouldiers entertained aboue the ordinary companies) forgot nothing which appertained to a moſt braue Captaine. The French men ſuſtained with great valour ſo hote and furious a charge, but finding themſelues ouerlayed with ſuch ods of numbers, they began almoſt manifeſtly to ſtagger, not without the danger of the King, within a very few paces of whom, the baſtard of Burbon was made priſoner, notwithſtanding he fought with great vertue: by whoſe fortune the Marqueſſe hoping to haue the ſame ſucceſſe againſt the perſon of the King, being vndiſcreetly led into a place ſo dangerous, without that gard and order which was conuenient for ſo great a Prince; made many attempts with his ſoudiers to come neare him. Againſt whom, the King albeit he had few of his people about him, defended himſelfe gallantly and with great courage ouercame his preſent danger, the fierceneſſe and agility of his horſe doing more to his ſafety, then the ſuccours of his people. In theſe great perils, there wanted not in him, thoſe counſels, which feare brings to our memorie in actions dangerous: for that ſeeing himſelfe almoſt abandoned of his owne, he had recourſe to the heauenly aides, making a vow to S. Denis & S. Martin, reputed protectors particular of the realme of France, that if he paſſed ſafe into Piemont with his army, he would, as ſoone as he was returned on the other ſide the mounts, viſite, and that with great gifts, the Churches dedicated to their names, whereof the one is neare to Paris, and the other in the towne of Tours: and that euery yeare with moſt ſolemne feaſts and ſacrifices, he would honour and celebrate ſo great a grace receiued by their meane: which vowes being thus made, he entred into a new courage, and began eſtſoone to fight with greater valour then his complexion could naturally beare. But now the danger of the King ſo touched and enflamed ſlamed thoſe that were leaſt diſtant from him, that running to couer with their perſons the perſon of the King, they ſuſtained the Italians: and his battell which remained behind, preſſing in at the ſame time, a ſquadron of the ſame charged ſo furiouſly the enemy in the flanke, that it moderated ſomewhat their heate, and preſently reſcued the Kings danger: whereunto was added this helpe, that Rodolph Gonzague vncle to the Marqueſſe of Mantua, a Captaine of great experience, as he encouraged the ſouldiers and reordered ſuch as he ſaw out of order, doing alwaies many other good offices of an excellent Captaine, as he raiſed by chance his beauer, was ſo hurt in the face with an eſtockado by a French man, that falling from his horſe, his people could neuer reſcue him in ſo great a confuſion and tumult, and ſo thicke troupes of fierce horſes; but other men and horſes falling vpon him, he died rather ſtifled and ſmoothered with the throng of horſes feete and treadings, then by the armes or blowes of the enemies: A chance truly vnworthy ſuch a man, for that in the counſels of the day before, and the ſame morning, he perſwaded (contrary to the will of his nephew) to abſtaine from fight, iudging it a great want of diſcretion to hazard themſelues to the will of fortune without any neceſſity. Thus the battell changing by diuerſe accidents, and no aduantage appearing more for the Italians then for the French men, it was neuer more doubtfull then now to whom the victory would remaine: in ſo much that hope and feare being equall on both parts, they fought with an incredible fury, euery one eſteeming that the victory reſted in his right hand, and in his ſtrength. The French men had a deſperate courage, as well for the preſence and danger of their King (for that nation hath alwaies borne no leſſe reuerence to the maieſty of their Kings, then to things of diuinity) as for that they were in ſuch place, as gaue no hopes of their ſafety but onely by the victory. The Italians were encouraged, by the couetouſneſſe of ſo rich a pillage, by the honorable example of the Marqueſſe leading them to the battell with ſo happy ſucceſſe, and by the great number of their army, by reaſon whereof they had expectation of ſuccours from many of their friends; a thing which the French could not hope for, for that either their whole companies were already in the fight, or at leaſt attended euery inſtant to be charged by their enemies. But (all men know) the power of fortune is great in all humane actions, more mighty in matters of war then in any other thing, but moſt infinite and ineſtimable in the feats of armes; where) one commandement ill vnderſtood, one order ill executed, one raſhneſſe, one vaine voice, yea ſometimes euen of the meaneſt ſouldier, carieth many times the victory to ſuch as ſeemed euen vanquiſhed and ouercome; and where vnlooked for do happen many ſodaine accidents, which it is impoſſible for a Captaine to foreſee, or hinder by his counſell. In ſo much as, in ſo great a doubt, not ſayling of her cuſtome, ſhe did that, which neither the vertue of men, nor the force of armes had yet done. For, the eſtradiots ſent to charge the tents and baggage of the French, hauing begun to ſpoile without any reſiſtance, and beginning to leade away to the other ſide the water, ſome mulets, ſome ſumpters, and ſome armour: not onely the other eſtradiots appointed to charge the French in the flanke, but euen ſuch as were already within the fight, ſtirred vp with the ſight of the gaine wherewith they ſaw their companions go laden to their tents, left the battell, and went to pill and ſpoile that that was left of the French pillage: and following their example, you ſhould ſee many horſemen, and footmen iſſue by troupes out of the battell, to do the like. By which occaſion, not onely the ſuccours ordained failing the Italians, but euen the number of thoſe that fought diminiſhing with ſo great diſorders, and Anthony of Montfeltre not remouing for that no man called him, Rodolph de Gonzague being ſlaine, vpon whoſe call he depended, the French men began to winne ſo much ground, that now nothing did more ſuſtaine the Italians (manifeſtly declining) then the vertue of the Marqueſſe, who fighting moſt valiantly, made head yet againſt the violence and fury of the enemies, encouraging his people as well by his owne example, as with vehement and moſt affectionate ſpeeches, perſwading them rather to loſe their liues then their honors. But it was impoſſible that few ſhould long reſiſt againſt many, and the enemies increaſing vpon them on all ſides, and a great part of their owne being ſlaine, and many hurt, yea euen of the particular band of the Marqueſſe; they were driuen to betake themſelues to flight, to repaſſe the riuer, which by the raine fallen ouer night, and which with haile and thunder in great abundance during the fight, was riſen ſo high, that it gaue great impediments to ſuch as were forced to repaſſe it. The French men followed the chaſe with a fury equall to their fortune, euen to the riuer, regarding nothing more then cruelly to make ſlaughter of thoſe that fled, without taking any priſoner, or reſpecting either ſpoile or gaine; but there was heard through the field the redoubled voice of one that cried; Companions remember Guignegate: Guignegate is a village in Picardie neare to Terwaine, where, in the later yeares of the raigne of Lewis the xj. the French men almoſt victorious in a battell againſt Maximilian king of Romains, being diſordered becauſe they began to fall to pillage, were put to flight. But at the ſame time that on that ſide of the army the fight was valiant and obſtinate, the vantgard of the French (againſt the which Count Caiazze led one part of the horſemen) came to the battell with ſo great a fury, that the Italians aſtoniſhed when they ſaw they were not followed of their peoples, inclined of themſelues ſo faſt to diſorder, that many of their leaders being ſlaine, amongſt whom was Iohn Piccingin and Galeas of Correge, they returned in manifeſt flight to the great eſquadron. But the Marſhall of Gié, diſcerning (beſides the ſquadron of the Count) another regiment of men at armes prepared to the battell on the other ſide the riuer, would not ſuffer his ſouldiers to follow them: which afterwards by ſome was reputed a counſell diſcreet and wiſe, and by others, looking perhaps leſſe into the reaſon then into the euent, it was iudged a reſolution rather cowardly then conſtant: for that, if they had purſued them, the Count and his companies had giuen him their backes; by which diſaray he had ſo amazed the reſidue of their ſtrength remaining on the other ſide the water, that there would haue bene great impoſſibility to retaine them, ſeeing that the Marqueſſe flying as well as the others, and repaſſing the riuer as ſtrongly and in as good order as he could, found them in ſuch tumults and ſeparations, as euery one thinking to ſaue himſelfe with his cariage, the high way that goeth from Plaiſance to Parma was already full of horſes, of men, and cariages which drew to Parma. This tumult partly was ſtayed by the preſence and authority of the Marqueſſe, who reaſſembled them, and put eftſoons all in order: But much more did reaſſure the diuided minds of the Italians, the coming of Count Petillane, who in ſo generall a confuſion of both the armies, vſing the occaſion, fled to the Italian campe: where diſperſing comfort to euery one, and affirming that amongſt the enemies was no leſſe diſorder and amaze, he eftſoones confirmed their mindes: in ſo much that euery one ſuppoſed that without him, either at the inſtant, or at the leaſt the night following, all the campe had diſperſed in great terrour. The Italians then being retired to their campe, except ſuch as being caried with confuſion and tumult (as it hapneth in ſuch like caſes) and being alſo daunted by the greatneſſe of the floud, thought to find ſafety in flying, and were diſperſed into ſundry places, whereof many falling into the hands of the French men, were by them ſlaine. The king with his people drew to his vantgard which had not ſtirred: and there deuiſing with his Captaines, whether he ſhould ſuddenly paſſe the riuer to aſſaile the enemies in their lodgings, he was counſelled by Triuulce and Camilla Vitelli, (who was come to the battell with a few horſemen, hauing ſent the reſidue of his company to the enterpriſe of Genes) to ſet vpon them: and Francis Secco furthering the expedition more then any other, told the King that the way that was ſeene ſo farre off, was full of men and horſes, which argued that either they were fled to Parma, or hauing begun to flie, were eftſoones returned to the campe. But indeed the difficulty to paſſe the riuer was not little, and the bands that partly had fought, and partly were kept armed in the field, were ſo weary and ouer-trauelled, that by the counſell of the French Captaines, it was determined to ſeeke harbour; and ſo they went to lodge vpon the hill in the village of Medeſane, of little more diſtance then a mile from the place of the battell: there they pitched their lodging without any order, but with great incommodity, for that the moſt part of their baggage and ſtuffe was made pillage by the enemy.

This was the diſcourſe of the battell betweene the Italians and the French vpon the riuer of Taro, not vnworthy of memory, for that it was the firſt of very long time that was fought in Italy with ſlaughter and bloud, ſeeing that in all battels or actions of warre in that countrey, the liues of men were wont more to be put to ranſome, then ſold with the price of bloud. But in this, notwithſtanding of the French part, the ſlaughter ſcarcely contained two hundred bodies, yet of the Italians were found dead more then three hundred men at armes, and of others as many as made vp the number of three thouſand perſons, amongſt whom was Ramiccio de Farneze leader of the Venetian horſemen, with many other gentlemen of marke. Bernardin de Montone alſo a Captaine of horſemen vnder the Venetians, (whoſe name was more populous and renowmed by Braccio de Montone his grandfather, one of the firſt beautifiers of the Italian diſcipline of warre, then by his proper vertue or fortune) receiued a blow with a maſe vnder his helmet, with the which being fallen from his horſe, he was left on the ground for dead. This ſlaughter

was so much the more wonderfull to the Italians, by how much the encounter endured not aboue an houre, euery one on both sides fighting with his proper force and valour, without helpe of the artillery. Touching the honour of the iourney, either part laboured to appropriate to his particular; the renowme and glory of the victory. The Italians occupied this reason, for that their tents and carriages remained vntouched, where the French on the contrary, had their lodgings rifled, and lost much of their best stuffe, yea part of the proper paullions of the King: alledging further, that they had vtterly discomfited the enemies, if one part of their people appointed to enter the battell, had not turned to the pillage of their trenches; a thing which the French confessed to be true. And the Venetians laboured so much to attribute the glory of this iourney to themselues, that by publike commandement through all the lands of their obedience, and specially at Venice, they made bonfires, with other feasts and testimonies of gladnesse. This publike example was followed with no lesse affection of sundry particulars, for that vpon the sepulcher of Melchior Treuisan, were stamped these words in the Church of the Frier minors; He fought prosperously vpon the riuer of Taro against Charles King of France. But by the vniuersall consent of men indifferent, the palme, merit, and true glory of the victory, was adiudged to the French men, both for the numbers of the dead, so farre different and vnequall; and for the chase of the enemies ouer the riuer, and also for that they wonne their liberty to passe further, which was the controuersie for which they came to the battell. The king remained all the day following incamped in the same place, procuring (by the meane of Argenton) a parley with the enemies, by which was accorded a truce till night: the King on the one side desired to passe with surety, knowing that many of the Italians army had not yet fought; and remaining in order about their trenches, the march of so many daies iourney through the Duchy of Millan with the enemy in his taile, could not but be dangerous: and on the other side, he knew not what resolution to take; such was the simpleneſſe of the councell with whom he vsed most conference in his deliberations, reiecting for the most part the aduices of men graue and experienced. No lesse doubt and incertainty trauelled also the minds of the Italians, who albeit at the beginning they were falne into no small astonishment, yet were eftsoons so reassured, that the night after the battell, they held counsell (by the incouraging and comfort of the Count Petillane) to inuade the French campe in the night, being lodged with many incommodities, and not fortified: but by the plurality of voyces this counsell was reiected, as too dangerous. There ran a bruite then through all Italy, that the bands of Lodowicke Sforce, according to his secret direction, would not fight, for that, hauing so strong an army of the Venetians vpon his Estate, he was in more feare of this victory, then of the fortunes of the French, touching whom he was indifferent whether they were victors or vanquished: and that for his better surety in all chances, he would keepe his forces whole, which was an occasion that the Italians did not obtaine the victory: which opinion was maintained by the Marqueſſe of Mantua and the other Venetian Captaines, to make their reputation the greater, and willingly receiued of all such as desired augmentation of the glory of the Italian souldiers. But I haue heard this bruite confuted by a personage of great grauity, and remaining then at Millan in such a place of honour, that he had entire knowledge of the affaires, who affirmed that Lodowike hauing sent all his forces to the siege of Nouaro, had not so many at the battell of Taro as were of great consequence for the victory, which the army of the confederates had obtained, if their proper disorders had not hurt them more then the want of a greater number of men; seeing withall, that many whole companies of the Venetians fought not at all. And also the Count Caiazze sent against the enemy but one part of his companies, and that very coldly: he did it perhaps, for that the vantgard of the French was so strong, that the danger was apparent to commit himselfe to fortune, and perhaps because ordinarily actions couragious and venturous haue made him more wonderfull, then such wherein was surety. And yet the companies of Sforce were not altogether vnprofitable, for that albeit they fought not, yet they kept at a bay the vantgard of the French, and were the cause that it gaue no succours to the King, who with the lesse or most weake part of the army, sustained with the great danger of his person, all the brunt and sway of that daies fight. And if I be not deceiued, this testimony is no more confirmed with authority then with reason. For, how is it likely, that if that intention had bene in Lodowike, he would not rather haue instructed his Captaines, to dissuade from letting the French men to passe: seeing that if the victory had falne on the French, his bands being so neare the enemy, had bene no more in safety then the others, notwithstanding they meddle not in the battell? and with what discourse, with what consideration, or with what experience of things could he promise to himselfe, that comming to the fight, fortune would be so equall, that the French King should neither be victor nor vanquished? And this is likewise without doubt, that they had not fought at all without his aduice; for that the companies of the Venetians being sent to the Duchie of Millan onely for his good and safetie, would not haue swerued from the mind of his Captaines.

The morning following, the King departed with his army before day, without sound of trumpets, to couer his discamping as much as he could: and for that day he was not followed by the army of the Confederates, who though they had had will to haue pursued him, yet they should haue found impediments in the waters of the riuer, which were so much increased by raines that fell in the night, that there was no possibility of passage for the day following: onely at the declining of the Sunne, passed ouer not without danger the Count Caiazze with two hundred light horsemen, and following the trace of the French men, who marched the right way towards Plaisance, he gaue them the day following many alarmes and impediments: and yet, all wearied and trauelled as they were, they kept their way without disorder, the villages refreshing them with plenty of victuals, partly for feare to receiue hurt by them, and partly by the meane of Triuulce, who scouring before for the same effect with the light horsemen of the army, made perswasions to men, sometimes by threats, and sometimes with his authority, great in that Duchy with all sorts, but very great with the family of the Guelfes. The army of the league which remoued the day after the discamping of the French, and but little disposed (specially the prouisors of the Venetians) to put themselues any more in the arbitrement of fortune, came neuer so neare them, as to annoy them with any little disturbance: but being lodged the second day vpon the riuer of Trebia a little beyond Plaisance, (the Swissers and two hundred lances, and almost all the artillery remaining betweene the riuer and the city of Plaisance for the commodity of incamping,) the flouds were so great by reason of the raines falling in the night, that notwithstanding their extreme diligence, it was impossible that either the footmen or horsemen could passe but at high day, & then with difficulty, although the waters began to abate: notwithstanding all which oportunities fauoring the army of the league, yet they neuer executed any action against the French but a farre off, nor yet the Count de Caiazze who was entred within Plaisance, for suspition of reuolt or tumult: which suspition was not altogether without occasion; for that it was beleeued, that if the King according to the counsell of Triuulce, had displayed his ensignes vnder the name of Francis the little sonne of John Galeas, the Duchy would easily haue falne into some mutation, so plausible was the name of him whom they held for their lawfull Lord, and so hatefull the remembrance of the vsurper, and of speciall importance the credit and friendships of Triuulce. But the King in whom was setled no other impression then to passe on, would not be entangled with new practises, but followed his way with diligence, finding great want of victuals after the first daies trauell, and in all places the forts and peeces well guarded, Lodowike hauing distributed what into Tortona vnder Iasper S. Seuerin, surnamed Frecasse, and what into Alexandria, many horsemen with twelue hundred lance-knights, which he had drawne from the campe of Nouaro. After the King was passed Trebia, his army was alwaies vexed in the taile by the Count Caiazze, who had ioyned to his light horsemen fiue hundred lance-knights of the garrison of Plaisance, finding no meanes to haue the residue of the light horsemen and foure hundred men at armes to be sent him from the armie, for that the Venetian Commissioners, warned by the perill at the battell of Taro, would giue no consent eftsoones to hazard their forces: but at last the French men (when they were neare to Alexandria) taking their way more high towards the mountaine where the riuer of Tanaro runnes with shalloweſt water, were brought without losse of men in eight remoues or soiournings of the campe before the wals of Ast: in which city after the King was entred, he dispersed his men of warre into the champion, with intention to increase his army, and to abide in Italy vntill he had succoured Nouaro: and the campe of the league which had pursued him to the countrey of Tortona, despairing now to vexe him more, went and ioyned it selfe to the companies of Lodowike Sforce besieging the said city of Nouaro; which euen now began to suffer great scarcity of victuals, for that by the Duke of Orleans nor his people had bene vsed any diligence for prouision, which by reason of the fertility of the countrey, they might haue done very abundantly: but like men either blinded with security, or else of little policy, they neuer considered of the danger, till the meanes of remedy were past, consuming ſuming without ſparing all the ſtore of victuals which they found there.

About this ſeaſon returned to the King thoſe Cardinals and Captaines, who with ill ſucceſſe had bene at the enterpriſe of Genes. For after the Kings army by ſea had taken the towne of Spetia, it ſet vpon Rapalle, and poſſeſſed it eaſily: but there iſſued out of the port of Genes a nauy of eight light gallies, one carricke, and two barks of Biskay, which by night put on land ſeuen hundred footmen, who without any difficulty tooke the borough of Rapalle, with the French garriſon that was within, and then accoaſting the French nauy which was retired to the gulfe, after a long fight, they remained victors, taking and burning all their veſſels, the Captaines made priſoners, and the place by this victory made more renowmed, for that in the yeare before, the Aragons were there defeated. Neither was this aduerſity of the French recompenced by the army that went by land, who guided by the Eaſt riuer to Valdibiſogne, and ſo to the ſuburbs of Genes, found themſelues deceiued in their hopes that they had conceiued, that in Genes would riſe tumults: and therefore vnderſtanding of the ſpoile and loſſe of the nauy by ſea, they tooke way with ſpeed to the mountaine, which is very tharpe and vneaſie, and from thence deſcended to the valley of Pozzenere, which is on the other ſide of the City: from whence, notwithſtanding their troups were well increaſed by the concourſe of paſſants and other people, whom the Duke of Sauoy had ſent in their fauour, they drew with the ſame diligence towards Piemont. In the action of this enterpriſe it is certaine, that if they within the towne had not bene reſtrained from iſſuing forth, for doubt leſt the faction of Fregoſa would make ſome innouation, they had wholly broken the French army and put them to flight. The horſemen alſo of Vitelli now come to Chiuſure, vnderſtanding the ſucceſſe and great diſorder of thoſe with whom they went to ioyne in ſtrength, retired with great haſte and not without danger, to Serezana: in ſo much, that except Spetia, all the places of that riuer that had bene occupied by the baniſhed, recalled againe forthwith the Genouayes, as did in like ſort in the riuer of the Ponent, the city of Vinſentille, which at the ſame time had bene occupied by Paul Baptiſta Fregoſa, and certaine others of the baniſhed.

Ferdinand to recouer his kingdome of Naples.

At the ſame time, the warre was alſo as hote in the realme of Naples, as in the parts of Lombardy, but with a more diuerſe fortune: for Ferdinand after he had taken Regge, conſidered how he might recouer the places bordering, hauing in his army ſix thouſand men, comprehending ſuch of the countrey and Sicille as willingly followed him, together with the horſemen and footmen of the Spaniſh, ouer whom was Captaine, Gonſaluo Fernand of the houſe of Aghilar, and countrey of Cordone, a man very valiant and long exerciſed in the wars of Granado; who at his firſt coming into Italy, being called (by a Spaniſh brag) the great Captaine, to ſignifie with this title, the ſoueraigne power he had ouer them, did well deſerue by the many goodly victories he atchieued, that that ſurname might be after confirmed and perpetuated in him by vniuerſall conſent, in teſtimony of his great vertue and excellency in the knowledge of warre. To this army, which had already ſtirred vp a great part of the country, Monſieur d'Aubigny preſents himſelfe neare Seminara, a towne vpon the ſea, with the men at armes of France remaining for the gard of Calabria, and ſuch bands of horſemen and footmen as the Lords of the countrey of the French faction had ſent to him: and being come to the battell, the valour of the ſouldiers which were of traine and exerciſe, caried the victory againſt the ignorance of the other little experienced. For, not onely the Italians and Sicilians which Ferdinand had gathered in haſte, but alſo euen the Spaniards, were ſouldiers new and vntrained to ſeruice; with whom notwithſtanding, he maintained the skirmiſh with great ſtoutneſſe, for that the vertue and authority of the Captaines failing nothing of their place and office, ſuſtained ſuch as for all other regards were much inferiour, and aboue the reſidue Ferdinand behaued himſelfe as appertained to his worth; but his horſe being ſlaine vnder him, he had in all coniecture, remained either dead or taken, if Iohn de Capua brother to the Duke of Termini, (who had bene his Page from his childhood, & whom he had entirely loued in the floure of his age) had not alighted and remounted him vpon his horſe, and with an example of faith and loue very notable and worthy, offered his owne life for the ſafety of his Lord, for he was ſlaine in the flight. Gonſaluo flieth along the mountaines to Regge, and Ferdinand to Palma, which lieth vpon the ſea neare to Seminara, and there tooke gallies and ſayled to Meſſina. And as in aduerſities neceſſity is mighty to make men reſolute, ſo by this ouerthrow, there increaſed in him a new courage and will to aſſay againe the triall of fortune: for, he was not onely aduertiſed, that the whole city of Naples thirſted with great deſire to haue

him,but alſo by ſecret intelligence he knew,that he was generally called by the principals of the Nobility and people: and therefore fearing leſt ſingring ioyned to the report of his ouerthrow in Calabria, might eftſoones make cold that diſpoſition; after he had aſſembled (beſides the gallies which he had led from Iſchia, and the foure that ſerued his fathers firſt departure from Naples) the other veſſels that brought the Spaniards into Sicile, with all others that he could recouer of the cities and Barons of Sicile, he hoyſſed ſaile out of the port of Meſſina, not tarrying, for that he had not men of warre ſufficient to arme them: wherein wanting forces conuenient for ſuch an enterpriſe, he was conſtrained to furniſh and ſerue his turne, no leſſe with demonſtration and apparence, then with the effect and ſubſtance of things. He departed then from Sicile with threeſcore veſſels of cable and anker, and twenty others of leſſe propoetion, accompanied with Ritaienſe of Catelognia, Captaine of the Spaniſh veſſels, a man whoſe expetience was equall to his reſolution in ſeruices at ſea; but with ſo ſmall proportions of fighting men, that in moſt part of theſe veſſels, there were almoſt no other ſorts of men, then ſuch as neceſſarily were appointed to the ſeruice of the nauigation. In this ſort his forces were ſmall, but great towards him were the fauors and goodwils of the people: in ſo much that being arriued in the road of Salerne, Salérne it ſelfe, the coaſt of Melfe, and of Cauo, hoiſſed their ſtreamers to the wind. Afterwards he remained two daies aboue Naples, in expectation to heare of ſome tumult in the towne: but it was in vaine, for that the French mē running preſently to armes, & planting ſure gard vpō places of perill, ſuppreſſed immediatly the rebellion that euen already was kindled: yea, they had put remedy to all their dangers, if they had valiantly followed the counſell of ſome amongſt them, who geſſing that the veſſels of the Aragons were ill manned with ſouldiers able to fight, aduiſed Monſieur Montpenſier to refurniſh the French veſſels which were in the hauen, with bodies reſolute and men of action, and ſo giue the charge to the enemy. But the third day Ferdinand deſpairing of commotion in the City, turned his ſailes into the ſeaward to retire to Iſchia: by which it happned, that the conſpirators with Ferdinand, conſidering that their faction and intelligence was now diſcouered, and therefore his cauſe was become theirs, aſſembling themſelues they determined to make of their common neceſſity a ſpeciall vertue: following this deliberation, they diſpatched ſecretly a little boate to call home Ferdinand, beſeeching him to put on land either all or the greateſt part of his companies, to the end to giue the more meanes & courage to ſuch as were inclined to make inſurrection in his fauour. Vpon this intelligence, Ferdinand returned eftſoones aboue Naples, & the day after the battel of Furnoue, he approched neare the ſhoare to take land at Magdalena a mile from Naples, and where the riuer or rather ſmall brooke of Sebeta falls into the ſea, which had lyen vnknowne if the verſes of the Poets of Naples had not giuen it a name. Monſieur Montpenſier to whom all things were diſcloſed, ſhewed himſelfe no leſſe hardy and ready to charge them when was cauſe to feare them, then he was vnreſolute and fearefull the day before when courage was neceſſary; in ſo much that he iſſued out of the Citie almoſt with all his ſtrength to ſtop the deſcending of Ferdinand: which was the cauſe that the Neapolitans hauing ſo faire an oportunity, (which was ſuch as they could not haue deſired better) roſe ſuddainly into armes: and ſounding the alarme by ringing the great bell of the Friers next to the walls of the towne, all the other Churches doing the like, they ſeized vpon the gates of the Towne, and began to publiſh the name of Ferdinand. This ſuddaine tumult ſo amazed the French men, that holding it a place of no ſurety to remaine betweene the enemies and the Citie rebelled, and leſſe expectation to returne by that way they iſſued out, they determined to reenter Naples by the gate that belonged to the new Caſtell: for the accompliſhment whereof they muſt take a long way, full of hils and very troubleſome, compaſſing the walls of the towne. But in this meane while Ferdinand being entred, and mounted on horſebacke with certaine of his followers by the Neapolitans, rode throughout the towne, to the incredible ioy and gladneſſe of euery one, the Communaltie receiuing him with great cries and ſhowtes, and the Ladies and women beholding him out of windowes and caſements, could not be ſatisfied to couer him with flowers and ſweete waters: yea many of the Nobleſt ran into the ſtreets to embrace him & wipe the ſweate from his face, not being negligent for all this in things neceſſary for the defence of the Citie. For, the Marquis of Peſcaire accompanied with the ſouldiers which were entred with Ferdinand and the youth of Naples, looked to the intrenching and fortifying of all places for their defence againſt the French: who after they were come vpon the greene of the new Caſtell, did what they could to reenter into the heart of the Citie, but being repulſed by croſ-

bow men and ſmall ſhot, and finding at all the entries and comings into the ſtreets, a ſufficient defence, and the night now drawing on, they retired to the Caſtell, leauing almoſt (of all ſorts) two thouſand horſes vpon the greene, hauing no place nor feeding for them in the Caſtell wherein they incloſed themſelues, with Monſieur Montpenſier, Meſſire Yues d'Alegre, a Captaine of reputation, and Anthonie Prince of Salerne, with many others French and Italians of marke: who albeit they ſpent certaine dayes in skirmiſhing, aſwell on the Caſtell greene as about the port, diſcharging their artillerie into the towne, yet finding in their repulſes a redoubled valour in the enemie, they remained void of hope to be able to recouer the Citie of themſelues. The example of Naples was immediatly followed by Capua, Auerſa, the rocke of Mondragon, and many other peeces thereabouts, yea moſt part of the kingdome was ſuddainely in reuolt: but among others thoſe of Caietta, hauing taken armes with more courage then force, for that certaine gallies of Ferdinand were diſcouered afore the hauen, were with great ſlaughter ouercome by the French garriſons there, who in their furie ſacked all the Citie.

At the ſame time the nauie of the Venetians being come neare to Monopoly one of the Cities of Pouylla, after they had ſet on land their Eſtradiots and many of their footmen, aſſaulted it both by ſea and land, where Peter Bembo owner of one of the Venetian gallies was ſlaine with a ſhot out of the towne. But in the end fortune yeelding to vertue, the Citie was taken by force, and the Caſtell likewiſe rendred, for feare which the French Captaine had that kept it: and the ſaid nauy tooke alſo by compoſition the towne of Poliegnane. But Ferdinand was not without apparent hopes to haue the new Caſtell and the Caſtell of the Egge, for that famine (which is an enemie troubleſome) ſerued more for him then his force or policie, there remaining a very ſmall quantitie of victuals in regard of the proportion of men that were within: and winning vpon them continually the places about the Caſtell, to the end to keepe them in a ſtraiter compaſſe: therefore the French men ſeeing their armie by ſea had no ſuretie in the hauen, which contained fiue ſhips, foure light gallies, a galliot, and a gallion, they retired them betweene the tower of S. Vincent, the Egge Caſtell, and Pizzifalcone, which yet they held, as alſo the hinder parts or skirts of new Caſtell where were the gardens of the Kings: in ſo much as keeping peeces euen to Capella, and fortifying the Monaſterie of the Croſſe, they made incurſions euen to Piegrotte and S. Martin. Againſt whom Ferdinand hauing taken and fortified Hippodrome, and made couert waies by Incoronato, he poſſeſſed the Mount of S. Herme, and afterwards the hill of Pizzifalcone, the French holding the Caſtell ſeated in the higheſt part of it. To hinder the ſuccours that were to come from it, (for in taking it they might endomage and batter from the ſteepe places the nauy of the enemy) Ferdinand aſſailed the Monaſterie of the Croſſe: at whoſe firſt approch they receiued ſuch harmes by the artillery, that deſpairing to win it by force, they deuiſed to betray it by practiſe and intelligence; a deuice very vnhappy and wretched to him that was the author: for that a More which was within, hauing fraudulently promiſed to the Marquis of Peſcaire (aforetimes his maſter) to put him within the place, and in that action, hauing made him come by night by a ladder faſtened to the wall of the Monaſtery to ſpeake with him, to the end to agree vpon the manner and time to enter it the ſame night; he was by great treaſon and double intelligence ſlaine with the ſhot of a crosbow running through his throate. Marquis of Peſcaire ſlaine.

And the reuolt firſt of Proſper and then of Fabrice Colonne was of no little importance for the affaires of Ferdinand, who euen during the bond of their ſeruice and oath contracted with the French King, returned to the pay of Ferdinand almoſt aſſoone as he had recouered Naples excuſing themſelues, that they were not ſatisfied in due time of the payments promiſed; and that Virginio Vrſin and the Count Petillane (with ſmall regard to their merites) had bene much cheriſhed by the King: which reaſon ſeemed to many very weake, and farre inferiour to the greatneſſe of the benefites which they had receiued of him. But who knowes whether that which in reaſon ought to ſerue as a bridle to reſtraine them, was not the very motion that led them to do the contrary? For by how much the benefits they had receiued were great and many, by ſo much perhaps was great in them the deſire to keepe them, perceiuing withall the ill diſpoſition of the affaires of the French, which began euen then to ſhake and decline. The Colouni returne to the pay of Ferdinand.

But now the Caſtell thus hemmed in, and the ſea reſtrained by the nauie of Ferdinand, the want of victuals increaſed more and more, and they that were beſieged entertained themſelues onely with hopes to haue ſuccours out of France by ſea, the rather for that the King (aſſoone as he was arriued at Aſt) had diſpatched Peron de la Baſche to rigge in the hauen of Ville Franche

neare Nice, an armie at ſea of two thouſand Gaſcoynes and Swiſſers with prouiſion of victuals, whoſe leader and Captaine ſhould be Monſieur d'Arban, a man warlike, but not experimented in ſea ſeruice. This nauie being put vnder ſaile, and arriued as farre as the Iſle of Pozeza, diſcouering thereabout the nauie of Ferdinand containing thirtie ſailes and two great ſhips of Genes, retired and fell forthwith into flight: and being purſued vnto the Iſle of Elba, they made way in ſuch feare to the hauen of Lyuorne, with the loſſe of a little ſhip of Biſcay, that it was not in the power of the Captaine to withhold moſt of his men from going on ſhoare, and againſt his will they went to Piſa. By reaſon of the retraict of this army by ſea, M. Montpenſier with his companies, preſſed with want of victuals, accorded to render the Caſtell to Ferdinand, hauing now endured the ſiege three moneths, and from thence to go to Prouence, if they were not reſcued within thirtie dayes. This contract included ſuretie of life and goods to all ſuch as were within the Caſtell, giuing in hoſtage to Ferdinand, Iues d'Alegre with three others for aſſurance of the conditions. But the ſhortneſſe of time made impoſſible all hopes or expectation of ſuccours, other then ſuch as they had within the realme. In which reſpect M. de Perſie one of the Captaines of the King, accompanied with the Swiſſers and part of the French lances, and the Prince of Byſignian with many other Barons, drew ſtraight to Naples: againſt whom Ferdinand, hauing aduertiſement of their coming, ſent out to Eboly the Count of Matalona with an armie for the moſt part confuſed, compounded of bodies whom he truſted and eſteemed his friends. This armie albeit much ſuperiour in numbers and furniture, yet encountring the enemy at the lake of Pinzola, which is a little borough neare Eboly, they fell into generall diſorder and preſent flying without fighting. In which chaſe was taken priſoner Venantio ſonne of Iulius Varano Lord of Camerin: but being not purſued by the French, they retired without great loſſe to Nola, and ſo to Naples. The victors followed their enterpriſe to ſuccour the Caſtels, and that with ſo great reputation for the victory obtained, that Ferdinand was at the point once againe to abandon Naples: but in the end being incouraged by them of the towne, who were no leſſe puſhed forward with the feare they had of their liues, (remembring their rebellion) then with the friendſhip they bare to Ferdinand, he incamped at Capella: and the better to let the enemies for approching the Caſtell, caſting a trench from the Mount S. Hermo vntill the Egge Caſtell, he furniſhed with artillerie and footmen all the hils vnto Capella and aboue Capella: In ſo much that albeit the French men, who being come to Nocere by the way of Salerna, paſſing by the caue and the hill Piegrotte, were guided to Chiaia neare to Naples: yet all things hauing good defence, and by the valour of Ferdinand, the artilleries thundring vpon the French men, but ſpecially thoſe that were planted vpon the hill of Pizifolcone which commanded the Egge Caſtell, (and in thoſe places where earſt were the ſingularities and pompes ſo much renowmed of Lucullus,) they could paſſe no further, nor approch Capella. And hauing no meane to make further abode there, for that nature fauoureth the place with all pleaſures and commodities ſauing freſh waters, this neceſſitie conſtrained them to retire ſooner then they would, leauing behind at their diſcamping three peeces of artillery, and part of the relieſes which they had brought to reuictual the Caſtels; and ſo tooke their way towards Nola, againſt whom Ferdinand oppoſed himſelfe, leauing the Caſtell beſieged, and incamped with his companies in the plaine of Palma neare to Sarnie. But Monſieur Montpenſier by their departure ſeeing himſelfe deprived of ſuccors, leauing three hundred men within the new Caſtell (a number no leſſe proportioned for the victuals which now were ſhort, then for the ſeruice and defence) and a garriſon within the Egge Caſtell, drew away with him the reſidue (which were in all two thouſand & fiue hundred ſouldiers) & by night embarking himſelfe and his companies went to Salerna, not without the great complaints of Ferdinand, who pretended, that it was not lawfull for him (during the terme wherein he had promiſed to yeeld) to depart with ſuch a companie, vnleſſe he had rendred both the Caſtels according to the contract. This eſcape wrought many paſſions in Ferdinand, in whom was no want of inclination (according to the rigour of the contract) to reuenge the iniury and infidelity of Montpenſier, vpon the bloud and life of the Oſtages, for that the Caſtels were not redeliuered at the terme accorded, but almoſt a moneth after: at which time thoſe that remained in the new Caſtell not able any longer to reſiſt the rage of hunger, rendred the Caſtell, with condition to haue the Oſtages deliuered. And almoſt at the ſame time, and for the ſame occaſion they that were within the Egge Caſtell, agreed to yeeld the firſt day of the next Lent, if they were not reſcued before. Much about this time died at Meſſina, Alphonſo of Aragon; the glory and fortune of whom whom (by which whileſt he was but Duke of Calabria, his name was very famous) was conuerted into a great infamy and infelicitie when he came to be King of Naples. It was ſaid, that a litle before his death, he made inſtance to his ſonne to returne to Naples; where the hatreds that were generall againſt him beforetime, were now almoſt conuerted into affections and good likings: to whom it is ſuppoſed, that Ferdinand (ambition and deſire to reigne, bearing more rule in him then reuerence and reſpect to his father) anſwered no leſſe ſubtilly then in ſcorne, that he ſhould attend and expect till he had ſo aſſured the Realme, that he ſhould not eftſoones be driuen to abandon it and flie. And Ferdinand to entertaine himſelfe in the friendſhip of the King of Spaine by a more ſtrait bond, tooke to wife (with diſpenſation of the Pope) Iane his aunt, daughter to Ferdinand his grandfather, and of Iane ſiſter to the ſaid King of Spaine.

Now whileſt the ſiege was continued with diuers ſucceſſe about the Caſtles of Naples (as hath bene ſaid) the ſiege of Nouaro was brought to very ſtrait and hard termes; for the Duke of Millan had there a puiſſant army, which the Venetians had ſuccoured with ſuch a readineſſe, that in no enterpriſe within memory haue they bene knowne to make leſſe ſparing of charges: ſo that in a very ſhort time there were in this campe of the Confederates three thouſand men at armes, three thouſand light horſemen, a thouſand Almaines on horſebacke, and fiue thouſand footmen Italians; but the principall ſtrength of their army ſtood vpon ten thouſand Lance-knights (for ſo are the Almaine footmen called) entertained moſt part by the Duke of Millan, to be oppoſed againſt the Swiſſers; for that the Italian footmen could not endure their name, and much leſſe heare ſpeake of them without feare; ſo greatly were they diminiſhed in reputation and courage, ſince the French men came into Italy. Ouer them were gouernours many valiant Captaines, amongſt whom was moſt ſingular George Pietrepante of the countrey of Auſtrich, who a few yeares before being in the pay of Maximilian King of Romanes, conquered with great praiſe vpon the French King the towne of S. Omer in Picardie. And the Senate of Venice was not onely carefull to ſend to this ſiege many bands of ſouldiers, but alſo to entertaine them in a greater courage, they created Gouernour and Captaine generall ouer the army the Marquis of Mantua, honoring in him by the collation of that dignitie the vertue he ſhewed in the battell of Furnoue; and with an example worthy of eternall memory, they had not onely increaſed the payes of ſuch as ſhewed valour there, but alſo endued with penſions and ſundry recompences the ſonnes of many that died in that battell, and transferred dowrie to their daughters. The ſiege of Nouaro was continued with this mightie army, for that the counſell of the Confederates (referring all things appertaining to that action to the will of Lodowike Sforce) was, not to hazard the triall of battell with the French King, vnleſſe they were conſtrained, but rather in fortifying about Nouaro the places of importance, to let victuals for entring. For they hoped that thoſe within could not hold out long, for that they had ſmall ſtore of victuals; and had need of much, ſeeing that beſides the people of the Citie, and the paiſants which were thither retired, the Duke of Orleans had of French and Swiſſers more then ſeuen thouſand men of choiſe. In which reſpect, Galeas de S. Seuerin giuing ouer all cogitation to take the towne by force, for the multitudes of men of warre that were within, had incamped himſelfe with the Dukes army at Mugnes, a place of ſuretie vpon the high way, very conuenient to giue impediments to the prouiſions that might come to Verceil: and the Marquis of Mantua with the bands of the Venetians, taking at his arriuall by force certaine peeces thereabout, together with the Caſtle of Brione, a place of ſome importance, had alſo refurniſhed Camarian and Bolgare which are betweene Nouaro and Verceil, diſtributing the army into ſundry places about Nouaro, the better to ſtop the courſe of victuals, and fortified euery particular lodging.

The ſiege of Nouaro.

On the other ſide, the French King to haue more oportunitie to the ſuccours of Nouaro, was remoued from Aſt to Thurin: and albeit he made many iourneys euen to Chyers, to make court to a Lady remaining there, yet that vanitie brought no negligence to the common affaires, for that they ceaſſed not without intermiſſion to conſider of the prouiſions for the warres, ſoliciting continually the companies come out of France, with intention to put to the field two thouſand French lances. They were no leſſe diligent to ſolicite the deſcending of ten thouſand Swiſſers; for the leuie of whom was diſpatched the Bailiffe of Dion: and the reſolution was, that as ſoone as the army was poſſeſſed of them, to aduance all meanes poſſible to reſcue Nouaro. For without the ſtrength of the Swiſſers, there was litle abilitie in the French to accompliſh any worthy enterpriſe, ſeeing the Realme of France in thoſe times albeit mightie in horſemen, and well furniſhed niſhed with artilleries and men moſt apt and nimble to manage them, yet it was very weake in footmen of the proper region: the reaſon was, that armes and exerciſes of warre reſting onely in the Nobilitie, the ancient valour of that nation was failed in the multitudes of men of baſe condition, ignorant in martiall ſeruice, for the long time they had not managed armes; in place of which they had giuen themſelues ouer to trades, profites, and delights of peace. For, many of the ancient Kings before, fearing the fury of the popular ſort, by the example of diuers conſpiracies and rebellions hapning in the ſame kingdom, thought it neceſſary in policie to diſarme them, and draw them from the vſe and practiſe of armes. For theſe reaſons the French men, not truſting in the vertue of their owne footmen, neuer went to the warres with courage, vnleſſe their army were ſtrengthened with certaine bands of the Swiſſers; which nation (in all ages reſolute and hardy in armes) had about twentie yeares before much increaſed their reputation, for that being aſſailed by a mightie army led by Charles Duke of Bourbon (he that for his power and fierceneſſe was much redoubted, not onely in the Realme of France, but of all his neighbours) they had in leſſe then one moneth put him thriſe to flight; and at the laſt chaſe, either as he fought, or as he fled (the certaine maner being doubtfull) they tooke from him his life. So that what for their reſolute valour, and that the French had no controuerſie with them, and leſſe feare to doubt them for their intereſts particular, then they had of the Lance-knights, they entertained no other forreine ſouldiers then the Swiſſers, vſing their ſeruice in all their warres of importance: but more willingly at that time then at any other, for that they ſaw how hard a thing it was, and full of danger, to reſcue Nouaro enuironed with ſo great an army, and wherein were ſo many bands of Lance-knights gouerned by the ſame diſcipline that the Swiſſers were.

Vercell giuen to the Duke of Sauoy.

The Citie of Vercell is ſituated in the mid way betweene Thurin and Nouaro, and hauing in ancient times bene a member of the Duchie of Millan, it was giuen by Philip Maria Viſcounte (during the long warres he had with the Venetians and the Florentines) to Aymie Duke of Sauoy, to ſeparate it from then. Into this Citie were not yet entred any bands of either part, for that the Ducheſſe, mother and tutor to the yong Duke of Sauoy, who in her heart was wholly French, would not diſcouer her ſelfe to the King till he were more ſtrong, giuing in the meane while to the Duke of Millan gracious words and hopes: but as ſoone as the King was ſtrong in men, and come from Thurin a chiefe Citie of the ſame Duchie, ſhe conſented that he and his ſouldiers ſhould enter into Vercell; ſo that by the oportunitie of that place the King had greater hope to be able to ſuccour Nouaro when all his ſtrength ſhould be aſſembled. And for this cauſe the Confederates began to doubt, that to determine with more mature deliberation how they ſhould proceed in theſe difficulties, Lodowike Sforce went to the army with Beatrix his wife, who ordinarily accompanied him no leſſe in matters of importance, then in actions familiar: in the preſence of whom, and (as the bruite went) chiefly by her counſell, the Captaines after many reaſonings, concluded with one conſent, that for the more common ſuretie of them all, the bands of the Venetians ſhould be ioyned to the army of the Duke of Mugnes, leauing ſufficient guard in all the other places about Nouaro ſeruing to the ſiege: That Bolgare ſhould be abandoned, for that being within three miles of Vercell, it was neceſſary, if the French men came with ſtrength to get it, either to loſe it with infamy, or (contrary to the former reſolution) to ſuccour it with the whole army: That in Camarian, three miles from Mugnes, where the campe was, the garriſon ſhould be refurniſhed: Laſtly, that the whole campe being fortified with trenches and rampiers, and ſupplied with ſtore of artillery, the Captains ſhould dayly enter into other counſels, according to the behauiours of the enemy. They forgat not to giue order to ſpoile and cut downe all the trees euen to the walls of Nouaro, to giue incommodities to men and forage for horſes, whereof there were great quantities in Nouaro. Theſe things reſolued on, and a generall muſter made of the whole army, Lodowike returned to Millan, to make with more readineſſe ſuch prouiſions as dayly ſhould grow neceſſary for the ſeruice; and withall to fauour the temporall forces with the authoritie and armes ſpirituall, the Venetians and he wrought ſo much with the Pope, that he ſent one of his officers at the Mace to the King, commanding him within ten dayes to depart out of Italy with all his army, and within another ſhort terme to ſend all his people out of the Realme of Naples; otherwiſe that vnder the ſpirituall paines wherewith the Church is wont to threaten, he ſhould appeare before him perſonally at Rome. This remedy the ancient Popes haue vſed in times before: for according to traditions written, Adrian the firſt of that name, conſtrained with no other armes then theſe, Deſiderius King of the Lombards (going (going with a ſtrong army to trouble the Citie of Rome) to retire from Ternie (where he was arriued) to Pauia. But the reuerence and feare which for the holineſſe of their life was nouriſhed in the hearts of men, being now failed, it was a thing hard to hope, that of manners and examples ſo contrary, would come like effects. Then the French King (ſcorning at his commandement) anſwered the meſſenger, that the Pope refuſing at his returne from Naples to tary in Rome, whither he went deuoutly to kiſſe his feete, he could not but maruell, by what reaſon he could require him now to come thither: notwithſtanding he ſaid, that to obey him, he would looke to open his way; and prayed him, leſt he ſhould take thoſe paines in vaine, to attend him there till he came.

The Pope commands the French king to go out of Italy

In this time at Thurin the King contracted with the Ambaſſadours of Florence new capitulations, not without the great contradiction of ſuch as aforetimes had made reſiſtance; who now had ſo much the more occaſion to impugne it, by how much the Florentines (after they had recouered the other boroughs and ſtrong places of the hils of Piſa) their campe being afore Pont de Sac, and the ſouldiers that were within rendring it with condition to haue their liues ſaued; they did (contrary to their faith and promiſe giuen) put to the ſword almoſt all the Gaſcoine footmen which were found with the Piſans, and vſed many cruelties againſt the dead bodies. This accident hapned againſt the wils of the Florentine Commiſſioners, who with great difficultie ſaued a great part of them; but altogether by the incitation of certaine ſouldiers, who being priſoners to the French, were very rigorouſly dealt withall: yet in the Court of the King, all being taken by their aduerſaries as a ſigne manifeſt of minds malicious to the name of all the French men, many impediments were obiected to the ſolicitation and practiſe of the accord; which notwithſtanding had his paſſage and full concluſion: not that the memory of the promiſes and oaths ſolemnly made had more power then all other reſpects, but the vrgent neceſſitie and want of mony and other commodities to ſuccour the affaires of the kingdome of Naples. This then was the accord: That without any delay, all the Townes and Caſtles which were in the Kings poſſeſſion, ſhould be reſtored to the Florentines, vpon condition that the State of Florence ſhould be bound to deliuer within two yeares next coming (at the pleaſure of his Maieſtie, and receiuing of him ſufficient recompence) Pietraſanta and Serezana to the Genoways, in caſe their Eſtate ſhould fall to the iuriſdiction and obedience of the King: That vnder this hope the Florentines ſhould make preſent paiment of the thirtie thouſand duckats remaining of the capitulation made at Florence, receiuing a pawne of iewels for their ſuretie and reſtitution, if for any occaſion their places were not rendred: That after the redeliuery of their places, they ſhould lend to the King vpon bonds of the Generals of the Realme of Frante (ſo are called the foure officers royall, which receiue the reuenues of the Crowne) threeſcore and ten thouſand duckats; and to ſend part of them in his Maieſties name to the bands which were in the Realme of Naples, and another part to be miniſtred to the Colonnoys, in caſe they were not reconciled to Ferdinand; whereof his Maieſtie (albeit he had ſome apparance of the accord of Proſper) was not yet fully informed: That if they had no warres in Tuskane, they ſhould ſend to Naples to the aide of the French army there, two hundred and fiftie men at armes: And in caſe they had warres in Tuskane (but no other then thoſe of Montpulcian) they ſhould be bound to ſend them thither to accompany the bands of Vitelli which were in the countrey of Piſa; and yet ſhould not be bound to entertaine them in that ſeruice any longer then all the moneth of October: That they ſhould pardon the Piſans for all their offences committed, giuing them a forme certaine for the reſtitution of their goods which had bene taken from them, together with conuenient and liberall meanes to exerciſe their traffickes and merchandizes: That for the ſuretie and obſeruation of theſe things, they ſhould deliuer as hoſtages at the election of the King, ſix of the principall citizens of Florence, and they to remaine a certaine time in his Court. This accord concluded, and the thirtie thouſand duckats (which were immediatly ſent to make a leauy of Swiſſers) giuen vnder gage of the Kings iewels, the commiſſions and commandements of the King were immediatly diſpatched to the Captaines of the fortreſſes, to make preſent redeliuery to the Florentines without any difficultie.

The Gaſcoines put to the ſword by the Florentines.

Capitulations betweene the French king and the Florentines.

The French kings iewels are pawned.

But within Nouaro, albeit the vertue of the ſouldiers was great, and moſt great (for the memory of the rebellion) the obſtinacie of the townesmen to defend the towne, yet things diuolued dayly to more hard and difficult termes; the ſtore of victuals ſo faſt diminiſhing, that they began euen now to be pinched with the want of neceſſaries: and although the Duke of Orleans, when he ſaw himſelfe in ſuch a ſtrait, had rid out of the towne all vnprofitable mouthes; yet ſo it was, that that remedy was not ſufficient, for that many ſouldiers of the French and Swiſſers not able to beare theſe diſcommodities, began to languiſh in diſeaſes and ſickneſſe: by reaſon whereof, the Duke being alſo troubled with a quartane feauer, made many ſolicitations to the King by meſſengers and letters, not to deferre their ſuccours; which could not be aduanced with ſuch readineſſe as might be able to miniſter to their generall neceſſities, for that there was not aſſembled ſuch ſufficient ſtrength as was needfull. And yet the French army made many attempts to reuictuall the towne by night, vſing to that purpoſe the ſeruice both of horſemen and footmen: but being alwayes diſcouered by the enemy, they were conſtrained to retire; and ſometimes with great damage to their Leaders. But to ſtop altogether the paſſage of victuals into the towne, the Marquis of Mantua aſſailed the Monaſtery of S. Francis, ſtanding neare the wals of Nouare; and hauing taken it, he manned it with a garriſon of two hundred men at armes, and three thouſand footmen of the Almaines: by which meanes the army Confederate was diſcharged of a great care, the way being now made ſure, by the which reliefe was brought into the towne; and the way of the gate that leades to the mount Biandrane was ſtopped, which was of moſt facilitie to enter Nouare. Alſo the day after he tooke the Baſtillion, made by the French vpon the point of the ſuburbes of S. Nazare; and the night following were ſurpriſed the whole ſuburbes, together with the other platformes neare to the gate, wherein he beſtowed a guard, and fortified the ſuburbes; the Count Petillane (whom the Venetians had taken into their pay, with the title of Gouernour) being hurt there with a ſmall ſhot neare the girdle place, and in great danger of death. For the ſucceſſe of theſe places, the Duke of Orleans diſtruſting to be able to defend any more the other ſuburbes which he had fortified at his entry into Nouare, he ſet fire on them the night following, and drew all his ſtrength to the defence and guard of the Citie onely: and ſuſtaining himſelfe in the extremitie of famine with the hope of ſuccors, the rather for that the Swiſſers beginning now to arriue at the campe, the Kings army paſſing the riuer of Steſia, was marched a mile from Verceil to lodge in the field; and hauing beſtowed a guard in Bolgare, expected the reſidue of the Swiſſer; who being once aſſembled, the army was reſolued to miniſter ſuccours to Nouare: an action notwithſtanding full of many difficulties, for that the Italian bands were lodged in the places of aduantage, well furniſhed and fortified; and the way from Verceil to Nouare, full of lakes and waters, and very vneaſie to paſſe, by reaſon of the broad and deepe ditches, whereof the country is full: beſides, betweene Bolgare holden by the French, and the campes of the Italians, was Camarian, which the Italians guarded. In reſpect of theſe difficulties, there appeared not in the mind of the King nor of others, any great forwardneſſe; and yet notwithſtanding if the whole number of Swiſſers had ſooner arriued, they had aduentured the fortune of battell, the euent whereof could not but be doubtfull to either of the armies: and therefore, they both hauing regard to the danger preſent, there wanted no ſecret trauell to ſolicite an accord betweene the King and the Duke of Millan, albeit it was with ſmall hope, for the great diſtruſt that was betweene thoſe two Princes, and for that both the one and the other (for their greater reputation) made ſhewes that they had no deuotion to peace. But fortune layed open another meanes more expedient for ſo great a concluſion: for about the ſame time, the Lady Marqueſſe of Montferrat being dead, and being in debate who ought to take the gouernment of a litle ſonne whom ſhe had left, to which Regentſhip aſpired with one deſire the Marquis of Saluce, and Conſtantine brother to the ſaid Lady deceaſſed, one of the ancient Lords of Macedonia, which Mahomet Ottoman had occupied many yeares before. The French King fauouring much the tranquillitie of that eſtate, ſent Argenton to Caſal Cernas, to ordaine and eſtabliſh a Protectorſhip according to the conſent of the ſubiects; and being gone thither alſo as a mourner for the death of the Lady one of the principall officers of the Marquis of Mantua, they two meeting vpon the way, fell into diſcourſe of a peace, and of the great good that would redound to both parties: and the matter went ſo farre, that Monſieur Argenton by the perſwaſion of this officer, tooke occaſion to write to the Venetian Commiſſioners, repeating the reaſons and matters which had bene begun to be debated euer ſince they were at Tare: and they fauouring the motion with very forward affections, communicated immediatly with the Captaines of the Duke of Millan, and ſo with one agreement ſent to require the French King (now come to Verceil) that he would aſſigne ſome of his Councell to meet in ſome conuenient place to commune with ſuch as they ſhould appoint in deputation for their part. Wherunto the King

consenting, there assembled the day following betweene Bolgaro and Camarian for the Venetians the Marquis of Mantua, and Bernard Contarin gouernour of their Estradiots; for the Duke of Millan was sent Francis Bernardin Viscounte; and for the French King the Cardinall of S. Malo, the Prince of Orange (to whom being newly come to the campe, the King had giuen the principall charge ouer the whole army) the Marshall of Gié, Monsieur de Piennes, and Monsieur d'Argenton: who making many meetings, and withall some of them making iourneys from the one army to the other, the differences and chiefe controuersies fell at last vpon the citie of Nouaro: for that the French King making no difficultie in the effect of the restitution, but in the manner, the lesse to offend his honour, laboured that it might be referred (in the name of the King of Romanes direct Lord of the Duchie of Millan) into the hands of one of the Alpine Captaines which was in the campe of the Italians: and on the contrary, the Confederates requited that it might be left freely. These and other doubts hapning, not being able to be resolued with that speed which they that were within Nouaro required, being now fallen vpon such extremities, that what by famine and other diseases rising by it, there were dead of the Dukes company aboue two thousand bodies: a truce was made for eight dayes, with sufferance to the said Duke and the Marquis of Saluce, to go with a small company to Verceil, but vnder promise and faith to returne to Nouaro with the same company if the peace proceeded not: and for the suretie of the Dukes person (for that he was to passe through the campe of the enemy) the Marquis of Mantua went to a tower neare to Bolgare, in the keeping of the Count de Foix. But the souldiers that remained in Nouaro, would not haue suffered him to depart, if he had not giuen them his faith, that within three dayes he would returne, or else by his meanes they should haue libertie to go out; and if the Marshall of Gié being there for his conduct, also had not left one of his nephews for hostage: for that not onely the victuals were consumed, which ordinarily serued for the sustenance of man, but also the vncleane and filthy scraps, from which they could not abstaine in so great an extremitie. Immediatly after the Duke was come to the Kings presence, the truce was eftsoones proroged for a few dayes, with condition that all his companies should go out of Nouaro: That the towne should be left in the power of the people, and they to make an oath not to giue it to either partie without common consent: And that thirtie footmen, who should be victualled dayly by the campe of the Italians, should remaine in the Castle for the Duke of Orleans. Thus all the souldiers issued out of Nouaro, whom the Marquis of Mantua and Galeas de S. Seuerin protected and conducted till they were in place of suretie. But so much were they weakened and consumed with hunger, that they were no sooner arriued at Verceil, then many of them died, and the residue remained altogether vnprofitable for the seruice of that warre.

The Prince of Orange Generall of the French armie.

About this time the Bailiffe of Dion arriued at the campe with the residue of the Swissers; of whom albeit his commission was to leauie but ten thousand, yet he could not chuse; but at the report of the Kings money, there descended by troupes a farre greater number, rising in the whole to an armie of twentie thousand: the one halfe was admitted to ioyne to the campe neare Verceil, and the residue remained ten miles off, because in policie it was not thought sure that so great a proportion of men of one nation should be at one time in one campe: and if their coming had bene somewhat sooner, the practises of peace had bene easily broken, seeing without them there were in the campe eight thousand French footmen, two thousand of those Swissers which had bene at Naples, and eighteene hundred lances.

But things being now so farre aduanced, and Nouaro already abandoned, the enterviewes did not discontinue, although the Duke of Orleans vsed all his endeuor to the contrary, hauing many of the greatest of the Court of his opinion: therefore the Deputies were euery day at the campe of the Italians to solicite with the Duke of Millan, who was newly returned thither, to the end to debate himselfe in a matter of so great consequence, doing all things (notwithstanding) in the presence of the Confederate Ambassadors. At length the Deputies returned to the King, bringing the last conclusion of all things that they could for the accord. First, that betweene the French King and the Duke of Millan, there should be a peace and friendship perpetuall (the Duke nothing derogating notwithstanding from his other confederations:) That the King should consent that the towne of Nouaro should be rendered to the Duke by the people, together with the Castle left to his Maiestie by the guard of thirtie footmen: That the towne of Spetia and all other places occupied by either part, should be rendred: That it should be lawfull to the King to arme at Genes (his free-hold and chiefe) ſo many veſſels as he would, ſeruing his turne of all the commodities of that Citie, ſo that it were not in fauour of the enemies to the ſtate of the ſame: That for aſſurance of this article, the Genoways ſhould giue him certain hoſtages: That the Duke of Millan ſhould cauſe to be rendred to the King, the veſſels loſt at Rapalle, and the twelue galleys reſtrained at Genes; and to arme for him preſently at his proper charges two groſſe carricks of Genes, which with foure others of his owne he determined to ſend to the ſuccours of Naples: That the Duke ſhould alſo deliuer to the King the yeare after, three others in the ſame maner: That the Duke ſhould giue free and friendly paſſage to the companies that the King ſhould ſend by land to the ſame ſuccours, vnder this couenant, that there ſhould not paſſe by his eſtate more then two hundred lances at a time: That if the King returned in perſon to the ſame enterpriſe, the Duke ſhould follow him with certaine bands of men: That the Venetians ſhould haue power to enter this contract within two moneths; and if they did enter, then to retire their army by ſea from the kingdome of Naples, and to be bound to giue no ſuccours to Ferdinand; but if they did not obſerue this, and the King ſhould raiſe warre againſt them, the Duke ſhould be bound to aide him, reaping to his vſe all that ſhould be conquered of the Venetian eſtates: That the Duke ſhould pay fiftie thouſand duckats in the moneth of March next to the Duke of Orleans for the charges of the warre of Nouare; and acquit the King of foureſcore thouſand duckats parcell of the money he had lent his Maieſtie when he marched firſt into Italie; the reſidue to be rendred by his Maieſtie at a longer terme: That Iohn Iaques Trinulce ſhould be releaſed of the baniſhment wherein he had bene condemned by the Duke, and enioy reſtitution of all his goods: That the baſtard of Bourbon taken in the iourney of Furnoue, and the Lord of Miolans taken at Rapalle, together with all the other priſoners, ſhould be redeliuered: That the Duke ſhould withdraw from Piſa, Fracaſſe, whom he had ſent thither a little before, together with all his bands, and thoſe of the Genoways: That he ſhould giue no impediment to the Florentines to recouer that which appertained to their iuriſdiction: That within one moneth he ſhould put the litle Caſtle of Genes into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara, who called to that end by both the parties, was now come to the campe of the Italians; and that the ſaid Duke of Ferrara ſhould keepe it two yeares at their common charges; and be bound by oath to redeliuer it (euen within the ſaid time) to the hands of the French King, in caſe the Duke of Millan ſhould not hold his promiſes; who immediatly vpon the concluſion of the peace, ſhould giue hoſtages to the King for aſſurance to aſſigne the litle Caſtle at the time agreed vpon. Theſe conditions brought to the King by his Deputies that had debated them, were propounded in his Councell; wherein being found no leſſe variation of minds, then contrarietie of reaſons, euery one diſputing particularly, Monſieur Trimouille reaſoned in this ſort: If in the preſent Councell we had not to debate but of meanes to increaſe the glorie of the Crowne of France by actions of valour and vertue, I ſhould not perhaps be ſo forward to encourage your Maieſties perſon to new dangers, although your owne example giues you counſell to the contrary, ſeeing that (being carried with no other affection then a deſire and ambition of glory) you determined the yeare paſt, againſt the counſels and humble petitions almoſt of the whole body of your Realme, to deſcend into Italy to conquer the kingdom of Naples; where your enterpriſe hauing a ſucceſſe ſo happie, and with ſuch increaſe of your name & honor, it is a thing manifeſt, that now we haue not onely to deliberate, whether the occaſion to winne new honors and glorie is to be reiected, but alſo whether we ſhould reiect and loſe againe that reputation which you haue got with ſo great charges and dangers; and conuert the honour already wonne, into perpetuall ignominie; and whether you ought to be the perſonage that ſhould reprehend and condemne the counſels eſtabliſhed by your ſelfe. For your Maieſtie might without any loſſe to your reputation haue remained in France; and that which the world will now account diſhonorable feares and cowardize, could not as then be referred to any other thing then to negligence, or to an age occupied in pleaſures. Your Maieſtie as ſoone as you had bene arriued in Aſt, might eſtſoones haue returned into France, with the ſame ſpeed, and leſſe ſhame, making as though the matters of Nouaro concerned you nothing at all. But now by the preſence of your armie ſo long incamping here, you haue publiſhed your intention, and that you were touched with deſire to deliuer the towne from ſiege: for which regard alſo hauing aſſembled out of France ſo great a proportion of Nobilitie and a leauie of Swiſſers, at a charge intollerable; who will doubt, that if you depart and not deliuer that towne, but your glorie (with the reputation of your whole Realme) will

will turne into a reproch and infamie perpetuall? But (if in the great hearts of great Kings, there may be motions more violent then the desire of renowne and glory) there be yet reasons more mightie, or at least more iust and necessary; seeing our retrait into France, consenting to the losse of Nouàro, neither is, nor will be thought any other thing then the losse of the whole kingdome of Naples, and the vnworthy slaughter of so many Captaines and Nobles of France, left there for the defence of the same, vpon your hopes, ioyned with your faith and promises to send them speedie succours: wherein, how miserable will be their expectations, but more wretched and desperate their estates and conditions, when they shall vnderstand that your Maiestie incamping vpon the frontiers of Italy, with an armie so populous and forces so resolute, shall yet retire and giue place to the enemy. The successe of warres (as euery one knowes) depends for the most part of fame and renowne, which when it declines, declineth withall the vertue of the souldiers, the faith of the people diminisheth, and the reuenues appointed to sustaine and maintaine the warres, fall to wants & diminutions; and on the contrary, the enemy increaseth in courage, such as wauder in feares and doubts, come to be resolute and well assured, and all difficulties are infinitely increased. So that, for so wretched and miserable a newes, the vigour and courage of our armie falling into faintnesse and feeble doubts, and the valour and reputation of our enemies more and more increasing, who doubts not to see with this alteration & change, the reuolt and rebellion of all the kingdom of Naples, together with the desolation of our whole army; and so that honorable enterprise begun and prosecuted with so great felicitie, to bring forth in the end no other fruite then dommage and dishonour inestimable? For he that is perswaded that this peace is made with good faith and meaning, lookes with slender iudgement into the condition of things present, and much lesse knoweth the natures of those with whom we deale: seeing it is a thing of easie comprehension, that we shall no sooner haue turned our backes to the region of Italy, then all these promises and contracts will vanish and turne into smoke; yea in place to minister those aides they haue promised, they will send succours to Ferdinand: and those very bands which will brag that they haue caused vs cowardly to flie out of Italy, will march to Naples to make themselues rich with the spoiles of our countrimen: which infamie, me thinkes, might be the easier borne, if by any probable reason we might doubt of the victorie. But it is a doubt vaine, and by no sense can settle in the minds of any, who making consideration of the greatnesse of our army, and the oportunities of the countrey adioyning, will remember how ouerwearied and trauelled with a long march, disfurnished of victuals, our numbers small, and in the midst of the countrey of the enemy, we fought against a most huge armie at the riuer of Taro, making the riuer by our valour swell higher with the bloud of our enemies, then with his proper streames: at what time also we opened our way with the sword, and as conquerers rode eight dayes iourney through the Duchie of Millan, enemy to our enterprises and greatnesse. We haue now twise as many horsemen, the numbers of our French footmen redoubled, and in place of three thousand Swissers, our army embraceth at this instant two and twentie thousand. And albeit the enemy is stronger then before in Almaine footmen, yet in all discourse of reason, they cannot hold comparison with ours: neither are their horsemen other then the selfe same, and their Captaines euen those, that hauing once yeelded vnder the force of our armes, and by our fury suffered so great harmes, will not eftsoones returne to the fight, but with minds fearfull and appalled. But it may be obiected, that the profits of the victory are so small, that they ought not to stand in regard with vs. Nay, on the contrary, they are such, as we should seeke to obtaine with what danger soeuer: for that they include not onely the preseruation of so great a glory gotten, the succours of so rich a kingdome as Naples, the safetie of so many of your Captaines, and the honorable deliuery of such a proportion of your Nobilitie; but also they make a secret offer to inuest you in the whole Empire of Italy; which if we remaine here with the vpper hand, will be the recompence of our victory. For what other bands, or what other armies remaine to the enemies, in whose campe are assembled all the forces, and all the Captaines which they could leuie? One trench which we shall winne, one rampier which we shall force, will put into our bosomes (things honorable and great) not onely the Empire and treasures of all Italy, but also the meanes to be reuenged of all our common wrongs. If these two spurres or motions, alwayes accustomed to pricke forward base and cowardly minds, stirre not with another quickenesse our warlicke and resolute nation, we may iustly say, that our valour hath rather failed vs then our fortune, by whom is prepared the occasion

" to winne in ſo litle a place, and in ſo few houres, ſo great and worthy recompences, that greater or more worthy could not be wiſhed. The Prince of Orange hauing a contrary affection, ſpake againſt this opinion, in this ſort:

" If your affaires (right Chriſtian King) were not ſo much preſſed with time, but that they would giue you leiſure to accompanie your forces with induſtrie and diſcretion; or if they ſtood not vpon ſuch termes, as you are conſtrained (if you will continue the warre) to proceed with impetuoſities contrary to all the precepts and directions of warre, I could alſo be one of thoſe who would giue counſell to reiect the peace: for that by many reaſons we are incouraged not to accept it, as alſo it cannot be denied, but that it would be a thing honorable to continue the warre, and no leſſe conuenient for the affaires of Naples. But the termes whereinto are brought the towne and Caſtle of Nouaro, not prouided of victuals for one day, compell vs (if we will ſuccour it) to ſet ſpeedily vpon our enemies: and if (ſuffering it to be loſt) we meane to tranſport the warre into another part of the ſtate of Millan, the ſeaſon of the Winter now at hand, very vnfit to make warre in places ſo low and full of waters, the qualitie of our army, which for the nature and great multitudes of Swiſſers not being ſpeedily employed, may be more preiudiciall to vs then to our enemies; and laſtly, our generall want of money making our abode here impoſſible for any long time, inforce vs (not accepting the accord) to ſeeke the meanes to put ſuddenly an end to the warre: a thing which cannot be done otherwiſe, then directly to go and charge the enemies; which as well for their conditions, as the diſaduantages of the country, is ſo dangerous, as to proceed in this ſort, can hold of nothing elſe but raſhneſſe and indiſcretion: for that their campe is ſo ſtrong both by nature and art, they hauing had ſo much time to rampier and fortifie it; the places round about where their garriſons are, ſo conuenient for their defence, and ſo well manned: the countrey, for the quantitie of ditches and impediment of waters, ſo vnapt to the ſeruice of horſmen; that to go ſeeke them directly, and not to accoaſt them ſtep by ſtep, obſeruing the commodities and aduantages, and (as the ſaying is) to winne vpon them by litle and litle, is no other thing then to tempt fortune, and aduenture vpon perils moſt certaine and deſperate. For with what diſcourſe, with what reaſon of warre, or with what example of notable Captaines, may we with ſuch raſhneſſe and importunitie inuade ſo great an army, and that in trenches ſo ſtrong and well furniſhed with artillerie? No, it is better (if you will proceed otherwiſe then at aduenture) to ſeeke to draw them from their trenches by winning ſome place which they command, or at leaſt in reſtraining their victuals: wherein I can ſee no other thing to aſſure our hopes, then by proceeding deliberately, and with the length of time, which we haue no meanes to attend. Beſides, our horſemen containe neither ſuch number, nor that valour, which haply many do weene, for that (as all men know) many are ſicke, many are returned into France with leaue, and without leaue; and many of thoſe that remaine, ouertrauelled with this long warre, haue more deſire to go home then to fight. And the great number of Swiſſers, who are the principall force of our armie, may haply be more hurtfull, then would be vnprofitable a leſſer proportion: for ſuch hath bene alwayes the experience of the cuſtomes and nature of that nation, that to manage them being ſo ſtrong and many together, cannot almoſt be without certaintie of ſome dangerous tumult, ſpecially things proceeding (as is neceſſarie) with length of time: during which time, by reaſon of their paiments, wherein they are inſatiable, and other accidents which follow of courſe, may happen a thouſand occaſions to turne and change them; and ſo we ſhould remaine vncertaine whether their aide would ſerue vs as a medicine or a poiſon: and in ſuch an vncertaintie we cannot eſtabliſh any thing in our counſels, and much leſſe reſolue our minds to any enterpriſe of valour or importance. No man doubteth but the victory is more honorable and ſure for the defence of the kingdome of Naples, then the agreement to peace: but in all humane actions, and ſpecially in warres, we muſt accommodate our counſels to neceſſitie, and not for the deſire to obtaine that part which is hard and impoſſible, to put the whole in manifeſt perill; ſeeing it is the office of a valiant Captaine, as well to ſhew wiſedome in his actions as courage. The enterpriſe of Nouaro (Sir) was not your principall intention, neither doth it touch you but indirectly, for that you pretend no right to the Duchie of Millan; and much leſſe are you come to Naples to ſtay to make warre in Piemont, but to returne into France, to giue order to leuie treaſure and men, to the end with more mightie ſuccours to miniſter aide to your companies at Naples; who in the meane while, with the reſcue of your nauie departed from Nice with the companies of the Vitellies, and with the men and moneys

neys of the Florentines, wil haue ſo good meanes to defend themſelues, that they may without danger attend the great prouiſions which you are to areare at your returne into France. I am none of thoſe that will aſſure that the Duke of Millan will iuſtly obſerue theſe capitulations, yet receiuing hoſtages of him and the Genoways, and the Caſtle alſo committed according to the forme of the contract, you are not without pawne and ſuretie. It is alſo reaſonable in him to demand peace, becauſe lying neareſt the danger of your forces, his feares are no leſſe iuſt, then his perils likely. Beſides, leagues, which haue many competitors, of their proper nature haue not that ſtabilitie and concord, but vpon occaſions they come to diſagree and fall off one from another; in which caſe, euery litle hole that they ſhall make, yea euen the ſmalleſt ouerture that ſhall appeare, will make to vs the victory no leſſe eaſie then well aſſured. Seeing then your affaires ſtand in theſe degrees, my aduice is, that your Maieſtie hearken to peace; not that it is of it ſelfe profitable or commendable, but becauſe it is an office in Princes wiſe and ſtayed, in cauſes difficult and dangerous, to allow for eaſie and commendable, that that is neceſſarie, or at leaſtwiſe ſuch as are leaſt intangled with dangers and difficulties. The Duke of Orleans rebuked ſo ſharply the ſpeeches of the Prince of Orange, that either of them falling from words to reproches and iniuries, the Duke gaue him the lie, in the whole preſence of the Councell: but the inclination of moſt part of the Councell, and almoſt of the whole army, was to embrace the peace; a ſweete deſire to returne into France bearing ſo much power in them all, and no leſſe in the perſon of the King, that they were not able to diſcerne the danger of the kingdome of Naples, and much leſſe to ſee how ſlanderous it was to ſuffer to be loſt afore their eyes the Citie of Nouaro; and laſtly to depart out of Italy with conditions ſo vnequall, conſidering the vncertaintie of the obſeruation: which diſpoſition was ſo vehemently fauoured by the Prince of Orange, that many doubted leſt to gratifie the Emperour, to whom he was moſt affectioned, he had no leſſe regard to the profit of the Duke of Millan, then to the commodities of the French King; with whom truly his authoritie was great, partly for the excellencie of his wit, and partly for his valour, but moſt of all, for that it is a cuſtome and propertie with Princes, to eſteeme moſt wiſe, ſuch as are moſt conformed to their inclinations.

The lie giuen to the Prince of Orange.

At laſt the peace was made, which was no ſooner ſworne by the Duke of Millan, then the King reiecting all other thoughts then ſuch as made for his returne into France, went forthwith to Thurin: his haſte was the more importunate to depart from Verceil, for that thoſe bands of the Swiſſers that were in the campe to aſſure their payes of three whole moneths (according to the cuſtome of Lewis the eleuenth, as they alledged) began to ſpeake of ſtaying the King or the Chieftaines of his Court for the ſuretie of their pay, although they could not claime ſo much by promiſe, nor yet had ſerued him ſo long time: from which danger albeit the perſon of the King was deliuered by his ſudden departure, yet they hauing made priſoners the Bailiffe of Dion and others that leuied them, he was in the end conſtrained to aſſure all their demands, as well with promiſes as with hoſtages. From Thurin the King deſiring to make a perfect eſtabliſhment of the peace, ſent to the Duke of Millan the Marſhall of Gié, the Preſident of Gannay, and Argenton, to induce him to parley with him: wherewith the Duke ſeemed to be well pleaſed, but yet with ſome doubt of treaſon; in ſo much, that either for that ſuſpition, or obiecting perhaps ſome expreſſe difficulties, as not to giue occaſion of iealouſie to the Confederates, or for that his ambition would not ſuffer him to come in a behauiour inferiour to the French King, he propounded to haue the meeting vpon the middeſt of a riuer, where a bridge being made either with barkes or other matter, there ſhould be betweene them a ſtrong barre of wood: a maner of communing together vſed heretofore by the Kings of England and France, and other great Princes of the Weſt. This the King refuſing, as a thing vnworthy his greatneſſe, after he had receiued his hoſtages, he diſpatched Peron de la Baſche to Genes to receiue the two carricks that were promiſed him, and to rigge foure others at his owne charges for the ſuccours of the Caſtles of Naples, which he knew had not receiued the reſcues ſent from Nice; and therefore the beſieged had made compoſition to render vp the Caſtles if they were not ſuccoured within thirtie daies. The King made his plot to arme the ſaid veſſels with three thouſand Swiſſers, and to adioyne them to the ſaid nauie parted from Nice now retired to Liuorne, and to certaine other veſſels expected from Prouence. All which (without the great ſhips of the Genoways) had not bene ſufficient for thoſe ſuccours, the hauen of Naples being now filled with a huge army by ſea, for that beſides the veſſels which Ferdinand had brought, the Venetians had alſo ſent thither twentie galleys and foure ſhips. The King after he had diſpatched Monſieur Argenton to Venice, to ſolicite the Senate to enter into the peace, and participate with the accord, tooke his way into France, with all his Court, with ſuch great ſpeed and deſire to be there, that there was nothing could ſtay him any few dayes in Italy, no not till the Genoways had deliuered him their hoſtages promiſed vpon the contract at Verceil; which certainly they had accompliſhed, if he had not departed ſo ſuddenly. Thus then vpon the end of October, in the yeare 1495. the King returned on the other ſide the mounts, reſembling rather a perſonage vanquiſhed, then a Prince victor (notwithſtanding the victories he had obtained:) and left as his Lieutenant in Aſt (a Citie which it ſhould ſeeme he bought of the Duke of Orleans) Iohn Iaques Triuulce with fiue hundred French lances, who not many dayes after, of their proper authoritie followed the King; by whom was left no other ſuccours for the kingdome of Naples, then the nauies preparing at Genes and Prouence, and the aſſignation of the aides and moneys promiſed by the Florentines.

After the diſcourſe of other things, me thinkes it cannot be out of purpoſe (ſpecially it being a deſtinie fatall, that the calamities of Italy ſhould take their beginning of the paſſage of the French men, or at leaſt were imputed to them) to leaue to memory and tradition in what ſort began the diſeaſe which the French men call the euill of Naples, and the Italians name the botch, or more commonly the diſeaſe of France. It happened as an infection to the French men whileſt they were at Naples, and by them in their returne from that warre was diſperſed and ſpread through all Italy. This diſeaſe either altogether new, or at leaſt vnknowne to that age in our hemiſphere, otherwiſe then in the moſt extreme and furtheſt parts, was for certaine yeares ſo horrible, that it well deſerueth mention, as a moſt grieuous calamitie: for it appeared alwayes either in vile botches or buttons, which oftentimes proued vlcers incurable; or elſe they tormented the whole body with paine and aches in the ioynts and ſinewes: and the Phyſitions hauing no experience in maladies of that nature, and therefore ignorant in the remedies proper and naturall, applied oftentimes cures directly reſiſting and contrary, which inflamed the infection to greater rage, euen to the killing of many bodies of all ages and ſexes; and many became deformed with them, and ſubiect to almoſt torments perpetuall; yea the moſt part ſuch as ſeemed to be deliuered of them, returned eftſoones in ſhort time to the ſame miſerie. But after the courſe of many yeares (either the influence aboue being appeaſed which bred them ſo horrible and raging, or by long experience their proper remedies and cures being found out) the diſeaſe began to be leſſe malicious, changing it ſelfe into diuers kinds of maladies differing from the firſt calamitie; whereof truly the regions and people of our times might iuſtly complaine, if it hapned to them without their proper diſorder, ſeeing it is well approued by all thoſe that haue diligently ſtudied and obſerued the properties of that euill, that either neuer or very rarely it happeneth to any, otherwaies then by contagious whoredome. The French thinke it reaſonable to acquit them of the ignominie, for that it is knowne ſince, that ſuch a diſeaſe was tranſported out of Spaine to Naples, and yet not proper or naturall of that nation, but brought thither from the Iles, which (as elſewhere we ſhall more fitly declare) in thoſe ſeaſons began to be knowne to our regions by the nauigation of Chriſtopher Columbus a Genoway: in which Iles (by the fauour of Nature) are remedies ready to the cure of that ill, by drinking onely of the iuyce of a wood (moſt ſingular for many other worthy properties) which growing plentifully in thoſe places, is a remedie no leſſe eaſie then abſolute and aſſured to the inhabitants there.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE historie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

The Argvment.

Lodowike Sforce keepeth not the treatie of peace. The Venetians take the towne of Piſa into their protection. The French King determineth to returne into Italy. The Emperour and the Venetians beſiege Liuorne; defended by the Florentines, to whom the French ſend aide. The Pope makes warre vpon the Vrſins. The French King dieth at Amboyſe. Frier Ieronymo Sauonarola is hanged at Florence.

BY the diſhonorable returne of the French King ouer the Mounts, proceeding notwithſtanding more of indiſcretion and diſorders, then by puſillanimitie or weakneſſe of his armie; wiſe men grew into hopes that Italy (after ſo many ſtormes of grieuous infelicities) would now at laſt be deliuered of the inſolent power of the French; wherein by ſo much more were worthy and notable the vertues and actions of the Senate of Venice and Duke of Millan, by how much the taking armes with a wiſe and reſolute counſell, were the onely lets, that ſo goodly a part of the world fell not into the ſeruitude of ſtrangers: and if they had not bene carried with ambitious reſpects touching their particular intereſts, nor (to their proper infamie and common harmes) had ſo corrupted the vniuerſall benefite and commonweale of that region; no man might haue doubted, that Italy (their counſels and forces reſtored to their former luſtre) had not bene for a long time aſſured againſt the furie and violent inuaſion of the nations beyond the Mounts. But ambition, which would not ſuffer any of them to be contented with his limits, was the cauſe not onely to returne vpon Italy new troubles, but alſo that they could not enioy the fruite of the victorie which they had gotten ſince againſt the French in the kingdome of Naples: a victorie, which the negligence and vnwiſe counſels of the King made eaſie to them; for that the ſuccours which he had leuied at his departure out of Italy, were vtterly vaine, his prouiſions of nauigation, and the aides promiſed by the Florentines, ſeruing alſo to like effect. Lodowike Sforce conſented not to the peace with the King with a ſound faith and meaning, for that remembring the iniuries he had done him (as it is the nature of him that doth wrong) he thought it ſtood not with his ſuretie, eftſoones to commit himſelfe to the fidelitie of the King; but the deſire to recouer Nouaro, and deliuer his owne Eſtate from the incommodities of the warre, induced him to promiſe that which he had no deſire to keepe, following the Kings humor with words, and keeping his intentions diſſembled: and it may be ſuppoſed, that in the peace made with this ſemblance, did participate the conſent of the Senate of Venice, willing to disburden their Eſtate without infamie, of the exceſſiue expences in the warre of Nouaro. Neuertheleſſe Lodowike, becauſe he would not in vnaduiſed ſort breake the articles of the capitulation, but ſhadow his doings with ſome colour, performed that which he could not denie to be in his power; he deliuered the hoſtages, he ſet at libertie the priſoners, paying their ranſomes of his proper treaſures; he reſtored the veſſels taken at Rapallo; he withdrew from Piſa, Fracaſſe, whom he could not diſſemble to be in his pay: laſtly, he put the Caſtle of Genes into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara, who went thither in perſon to receiue it. But on the other ſide, he left within Piſa Luke Maluezzo with many bands of ſouldiers, as though he were in the wages and pay of the Genoways; he ſuffered that two carricks which were armed at Genes, went to Naples for the ſeruice of Ferdinand, vſing this excuſe, that for that he had entertained them afore the concluſion of peace, they of Genes would not conſent that they ſhould be denied to him: he laboured ſecretly that the Genoways ſhould not deliuer in their hoſtages to the King: and that which was of greater conſequence for the loſſe of the Caſtles of Naples, after the King had armed and manned the foure ſhips, and that he had furniſhed him of the two, for the which

which he was bound; he wrought ſo with the Genoways, that making ſemblance of feare, they gaue impediments that the kings ſouldiers ſhould not be armed, if firſt they receiued not of him ſufficient caution that he ſhould not employ them againſt themſelues, nor attempt with that force, to change the gouernment of Genes. For theſe cauillations, the King complained by men expreſſe to Lodowike; who anſwered, that he had promiſed to furniſh him with the ſhips, but had not conſented that they ſhould be manned with French ſouldiers. And ſometimes he alledged, that the iuriſdiction which he had of Genes was not abſolute, but limited and reſtrained to ſuch conditions, as he had no power of compulſion, and much leſſe was his authoritie to enforce their wils to his deſires, ſpecially in things which they pretended to be dangerous to their Eſtate, or to derogate the liberties of their Citie: wherein the better to iuſtifie his excuſes, he wrought ſo, that the Pope commanded the Genoways and him, vpon paine of the Church cenſures, that they ſhould not ſuffer to be drawne from Genes by the French King, veſſels of any ſort or nature: in ſo much as the ſuccours expected with ſo great deſire by the French which were in the kingdome of Naples, ſtood them in no ſtead; no more did the aides and moneys promiſed by the Florentines. For after the accord made at Thurin, Guid'Anthonie Veſpucci one of their Embaſſadours aſſiſtant at the concluſion, departing immediatly with all the neceſſarie diſpatches; and paſſing without ſuſpition through the Duchie of Millan, for that the commonweale of Florence was not declared enemy to either part; he was retained in Alexandria by the Dukes commiſſion; and all his papers and diſpatches taken from him, he was led forthwith to Millan, where the capitulations and promiſes of the Florentines being bewrayed, the Venetians and the Duke tooke counſell, not to ſuffer the Piſans to periſh: who as ſoone as the French King was gone out of Italy, had by new Embaſſadors recommended their affaires to Venice and Millan. Their reſolution to reſcue the Piſans, was not without the conſent of the Pope and the Embaſſadors of the other Confederates, vnder pretence to hinder the money and aides which the Florentines (reentring into Piſa and their other places) were to ſend to the Realme of Naples; and alſo for that being conioyned with the French King, and by the recouering of that Citie, made more mightie, they might in many ſorts endomage the common ſafetie of Italy. But the principall humor that fed that motiue, was their ambition and great deſire to make themſelues Lords ouer Piſa: vpon which prey, as it had bene long afore vehemently aſpired vnto by Lodowike; ſo the Venetians began now in like ſort to caſt their eyes, as thoſe who ſeeing the ancient vnitie of the other Potentates broken, and one part of them weakened which had wont to oppoſe againſt them, embraced already with thoughts and hopes the monarchie of all Italie: whereunto they eſteemed they impery of Piſa very conuenient, to begin with the commoditie of his hauen (which they thought could not be long kept by Florence not holding Piſa) to ſtretch out their limits euen to the inferiour ſea; hauing withall by the oportunitie of that Citie, an entrie of great importance into Tuſcane. But the Duke of Millan ſhewed moſt readineſſe to miniſter to their ſuccours, who entertaining at the ſame inſtant the Florentines with diuers practiſes, had obtained that Fracaſſe vnder colour of his priuate buſineſſe (for he had poſſeſſions in that countrey) ſhould go to Piſa, and the Genoways to refurniſh them with new ſupplies of footmen. The Venetians alſo forgot not to nouriſh them with promiſes and comforts of ſpeedy ſuccours, and accordingly diſpatched one of their Secretaries to Genes to make a leuie of footmen, and perſwade the Genoways not to abandon the Piſans: yet they were long in ſending their ſtrength thither, perhaps by this opinion, that ſo long as the Citadell was holden by the French King, and ſo long as he were in Italy, it was not conuenient to lay any great foundation of thoſe things.

The Venetians in mind to reſcue the Piſans

On the other ſide, the Florentines, aduertiſed of the new couenants made with the King by their Embaſſadours at Thurin, had increaſed their armie, to be the more able to conſtraine the Piſans to receiue them as ſoone as they ſaw the diſpatches of the King. And albeit, as you haue heard, they were reſtrained together with their Embaſſadours by the Duke of Millan, yet they forbare not to take the burrough of Palaye, and ſo planted their campe afore Vicopiſan: the beſieging of which place was of no effect, partly for that the Captaines (either by ill counſell, or for that they iudged their ſtrength not ſufficient to bring their campe on that ſide towards Piſa, the Piſans hauing erected a Baſtillion on a mount neare the towne) encamped on the lower ſide towards Bientina, a place of litle commoditie to hurt Vico, and keeping it, the way of Piſa and Caſina lay open to thoſe that were beſieged; partly for that Paul Vitelli hauing receiued three thousand duckats of the Pisans, went thither to defend it, entring with his companies and the bands of his brethren, vnder a fained colour to haue letters of the King; and commandement from the Generall of Languedocke, brother to the Cardinall of Saint Mallo (remaining sicke at Pietrasanta) to protect Pisa and the appurtenances, vntill other order were taken. And certainly it is a thing right wonderfull, that the Pisans were at one and the same time defended by the souldiers of the French King, and aided by the succours of the Duke of Millan, and nourished also with hopes by the State of Venice, notwithstanding that Senate and the Duke of Millan were in open warre with the French King. With the succours then of the bands of Vitelli, Pisa defended it selfe easily, and gaue no litle domage to the campe of the Florentines, the same being pitched in a place so open and discouered, that it receiued many harmes by the artilleries which the Pisans had brought into Vico; in so much as hauing remained there many dayes, the Captaines of the Florentines raised the siege, to their reproch and shame. But after this, the Kings dispatches being at last come (which written into copies, were secretly sent out by many wayes) the towne, castles, and port of Liuorne were immediatly rendred to the Florentines by Salliant Lieutenant to Monsieur Beaumont, to whom the King had giuen them in charge: when Monsieur de l'Isle Deputie Commissioner to receiue of the Florentines the ratification of the accord made at Thurin, and to see the restitution executed, began to treate with Entragues Captaine of the Citadell of Pisa, and of the Castles of Pietrasanta and Matron, to resolue with him of the day and maner to resigne them vp. But Entragues, induced either by the same inclination common with the other French men that were then in Pisa, or by some secret commissions from Monsieur de Ligni, vnder whose name, and as depending vpon him, he was preferred to that charge, or perhaps drawne by the loue which he bare to a young maiden, daughter of one of the citizens of Pisa, (for it is not credible, that onely the desire of money led him, since he might receiue a greater quantitie of the Florentines) he began to oppose many difficulties, sometimes giuing to the Kings letters patents an interpretation contrary to the true sence; and sometimes he alledged, that at the beginning he had a commandement not to render them but by secret aduertisements from Monsieur de Ligni. Vpon which impediments, after they had in vaine disputed certaine dayes, it was necessary for the Florentines to make a new instance to the King, remaining yet at Verceil, to remedy that disorder expressed with so great an offence to his Maiestie, and hurt to his speciall profite. The King became much moued with the disobedience of Entragues, and commanded Monsieur de Ligni (not without indignation) to constraine him to obey, determining to send thither a man of authoritie with new letters patents and threats from the Duke of Orleans, whose seruant he was. But the resolute obstinacie of Monsieur de Ligni, and the fauours which he had in Court, being of more power then the slender counsell of the King, the dispatch was delayed certaine dayes, and in the end sent, not by a man of authoritie, but by Monsieur Lancepugno, a simple gentleman; with whom went Camilla Vitelli, to leade his companies to the Realme of Naples, and withall to conduct thither one part of the money to be defrayed by the Florentines, to whose army as soone as the Kings letters patents were arriued, were ioyned the men of warre of both the Vitellies. But this dispatch wrought no more effect then the first, notwithstanding the Captaine had receiued two thousand duckats of the Florentines, to entertaine (vntill the Kings answer came) the bands of footmen which were in garrison within the Citadell: and though to Camilla were payd three thousand duckats, because otherwise he would haue hindred that the Kings letters should not haue bene presented. For the Captaine of the Citadell (to whom it was supposed Monsieur de Ligni had sent by another way, commissions quite contrary) after he had many dayes abused their expectation, supposing that the Florentines (for that there were within the towne besides the inhabitants, a thousand footmen forreiners) could not force the suburbes of S. Marke ioyning to the gate of Florence, neare to the Citadell, at the entrie whereof the Pisans had formerly, by his consent, made a great Bastillion: and so that he might come to the end of his intention without manifest opposition against the Kings will, he sent to the other Florentine Commissioners, to present their army afore the said gate, (which they could not do vnlesse they wonne the suburbes) that if the Pisans would not receiue them in by accord, he would force them to abandon it, the same gate being so subiect to the artillery of the Citadell, that it was not able to maintaine defence against the will of such as had it in guard. The Florentines inclining readily to this deuice, went thither with a great preparation, a courage resolute, and an inflamed disposition of all the campe, which then lodged at Saint Remy, a place neare to the ſuburbes: and with ſuch valour they aſſailed the Baſtillion on three ſides (in the forme, ſeate, and rampiers whereof, they had bene fully inſtructed by Paul Vitelli) that they brake and put to flight ſuch as ſtood in defence; and purſuing the chaſe, they enter pellmell the ſuburbes by a draw-bridge which ioyned to the Baſtillion, killing and making priſoners the moſt of them. In this fury there was no doubt, (without the aide of the Citadell) but at the ſame inſtant they might haue made perfect the conqueſt of Piſa by that gate, many of their men at armes being entred, for that the Piſans put to flight, made no reſiſtance: but the Captaine of the Citadell ſeeing things ſucceed otherwiſe then he looked for, began to diſcharge the artillery vpon the Florentines; with which accident vnlooked for, the Commiſſioners and Leaders maruelling not a litle, many of their ſouldiers ſlaine and hurt by the artillery, and Paul Vitelli wounded in one of his legs, they ſounded the retrait, holding it impoſſible to take Piſa at that time for the furious reſiſtance of the Citadell: yea within few dayes after, they were conſtrained for the harmes they receiued by the artillerie, to abandon the ſuburbes which they had brought into their power, and ſo retired with great diſcourage and no leſſe diſcontented to Caſſina, till the King had reformed ſo manifeſt a diſobedience of his ſubiects.

In this meane while alſo, the Florentines were not without their perplexities, for new and dangerous practiſes ſtirred vp principally by the Potentates of the league; who to giue the more impediments to the conqueſt of Piſa, and by ſome new neceſſities at home, to enforce them to leaue the alliance of the French King, incenſed Peter de Medicis to make triall, with the aide of Virginio Vrſin (who being fled from the French camp the day of the battell of Taro, ſoiourned at Bracciane) to returne to Florence: a matter of right eaſie perſwaſion both to the one & the other: for that to Virginio it ſorted to good purpoſe (whatſoeuer became of the enterpriſe) to reaſſemble at the charges of others, his ancient bands and partakers, and to put himſelfe eftſoones into the reputation of armes: And Peter according to the cuſtome of men baniſhed, had no want of diuers hopes for the multitude of friends which he had in the Citie, by whom he had intelligence that the gouernment popular was diſpleaſing to many of the Nobles; and no leſſe for the multitude of his adherents and followers, which by reaſon of the ancient greatneſſe of his houſe, was almoſt vniuerſall through the whole dominion of Florence. It was beleeued that this plot tooke his firſt beginning at Millan, for that Virginio was no ſooner eſcaped out of the hands of the French, then he made his firſt office to go viſite the Duke; but afterwards it was concluded at Rome, where did negotiate many dayes with the Pope, the Embaſſadour of Venice, and the Cardinall Aſcanius, who proceeded by commiſſion from Lodowike. But the grounds and hopes of this enterpriſe were theſe; that beſides the bands which Virginio ſhould leuie of his old ſouldiers, and with ten thouſand duckats gathered by Peter de Medicis, of his owne, and by the liberalitie of his friends, Iohn Bentiuole (being then in the pay of the Venetians and the Duke of Millan) ſhould at the ſame inſtant make warre againſt them vpon the frontier of Bolognia: and alſo that Katherine Sforce, whoſe ſonne tooke pay of the Duke of Millan, ſhould vexe them by the cities of Imola and Furly, confining vpon the lands of the Florentines. Laſtly, they made promiſe to themſelues (not in vaine) to haue at their deuotion the Siennoys, no leſſe inflamed with an old hatred againſt the Florentines, then deſirous to embrace occaſions to preſerue Montpulcian, a towne which they diſtruſted not to be able to defend of themſelues, for that hauing attempted not many moneths before with their owne ſtrength, and the bands of the Lord of Plombin, and Iohn Sauelle, (whom the Duke entertained in common with them) to make themſelues Lords of the countrey of the marriſh of Chianes, which marriſh had bene long time the limit or marke ſtone of that ſide betweene the Florentines and them; and to that end had begun to make neare to the bridge of Valiane, a Baſtillion to beate a Tower erected by the Florentines vpon the point towards Montpulcian; things fell out contrary to their expectation: for that the Florentines, moued with the danger of the loſſe of this bridge, which not onely tooke from them all meanes to moleſt Montpulcian, but alſo gaue entry to the enemies into the territories of Cortona and Aretze, and other peeces, which on the other ſide of Chianes appertained to their iuriſdiction, ſent thither a ſtrong ſuccour, which forced the Baſtillion begun by the Siennoys: and for their full ſuretie of that peece, they planted neare the bridge (but on the other ſide Chianes) a Baſtillion conuenient to beſtow many ſouldiers in; by whoſe helpe and commoditie they made roades euen to the gates of Montpulcian, vexing with like actions all the townes of the the Siennoys on that ſide. To which ſucceſſe was ioyned this fortune, that a litle after the paſſage of the French King, they had broken neare to Montpulcian the bands of the Siennoys, and made priſoner Iohn Sauella their Captaine. But Virginio and Peter de Medicis hoped to obtaine place of retrait, with ſome other commodities of the people of Peruſia, not onely for that the family of the Baillons (who with armes and aides of their followers, were almoſt become maiſters of that Citie) were vnited to Virginio in a common fidelitie to the name and faction of the Guelfes, and had withall familiar and ſtraight friendſhips with Laurence and Peter de Medicis whileſt he ruled in Florence, by whoſe fauours and other miniſtrations they had ſpeciall countenance againſt all action of their enemies: but alſo being the ſubiects of the Church (but more in demonſtrations then in effects) it was beleeued that in things concerning principally their eſtates, they would yeeld to the will of the Pope, hauing communitie therein the conſent of the Venetians and the Duke of Millan. Virginio then and Peter de Medicis departed from Rome with theſe hopes, and occupying amongſt themſelues theſe perſwaſions, that the Florentines trauelled with ciuill diuiſions at home, and vexed by their neighbours abroad, vnder the name of their Confederates, could hardly make reſiſtance: and remaining certaine dayes betweene Terni and Todi and theſe confines, where Virginio ſtudying by all meanes to plucke downe the Gibelin faction, leuied men and money of the Guelfes. At laſt they ſetled their campe in fauour of the Peruſins, before Gualde, a towne poſſeſſed by the communaltie of Fuligni, but ſold before by the Pope for ſixe thouſand duckats to the Peruſins; who were no leſſe inflamed with a deſire to haue it, then incenſed with the contention of the parties, by reaſon of whoſe dealings, all the townes about inclined then to emotion and inſurrection: for not many dayes before, the family of the Oddies, baniſhed from Perouſa, and Chieftaines of the faction contrary to the Baillons, hauing aides of them of Fuligni, Aſceſe, and other peeces adioyning, which embraced the part of the Gibelins, were entred Corciana (a ſtrong peece within fiue miles of Perouſa) with three hundred horſe, and fiue hundred footmen: for which accident, all the countrey being riſen (for Spolette, Camerin, and other places of the Guelfes, were fauourable to the Baillons) they of Oddi within few dayes after entred by night within Perouſa, and that with ſuch aſtoniſhment to the Baillons, that hauing loſt hope & abilitie of defence, they began to put themſelues to flight. But the Oddies, by a ſmall and vnlooked for aduenture, loſt that victorie, which the power of their enemies could not depriue them of: for that being come without impediment to one of the entries of the principall place, and one of them who for that purpoſe carried a hatchet, offering to cut in peeces the chaine drawne ouer the way, according to the cuſtomes of Cities in faction; and being ſo troubleſomly enuironed with the preſſe of his companies, that he had no ſpace to lift vp his arme to hew the chaine, cried with a loud voice, Giue backe, giue backe, to the end that hauing more roome, his libertie might be more furthering to the action he went about. This voice being wrongly vnderſtood, and repeated from hand to hand by ſuch as followed him, and ſo deliuered to others in a ſence ſounding to retire and flie, it was the cauſe that all the companies without other encounter or let, fell ſuddenly to flie, not one knowing by whom they were chaſed, nor for what occaſion they fled. This diſorder reſtored the aduerſaries to ſuch preſent courage, that reaſſembling their ſtrength, they charged them in the chaſe, and made great ſlaughter, taking priſoner Troilo Sauello, who for the ſame affection to the faction, had bene ſent to the ſuccours of the Oddies, by Cardinall Sauella: and applying their forces to the occaſion that was offered, they followed the chaſe euen to Corciana, which they recouered in this action, and with the ſame furie: and laſtly, not contented with the death of ſuch as they had in chaſe, they hanged many at Perouſa, following the crueltie which for the moſt part factions are wont to vſe. Of which tumults, many murders happening in the places bordering, for that in ſeaſons doubtfull, the parties are carefull, and do cuſtomably draw into inſurrection, either for deſire to cut off their enemies, or for feare to be preuented by them; the Peruſins inflamed againſt the Fulignians, had ſent the campe to Gualda, and hauing giuen the aſſault to it in vaine, with no leſſe diſtruſt to carry it by their owne ſtrength, they accepted the aides of Virginio, who offered himſelfe to them, to the end that at the bruite of bootie and ſpoile, the ſouldiers might runne with more readineſſe to the warre. And albeit they were preſſed by him, and by Peter de Medicis to miniſter openly to their enterpriſe, or at leaſt to giue ſome peece of artillerie or place of retrait for their people at Chaſtillion du Lac confining vpon the territorie of Cortona, with commoditie of victuals for the armie: yet they conſented to none of theſe demands, mands, notwithſtanding the Cardinall Aſcanius made in the name of the Duke of Millan, great inſtance, and the Pope commanding no leſſe by writs vehement and full of threats. All this was, for that ſince the taking of Corciana, the Florentines lending them money, and giuing yearely penſion to Guy and Rodolpho chiefe of the Baillons; and laſtly, hauing taken into their pay Iohn Paul ſonne to Rodolpho, they were of their ſide, and conioyned with them. Beſides theſe, they were eſtranged from the amitie of the Pope, for that they feared he ſtood fauorable to the cauſe of their aduerſaries, or at leaſt, by the occaſion of their diuiſions, they ſuſpected that he aſpired to put abſolutely that Citie vnder the obedience of the Church. In this time, Paul Vrſin, who with threeſcore men at armes of the old companie of Virginio, had remained many dayes at Montpulcian, and afterwards was gone to the borough of Pieua, entertained (by the direction of Peter de Medicis) a practiſe in the Citie of Cortona, with intention to execute it at ſuch time as the bands of Virginio ſhould approch, whoſe numbers and vertue anſwered not the firſt plots. But during that reſpite of time, the practiſe being diſcouered by the meanes of one of the exiles of baſe condition, one part of their generall grounds and deuices began to faile, and withall many great impediments to appeare. For the Florentines alwayes carefull to prouide for dangers, leauing in the countrey of Piſa three hundred men at armes, and two thouſand footmen, had ſent to incampe neare Cortona two hundred men at armes, and a thouſand footmen vnder the leading of Count Rainuce de Marciane, a gentleman of their companies: and to the end the bands of the Siennoys ſhould haue no oportunitie to ioyne with Virginio, according to the practiſe betweene them, they ſent to Poggi Imperiall vpon the borders of the countrey of Sienna, vnder the gouernment of Guidobalde of Montfeltre Duke of Vrbin (whom they had entertained into their pay a litle before) three hundred men at armes, and fifteene hundred footmen) beſides many baniſhed from Sienna (with whom they adioyned) to keepe the Citie in greater feare. But after Virginio had giuen many aſſaults to Gualda, where Charles his baſtard ſonne receiued a wound with a ſmall ſhot; and hauing embraced the moneys ſent ſecretly to him, as was ſuppoſed by the Fulignians, he raiſed his campe without mention or reſpect to the intereſts of the Peruſins, & marched to the victualling houſes, & ſo to Panicale in the countrey of Perouſa, making new inſtance that they would be declared againſt the Florentins: a thing which they did not onely denie to him, but alſo for the diſcontentment they had of his actions at Gualda, they compelled him almoſt with threatnings to depart out of their territories. In ſo much that Peter and he going firſt with foure hundred horſe to Orſaia, a towne neare to Cortona, hoping that in that Citie (which to auoide the harmes of the ſouldiers, had refuſed to receiue the men at armes of the Florentines) they ſhould find ſome tumult; when they ſaw all things in quiet, they paſſed ouer Chianes with three hundred men at armes, and three thouſand footmen, but the moſt part in diſorder, becauſe they had bene driuen backe, hauing but a very ſmall proportion of money: and they retired vpon the countrey of Sienna, neare to Montpulcian, betweene Chianciana, Torrite, and Aſina longue, where they remained many dayes without other action then certaine incurſions and pillages, hauing the bands of the Florentines (which paſſed Chianes at the bridge of Valiane) incamped directly oppoſite vpon the hill Sanſouin, and other places thereabouts. Neither on the ſide of Bologna (as they hoped) was any inſurrection, for that Bentiuole determining not (for the intereſts and regards of another) to enter warre with a Commonweale mightie and his neighbor, refuſed the quarrell and the defence, notwithſtanding the perſwaſions of the Confederates, to whom he made many excuſes, and vſed no leſſe delayes, neither was he content that many demonſtrations ſhould be made by Iulian de Medicis, who being come from Bologna, laboured to ſtirre vp the friends which they were accuſtomed to haue in the mountaines of that countrey. Yea amongſt the Confederates themſelues there was not generally one conſent of will and inclination, for that it was very acceptable to the Duke of Millan, that the Florentines ſhould be vexed with thoſe trauels, thereby to be leſſe able for the matters of Piſa: but it nothing pleaſed him, that Peter de Medicis, ſo greatly iniured by him, ſhould returne to Florence, notwithſtanding (to declare that hereafter he would wholly depend vpon his authoritie) he had ſent to him to Millan his brother the Cardinall. And touching the Venetians, they liked not to haue the burden of that warre impoſed vpon them, and much leſſe to embrace alone the quarrell: beſides, the Duke and they were buſie to leuie proniſions to expulſe the French out of the kingdome of Naples. In which reſpects, failing in Peter and Virginio not onely the hopes which they expected, but alſo the moneys greatly diminiſhing to entertaine their bands of footmen and

and horſemen, the neceſſities of their eſtates, and conſideration of their proper ſafeties, cauſed them to withdraw to Bagno Rapulano in the countrey of Chiuſa, a Citie ſubiect to the Siennoys; where not many dayes after (Virginio being drawne by his deſtinie) arriued Camilla Vitelli and Monſieur de Gemel, ſent by the French King to entertaine him into his pay, and to bring him into the kingdome of Naples, where the King deſired to ſerue his purpoſe of him, hearing of the defection of the Colonnoys. This offer (albeit many of his friends impugned it, aduiſing him rather to follow the ſeruice of the Confederates, who made great ſolicitation to him, or elſe to become for the Aragons,) was accepted by him, either for that he hoped by that meanes to be more able to recouer the lands and countrey of Albe and Taillecouſſe; or elſe remembring eſtſoones how things happened in the loſſe of the kingdome, and ſeeing the authoritie of the Colonnoys his ancient aduerſaries was great with Ferdinand, he was out of hope to recouer his former greatneſſe and fauour with him; or laſtly, for that he was moued (as himſelfe did aſſure) with a diſcontentment which he had of the Princes Confederate, failing to accompliſh thoſe promiſes which they made to him to miniſter fauours to Peter de Medicis. Virginio then entred pay with the French King, receiuing contract as well for him, as for others of the houſe of the Vrſins, for ſixe hundred men at armes; notwithſtanding vnder this obligation (ſuch be the fruits of thoſe that once haue made their faith ſuſpected) to ſend his ſonne Charles into France for the Kings ſuretie: and being poſſeſſed of the Kings money, he prepared himſelfe to go with the Vitellies to the kingdome of Naples, where both before the loſſe of the Caſtles and after, was continuall inſurrection in many places, with diuers accidents and fortunes.

Virginio Vrſin in pay with the French King.

Virginio leaueth his ſonne pledge to the French.

For, after Ferdinand had in the beginning made head in the plaine of Sarny, the French men that were retired from Pied grotte, were incamped at Nocere within foure miles of the enemie; where their forces being equall, they conſumed the time vnprofitably in skirmiſhing, without any action worthy of memorie; ſauing that ſeuen hundred of the armie of Ferdinand, as well footmen as horſemen, being led by a double intelligence to enter the borough of Giſone, neare the towne of S. Seuerin, were almoſt all either ſlaine or made priſoners. But the bands of the Pope being come to the ſuccour of Ferdinand, and by that meanes the French made inferiour, they retired from Nocere, which by that occaſion, together with the Caſtle, was taken by Ferdinand, with a great ſlaughter of ſuch as had followed the French. In this time Monſieur Montpenſier had foreſeene to furniſh of horſes and other things neceſſary for the warre, ſuch as were come with him from the new Caſtle; with whom, after he had remounted them in good order, he went to ioyne with the others, and after came to Ariana, a towne abounding with victuals. On the other ſide, Ferdinand ſeeing himſelfe leſſe ſtrong then the enemie, ſtayed at Mantfuſcule to temporiſe, without aſſaying of fortune, vntill the Confederates had refurniſhed him with a greater ſuccour. Monſieur Montpenſier tooke the towne, and afterwards the Caſtle of S. Seuerin, and with that fortune had done farre greater things, if the want of money and the difficultie to get ſome, had not hindred him. For hauing no reliefe ſent out of France, nor meanes to leuy any in the kingdome of Naples, he could not pay the ſouldiers; by reaſon whereof the armie inclining to diſcontentment, and ſpecially the Swiſſers, he could not poſſibly do any thing, whoſe effects might be anſwerable to the forces he had. In ſuch like actions were conſumed by the one and other armie, about three moneths: in which ſeaſon, Dom Federike who had with him Ceſar of Aragon, made warre in Pouilla; being aided by thoſe of the countrey; againſt whom made head the Barons and peoples that embraced the French part. On the other ſide, Gracian des Guerres made valiant defence in Abruzze againſt Ferdinand; and the Prefect of Rome, who had the Kings pay for two hundred men at armes, vexed with his eſtates the lands of Moncuſin, and the countrey thereabouts, where was ſomewhat declined the proſperitie of the French, by the long ſickneſſe of Monſieur d'Aubigny, which interrupted the courſe of his victory, although almoſt all Calabria and the principalitie remained at the deuotion of the French King. But Gonſalue hauing gotten together the Spaniſh bands, with ſuch of the countrey as bare friendſhip to the Aragons, (now well increaſed by the conqueſt of Naples) had taken there certaine places, and made ſtrong in that prouince the name of Ferdinand, where the French found the ſame difficulties which were in the armie for want of money: notwithſtanding, the Citie of Coſenze being drawne into rebellion againſt them, they recouered it and ſackt it. But in theſe great neceſſities and dangers, appeared no ſuccours at all out of the Realme of France: for that the King ſtaying at Lyons, ſpent the time about iuſts, tourneys and other pleaſures, giuing ouer all all thoughts of the warre: and albeit he assured alwayes, that he would eftsoones consider of the affaires of Italy, yet by the effects it appeared not that he had any remembrance thereof. And though Argenton brought him this answer frō the Senate of Venice; that they pretended to haue no disfriendship with him, for that they entred not into armes vntill Nocere was taken, and for no other cause then for the defence of the Duke of Millan their confederate; and therefore they thought it a thing superfluous, to ratifie againe the ancient friendship with a new peace: and that on the other side they had offered him by persons indifferent, to induce Ferdinand, to giue him presently some summe of money, with constitution of a tribute of fiftie thousand duckats by the yeare, and to leaue in his hands for securitie, Tarenta, vntill a certaine time; the King, as though he had a prepared and puissant succour, refused to open his eares to these offers, notwithstanding (besides these perplexities of Italy) he was not without vexations vpon the frontiers of France; seeing that Ferdinand King of Spaine (being come in person to Parpignian) had made incursions into Languedock, where they did no small harmes, adding to their present furie, other demonstrations of farre greater emotions: and besides it was not long since the Daulphin of France, the onely sonne of the King, died; all which things (if he had bene capable to make wise election of peace or warre) ought to haue brought him with more facilitie to condescend to some accord.

The death of the Daulphin.

About the end of this yeare were determined the controuersies happening by reason of the Citadell of Pisa: for the French King being informed of the obstinacie of the Captaine, sent thither at last Monsieur Gemel, with threatnings and commandements rigorous, not onely addressed to him, but generally to all the French appertaining to the charge and seruice of the said Citadell; and a litle after, he dispatched thither Monsieur Bonne cousin to the Captaine, to the end that being informed by a person whom he might trust, both of the Kings message, and also the meanes to satisfie with present obedience his former faults and contumacie; and also of the danger wherein he stood continuing in disobedience; he might with more readinesse proceed to the execution of his maiesties commandements. The Captaine notwithstanding continuing in his former wilfulnesse, made no reckoning of the message of Gemel, who stayed there a few dayes, according to his commission to go with Camilla Vitelli to find Virginio: and much lesse was the coming of Bonne (who was hindered many dayes, for that by direction of the Duke of Millan he was retained at Serezana) to any purpose to turne the Captaine from his obstinacie; but hauing wrought Bonne to his opinion, he made a contract with the Pisans (Luke Maluezze interposing himselfe in the name of the Duke) by vertue whereof he deliuered to the Pisans the first day of the yeare 1496. their Citadell, receiuing of them twentie thousand duckats, whereof twelue thousand to remaine to himselfe, and eight thousand were to be deuided amongst the souldiers that were therein. But this you must vnderstand, that the Pisans hauing no meanes to pay such a summe of money, they had foure thousand of the Venetians, foure thousand of the Genoways and Lucquoys, and foure thousand of the Duke of Millan: who vsing at the same time his ordinary shifts and practises (whereunto men gaue litle faith) he solicited faintly to enter with the Florentines into firme intelligence and amitie, and was already agreed of conditions with their Embassadors. But surely there was no likelihood that euer Monsieur de Ligni, or the Captaine, or any other would haue vsed so great a transgression without the Kings will and liking, chiefly seeing the matter was so much to his disaduantage; for that albeit the Captaine had capitulated, that the Citie of Pisa should continue in the obedience of the Crowne of France, yet it remained manifestly at the deuotion of the Confederates: and for that the restitution tooke not effect, the French men that were left in the Realme of Naples, were naked of the succours of men and money, promised in the contract of Thurin. But the Florentines obseruing diligently the progresse of all these things, (albeit in the beginning they made great doubt) were possest at last with this opinion, that all was done contrary to the will of the King: a thing which might seeme incredible to all other that knew not what was his nature, nor what were the conditions of his wit and customes, nor how litle authoritie he bare amongst his people; and lastly, how easily men are emboldened against a Prince that is fallen into contempt.

After the Pisans were entred by heapes into the Citadell, they razed it flat with the earth: and knowing themselues to be too weake to defend their cause, they sent at the same instant Embassadours to the Pope, to the Emperour, to the Venetians, to the Duke of Millan, to the Genoways, to the Siennoys, and to the Lucquoys, praying succours of euery one of them, but with greater greater inſtance of the Venetians and Duke of Millan; towards whom they nouriſhed a franke inclination to transferre the iuriſdiction of their Citie: wherein they had this cogitation; that they were conſtrained not ſo much to looke to the preſeruation of their libertie, as to eſchue the neceſſitie to returne eftſoones into the power of the Florentines: and alſo they had more hope in him, then in any other, for that he was the firſt ſtirrer of them to rebellion, by reaſon of neighbourhood; and for that hauing reaped from the other Confederates no other thing then hopes, they had alwayes receiued from him preſent and ready ſuccours. But the Duke (notwithſtanding his deſire was importunate) ſtood doubtfull whether he ſhould accept it, for feare leſt the other Confederates would take it ill, in whoſe councels was now begun to treate of the affaires of Piſa, as of a common cauſe: by reaſon whereof, ſometimes he would deſire the Piſans to deferre, and ſometimes aduiſed them that it might be done in publicke action, and in the name of the Saint Seuerins, and he to diſcloſe that all was done to his profit, when he ſhould ſee his time: but in the end, when he ſaw the French King was gone out of Italy, and finding withall that his buſineſſe with the Confederates was not now ſo great, he determined to embrace it.

Reaſons why the Piſans offer themſelues to the Duke of Millan.

But this inclination of the Piſans began to grow cold, for the great hopes they had to be ſuccoured by the Senate of Venice; and withall, they had this counſell of others, that more eaſily might they defend their eſtate with the aide of many, then to ſtand vpon the ſuccours of one alone; finding by this meanes a greater hope to maintaine their libertie. Theſe conſiderations growing now more ſtrong, after they had obtained the Citadell, they had ſpeciall regard to releeue and ſtrengthen themſelues with the fauours and ſuccours of euery one; for the furtherance of which intention, the diſpoſition of the Eſtates of Italy ſerued to good purpoſe. For the Genoways, for the malice they bare to Florence, and the Siennoys and Lucquoys for hatred and feare, were alwayes to miniſter aide to them in ſome ſort; wherein to proceed more orderly, they ſolicited to make a contract with obligations reſolued on to that effect: and the Venetians and Duke of Millan, entertaining one deſire to be their ſoueraigne Lords, could not endure that they ſhould returne vnder the rule of the Florentines: and with the Pope and the Embaſſadours of the Spaniſh, much helped their common deſire to plucke downe the Florentines, as being too much inclined to the doings of France. Then after they had bene graciouſly heard in euery place, and obtained of the Emperour the priuiledge of confirmation of their libertie, they brought from Venice and Millan the ſame promiſes to preſerue them in their libertie, which they had made afore with common conſent, to helpe to deliuer them from the French: and the Pope in the name and conſent of all the Potentates of the league, incouraged them by a ſpeciall ſignature, with promiſe that they ſhould be mightily defended of euery one. But yet the moſt apparent ſuccours came from the Venetians and Duke of Millan, the Duke augmenting the number of men that were there firſt, and the Senate refurniſhing them with a proportion ſufficient: an action wherein if they had both continued, the Piſans had not bene conſtrained to ſticke more to the one then to the other of them, and by that meanes alſo, the common benefite had bene more eaſily preſerued. But ſhortly after it came to paſſe that the Duke of Millan, who feared alwayes great expences, and being inclined of nature to proceed in all actions with apparences & ſhifts, made his account that the iuriſdiction of Piſa could not fall into his hands at this time, and therfore beginning with ſmall proportions to furniſh things which the Piſans demanded of him, he gaue them occaſion to be more inclined to the Venetians, in whom they found a plentifull reliefe in all their neceſſities, without any ſparing: from whence proceeded, that a few moneths after the French had redeliuered the Citadell, the Senate of Venice, required by the generall and importunate ſuites of the Piſans, determined to take the Citie into their protection, the Duke of Millan rather perſwading them to it, then making any ſhew of miſliking. This was done without the priuitie of the other Confederates; although from the beginning the Venetians had ſolicited them to ſend bands of men thither: but now they alledged, that they were no more bound to their promiſes, for that without their conſent they had particularly couenanted with the Venetians. But it is moſt certaine, that neither the deſire to preſerue the libertie of their neighbours, (which in their owne countrey they loue much) nor any regard to the common benefite and ſafetie, (as they did alwayes publiſh with maieſticall words) but the onely deſire to get the iuriſdiction of Piſa, was the cauſe that the Venetians made this reſolution: by the meanes whereof they doubted not in ſhort time to be able to accompliſh their deſire, euen with the wil of the Piſans themſelues, in whom was a willing election to liue vnder the rule of Venice, the better to be alwayes assured, not to returne eftsoones into the seruice of the Florentines. And yet notwithstanding this matter was oftentimes debated at large in the Senate, the generall disposition being hindered by the authoritie of some of the most ancient and best reputed Senators, who impugned it with mightie reasons, assuring the residue, That to vndertake the defence of Pisa, was a matter full of great difficulties, for that by land it was a State farre from their confines, and much more by sea, hauing no meanes to go thither, but by the dwellings and hauens of others, fetching a compasse about both the seas that enuiron Italy; for which reasons they could not defend it from the continuall vexations of the Florentines, but with intollerable expences. That it was indeed true, that such an enlargement would be very conuenient for the State of Venice, but first there should be consideration had of the difficulties to keepe it, and much more of the conditions of the time present, together with that which might happen by such a deliberation: for that all Italy being suspitious of their greatnesse, such an increase of Lordship could not but be extremely iealous and displeasing to all, wherin would be bred easily more great & dangerous accidents then haply were looked into of many: and such were greatly deceiued in whose perswasions was this suretie, that the other Potentates would suffer without gainsaying, that to their Lordship and Imperie, so redoubted through all Italie, should be ioyned so great oportunities by the demeane of Pisa: wherein if they were not (as they haue bene) so mightie to withstand it of their proper strength, they were not (seeing the way was taught to them on the other side the Mounts to passe into Italy) without great occasiō to oppose against them forraine force, to the which (no doubt) they would haue ready recourse, as well for hate as for feare (this being a vice common to all men, to seeke rather to serue strangers, then to giue place to their owne.) And touching the Duke of Millan, how can it be beleeued, that he accustomed to be carried sometimes by ambition and hope, and sometimes by suspition and feare; and now being stirred no lesse with disdaine then iealousie, to see transferred to the Venetians, that prey which he had sought by so many meanes and studies for himselfe, will not rather be readie to bring new troubles vpon Italy, then endure that Pisa should be occupied by others then himselfe? And albeit with words and counsels he declared the contrarie, yet it is easie to discerne, that it is farre from the intention and truth of his heart, containing no other thing then ambushes and counsels full of art tending to an ill end: in fellowship and company of whom, it were a necessarie wisedome to support that Citie; if for no other respect, yet at least to let that the inhabitants should not transferre it to him: but to make it a cause proper or particular, drawing after it so great enuie and no lesse charges, were a counsell neither wise nor well ruled: That they ought to consider how contrary would be those thoughts, to the workes and actions wherein for so many moneths they were so much trauelled and yet vexed continually; for that no other occasions did moue the Senate to take armes with so great expence and danger, then the desire to deliuer and reassure as wel themselues as the other regions of Italy from the rule of strangers. Wherein hauing giuen a beginning with a successe so glorious, and yet the French King scarcely repassed the Mounts, and the most part of the kingdome of Naples following his faction with a strong armie; what indiscretion, what infamie would it be (at a time needfull to confirme the libertie and suretie of Italy) to sow againe the seeds of new calamities: which might make easie the returne of the French King, or else the descending of the King of Romanes, to whom (pretending, as euery one knoweth, against their estate) could happen no greater occasion nor more strong desire then this: That the commonweale of Venice was not brought to those termes, to embrace counsels dangerous, nor to go before occasions, and much lesse to take them whilest they were greene: nay rather, no Estate in all Italy stood vpon better termes to expect the oportunitie of times, and with lesse perill could tarie till occasions were ripe: forasmuch as deliberations rash or doubtfull, did best befit those that suffered hard or sinister conditions; or such as being pushed forward with ambition and desire to make their name famous, feared to haue want of time; and not this Commonweale, which being raised into so great power, dignitie and authoritie, stands redoubted and enuied of all the residue of the principalities in Italy: and who in regard of other Kings and Princes, being almost immortall and perpetuall (retaining alwayes one selfe and setled name of a Senate of Venice) hath no cause to hasten their deliberations: And that it appertained better to the wisedome and grauitie of that Senate (considering according to the propertie of men truly wise, the dangers that lie hidden vnder those hopes and ambitions, and looking more into the ends then beginnings of things)

things) to reiect rash counsels, and to abstaine as well in the occasion of Pisa, as others offering to astonish or kindle the spirits of others, at least vntill Italy were better assured of the suspitions and dangers of those on the other side the Mounts, forbearing in any wise to giue them new occasion eftsoones to reenter: for that experience had shewed in very few moneths, how Italy when she was not oppressed by strange nations, followed almost alwayes the authoritie of the Senate of Venice; but when forreine forces occupied place in this Empire, in stead of being followed and redoubted of others, they with the others had reason to feare the power of strangers. All Italy followed the authoritie of the Venetians. These and the like reasons, besides the contrary desires of the greatest number, were surmounted and ouercome by the perswasions of Augustin Barbarin Duke of the same Citie, whose reputation was become so great, that exceeding the reuerence of the former Dukes, he aspired rather to a power absolute, then authoritie limited or regulated: for that, besides that he had many yeares managed that dignitie with happie successe; and besides his many excellent gifts and graces of the mind, he had so preuailed with singularitie of cunning dealing, that many Senators (who willingly opposed against such, as for the fame of their wisedome, and for that they had obtained supreme dignities, were of greatest reputation in that Commonweale) linked to him, and followed commonly his opinions, rather in maner of partakers, then with that grauitie and integritie which is requisite in a Senator. He then desirous to leaue with the increase of the State, a worthy memory of his name, putting no end to his appetite after glorie, and much lesse contented that during his rule, the Ile of Cyprus (the Kings of the house of Lusignian failing) had bene annexed to the Empire of Venice; was importunate to embrace euery occasion to make great their Estate. And for this cause, opposing himselfe against those who for the regard of Pisa, counselled the contrary, he shewed with round discourse of words and reasons, how much it imported the Senate in vtilitie and conueniencie to haue Pisa, and how much it concerned them to represse by this meanes the arrogancie of the Florentines, who in the death of Philip Maria Viscount, had made them lose the occasion to be Lords of the Duchie of Millan, and of late in their action of loanes of mony during the warres of Ferrara and other enterprises, had done more harme then any one of the other Potentates. He declared, that seldome are offered so faire occasions; what infamie to lose them, and afterwards what repentance would follow for not embracing them: That the conditions of Italy were not such, that in the other Potentates was power of themselues to oppose against the enterprise, and much lesse was there doubt, that for this indignation or feare, they would haue recourse to the French King: for that neither the Duke of Millan hauing so highly offended him, durst eftsoones trust him, neither did such thoughts moue the Pope: and the King of Naples, when he shall haue recouered his kingdome, will not endure to heare speake of the French. Besides, that their entrie into Pisa (albeit grieuous to others) was not an accident so furious, nor a perill so neare, as in regard of that, the other Potentates should run rashly into those remedies which are vsed in the last despaire, no more then the Physition makes haste to giue strong medicines in sleight diseases, esteeming that the patient hath time enough to take them. That if in this weakenesse and separation of the other Italians, being fearfull, they made no reckoning of so goodly an occasion, it were an expectation vaine, to tary to be able to do it with more suretie, when the other Potentates were returned into their former strengths, and assured frō the feare of them on the other side the Mounts: That for a remedie of too great a feare, they had to consider, that all worldly actions were exposed to many perils; but that wise men knew, that all the ils that may happen, do not always come to passe: for that either by the benefite of fortune many dangers are dissolued, and many auoided with industrie and prudence: and therefore men ought not to confound (as many affirme, considering litle the propertie of names and substance of things) feare with discretion, nor repute those wise, who making certaine all perils that are doubtfull, (and therefore fearing all) do rule their deliberation as if they should all happen; seeing that in no maner can merite the name of wise or discreete, such men as feare things to come more then they ought. That this title and this praise was fare more conuenient for men valiant and couragious, for that looking into the state and nature of dangers (and in that regard different from the rash sort, in whom is no impression of sence or iudgement of perils) they do notwithstanding discouer how often men, sometime by aduenture, and sometimes by vertue, are deliuered from many difficulties. Those men then that in deliberating call into councell as well hope as feare, and do not iudge for certaine the euents that are vncertaine, do not so easily as others reiect occasions profitable and ho-

Thus the Senate receiued the Piſans into protection by decree publicke, with ſpeciall promiſe to defend their libertie: which deliberation was not in the beginning conſidered by the Duke of Millan, as was conuenient. For he by this meanes being excluded to entertaine any bands there, held it very acceptable to be deliuered of ſuch expences; and eſteemed it not againſt his profite, that Piſa at one time ſhould be the occaſion of great charges both to the Venetians and the Florentines: perſwading himſelfe further, that the Piſans, for the greatneſſe and neighbourhood of his Eſtate, and for the memorie of things done by him for their deliuerie, would be ſo affected to him, that they would alwayes preferre him before all others. But that which increaſed theſe deuices and deceitfull hopes, was the perſwaſion wherewith (litle remembring the inconſtancie of humane things) he nouriſhed himſelfe, to haue as it were vnder his feete, Fortune, whoſe ſonne he would not ſticke with publicke vanting to ſay he was: ſo much was he puffed vp with vainglory, by the proſperous ſucceeding of his affaires, and ſwolne with ſingular weening, for that by his meanes and by his counſels, the French King paſſed into Italy; appropriating to himſelfe the chaſe giuen to Peter de Medicis by the Florentines, with the loſſe of his Eſtate for not beleeuing him, the rebellion of the Piſans, and the flying of the Arragons from the Realme of Naples: and that afterwards with a counſell changed, he was the cauſe (by his deuices and authoritie) of the confederation of ſo many Potentates againſt the French king: of the returne of Ferdinand into the kingdome of Naples, of the departing of the French out of Italy with conditions vnworthy ſuch a greatneſſe: and laſtly, in the action of the Captaine, who had in charge the Citadell of Piſa, wherein his induſtrie or his authoritie had more power then the will and commandements of his King. With which rules meaſuring things to come, and iudging the wiſedome and policie of all others to be farre inferiour to the excellencie of his ſpirit, he flattered himſelfe to be alwayes able to addreſſe and gouerne the affaires of Italy as he would, and with his induſtrie to turne and wind the minds of euery one. This fond perſwaſion he could not diſſemble neither in himſelfe nor in his peoples, and no more in words and geſtures then in demonſtrations and actions, making it a thing acceptable to him, that euery one beleeued and ſpake ſo by him: in ſo much that Millan day and night was repleniſhed with voices vaine and glorious, celebrating with verſes Latine and vulgar, and with publicke orations full of flatterie, the wonderfull wiſedome of Lodowike Sforce, of the which they made to depend the peace and warre of Italy; exalting his name euen to the third heauen, and the ſurname of More (impoſed vpon him from his youth, for that he was of complexion browne, and for the opinion of his crafts which now were manifeſt) he was contented to retaine willingly ſo long as he remained Duke of Millan. And no leſſe was the authoritie of this More in the other Caſtles of the Florentines, then it had bene in the Citadell of Piſa; ſo that in Italy it ſeemed that as well enemies as friends, were ruled by the meaſure of his will. For albeit the French King hearing the grieuous complaints made to him by the Embaſſadours of Florence, was not a litle diſcontented, and to the end at leaſtwiſe that their owne places might be rendred, had diſpatched Robert de Veſte his Chamberlaine with new commiſſions, and letters ſpeciall from Monſieur de Ligni; yet his authoritie bearing no more power with others then with himſelfe, the audacitie of Monſieur de Ligni was ſo great (aſſuring many that he proceeded not but by the Kings will) that his Maieſties commandements bare ſmall reputation, by meanes of his new commiſſions ioyned to the froward will of the caſtle-keepers: in ſo much that the baſtard of Bienne Lieutenant to Ligni in Serezana, after he had drawne his companies thither with the commiſſioners of the Florentines, to receiue poſſeſſion of them, he gaue them to the Genoways for the price of fiue and twentie thouſand duckats: and afterwards the Captaine of Serezanella did the like for a certain ſumme of money, of which the author and onely meanes was the More; who hauing oppoſed againſt the Florentines (but vnder the name of the Genoways) Fracaſſe, with an hundred horſe and foure hundred footmen, gaue hinderance that the Florentines, who by meanes of their bands ſent to receiue Serezana, had recouered certaine peeces in the countrey Lunigiane, ſhould not recouer all the other places they had loſt. And a litle after, Entragues late Captaine of the Citadell of Piſa, vnder whoſe guard alſo remained yet the Caſtles of Pietraſanta and Mutron, together with that of Librafatta, which not many moneths after he gaue to the Piſans, ſold the reſidue to the Lucqueys for ſixe and twentie thouſands duckats, as preciſely he was directed by the Duke of Millan; who firſt wiſhed they might fall to the Genoways, but afterwards changing aduice, he thought it better to gratifie them of Lucques, to the end they might haue occaſion to miniſter ready aides to the Piſans, and to reduce them more to his deuotion by this benefite. All which things being related in France, albeit the King ſhewed himſelfe much diſcontented with Monſieur de Ligni, and pronounced Entragues baniſhed out of all his Realmes, yet at the returne of Bonne (who beſides his participation with the money of the Piſans, had treated at Genes the ſale of Serezana) his iuſtifications were accepted, and graciouſly entertained an Embaſſadour of the Piſans, ſent with him to perſwade the King that the Piſans would remaine faithfull ſubiects to the Crowne of France, and to proteſt their fidelitie by oath, albeit a litle after, his commiſſion not being liked, he had franke leaue to depart; and on Monſieur de Ligni was impoſed no other paine, then that (to ſhew that he had no more the Kings fauour) the grace to lie in his Maieſties chamber as he was wont, was taken from him, to the which he was immediatly reſtored: and Entragues remained onely in contumacie, but no long time: to which things gaue good aide (beſides the Kings nature with other meanes and fauours) a true perſwaſion, that ſuch were the neceſſities of the Florentines, that they could not endure ſeparation from him; for that the ambition of the Venetians and Duke of Millan being manifeſt, it was holden for certaine, that if they were not repoſſeſſed of Piſa, they would neuer accord to be confederate with them for the defence of Italy; whereunto they ſought to induce them by threatnings and meanes rigorous; and did not for the preſent, aſſay any other thing againſt them, but reſted ſatisfied (with the bands they had put into Piſa) to ſupport that Citie, and not ſuffer her wholly to loſe her iuriſdiction, the danger of the kingdome of Naples drawing them from all other care. For Virginio, who had gathered at Bagno de Rapolano, and after at Peruſin (where he remained certaine dayes) many companies of ſouldiers, marched with the other Vrſins towards Abruzze; holding alſo the ſame way with their bands, Camilla and Paul Vitelli, to whom the borough of Montlion refuſing to giue victuals, was by them put to the ſacke: which ſo amazed the other places of the Church by the which they ſhould paſſe, that notwithſtanding the expreſſe inhibitions of the Pope, they were euery where lodged & furniſhed with victuals. By reaſon whereof, but much more for the bruite of an aſſured ſuccour comming by ſea out of France, whereby the French affaires ſeemed to ſtand vpon good termes in the kingdome of Naples; Ferdinand who was deſtitute of money, and wrapped in ſo many difficulties, that he was not able to ſuſtaine ſo great a burthen, without greater ſuccours, was conſtrained to ſtudie for new remedies, to his preſent defence.

Now ſo it is, that in the beginning the other Potentates had not comprehended Ferdinand in their league: and albeit ſince he had recouered Naples, the King of Spaine made inſtance to haue him admitted to the confederation, yet the Venetians would neuer agree thereto, perſwading themſelues that his neceſſities would be a readie meanes to aduance their plot, which was, that one part of that Realme might fall into their obedience. Ferdinand then being deſtitute of all other hopes, (for he expected no new ſuccours from Spaine, and the other Confederates would not intangle themſelues with ſo great expences) agreed with the Senate of Venice, the Pope, and the Ambaſſadours of the Kings of Spaine: That the Venetians ſhould ſend to his ſuccours into the Realme of Naples, the Marquis of Mantua their Captaine with ſeuen hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and three thouſand footmen, maintaining ſtill their armie by ſea, which was there alreadie; with condition notwithſtanding, that they might reuoke thoſe aides at all times when they ſhould haue need to imploy them in their owne defence: That they ſhould lend to him fifteene thouſand duckats to ſerue his preſent neceſſities: That for the ſecuritie of theſe expences, Ferdinand ſhould deliuer in pawne vnto them Otrante, Brunduſa, and Thrane, and conſent that they might ſtill retaine Monopoli and Puligniana, which were then in their hands; vnder this couenant, to render them when their expences ſhould be ſatisfied: prouided alwayes, that neither by reaſon of the warre, nor for the guarding or fortifications which they ſhould make, they ſhould not redemand of him aboue two hundred thouſand duckats. Thoſe ports being in the ſuperiour ſea, and therefore of great oportunitie to Venice, niee, augmented much their greatneſſe: the which (no man now oppoſing againſt them, and ſince they embraced the protection of Piſa, hearing no more of the counſels of ſuch as wiſhed that to winds ſo fauourable they had giuen leſſe ſailes) began to be ſtretched through all the parts of Italy. For beſides the affaires of the kingdom of Naples and of Tuſcane, they had of new taken to their pay Aſtor Lord of Faenza, and accepted the protection of his Eſtates: a meane very conuenient to keepe in feare the Florentines, the Citie of Bologna, with all the reſidue of Romagnia. To theſe particular aides of the Venetians, were added other ſuccours of the Confederates; the Pope, the Duke of Millan, and they, ſending to Ferdinand a ioynt ſupply of bands of men at armes entertained at their common pay: for albeit the Duke of Millan, in whom remained as yet many ſemblances to keepe the accord at Verceil, (notwithſtanding the moſt part of thoſe things were directed by his counſels) would not either in the leuies of men or money, or other demonſtrations, that his name were vſed; yet he agreed ſecretly to contribute euery moneth ten thouſand duckats for the ſuccours of the kingdome of Naples. The marching of the Vrſins and the Vitellies aſſured greatly the affaires of Abruzze, which were in no ſmall confuſion againſt the French men: ſeeing Terame and the Citie of Chieta were drawne into rebellion, with great doubt that Aquileia the principall towne of that region, would do the like: which they at their comming hauing reconfirmed at the deuotion of the French, and recouered Terame by compoſition, and ſacked Iulianoue, almoſt all Abruzze followed the name of the French; ſo that the affaires of Ferdinand began to go ill through the whole kingdome: for that almoſt all Calabria was in the power of Monſieur d'Aubigny; notwithſtanding his long ſickneſſe, for the which he ſtayed in Terace, gaue oportunitie to Gonſaluo to keepe the warre kindled in that Prouince, with the Spaniſh bands, and ſtrength of ſome Lords of the countrey. Beſides, Caietta with many places aſſiſting, followed the obedience of the French. The Prefect of Rome, with his companie, and the forces of his Eſtate, after he had recouered the peeces of Montcaſin, inuaded the land of Lauora on that ſide: and Monſieur Montpenſier, albeit by the want of money he was much reſtrained to vſe his forces, yet he compelled Ferdinand to incloſe himſelfe in ſtrong places, being vexed with the ſame neceſſitie of money, and many other wants, but wholly repoſed vpon the hope of the ſuccours of Venice, which, for that the contract betweene them was made not long before, could not be ſo ſoone readie as had bene fit. Montpenſier laboured to betray Beneuent by intelligence; but Ferdinand hauing doubt of the practiſe, ſuddenly entred the towne with his bands. The French came neare to Beneuent, and lodging vpon the bridge of Finoeche, they tooke Fenezana, Apice, and many other bordering townes: but theſe places bearing no fauour to their armie for victuals, they diſcamped, hauing alſo regard to the time drawing on to gather the tribute of the cattell of Powilla, one of the greateſt reuenues of the kingdome of Naples, for that it was wont to amount euery yeare to foureſcore thouſand duckats, which were all gathered almoſt in the ſpace of a moneth. Monſieur Montpenſier to deprriue them of this commoditie, and no leſſe for the extreme neceſſities of his people, turned his way to Powilla, whereof one part was holden by him, and the other at the deuotion of Ferdinand, who ſoone after marched after him by the ſame way, with intention rather to hinder by art and diligence the actions of the enemie vntill his ſuccours were arriued, then to fight with them in plaine battell.

The arriuall of the French army at Caietta, and their exploits.

About this time arriued at Caietta an armie by ſea of the French, of fifteene great veſſels, and ſeuen other of leſſer burden, in which were imbarked at Sauone eight hundred Lance-knights, leuied in the countreys of the Duke of Gueldres, and thoſe Swiſſers and Gaſcoines appointed before by the King to be ſent with thoſe great ſhips which were to be armed at Genes: to which nauie the armie of Ferdinand, which was aboue Caietta to ſtop the paſſage of victuals, (being indeed for want of money ill appointed) gaue ſuch way, that they entred the hauen without any impediment, ſet their footmen on land, and tooke Itrie with other places adioyning; and after they had made a great prey through the countrey, they hoped to haue Seſſe by the meanes of Dom Baptiſta Caracciol, by whom they had promiſe to be put ſecretly therein. But Dom Federike (who with the bands that followed him being withdrawne from the borders of Tarenta, was afterwards ſent by Ferdinand to the gouernment of Naples) being aduertiſed of the conſpiracie, marched thither with ſpeed, and made priſoner the Biſhop with certaine others conſenting to the treaſon.

In Powilla, where was the ſtrength of the warre, things ſucceeded diuerſly to both the one and the other armie, which were diſperſed into the townes, as well for the ſharpneſſe of the ſeaſon, as for

for the ſtraitneſſe of the place, not ſufficing to receiue one of the armies wholly: and their exerciſes were to make incurſions and roads on horſebacke to pill and prey the cattell, vſing rather induſtrie and agilitie, then vertue or force of armes. Ferdinand was lodged in Fogge with a part of his people, and had beſtowed the reſidue, partly in Troy, and partly in Nocere: where vnderſtanding that betweene S. Seuera (within which towne was lodged Virginio Vrſin with three hundred men at armes, come to be vnited with the armie of Montpenſier) and the towne of Porcina (where was Marian Sauella with an hundred men at armes) was brought almoſt an infinite quantitie of Muttons and other natures of cattell: he marcheth thither with ſixe hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, and fifteene hundred footmen; and comming by the breake of day afore S. Seuera, he planted himſelfe there with his men at armes to giue reſiſtance to Virginio, if he made any eruption; and making his light horſemen to ſcoure abroad, they ouerſpred forthwith the whole countrey, and led away almoſt threeſcore thouſand head of cattell: whereto Marian Sauella offering to make reſiſtance, and iſſuing forth of Porcina, they conſtrained him to retire with the loſſe of thirtie men at armes. This loſſe and ſhame procured Monſieur Montpenſier (reaſſembling all his forces) to march towards Fogge, for the recouerie of the prey and honour loſt: where, with a ſucceſſe beyond his expectation, he met betweene Nocere and Troy, eight hundred Lanceknights newly arriued by ſea, and entred into the pay of Ferdinand: theſe Lanceknights departing from Troy where they were incamped, went to Fogge to ioyne with Ferdinand; a iourney more vpon their owne braine and raſhneſſe, then by the Kings commandement, and altogether againſt the counſell of Fabrice Colonne, who was likewiſe lodged in Troy. And albeit they ſaw that they could not ſaue themſelues either by flying or fighting, yet would they not yeeld, but were ſlaine in fight euery man of them, exchanging their liues with the ſlaughter of many of their enemies. After this, Montpenſier preſented himſelfe before Fogge in array of battell; but Ferdinand not ſuffering others to go out then light horſemen, the French men went to incampe in the wood of Incoronato, where after they had remained two dayes with no ſmall difficultie for victuals, and hauing recouered the moſt part of the cattell, they came againe afore Fogge, and abiding there a whole night, they returned the day following to S. Seuera, but not with all the prey they had recouered, for that in their retrait, the light horſemen of Ferdinand tooke a part from them; in ſo much as the cattell being harried by the one and the other, neither part drew any great profite of the reuenues of that tribute. Not many dayes after, the French men made wearie with want of victuals, went to Campobaſſo which was holden by them, and tooke by force Coglioneſſa or Grigoneſſa, a towne faſt by, where the Swiſſers againſt the will of the Captaines, vſed ſuch crueltie, that (albeit the countrey were filled with aſtoniſhment) it eſtranged from them the affections of many: and Ferdinand looking to defend his eſtate as well as he could, whileſt he expected the Marquis of Mantua, he refurniſhed his bands, by the meanes of ſixteene thouſand duckats which the Pope had ſent him, and with ſuch other proportions as he could leuie of himſelfe.

About this time did ioyne with Montpenſier the Swiſſers, and other foot-bands which were come by ſea to Caietta; and on the other part, the Marquis of Mantua now entred into the kingdome of Naples, and come to Capua by the way of S. Germin, hauing taken in his way, partly by force, partly by compoſition, many places, (albeit of ſmall importance) about the beginning of Iune he vnited his forces with the King at Nocere, whither Ceſar of Aragon led the bands that had lyen vpon the borders of Tarenta. Thus being brought into neighbouring places, almoſt all the forces of the French and of Ferdinand; the French more ſtrong in footmen, and the Italians more mightie in horſemen, the euent of things ſeemed very doubtfull, being not poſſible to diſcerne to whether of the parties the victory ſhould incline.

In this meane while, the French King tooke care for prouiſions to ſuccor his people; for when he had vnderſtanding of the loſſe of the Caſtles of Naples, and that his bands were not ſuccoured by the Florentines, neither with men nor money, for that they had not reſtitution of their fortreſſes; awaking out of that ſlumber of negligence wherewith he ſeemed to haue returned into France, he began eſtſoones to turne his thoughts to the actions of Italy; and to the end to be more free from all things that might retaine him, and (ſhewing himſelfe mindfull of the benefites receiued in his dangers) that he might with more confidence haue recourſe againe to the aides celeſtiall, he takes a iourney in poſt to Tours, and after to Paris, to ſatisfie the vowes he made to S. Martin and S. Denis the day of the battell of Furnoua; and returning with the ſame diligence to Lyons, this deſire ſeemed daily to increaſe in him, whereunto of his owne nature he was moſt inclined. For he interpreted it as an action of great glorie, to haue made a conqueſt of ſuch a kingdome, being the firſt of all the French Kings, in whoſe perſon hath bene renewed in Italy, after many ages, the memory of the armes and victories of the French: and he perſwaded himſelfe, that the difficulties which he encountred in his returne from Naples, proceeded more by the diſorders of his owne people, then by the power or vertue of the Italians, whoſe name (concerning the action of warre) carried no reputation with the French. To this inclination, were not a litle furthering the inticements of the Ambaſſadours of Florence, of the Cardinall of S. Peter ad Vincula, and of Triuulce, who was come to the Court for the ſame occaſion, with whom were aſſiſtant in that inſtance Vitellozze and Charles Vrſin; and beſides theſe, the Count Montoire, ſent to his Maieſtie for that purpoſe by the Barons of Naples holding part with the French: as alſo there came to him at laſt by ſea from Caietta, the Seneſhall of Beucaire, by whom were declared many hopes of the victory, in caſe his Maieſtie did not deferre to ſend a ſufficient ſuccour: as on the contrary, that the affaires being abandoned, it could not long be ſuſtained. To theſe were ioyned the fauourable perſwaſions of many the great Lords of France, euen ſuch as afore had giuen counſell againſt the enterpriſe of Italy; they aduiſed the King to giue a new life to that expedition, to auoide the diſhonour that would fall vpon the Crowne of France, to loſe ſo cowardly that which they had conquered, but much more to preuent the ſpoile of ſo great a part of the Nobilitie, as lay open to deſtruction in the Realme of Naples. Theſe counſels were not hindered by the emotions which the King of Spaine made on the frontier of Parpignian; for that the preparations being greater in bruite then in effect, and the forces of that King more mightie to defend his proper Realmes, then meete for the inuaſion of another, it was iudged ſufficient to ſend to Narbonne and other townes vpon the frontiers of Spaine, bands of men at armes with conuenient companies of Swiſſers. Then the Lords and men of marke, which were found at the Court, being aſſembled in councell by the King, it was determined, That Triuulce ſhould returne to Aſt with as much diligence as he could, vnder the title of the Kings Lieutenant, leading with him eight hundred lances, two thouſand Swiſſers, and two thouſand Gaſcoines: That after him the Duke of Orleans ſhould paſſe the Mounts with other bands: And laſtly ſhould march the Kings perſon with all other prouiſions; and paſſing with a power royall, there was no doubt but the States of the Duke of Sauoy, of the Marquis of Montferrat and Saluce, (very fit inſtruments to make warre vpon the Duchie of Millan) would be for him: and alſo it was beleeued, that except the Canton of Berne, who had promiſed the Duke of Millan not to moue againſt him, all the other Swiſſers would reſort to the Kings pay with great readineſſe. Theſe reſolutions were made with conſents ſo much the more general, by how much was great the deſire of his Maieſtie, who afore they entred into councell, had much coniured the Duke of Bourbon to ſet forth with vehement and liuely ſpeeches, how reaſonable and neceſſary it were to make a ſtrong warre: and of himſelfe in open councell, with the ſame affection he refuted the Admirall, who (not ſo much in impugning directly, as propounding many difficulties) aſſayed to qualifie indirectly the wils of the Councell, hauing but a few fauourers of his opinion: and ſo the King aſſured them publickly that it was not in his power to make other reſolution, for that ſuch was the will of God that he ſhould in perſon march eſtſoones into Italy. It was decreed in the ſame Councell, that a nauie of thirtie ſhips (whereof was one moſt huge carricke called the Norman, and another great carricke of the region of the Rhodes) ſhould paſſe along the coaſt of the Ocean into the hauens of Prouence, where ſhould be armed thirtie galleys and gallions with a mightie ſuccour of men, money, munition and victuals for the ſeruice of Naples; and neuertheleſſe that without ſtaying vntill this nauie could be digeſted into order, there ſhould be ſent forthwith certaine veſſels charged with victuals and ſouldiers. Beſides all theſe things, it was ordained that Rigault the Kings Steward ſhould go to Millan, for that the Duke (notwithſtanding he had not deliuered the two carricks, nor ſuffered to rig a nauie for the King at Genes, but onely reſtored the veſſels taken at Rapale, and not the twelue galleys reſtrained in the port of Genes) laboured to excuſe himſelfe vpon the diſobedience of the Genoways, and had alwayes with ſundry practiſes entertained ſome of his people about the King, to whom he had newly ſent Anthonie Maria Paluoiſin, both to aſſure his Maieſtie that he was diſpoſed to obſerue the accord paſt, and to demaund prolongation of terme to pay to the Duke of Orleans the fiftie thouſand duckats promiſed in the ſame accord. Of which deceits and ſubtilties albeit albeit he reaped but a very litle fruite, the King being well informed of his intention, as well by the examples of his actions paſt, as for that by his letters and inſtructions which were ſurpriſed, it came to light that he ſtirred vp with continuall ſolicitation the Emperour and the King of Spaine to make warre in France; yet hoping that feare perhaps would induce him to things whereunto his will was eſtranged, Rigault was charged, that (without ſpeaking of the diſobedience paſt) he ſhould ſignifie to him that it was in his power to deface the memory of offences, in beginning to obſerue, as to reſtore the galleys, to deliuer the carricks, and by giuing ſufferance to arme a nauie at Genes: and that he ſhould adde to theſe aduertiſements, that the King was determined to returne into Italy in perſon, which ſhould be to his great harmes, if whileſt he was offered the meanes, he would not reenter into that amitie, whereof his Maieſtie was perſwaded that he had vndiſcreetly made ſmall account, rather by vaine ſuſpitions, then for any other reaſon.

Now the bruite of theſe great prouiſions being come into Italy, much troubled the minds of the Confederates; but aboue all Lodowike Sforce, ſtanding in the mouth of the danger, and to be the firſt oppoſed to the fury of the enemy, ſuffered no leſſe perplexities then the conſideration of his perill required, ſpecially vnderſtanding that ſince the departure of Rigault, the King had diſmiſſed all his agents with rough words and auſtere countenance. By reaſon whereof, conſidering well the greatneſſe of the danger, and that the whole force of the warre would fall vpon his Eſtate, he had eaſily accorded to the Kings demands, had it not bene for the guilt of conſcience for the offences he had made him, the ſame cauſing on all ſides ſuch a diſtruſt, that it ſeemed more hard to find a meanes to aſſure both the one and the other, then not to accord to the articles: for taking from the ſuretie of the one, that which was conſented to aſſure the other, none would referre to the faith of another, that which the other refuſed to referre to his owne. So that neceſſitie compelling Lodowike to take the counſell that to him was moſt grieuous, he thought (at leaſt to make ſlow his dangers) to entertaine Rigault with the ſame cunnings which he had vſed to that preſent; aſſuring him with great firmneſſe, that he would bring the Genoways to obey, whenſoeuer the King would giue in the Citie of Auignion ſufficient ſecuritie for the reſtitution of the ſhips, and that both parties would promiſe (giuing mutually hoſtages for all obſeruation) not to enterpriſe any thing preiudiciall one to the other: which practiſe continuing many dayes, had laſtly for many cauillations and difficulties which hapned on the ſudden, the ſame effect which others had had before. But Lodowike, not to waſte time vnprofitably, diſpatched during theſe reaſonings Ambaſſadors to the Emperor, to induce him to paſſe into Italy with the aide of him and the Venetians, to whom alſo he ſent meſſengers, to require that Senate (to the end to prouide for the common perill) to contribute to that charge, and to ſend into Alexandria a ſufficient proportion of forces to make head againſt the French; which they offered very readily to do: but they ſhewed not ſuch facilitie to aſſiſt the paſſage of the Emperour, bearing litle friendſhip to their commonweale in reſpect of thoſe peeces which they poſſeſſed in the firme land appertaining to the Empire and houſe of Auſtrich: neither were they content, that at a common expence, ſhould paſſe into Italy an army, which ſhould wholly depend vpon Lodowike. Notwithſtanding Lodowike continuing ſtill to ſolicite and make inſtance, for that beſides the other reaſons that moued him, the onely forces of the Venetians in the ſtate of Millan were ſuſpected to him: the Senate alſo fearing leſt he, in whom they knew was no litle feare, would ſuddenly draw to reconcilement with the French King, gaue in the end their conſents, and for the ſame occaſion ſent Ambaſſadours to the Emperour. Beſides theſe coniectures, the Venetians and the Duke feared leſt the Florentines, as ſoone as the King were paſſed the Mounts, would make ſome inſurrection in the riuer of Genes; and for this cauſe they ſent to Iohn Bentiuole, to the end that with three hundred men at armes (with whom he was entertained in the pay of the Confederates) he ſhould make warre vpon the Florentines in the frontier of the countrey of Bologna, promiſing that at the ſame time they ſhould be vexed by the Siennoys, and by the men that were in Piſa, and offered him to be bound, that if he tooke the towne of Piſtoya, to keepe it for him: wherein albeit Bentiuole gaue them hope, yet his mind was farre remoued from that ſeruice; and fearing the coming of the French, he ſent ſecretly to the King, to excuſe himſelfe for matters paſt, vpon the neceſſitie of the place wherein Bologna was ſeated, and to offer a good will to depend vpon his Maieſtie hereafter, and for his ſake to abſtaine from vexing the Florentines. But the will of the King (albeit very forward) was not ſuf-ficient to put in execution the things reſolued on, although as well for his honour, as for the dangers of the kingdome of Naples, there needed a moſt ready expedition. For the Cardinall of S. Mallo, in whoſe direction (beſides the managing of the treaſure) reſted the ſubſtance of the whole gouernment, albeit he impugned not theſe doings apparently, yet he made ſo ſlow all expeditions, by delaying the neceſſary paiments, that not one prouiſion was aduanced in due time: and it was thought that he did thus, either for that he iudged it was a better meanes to perpetuate his greatneſſe, (making no expence but ſuch as appertained either to the preſent profite or to the pleaſures of the King) not to haue occaſion to propound euery day the difficulties of the affaires and neceſſities of money; or elſe for that (as many doubted) being corrupted with preſents and promiſes, he had ſecret intelligence with the Pope, or with the Duke of Millan: To which dilatory and iealous dealings, the expreſſe commandements of the King full of diſdaine and reprochfull words, could giue no remedy; for that according to the experience he had of his nature, he ſatisfied him alwayes with promiſes contrary to the effects. In ſo much as the execution of things determined, hauing bene begun to be lingred by his meanes, there hapned an accident, whereby they became more ſubiect to delayes, and almoſt deſperate altogether. For the King in the end of May, and when was generall expectation of his ſpeedie paſſage into Italy, determined to go to Paris, alledging theſe reaſons, that following the cuſtome of the ancient Kings of France, it was neceſſary afore he parted out of France, to take leaue of S. Denis with all the ceremonies vſuall, and likewiſe of S. Martin in paſſing by Tours: and that being determined to march into Italy with a great prouiſion of money, it was needfull (to auoide the neceſſities wherein he had fallen the yeare before) that he induced the other Cities of France to contribution by the example of Paris, by whom he ſhould not obtaine that he deſired, vnleſſe he went thither in perſon: alſo that being in thoſe quarters, he ſhould cauſe to march in greater diligence the men at armes that came from Normandie and Picardie: and he aſſured them, that afore he departed from Lyons, he would diſpatch the Duke of Orleans, and that he would returne thither againe within one moneth. But it was ſuppoſed, that the moſt true and principall cauſe of his going, was for that he was amorous of one of the Ladies of the Queenes chamber, the Queene being gone a litle before to Tours with her Court: wherein he was ſo reſolute, that neither the counſels of his people, nor the importunate prayers and almoſt teares of the Italians, could withdraw him from this determination: who ſhewed him, how hurtfull it would be to waſte time proper for the warre, ſpecially in ſo great a neceſſitie of his people in the kingdome of Naples; and to what ſlander he ſhould be ſubiect throughout all Italy, to haue drawne backe when he ought to haue gone forward: That the reputation of enterpriſes changed for euery litle accident and light bruite: and that it was very hard to recouer it, after it began once to decline, yea though he ſhould happen afterwards to do greater things then afore men did promiſe themſelues. Theſe perſwaſions by him litle regarded, after he had yet taried a moneth longer at Lyons, he tooke his way to go to Tours, not hauing otherwaies diſpatched the Duke of Orleans, then only ſending Triuulce into Aſt with a very ſlender companie, not ſo much prouided for the warres, as inſtructed to confirme in his friendſhip and deuotion, Philip newly ſucceeded to the Duchie of Sauoy by the death of the Duke his Nephew. And thus all that was done afore his departure, touching the prouiſion for Naples, was the diſpatch of ſixe ſhips loaden with victuals to Caietta, carrying many hopes that the maine army ſhould follow with ſpeed: and to take order with the Merchants (but very late) to aduance fortie thouſand duckats to Montpenſier, to whom the Swiſſers and Lanceknights had proteſted, that if they were not payed before the end of Iune, they would paſſe to the campe of the enemy. The Duke of Orleans, the Cardinall of S. Mallo, and all the Councell, remained at Lyons, with commiſſion to haſten the prouiſions; wherein if the Cardinall proceeded ſlowly in the preſence of the King, it was nothing to the lingring he vſed in his abſence.

But the affaires of Naples could no more attend ſuch ſlow remedies, the warre being drawne into ſuch termes (both for the aſſembly of armed bands on each ſide, and many difficulties diſcloſed by both the parties) that of neceſſitie, without longer delayes, the warre muſt determine. Vnderſtand then that Ferdinand after he had ioyned to him the bands of the Venetians, he tooke the towne of Caſtelfranke; and that there arriued at his campe accompanied with two hundred men at armes, Iohn Sforce Lord of Peſere, and Iohn Gonſague brother to the Marquis of Mantua, Captaines of the Confederates; in ſo much as the whole number of his campe amounted ted to twelue hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen: and at the ſame time the French men were incamped at Circelle ten miles from Beneuent, towards whom Ferdinand marched, and approching them within foure miles, he pitched his campe before Frangette de Montfort, a place of ſo good prouiſion, that it was not taken at the firſt aſſault. The French raiſed their campe from Circelle to reſcue it, but they came not in time, for that the Lanceknights which were within yeelded themſelues for feare of the ſecond aſſault, and left the place to diſcretion: which occaſion knowne to the French, had bene the cauſe of their felicitie, if either by indiſcretion or ill fortune they had not ſuffered it to be loſt: for (as was confeſſed generally) they might that day haue eaſily broke the whole army of the enemy, ſo vniuerſally confuſed in the ſack of Frangette, that they gaue no regard to the directions of the Captaines, who ſeeing no other diſtance betweene the French and them then a valley, laboured with all diligence to reaſſemble them. Montpenſier ſaw well enough into the occaſion, and Theſeus was not ignorant in the oportunitie offered, the one commanding, and the other perſwading the victory to be certaine, deſired with teares in their eyes, to march ouer the valley, whileſt in the campe of the Italians all things were in tumult, ſome of the ſouldiers buſie in the pillage, and ſome labouring to packe away the things they had pilled, none hearkening to the command of his Captaine. But Monſieur de Perſie one of the chiefe of the army next to Monſieur Montpenſier, ouer-ruled either with the naturall lightneſſe of a yong man, or elſe (as it was rather thought) enuying the glory of the Duke Montpenſier, perſwaded vehemently againſt the paſſage ouer the valley, alledging that they ſhould riſe euen vnder the feete of the enemy; which weighed with the ſtrong ſituation of their campe, he made an argument to the ſouldiers of no ſmall danger, and therefore wiſhing openly that they ſhould not fight, he was the onely hinderer of ſo good a counſell: and likewiſe it was beleeued that the Swiſſers and Lanceknights receiuing courage by him, drew into mutinie, and demanded money. For this cauſe Montpenſier being compelled to retire, returned to Circelle, where, as they gaue the aſſault the day following, Camilla Vitelli (whileſt about the walls he did the office of an excellent Captaine) was ſtriken in the head with a quarrell, whereof he died: for which accident the French men leauing the inuaſion of the place, brake vp from thence, and marched towards Arriana, diſpoſed neuertheleſſe to aſſay the hazard of battell if occaſion were offered: to which reſolution was flat contrary the counſell of the army of the Aragons, with whom ſpecially the Commiſſioners of the Venetians conſented in opinion; for that ſeeing the enemies began to want victuals, and that they were without money, and perceiuing that the ſuccours out of France came forward very ſlowly, they hoped that their miſaduentures and neceſſities would dayly grow and increaſe, and that they would be ſubiect to as great diſpleaſures in other parts of the kingdome: for that in Abruzze, Annibal naturall ſonne to the Lord of Camerin, being voluntarily gone to the ſuccours of Ferdinand, with foure hundred horſemen leuied at his proper charges, had newly broken the army of the Marquis of Bitonte: beſides there was expectation of the coming of the Duke of Vrbin with three hundred men at armes lately entred into the pay of the Confederates, whoſe fortune and greater conditions hauing determined to follow, he had abandoned the alliance of the Florentines (to whom he was yet bound for more then a yeare) vnder this excuſe, that being feodary of the Church, he might not diſobey the commandements of the Pope: And Gratiano d'Aguerre, who had taken the field to encounter him, was charged in the plaine of Sermone by the Count of Selane and the Count de Popoli, with three hundred horſemen and three thouſand footmen, whom he put to flight. But with the loſſe of the occaſion of the victory about Frangette, the fortune alſo of the French began manifeſtly to decline, concurring againſt them at one time almoſt infinite difficulties, as extreme want of money, ſcarcitie of victuals, hate of the people, diſagreement of the Captaines, diſobedience of ſouldiers, and the ſtealing away of many from the campe, partly by neceſſitie, and partly by will. Alſo they had no meanes to draw out of the kingdome any great proportion of money, neither had they receiued from France any ſumme notable, ſeeing that the fortie thouſand ducats leuied for their reliefe, were too late ſent from Florence: in ſo much as no leſſe for that cauſe, then for the neighbourhood of many townes ſupported by the army of the enemy, they could not raiſe prouiſions neceſſary for their food and ſuſtenance: and in their army was nothing but diſorder, as well for that the courages of the ſouldiers were abated, as for that the Swiſſers and Lanceknights drawing into tumult, demanded importunately their payes: and touching the diſcord of the Captaines, that which moſt hurt all their deliberations, was the continuall contradiction of Perſie againſt Montpenſier. To be ſhort, ſuch were their neceſſities and diſorders, that the Prince of Biſignian was compelled to depart with his people to go to the guard of his owne eſtate, for feare of the bands of Gonſalue, by whoſe example the particular ſouldiers of the countrey abandoned the campe by troupes, wherein they had reaſon; for beſides that they neuer receiued pay, the French and Swiſſers vſed them very ill, as well in the diuiſion of booties, as in diſtribution of victuals. Theſe difficulties, but chiefly the extreme want of victuals, conſtrained the French army by litle and litle to retire and wander from one place to another, which diminiſhed greatly their reputation with the people: And albeit the enemies followed them continually, yet they had no hope to be able to fight, as was ſpecially deſired by Montpenſier and Virginio: for that not to be enforced to battell, they incamped alwayes in places of ſtrength, and where no impediment could be giuen to their commodities, with whom Philip Roſſe a Captaine of the Venetians, going to ioyne himſelfe with a company of an hundred men at armes, was defeated by the ſouldiers of the Preſect of Rome. At laſt, the French being lodged vnder Montcaluole and Caſalarbore neare to Arriana, Ferdinand approching them within the ſhot of a croſſebow (but alwayes keeping him in ſtrong places) brought them into great neceſſitie of victuals, taking from them in like ſort the vſe of freſh water. For which cauſe they thought it beſt to draw towards Powilla, where they hoped to find commoditie of victuals; and fearing, by reaſon of the nearneſſe of the enemies, the difficulties that ordinarily do follow armies that retire, they raiſed their campe in the beginning of the night, not making any bruite to bewray their going, and marched fiue and twentie miles afore they reſted. Ferdinand followed them in the morning, but deſpairing to be able to ouertake them, he incamped before Geſualdo, which towne hauing heretofore ſuſtained a ſiege of fourteene moneths, was now taken by him in one day, a thing which greatly deceiued the French; for that determining to put themſelues within Venouſa, a towne ſtrong by ſituation, and moſt plentifull with victuals, the opinion they had that Ferdinand could not ſo eaſily take Geſualdo, was the cauſe that they amuſed themſelues about the ſacke of Atella which they had taken; and for the time they loſt there, afore their departure they found the army of Ferdinand at their backes, who as ſoone as he had taken Geſualdo, came forward apace: and albeit they repulſed diuers ſcouts and fore-riders, yet ſeeing the maine army march after with ſuch ſpeed, as they had no meanes to recouer Venouſa which was eight miles diſtant, they remained in the towne of Atella, with intention to expect if ſuccours would come from ſome part, hoping for the nearneſſe of Venouſa and many other peeces thereabout holding yet for them, to receiue the commoditie of victuals. Ferdinand with ſpeed incamped before Atella, labouring onely (for the hope he had to obtaine the victory without perill and bloud) to cut them from victuals: for the better aduancement whereof, he caſt many trenches about Atella, and loſt no oportunitie to make himſelfe maiſter of the places adioyning, forgetting no diligence, trauell, or action of a Captaine politicke and valiant: and the difficulties of the French made euery day all things more eaſie to him, for that the Lance-knights hauing receiued but two moneths pay ſince they departed from their houſes, and ſeeing all the dayes and termes appointed for their pay paſt with vaine expectation, they went to the campe of Ferdinand: inſomuch that hauing meanes ſo much the more to grieue the enemy, and to enlarge his army with more ſcope, he ſuffered a more hard paſſage of victuals which came from Venouſa and other places about Atella, wherein was not refreſhing ſufficient to feed the French numbers a very few dayes: for the corne bare a very ſcant proportion, and alſo the Aragons had pluckt downe a mill ſtanding vpon the riuer which runneth neare to the wals, whereby they wanted meanes to turne their litle ſtore of corne into meale: neither were their diſcommodities preſent, recomforted by hoping in any good to come, ſeeing that from no part appeared ſo much as any ſigne of ſuccours.

But the cauſe of their full ruine, was the misfortune that fell in Calabria. For by occaſion of the ſickneſſe of Monſieur d'Aubigny, (for which cauſe many of his people went to the armie of Montpenſier) Gonſalue hauing taken many peeces in that Prouince, incamping at laſt with his Spaniſh bands and many ſouldiers of the countrey, at Caſtrouillare; where hauing aduertiſement that the Count Melete, and Albert de S. Seuerin, with many other Barons were at Laine with bands of ſouldiers almoſt equall to his, and that increaſing their numbers dayly, they purpoſed to aſſaile him when their whole ſtrength was aſſembled; he determined to preuent them, hoping to ſurpriſe them vnprouided, by the confidence they had in the ſituation of the place, the the Caſtle of Laine ſtanding vpon the riuer Sapry, which diuideth Calabria from the principalitie: and the borough is on the other ſide of the riuer, wherein being intrenched, they were guarded by the Caſtle againſt all inuaſions by the high way: and betweene Laine and Caſtrouillare, was Murana, with certaine other peeces of the Prince of Biſignian which held for them. But Gonſaluo with a counſell all contrary, departed a litle before night from Caſtrouillare, accompanied with all his bands, and leauing the high way, he tooke the large way, notwithſtanding it was both more long and hard, for that he was to march by certaine mountaines; and being arriued neare the riuer, he commanded the footmen to take the way to the bridge, which is betweene the Caſtell of Laine and the borough, which bridge was but negligently guarded for the opinion of the ſuretie of the place: and himſelfe with his horſemen paſſing the riuer at a foord two miles higher, was at the borough before day, where finding the enemies without watch and guard, he brake them in a moment, ſleeping in the ſecuritie of the place; and made priſoners eleuen Barons, and almoſt all the ſouldiers, for that flying to the Caſtle, they fell amongſt the footmen, which now were poſſeſt of the paſſage of the bridge. By this honorable victory, being the firſt which Gonſaluo had got in the kingdome of Naples, his ſtrength was ſo increaſed, that when he had recouered certaine other places in Calabria, he determined with ſixe thouſand men to go and ioyne with the campe of Ferdinand, which was before Atella: and in that campe was arriued a litle before, an hundred men at armes of the Duke of Candia, Captaine of the Confederates, but himſelfe with the reſidue of his bands remained in the Citie of Rome. Thus by the coming of Gonſaluo (cauſed by the ſurpriſe of thoſe which were for the French in Calabria) they that were beſieged were brought into hard ſtraights, their towne being enuironed on three ſides, the Aragons occupying one, the Venetians another, and the Spaniards the third; in ſo much that there was almoſt left no entry for victuals, ſpecially the Venetian ſtradiots running ouer the whole countrey, and taking many French men which brought reliefe from Venouſa: and they alſo that were within, had no meanes to go on foraging, but at houres extraordinary, and that with a ſtrong guard. Furthermore, Paul Vitelli making a ſalley at midday, with an hundred men at armes, was drawne by the Marquis of Mantua into an ambuſh, where he loſt part of his company. And being thus depriued of all commodities without, they were at laſt reduced to that extremitie, that they could not with guard and ſtrength ſerue their vſe of the riuer to water their horſes: and within the towne their neceſſities were no leſſe for freſh water, for the refreſhing of their perſons: ſo that being oppreſſed with ſo many aduerſities, and abandoned of all hopes, after they had endured the ſiege two and thirtie dayes, and being now left to the laſt remedy in warre, they demanded a ſafe conduct, which was granted; vnder the protection whereof, they ſent to capitulate with Ferdinand, Monſieur de Perſie, Bartholomew d'Alniano, and one of the Swiſſer Captaines; amongſt whom were agreed theſe couenants following: That there ſhould be no enterpriſe attempted by either part one vpon another for thirtie dayes: That during that time, not one of the beſieged (to whom ſhould be miniſtred day by day by the Aragons neceſſary victuals) ſhould depart out of Atella: That Montpenſier ſhould be ſuffered to aduertiſe his King of the accord: That if he were not reſcued within the ſaid terme of thirtie dayes, he ſhould leaue Atella, and all that he had in his power in the kingdome of Naples, together with all the artilleries that were there: That the ſouldiers ſhould be in ſafetie for their perſons and iewels, and with them it ſhould be lawfull to euery one to go into France, either by land or ſea; and to the Vrſins and other Italian Captaines, to returne with their bands whither they would out of the kingdome: That to the Barons and others, which had followed the faction of the French, (in caſe they would returne to Ferdinand within fifteene dayes) all puniſhments ſhould be remitted, and reſtitution of all the goods they poſſeſſed when the warre began. The terme of this abſtinence expired, Monſieur Montpenſier with all the French, and many Swiſſers, together with the Vrſins, were conducted to the ſea caſtle of Stabby, where they began to diſpute, if Montpenſier as Lieutenant generall vnder his King, and by that meanes aboue all others, were bound (as Ferdinand ſaid) to cauſe to be rendred all that was poſſeſſed in the kingdome of Naples, in the name of the French King; for that Monſieur Montpenſier pretended, that he was bound to no more then was in his owne power to render, and that his authoritie ſtretched not to command other Captaines and Caſtle-keepers which were in Calabria, Abruzze, Caietta, and many other townes and peeces which the King had giuen them in charge, and not him. The argument being trauerſed by many reaſons on both ſides for certaine dayes, they were at laſt conducted ducted to Baia, Ferdinand making ſemblance that he would let them go: and there (vnder colour that the veſſels wherein they ſhould be embarked, were not yet ready) they were ſo long retained, that being diſperſed betweene Baia and Puzzola, they fell into ſuch diſeaſes by the ill aire and many other diſcommodities, that both Monſieur Montpenſier died, and of the reſidue of his company which were more then fiue thouſand bodies, there ſcarce returned into France ſafe and ſound, fiue hundred. Virginio and Paul Vrſin (at the requeſt of the Pope, who was now determined to take from that family their Eſtates) were ſent priſoners to the Egge caſtle, and their companies conducted by Iohn Iordan ſonne to Virginio, and Bartholomew d'Aluiano, were alſo by the appointment of the Pope, ſtripped in Abruzze by the Duke of Vrbin: Iohn Iordan alſo and Aluiano, leauing their people in the way, and returning to Naples by the commandement of Ferdinand, were made priſoners: but Aluiano, either by his induſtry, or by the ſecret ſufferance of Ferdinand, (who loued him much) had meanes to eſcape. Now after Ferdinand had taken Atella, he made diuiſion of his army into many parts, for the more eaſie recouering of the reſidue of the kingdome: he ſent before Caietta, Federike of Aragon, and Proſper Colonne: and to Abruzze, where the towne of Aquila was already reuolted to his deuotion, he diſpatched Fabrice Colonne: and himſelfe hauing taken by force the rocke of Saint Seuerin, and cut off the heads of the Caſtle-keeper and his ſonne, the more to terrifie others, went to encampe before Salerna, where the Prince of Biſignian had parley with him, and compounded for himſelfe, for the Prince of Salerne, for the Count of Cappacie, and for certaine other Barons, with condition that they ſhould remaine poſſeſſed of their Eſtates, but that Ferdinand for his ſuretie ſhould keepe in his hands the fortreſſes for a certaine time; which accord being made, they went to Naples. In Abruzze was not made any great reſiſtance, for that Graciano, who was there with eight hundred horſemen, hauing no more meanes of defence, retired to Caietta. Into Calabria, of which the greateſt quantitie held yet for the French, returned Gonſaluo, againſt whom, albeit Monſieur d'Aubigny made ſome reſiſtance, yet being in the end driuen to take Groppoly, after he had loſt Manfredonie and Coſenſa, which had bene ſacked before by the French: and laſtly, ſeeing himſelfe naked of all hopes, he conſented to deliuer vp all Calabria, and was permitted to returne by land into France.

Montpenſier dieth.

Virginio Vrſin priſoner.

The Prince of Biſignian compoundeth for himſelfe and others.

Monſieur d'Aubigny conſents to depart the kingdome of Naples.

It is certaine, that many of theſe things happened by the negligence and indiſcretion of the French: for albeit Manfredonia was ſtrong, and ſeated in a fertile countrey, full of plentifull meanes for prouiſion of victuals, and that the King had left for the guard of it Gabriel Monſalcon, eſteemed a Captaine valiant; yet after it had endured ſiege for certaine dayes, he was conſtrained to render it for famine: and there were alſo other peeces, of good abilitie to defend themſelues, which either for feare, or for impatience of the incommodities which ſuch muſt ſuffer that are beſieged, yeelded themſelues: and ſome Caſtle-keepers finding their rocks well prouided for, ſold the victuals at their firſt entry; ſo that as ſoone as the enemy appeared, they were conſtrained to yeeld at the firſt ſummons. By theſe diſorders, the French loſt in the kingdome of Naples that reputation which the vertue of that man had wonne vnto them, who holding many yeares after the victory of Ferdinand, the Caſtle of the Egge, which Iohn of Anion had left in his charge, could neuer be brought to render it, but by compulſion of victuals altogether conſumed. Thus no more remaining for the recouery of the whole Realme, then Tarenta and Caietta, with other peeces holden by Charles de Sanguin: and Mont ſaint Ange kept by Dom Iulian de Lorraine, who with great merite and praiſe, made his vertue knowne in all the places thereabouts: it happened that Ferdinand, raiſed into great glory and great hopes to be equall in greatneſſe with his predeceſſors, went to Somme, a towne ſeated at the foote of the hill Veſuue, to ſee the Queene his wife, where he became very ſicke, either for his trauels paſt, or by new exceſſiue diſorders: and feeling by his diſpoſition no hope of recouery, he cauſed himſelfe to be carried to Naples, where he died not many dayes after, ſomewhat before the end of the yeare after the death of his father King Alphonſo. He left behind him, not onely in all his kingdome, but alſo through all Italy, a ſingular opinion of his valour, as well for the victory obtained, as for his noble ſpirit, and many other royal vertues, which did not meanly ſhine in him. He died without iſſue, and therefore his vnkle Dom Federike ſucceeded him, being the fift King that ſucceeded in that kingdome within the ſpace of three yeares.

Ferdinand dieth.

As ſoone as Federike was aduertiſed of the death of his Nephew, he raiſed his ſiege from before Caietta, and went to Naples, where was the old Queene his mother in law, who put into his hands

hands New caſtle, albeit many were of opinion that ſhe would retaine it for her brother Ferdinand King of Spaine. In this accident were moſt ſingular towards Federike, not onely the wils of the people of Naples, but alſo of the Princes of Salerne and of Biſignian, and of the Count Cappacie, who were the firſt that proclaimed his name within Naples, and going to meete him, ſaluted him as King at his deſcending from the ſhip: as farre better content with him then with the laſt King, for the mildneſſe of his ſpirit, and for that they were already entred into great iealouſie, that Ferdinand (as ſoone as his affaires were better ſetled) had intention to purſue with all extremitie thoſe that in any ſort had bene fauourers of the French; and therefore Federike to reconcile them fully to himſelfe, gaue to euery one their Caſtles freely, with great commendations. But theſe confuſions and diſorders hapning with ſo great diſhonour and ſo great detriment, had no power to ſtirre vp the Kings ſpirits, nor to haſten his prouiſions; who ſtanding intangled with the delights and pleaſures of the Court, made it foure moneths afore he returned to Lyons. And albeit in the meane while he oftentimes recommended to ſuch as he had left there, the ſolicitation and diſparch of all prouiſions as well for ſea as land, and that the Duke of Orleans was prepared to depart; yet by the cunnings of the Cardinall of S. Mallo, the men at armes which were ſlenderly paid, marched ſlowly towards Italy; and the nauie by ſea which was to be aſſembled at Marſeilles, aduanced ſo ſlackly, that the Confederates had leiſure enough to ſend firſt to Ville Franche a large hauen-neare to Nice, and afterwards euen to the roads of Marſeilles, an army by ſea leuied at their common charges at Genes, to giue impediments to the veſſels of France that were to go to the Realme of Naples. And to theſe great delayes, cauſed principally by the Cardinall of S. Mallo, wiſe men doubted that there was ioyned ſome other cauſe more ſecret, entertained and nouriſhed in the Kings mind with ſingular art and diligence, by ſuch as with many reaſons laboured to turne him from the enterpriſes of Italy, for that they thought, that for his proper regard and intereſt, he ought to be iealous ouer the greatneſſe of the Duke of Orleans, on whom (if the victory ſucceeded) the Duchie of Millan ſhould fall. And they perſwaded him further, that it was not ſafe for him to go out of France, afore he had made ſome contract with the King and Queene of Spaine; who expreſſing a deſire to be reconciled, had ſent by Embaſſadours to his Maieſtie to make an offer of truce and other meanes of agreement. Many alſo counſelled him to tarry till the Queene was brought to bed, for that it agreed not with his wiſedome, nor with the loue he ought to beare to his peoples, to expoſe his perſon to ſo many perils, afore he had a ſonne and heire to ſo great a ſucceſſion: which was a reaſon that made the deliuery of the Queene more painfull, ſeeing that not many dayes after, the maſculine iſſue which God had giuen him, died. So that partly by the negligence and ſimple counſell of the King, and partly by the difficulties which others cunningly ſuggeſted, the prouiſions were ſo long delayed, that the ruine of his people followed, with the abſolute loſſe of the kingdome of Naples: and the like had hapned to his friends and confederates in Italy, if of themſelues they had not conſtantly defended their proper eſtates.

Federike made king of Naples

Negligence in the French king.

It hath bene ſhewed before, how for feare of the French prouiſions, and more for the contentment of Lodowike Sforce, then any thing agreeable to the Venetians, there was a plot laid to make paſſe into Italy Maximilian Ceſar, with whom whileſt that feare endured, it was agreed: That the Venetians ſhould giue Lodowike for three whole moneths twentie thouſand duckats for euery moneth, to the end he ſhould bring with him a certaine proportion of horſemen and footmen. Vpon the paſſing of which accord, Lodowike accompanied with the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, went to Manza (a place on the other ſide the Alpes, vpon the confines of Almaine) to communicate with his Maieſtie: where, after they had vſed great conference, Lodowike came backe againe the ſame day to Bormy, a towne of the Duchie of Millan on this ſide the Alpes; whither came Maximilian the day following, vnder colour of going on hunting: and after in that enterview of two dayes, they had ſet downe the time and maner of his marching into Italy, Maximilian returned into Germanie to ſolicite the execution of things that were contracted. But the bruite of the prouiſions of France, growing now ſo cold, that for that regard it ſeemed not neceſſary that the Emperour ſhould march: Lodowike determined to ſerue his ambition of that which afore he had procured for his proper ſuretie. He continued then to ſolicite him to deſcend into Italy; and foraſmuch as the Venetians would not be concurrant in the promiſe of thirtie thouſand duckats which he demanded ouer and aboue the threeſcore thouſand that were accorded to him, he bound himſelfe to that demand. Inſomuch that in the end Maximilian

Lodowike will as well ſerue his turne of the Emperour for his ambition, as he had done of the French king in his neceſſitie.

milian paſſed into Italy, a litle afore the death of Ferdinand: of the which when he was aduertiſed, being neare to Millan, he entred into thoughts ſo to handle things, as by his meane the kingdome of Naples might come to Iohn the onely ſonne of the King of Spaine, and his ſonne in law. But being told by Lodowike, that in ſo doing he ſhould diſcontent all Italy, and be the cauſe to diſſolue the vnitie of the Confederates, and conſequently to make eaſie the purpoſes of the King of France, he did not onely giue ouer his firſt cogitation, but alſo fauoured, and ratified by letters the ſucceſſion of Federike. His deſcent into Italy was with a ſmall company of men, but he cauſed a bruite to runne, that there marched after the full number which he had promiſed. And being come to Vigeuena, where he ſoiourned, Lodowike and the Cardinall of Santa Croce (ſent vnto him as Legate by the Pope) together with the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, aſſembled with him in councell, to reſolue what were beſt to be done: and there it was thought moſt neceſſary that he ſhould march into Piemont to take the towne of Aſt, and ſeparate from the French King the Duke of Sauoy and the Marquis of Montferrat, as members depending of the Empire: to whom he addreſſed aduertiſements to come and ſpeake with him in ſome towne of Piemont. But his forces being contemptible, and by that occaſion the effects not anſwering the authoritie of the name Imperiall, not one of them conſented to go to him: and touching the enterpriſe of Aſt, there was no apparence that it ſhould happily ſucceed. He made the like inſtance to come to ſpeake with him, to the Duke of Ferrara, who vnder the name of Feodary of the Empire, poſſeſſed the townes of Modena and Regge; offering him for ſuretie, the faith of Lodowike, his ſonne in law; but he refuſed alſo to go to him, alledging that it ſtood not with his honour ſo to do, for that he held as yet in deputation the Caſtle of Genes. Finally, Lodowike (led ſtill with humors of his ancient couetouſneſſe, and no leſſe diſcontented that Piſa ſo ambitiouſly deſired of him, ſhould fall, with the danger of all Italy, into the power of the Venetians) ſought wonderfully to hinder ſuch a matter, and counſelled the Emperour to go to Piſa, perſwading him with diſcourſes full of deceits, that the Florentines being not ſtrong enough to reſiſt him and the ſtrength of the Confederates, would depart by neceſſitie from the alliance of the French King, and could not refuſe to referre the accord and arbitration of all their controuerſies to the perſon of Maximilian, to the end that if not by reconcilement, at leaſt by way of iuſtice, might be determined the differences betweene them and the Piſans; and that by this meanes Piſa ſhould be put into the hands of Ceſar, and all the appurtenances appertaining to it: whereunto he hoped by his authoritie to make the Piſans conſent; and that the Venetians (all the other Confederates agreeing thereto) would not oppoſe themſelues againſt a concluſion ſo conducible to the common benefite, and no leſſe iuſt and honeſt of it ſelfe. For Piſa being anciently a towne of the Empire, the reknowledging of the rights of ſuch as aſpired to it, appertained to no other then to Ceſar: and ſo being committed of truſt into the hands of Ceſar, Lodowike hoped that he ſhould eaſily come by it, either by money, or for the grace and authoritie which he had with him. This deuice was propounded in the Councell, vnder colour, that ſeeing for the preſent, the feare of the French warres ceaſſed, the comming of Ceſar might be vſed to induce the Florentines to knit with the other Confederates againſt the French King; a deuice pleaſing to Maximilian, who was not a litle diſcontented that his deſcending into Italy bred no effect; hoping withall, that where by reaſon of his infinite plots and inuentions, and no leſſe for his diſorders and vnbridled prodigalities, he had alwayes want of money, Piſa would be an inſtrument to gather ſome great quantitie, either of the Florentines, or others. The deuice alſo was approued by all the Confederates, as a thing very profitable for the ſuretie of Italy: and the Embaſſadour of Venice impugned it not, for that that Senate perceiuing well enough to what ends tended the thoughts of Lodowike, doubted not to beguile him eaſily, and hoped that by meanes of the preſence of Ceſar, might be gotten the hauen of Liuorne, which being vnited once to Piſa, the Florentines had no further hope euer to recouer that Citie.

Lodowike perſwades Ceſar to go to Piſa.

But you muſt vnderſtand, that the Confederates had afore many times made requeſt to the Florentines to vnite with them; and that at the times when moſt they feared the deſcending of the French, they gaue them hopes that they would be bound ſo to order things, that Piſa ſhould eſtſoones returne vnder their iuriſdiction: but the couetouſneſſe of the Venetians and Lodowike being ſuſpected to the Florentines, who would not lightly deuide themſelues from the amitie of the French King, they made no haſte to hearken to ſuch motions: and that which yet held them backe, was a hope to recouer by the coming of the French King, Pietraſanta and Serezana, which

which they could not expect by any working of the Confederates. But that which drew them quite away, was, that they weighing rather their owne merits, and that which they endured for the King, then his nature or his customes, promised to themselues by the meanes of his victory, not onely the Citie of Pisa, but almost all the residue of Tuscane: in which perswasion they were norished by the words of Ierome Sauonarola, who in his Sermons did continually foretel of many felicities and augmentation of impery appointed to that Commonweale after so many trauels and afflictions, together with most grieuous calamities to happen to the Court of Rome, & all the other Potentates of Italy: and albeit Sauonarola was not without his gainsayers, yet there was no litle faith giuen to his words; and many of the principall citizens, wherof, some of sinceritie, some by ambition, and some for feare adhered vnto him in such sort, that the Florentines being disposed to continue in the French amitie, the Confederates thought it not vnreasonable to labour to reduce them by force to that whereunto their wils were so estranged. They supposed the enterprise to inuade them, could not containe many difficulties, for that they were hated of all their neighbours, and had no expectation or hope of succours from the French King, who hauing abandoned the safetie of his owne people, it was very likely that he would faile others. Besides, their great expences for these three yeares, with so generall diminution of their reuenues, had so drained them, that it was not credible that they were able to sustaine so long trauels; seeing withall they had for this yeare past continually followed the warres against Pisa, wherein the accidents had bene diuers and notable, more for the resolution of courage shewed in many valiant acts and enterprises of warre by either part, and by the desperate obstinacie wherewith such things were done, then for any greatnesse of armies, and much lesse for the qualitie of places for the which they fought, being but villages and boroughs of small regard, and of themselues of no great consequence. For (to vse more large discourse) a litle after the Citadell was giuen to the Pisans, and afore the succours of Venice arriued there, the bands of Florence hauing taken the borough of Butie, and from thence incamped at Calcy, and before they tooke it, beginning (for their better suretie of victuals) to build a Bastillion vpon the mount of Doloroſa; the bands of footmen that were there for the guard of the place, were broken by their owne negligence, by the companies of the Pisans: and a litle after, as Francisco Secco was incamped with a great troupe of horsemen in the borough of Butie to see to the safe conuoy of victuals to Hercules Bentiuole, incamped with the footbands of the Florentines about the litle Castle of the hill Verrucole: he was so charged at vnawares by the footmen that came out of Pisa, that by the inconueniencie of the place to apply the seruice of his horsemen, he lost a great part of them. For which successe the affaires of Pisa seeming to rise increasing in fortune, and that with hope of greater prosperitie, for that the succours of the Venetians began to arriue; Hercules Bentiuole lodging in the borough of Bientina, hearing that John Paul Manfron Captaine of the Venetians, was with the first part of their companies come to Vicopisan which is two miles distant from Bientina, fained to haue feare, insomuch that presently he raised his companies and went into the field, and immediatly as soone as the Venetian bands were discouered, he retired againe into Bientina. But after he saw his enemy full of boldnesse and securitie, he trained him one day with great policie into an ambush, where he put him to the worst, with the losse of the most part of his companies, giuing him the chase euen to the wals of Vicopisan: and yet the victory was not in all points happie, for that Francisco Secco, come to the campe that morning to ioyne with Hercules, as they retired, was slaine with the shot of an Harquebuze. After these followed the other bands of the Venetians, amongst whom were eight hundred stradiots led by Iustinian Morosin: by whose coming the Pisans being now far superior, Hercules Bentiuole to whom the parts of the countrey were well knowne, neither willing to put himselfe in danger, nor altogether disposed to abandon the field, incamped in a very strong place, betweene the borough of Pontadere and the riuer of Ere: with the oportunitie of which place, he restrained much the violence of the enemy, who in all that time tooke no other place or peece then the borough of Butie, which yeelded to their discretion: and as they sent out their stradiots to make pillage of the countrey, three hundred of them running vp euen to Valdere, were charged and broken by certaine bands which Hercules sent after them. The Florentines were also in the same season vexed by them of Sienna, who by the occasion of the harmes they suffered in the countrey of Pisa, and at the incensing of the Confederates, sent to incampe afore the Bastillion of the bridge of Valiane, the Lord of Plombin and John Sauelle: but hearing that Rainuce de Marciano arriued with succours,

they retired in great haſte from before the Baſtillion, leauing behind them one part of their artillery: by reaſon whereof the Florentines ſeeing themſelues aſſured on that ſide, cauſed Rainuce to turne his force to the quarter of Piſa: in ſo much that their ſtrength being almoſt equall, the warre was now brought to the boroughs of the hils; but for that they ſtood affected to the Piſans, things fell out more to the diſaduantage of the Florentines; for that the Piſans entring by intelligence into the borough of Pont de Sat, ſtripped a whole company of men at armes, and tooke priſoner Lodowike Marciana; yet they abandoned forthwith the ſaid borough for feare of the Florentine bands which were not farre off. And the better to command and gouerne the hils, which were of great importance to them, as well for the victuals brought from thence to Piſa, as for that they gaue impediments to the Florentines in the traffick of the hauen of Liuorne; they fortified the moſt part of thoſe boroughs, amongſt the which Solana was made noble by a caſuall accident. For the campe of the Florentines being marched thither with intention to take it the ſame day, and for that cauſe hauing ſpoiled all the paſſages of the riuer of Caſcina, and put their men at armes in battell vpon the banke, to cut off the ſuccours of the enemy; it happened that Peter Capponi a chiefe commander amongſt the Florentines, as he was about to plant the artilleries, was ſtriken in the head by a bullet out of the towne, whereof he died preſently: an end vnworthy of his vertue, as well for the ignobilitie of the place, as for the litle importance of ſuch an enterpriſe; and for this accident they raiſed the campe without attempting any further action. Beſides, the Florentines at that time were compelled to ſend bands of men into Lunigiana to ſuccor the Caſtle of Verrucola, which the Marquis of Maleſpina held beſieged by the aide of the Genoways; from whence he eaſily gaue them the chaſe: ſo the ſtrength of the Piſans was mightie for certaine moneths, for that beſides the townesmen and people of the countrey become warlike by long experience, the Venetians and Duke of Millan had there many bands of horſemen and footmen, the Venetian numbers being greateſt: and it came to paſſe that the Dukes companies began to diminiſh becauſe they were not paid as appertained, therefore the Venetians ſent thither a new ſupply of an hundred men at armes, and ſixe gallies laden with proniſion of victuals, wherein they ſpared no neceſſary expences for the ſuretie of that Citie, the ſame hapning in good ſeaſon to winne and draw to them the affections of the Piſans, who euery day more and more eſtranged their minds from the Duke of Millan, as not content with his niggardize in the expence and prouiſion of things neceſſary, nor with his incertainties and variations, which were ſuch, as ſometimes he would be forward in the ſuccour of their affaires, and eſtſoones careleſſe and cold: in ſo much as beginning almoſt to doubt of his will, they layed this to his charge, that Iohn Bentiuole did not aduance to endomage the Florentines according to the commiſſion he had of the Confederates, the rather for that they knew he had failed him in a great part of his paiments, either through his couetouſneſſe, or elſe that the harmes of the Florentines were acceptable to him, but not their whole ruine. By meanes of which operations, he had layed of himſelfe (touching the ſtate of Piſa) foundations contrary to his chiefeſt ends and intentions, for the aduancement whereof he onely induced the Councell of the Confederates to determine that Maximilian Ceſar ſhould go to Piſa.

The Piſans begin to diſclaim the Duke of Millan.

But now returning from whence we came: after it was reſolued that Ceſar ſhould march to Piſa, he diſpatched two Embaſſadours to Florence, to aduertiſe them, that by reaſon of an enterpriſe which he intended with a mightie army againſt the Infidels, he had iudged it an action chiefe and neceſſary, firſt to paſſe into Italy, to the end to pacifie and aſſure the controuerſies there, for which cauſe he exhorted the Florentines that they would communicate together with the other Confederates in the common defence of Italy, or at leaſt if they had another inclination, that they would make manifeſt their intention: That for the ſame occaſion, and for that it appertained to the authoritie Imperiall, he would know the controuerſies that were betweene them and the Piſans, requiring them, till he had taken knowledge of the reaſons of both the one and the other, that they would ſurceaſſe the warre, which he aſſured would not be refuſed by the Piſans, to whom he had imparted the like ſignifications: and he aſſured them with courteous and milde words, that he would be ready to adminiſter iuſtice indifferently. To which meſſage (receiuing the offers of the Emperour with reuerence and recommendation, and expreſſing no leſſe ſhewes of ſingular confidence in his iuſtice and pietie) was anſwered by the Florentines, that they would giue him particularly to vnderſtand of their intention by ſpeciall Embaſſadours to be addreſſed to his Maieſtie with ſpeed. But in the meane while the Venetians (not to leaue to Maximilian or the Duke of Millan any meanes to be maisters ouer Pisa) sent thither with consent of the Pisans a new supply of an hundred and fiftie men at armes, some stradiots, and a thousand footmen vnder the leading of Annibal Bentiuole, signifying to the Duke that they had sent those succours thither, for that their Commonweale, which loued to cherish free Cities, was vniuersally inclined to aide the Pisans to recouer their countrey, as indeed by the succour of those bands they went through with the recouery of almost all the boroughs of the hils. By reason of which benefites, and for the franke readinesse of the Venetians to gratifie their demands which were in great number, sometimes wanting men, sometimes lacking money, and most commonly suffering necessities of victuals and munitions, the will of the Pisans was become so conformable to the desires of the Venetians, that all that office of deuotion and confidence which they were wont to owe to the Duke of Millan, being now transported into them, they greatly desired that that Senate would continue their protectors and defenders: and yet they solicited the coming of Cæsar, in hope that what with the strength they had already within Pisa, and the bands which his Maiestie would leade with him, they should with more facilitie get Liuorne. On the other side the Florentines, who besides other incumbrances, were at that time pressed with a great scarcitie of victuals, were occupied with no small feares, being left alone to resist the power of so many Princes: for that in Italy, there would not rise one in their aide and fauour, and from their Embassadours in France they were certified by letters, that they could hope for no rescue from the King, to whom they had with great instance recommended their suite to be relieued in their great dangers, at least with some proportion of money. Peter de Medicis alone did not molest them, because it was an article in the councell of the Confederates, not to vse in this action either his name or his fauour, knowing by experience, that the Florentines for that feare, did the more increase their vnitie for the preseruation of their libertie. And Ludowike Sforce, vnder colour to be iealous of their safetie, but more discontented with the greatnesse of the Venetians, ceassed not to apply all his discourse of wit and perswasion, to induce them to referre all things to the arbitration of Cæsar, wherein he alledged many great and sensible dangers, and insinuated with arguments and reasons, that this was the only meanes to draw the Venetians from Pisa, and so consequently to accomplish their full reintegration; a thing very necessary for the peace of Italy, and for that cause desired by the King of Spaine, and all the other Confederates. But the Florentines not suffering themselues to be moued with these faire and deceitfull apparences, and much lesse amazed with the contemplation of so many dangers and difficulties, determined to make no declaration with Cæsar, neither to referre their rights to his arbitrement, if first they were not restored to the possession of Pisa, for that they were not assured either of his will or of his authoritie, being manifest that hauing not of himselfe any forces or money, he proceeded as it best seemed to the Duke of Millan: neither did they discerne in the Venetians any disposition or need to leaue Pisa. Therefore they prepared with a franke and liberall resolution of courage, to fortifie and refurnish Liuorne as well as they could, and to draw all their strength into the countrey of Pisa: and yet for that they would not appeare estranged from the peace, and labouring withall to appease Cæsar, they sent Embassadours, who found him at Genes, where he was then arriued. Their commission was (for answer of the things propounded by his Embassadours at Florence) to aduertise him and perswade him, that it was not necessary to proceed to any declaration, because for the reuerence they bare to his name, he might promise to himselfe of the Commonweale of Florence, euen as much as he would desire: and to beseech him to thinke, that for his most holy resolution to reduce Italy to peace, there was nothing more conuenient then immediatly to restore Pisa to the Florentines; for that it was the roote from whence sprong all their deliberations so discontenting to his Maiestie and the Confederates; and Pisa also being in that regard the cause that made some to aspire to the Empire of Italy, who to that end laboured to keepe it in continuall trauels of warre; by which words (although it was no otherwise expressed) was meant the Venetians. Also that it was not agreeable to his iustice, that such as had bene dispoiled by force, should be constrained contrary to the disposition of the lawes Imperiall, to referre their rights to compromise, if first they were not restored to their possession: concluding that the Commonweale of Florence obtaining this of him, and by that meanes no cause remaining to desire any thing but peace with euery one, they would make all such declarations as he should thinke conuenient, and trusting wholly in his iustice, would readily recommend vnto him the knowledge of their rights. anſwer ſatisfied not Maximilian, who deſired aboue all other things, that they ſhould enter into the league vnder faith and promiſe to be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of Piſa within a terme conuenient: notwithſtanding after many diſcourſes and debatings, they could draw no other anſwer from him, ſauing that (vpon the platforme of Genes as he entred the ſea) he told them they ſhould vnderſtand further of his will by the Popes Legate which was at Genes; by whom being ſent backe againe to the Duke, who, from Tortone, whither he had accompanied Maximilian, was returned to Millan, they went into the ſame Citie; where, as they were demanding audience, they receiued commiſſions from Florence, (where they vnderſtood already the fruite of their legation) commanding them without ſeeking other anſwer, to returne home. So that being come to the houre appointed for their audience, they turned their demand of anſwer, into a ſignification of their dutie, that returning to Florence they were bold to lengthen their way to come to do him reuerence afore they parted out of his countrey, as well appertained to the friendſhip which their Commonweale had with him. But the Duke thinking they would demand an anſwer, had aſſembled all the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, and all his owne Councell, to make ſhew (according to his maner) of his eloquence and his cunning, and to ſport himſelfe with the calamities of others: but being not a litle confuſed with the nature of their propoſition, he asked them what anſwer they had of Maximilian. To which demand they anſwering, that according to the lawes of their Commonweale, they might not communicate nor treate of their commiſſion with any other Prince then with him to whom they were aſſigned Embaſſadours: he replied ſomewhat troubled, Then if we giue you anſwer, for the which we know that Cæſar hath referred you to vs, would you not heare it? It is not forbidden vs to heare (ſay they) neither can we let another to ſpeake. He anſwered, We are content to giue you the anſwer, but that cannot well be done, if you pronounce not that which you haue ſaid to him. And the Embaſſadours eftſoones anſwering, that they might not for the ſame reaſons, and that it was ſuperfluous, for that it was neceſſary that Cæſar had imparted their propoſition with thoſe to whom he had giuen the immediate charge to make the anſwer in his name: he could not neither in words nor in geſtures diſſemble his indignation, ſo that he diſmiſſed the Embaſſadours, with all the reſidue which he had aſſembled, receiuing in himſelfe part of that mockery which he meant to haue giuen to others.

Maximilian

Maximilian is come to Piſa.

In the meane while Maximilian departed from the hauen of Genes with ſixe galleys which the Venetians had in the ſea of Piſa, and with many other veſſels of the Genoways very well furniſhed with artillery, but not with fighting men, for that he had no other men of warre then a thouſand Lanceknights; with whom he ſailed to the hauen of Spetia, and frõ thence went by land to Piſa; and there hauing ioyned to his army fiue hundred horſmen, and a thouſand other Lanceknights which had marched by land, he determined to incampe before Liuorne, hauing for his backe the companies of the Duke of Millan, and part of the Venetian bands. His intention was to charge it both by ſea and land, ſending the other Venetian companies to Pont de Sac, to the end the Florentine campe which was not very ſtrong, ſhould not be able to moleſt the Piſans, nor giue ſuccours to Liuorne. But there was no enterpriſe which leſſe aſtoniſhed the Florentines then that of Liuorne, ſufficiently furniſhed with men and artillery, with dayly expectation of ſuccours from Prouence: for that a litle before, to augment their forces with the reputation wherein were at that time in Italy the armies of the French, they had with the conſent of the French king, entertained to their pay, Monſieur d'Albigois one of his Captaines with an hundred lances and a thouſand footmen, as well Swiſſers as Gaſcoines, which were come by ſea to Liuorne in certaine ſhips, which by their directions were loden with graine, to relieue the generall want of victuals reigning in all the lands of their obedience. This deliberation made, with other thoughts and for other ends, then for their defence againſt Maximilian, albeit it was full of difficulties, for that Monſieur d'Albigois with his company already conducted to the ſhips, refuſed to take the ſea, and onely ſixe hundred footmen being imbarked, yet it found ſuch plentifull fauours of fortune, that they could not haue deſired a prouiſion more great or more conuenient; ſeeing that the ſame day that a Commiſſioner of Piſa (ſent before by Maximilian with a great ſtrength of horſemen and footmen to make bridges and plankes for the army which was to follow) arriued before Liuorne, the nauie of Prouence containing fiue ſhips and certaine gallions, together with a great ſhip of Normandie which the King appointed to relieue Caietta with men and victuals, were diſcouered aboue Liuorne with ſo fauourable gales, that without any reſiſtance of the fleet

of the Emperour (for they were conſtrained by the time to ſpred abroad aboue Melorie, a rocke very famous; for that in a ſea battell made there in times paſt betweene the Genowayes and the Piſans, the Piſans were ouerthrowne) they entred the port without other loſſe then of one gallion loden with corne, which was taken by the enemy, as being ſtrayed from the other veſſels. This ſuccour gaue life and courage to thoſe that were within Liuorne, and much aſſured the minds of the Florentines, who interpreted this ſo ſeaſonable coming of the ſhips, to a ſigne, that though humane forces ſhould faile them, yet God would not forſake them, according to the aſſurance which oftentimes Sauonarola had preached to the people, euen when euery one was moſt aſtoniſhed. But for this the Emperour ceaſſed not to match with his campe to Liuorne, whither hauing ſent by land fiue hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen, he paſſed vpon galleys euen to the mouth of the poole which is betweene Piſa and Liuorne: and hauing appointed one part of the place to be inuaded by the Count Caiazze, whom the Duke of Millan had ſent with him, he preſented himſelfe afore the other: and albeit the firſt day he had no ſmall ado to ſettle his campe there for the great impediments which the artilleries of Liuorne gaue to him; yet after he had approched his army before day on that ſide to the fountaine, and hauing a chiefe deſire to be firſt maiſter of the hauen, he began to batter with the cannon Magnane, which was well fortified by them within; who ſeeing the campe drawne on that ſide, had on the other ſide ruined Polazzotte and the tower ſtanding on that ſide to the ſea, as a thing not only not guardable, but alſo conuenient to make them loſe the new tower. He cauſed alſo at the ſame time to come neare the hauen, his army by ſea, to beate the parts on the ſea ſide: for the French ſhips, after they had landed their men, and vnladen one part of their corne, as they were bound, returned into Prouence, and the Norman ſet ſaile to Caietta, notwithſtanding many importunities and requeſts to haue them tarry. The battery that thundred againſt Magnane, nouriſhing an intention to aſſault the towne afterwards by ſea, profited very litle: for that it was fortified in ſuch ſort, that the artillery did not much offend them; the defendants alſo very often making ſallies to skirmiſh with the enemy. But as the hopes of the Florentines began by the fauour of the winds, ſo it was a deſtiny that by the benefit of the winds ſhould be wrought their whole perfection. For by a great ſtorme riſing vpon the ſudden, the nauie of Ceſar was in ſuch ſort cruſhed, that the great ſhip Grimauld a Genoway, which had carried his Maieſties perſon, after ſhe had long wrought againſt the rage of the ſtorme, was drowned right againſt the new tower of Liuorne, with all the men and artillery that ſhe bare: and the like hapned at the point towards S. Iaques, to two galleys of the Venetians; and all the other veſſels were ſo diſperſed and bruiſed, that they became vnprofitable for the preſent enterpriſe; by meanes of which accident, the defendants recouered the gallion which before was fallen into the powet of the enemies. This ſhipwracke procured the Emperour to returne to Piſa; where after many counſels, euery one diſtruſting the poſſibilitie of the enterpriſe of Liuorne, it was agreed to raiſe the campe from thence, and transferre the warre to another part. And therefore the Emperour went to Vicopiſan, and cauſed to be built a bridge vpon Arne, betweene Caſſine and Vico, and another vpon Cilecchio: but whileſt it was expected that he would paſſe ouer, he departed vpon the ſudden, and returned by land the right way to Millan, hauing brought forth no other action in Tuſcane, ſauing that foure hundred of his horſemen ſackt Bolgheri, a towne almoſt vnknowne in the plaine of Piſa. He excuſed his ſudden departure vpon the difficulties that increaſed vpon him euery day, as well for that they ſupplied him not with money as often as he demanded, as for that the Venetian commiſſioners would not conſent that the greateſt part of their bands ſhould iſſue out of Piſa, for the ſuſpition they had of him; beſides that they had not fully ſatisfied him of their portion of the threeſcore thouſand duckats: for which iniuries (extolling greatly the Duke of Millan) he made many grieuous complaints againſt them. He paſſed by Pauie, where was taken a new counſell: and albeit he had publiſhed that he would returne into Almaine, yet he agreed to ſtay in Italy all the winter with a thouſand horſemen and two thouſand footmen, ſo that they would pay to him for euery moneth two and twentie thouſand florins of Rhein: and whileſt the anſwer from Venice was expected, he went from thence to Lomelline, at the time when there was looking to receiue him at Millan; it being a thing fatall vnto him (as was well approued by the experiences following) not to enter into that Citie. From Lomelline with a mind changed, he turned his way to Cuſague, ſixe miles from Millan; from whence contrary to all opinions, and vnwitting to the Duke and the Embaſſadours

which were there, he went to Coma: where vnderſtanding as he ſate at dinner, that the Popes Legat, to whom he had ſent that he ſhould not follow him, was arriued; he aroſe from the table, and embarked with ſo great haſte, that there was ſcarce leiſure to the Legat to deliuer to him a few words within the barke: to whom he anſwered in ſhort, that he was conſtrained to go into Almaine, but that he would returne with ſpeed. And albeit, after he was brought by the lake of Coma to Vellaſte, he was aduertiſed that the Venetians would condeſcend to all things that were agreed vpon at Pauie; yet he continued his voyage, and gaue them new hopes to returne to Millan: but a very few dayes after, according to the inconſtancie of his nature, he left part of his horſemen and footbands, and ſailed directly into Almaine, hauing ſhewed (with a very litle honor to the name Imperiall) his weakneſſe in Italy, wherein long time before had not bene ſeene any Emperour armed. And Lodowike deſpairing for the going away of the Emperour (if there happened not new accidents) to be able any more to draw Piſa to himſelfe, and much leſſe to keepe it out of the hands of the Venetians, withdrew from thence all his people, making it ſome conſolation to his diſpleaſures, that the Venetians onely ſhould remaine intangled with the warre againſt the Florentines; perſwading himſelfe, that the long trauels and perplexities of both the one and the other part, might with time raiſe vp ſome occaſions fauourable to his deſires. Now by the departure of the bands of Lodowike, the Florentines, whoſe power was ſtrongeſt in the countrey of Piſa, recouered againe all the boroughs about the hils: by reaſon whereof the Venetians being conſtrained to leuie new prouiſions to hinder their further proceedings, adioyned ſo many bands more to the companies they entertained already within Piſa, that in all, their armie contained foure hundred men at armes, ſeuen hundred light horſemen, and more then two thouſand footmen.

In this meane while in the kingdome of Naples there was almoſt an end put to all the reſidue of the warre againſt the French; for that the towne of Tarente, preſſed with famine, was rendred with her Caſtles to the Venetians, who had beſieged it by ſea; and after they had kept it certaine dayes, there growing a ſuſpition that they would appropriate it to themſelues, at the great inſtance of the Pope and the King of Spaine, they rendred it to Federike. And as it was vnderſtood at Caietta, that the great Norman ſhip hauing fought aboue the port Hercules with certaine Genoway ſhips which ſhe encountred, and ſailing afterwards in her courſe, was ſo beaten with ſtormes, that ſhe was drowned; the French men that defended Caietta, whither the new King was eftſoones marched with his campe, (albeit the brute went that there were victuals and munitions enough to beare out the ſiege certaine moneths) iudging that in the end their King would be as ſlow to miniſter to their ſuccours, as he was careleſſe of ſo great a part of his Nobilitie, and to reſcue ſo many places holding for him: they accorded with Federike, by the ſolicitation of Monſieur d'Aubigny (who for ſome difficulties hapning in the aſſignement of the fortreſſes in Calabria, was not yet departed from Naples) to leaue the towne and caſtle, and returne by ſea into France with ſafetie and protection of their liues and goods. By reaſon of which agreement, the French King ſeeing himſelfe deliuered of ſo many cares and thoughts to miniſter ſuccours to the kingdome of Naples; and on the other ſide, being inraged for the harmes and infamies of thoſe warres, he determined to ſet vpon Genes; wherein he hoped much in the faction of Baptiſtin Fregoſa (aforetimes Duke of that Citie) and in the traine and followers which the Cardinall of S. Peter ad Vincula had in the towne of Sauona, and in thoſe riuers: ſuppoſing withall that a good occaſion was offered; for that in thoſe ſeaſons Iohn Lewis de Fieſco, and the family of the Adornes, were in diſcord, and all the Genowayes generally ill contented with the Duke of Millan, both for that in the ſale of Pietraſanta, he had preferred the Lucquoys before them, and alſo, hauing promiſed to reduce it eftſoones into their hands, vſing in that action (the better to appeaſe the indignation conceiued againſt him) the authoritie of the Venetians, he had nouriſhed them many moneths with vaine hopes. For feare of this determination of the King, Lodowike (who for the occaſion of Piſa was almoſt eſtranged from the Venetians) was compelled to knit of new with them, and to ſend to Genes the horſemen and footmen of the Almaines which Maximilian had left in Italy, for whom (if this neceſſitie had not happened) there would haue bene neither emploiment, nor prouiſion made.

Tarente and Caietta are rendred to Federike the new king of Naples

The French King determineth to ſet vpon Genes.

Whileſt theſe things were in ſolicitation, the Pope (finding now a great oportunitie to occupie the eſtates of the Vrſins, for that the principals of that family were reſtrained in Naples) pronounced rebels in the Conſiſtorie, Virginio and the reſidue of that race, and confiſked their eſtates, eſtates, for that contrary to his commandement they had taken pay of the French; and hauing ſo done, he aſſailed their lands in the beginning of the yeare 1497, hauing ordered that the Colonnoys ſhould do the like in all thoſe places where they confined with the Vrſins. This enterpriſe was much furthered by the Cardinall Aſcanius, no leſſe for the ancient amitie he had with the Colonnoys, then for a ſetled diſſention and diſagreement entertained of long againſt the Vrſins; and was alſo conſented vnto by the Duke of Millan. But it was diſpleaſing to the Venetians, who deſired to winne that family, and to draw them to their deuotion: neuertheleſſe not being able with any iuſtifications to hinder the Pope from purſuing his rights, and withall holding it nothing profitable in that time to alienate him from them; they conſented that the Duke of Vrbin, mercenary in common to the Pope and to them, ſhould march to ioyne with the bands of the Church, ouer whom was Captaine generall the Duke of Candie; and in the office of Legat, the Cardinall la Luna borne at Pauie; a Cardinall wholly depending vpon Aſcanius: and King Federike of Naples ſent alſo Fabricius Colonne. This armie, after many peeces had rendred, marched to incampe at Triuignian, which towne maintaining a valiant defence for certaine dayes, yeelded at laſt to diſcretion. But during the defence of that towne, Bartlemew d'Aluiano iſſuing out of Bracciana, put to flight within eight miles of Rome, foure hundred horſemen that guided the artilleries to the campe Eccleſiaſticke: and another day running with the ſame fortune euen to the croſſe of Montmarie, he lacked not much of taking the Cardinall of Valence, who coming out of Rome to the chaſe, found his beſt ſafetie in the ſwiftneſſe of his horſe. After the rendring of Triuignian, the campe drew to the Ile, where after they had battered one part of the rocke with the artillery, they obtained it by compoſition. At length all the warre was reduced to Bracciana, where the Vrſins had layed vp all the hope of their defence; for that the place which was ſtrong before, was of new refortified with munitions and rampiers, and the ſuburbes reenforced, hauing at the entrie thereof erected a baſtillion, and beſtowed within it a ſufficient ſtrength of men vnder the gouernment of Aluiano, whoſe youth gaue him a bodie diſpoſed, and his wit no leſſe quick and reſolute, then his diligence incredible, increaſed in him (with exerciſe in armes) thoſe hopes and expectations, to the which in times ſucceeding, his actions were nothing inferior. The Pope ceaſſed not to increaſe daily his army, which he had of new refurniſhed with 800 Lanceknights of thoſe that had bene employed in the warres of Naples. There were dayly skirmiſhes on both parts, and that with great contention; thoſe without planting their artillery in many ſeuerall places; and they within, not forgetting to repaire and fortifie with preſent diligence and aſſurance. And yet within few dayes, the defendants were conſtrained to abandon the ſuburbes; which being taken, the Eccleſiaſticks gaue a furious aſſault to the towne, wherein albeit their fortune made them able to aduance their enſignes vpon the walls, yet by the vertue of the defendants they were eſtſoones forced to retire, ſuffering a great loſſe, in which action was hurt Antonel Sauelle. The defendants expreſſed the like valour in another aſſault, repulſing the enemie with a furie more reſolute and a loſſe more generall, for that two hundred of them were either ſlaine or very ſore wounded, not without the great praiſe of Aluiano, to whom was iuſtly giuen the principall glorie of that defence; for that within, he was of a liuely readineſſe to all offices neceſſary; and without, with continuall eruptions and ſallies, he kept the armie of the enemie day and night in alarums. And he added much to his reputation, in that by his direction, certaine light horſemen iſſuing out of Ceruetre (which the Vrſins held) and making incurſions euen to the campe, he himſelfe taking the occaſion of this tumult, charged them out of the towne, and put to flight the footbands that guarded the artilleries, of which he carried into Bracciana certaine ſmall peeces: and yet at length he and his companies hauing no reſpite neither day nor night, began to ſupport themſelues chiefly with hope of ſuccours, for that Charles Vrſin, and Vitellozze, who was knit to the Vrſins by a bond of the faction of Guelffes, (and being paſſed into Italy in the veſſels that came from Prouence to Liuorne, with money from the French King to redreſſe their bands diſperſed in the kingdome of Naples) prepared to ſuccour them in ſo great a danger: and for this cauſe Charles went to Soriana, to reaſſemble the old ſouldiers, friends and followers of the Vrſins: and Vitellozze at Citta de Caſtello made the like leuie of the ſouldiers and footmen of the countrey, adioyning with great diligence his whole ſtrength to Charles at Soriana, hauing in his regiment two hundred men at armes, and eighteene hundred footmen of his owne, with artillerie vpon wheeles, after the maner of France. By reaſon whereof the Captaines Eccleſiaſticke, foreſeeing that (if they marched forward) it would be dan-

dangerous to be incloſed in the midſt betweene the new ſuccours, and the old enemies within Bracciana; and to the end not to leaue them in prey all the countrey thereabouts, wherein they had already ſackt diuers boroughs, they leuied their campe from before Bracciana, and when they had put all their great artilleries within Anguillare, they marched directly to that quarter where the enemies were; and encountring them betweene Soriana and Baſſan, they fought together with great furie for certaine houres. But in the end (though at the firſt meeting they tooke priſoner Franciot Vrſin) were put to flight, with the loſſe of their baggage and artilleries: and they loſt, what in the ſlaughter, and by taking priſoners, more then fiue hundred men, among which priſoners, were the Duke of Vrbin, Iohn Peter of Gonſague Count of Nugolare, with many other bodies of marke: but the Duke of Candie lightly hurt in the face, and with him the Popes Legat, and Fabrice Colonne, found ſafetie by flying into Roncillon. Aboue all the reſidue, Vitellozze carried the honor and merit of this victorie, for that the bands of footmen of Citta de Caſtello, who had bene afore trained and managed by him and his brethren, with the orders and diſciplines of the French, were that day greatly aided by his induſtrie; and hauing armed them with pikes longer by an arme length then thoſe which were cuſtomably vſed, they had ſo much aduantage when they came to the ſhock with the footmen of the enemies, that wounding them with the oddes of length in their pikes, they put them eaſily to the chaſe; ſo much the more to their greater honor, by how much in the contrary battell, there were eight hundred footmen of the Almaines, of which nation the infanterie of Italy haue had a continuall feare euer ſince the deſcending of King Charles. After this victorie, the victors began to run without reſiſtance ouer all the countrey on this ſide Tyber; and afterward hauing paſſed part of their companies ouer the riuer beneath the hill Rotonde, they ſtill inuaded thoſe wayes where they ſuppoſed was any retrait for the enemie. In regard of which dangers, the Pope making a new leuie of men of warre, called to his ſuccours from the kingdome of Naples, Gonſaluo and Proſper Colonne. And yet not many dayes after (the Ambaſſadours of Venice interpoſing diligently to do pleaſure to the Vrſins, and alſo the Ambaſſadour of the King of Spaine fearing leſt theſe beginnings would draw ſome ill conſequence to the league) a peace was made, with a moſt readie inclination, as well of the Pope, who naturally hated expences, as of the Vrſins; who being no leſſe poore in money, then naked in friends, knew that their neceſſitie in the end would compell them to yeeld to the power of the Pope: the articles of this peace were theſe; That it ſhould be ſuffered to the Vrſins to continue in the pay of the French till the end of the time for which they were hired by the King, with expreſſe mention that they ſhould not be bound to take armes againſt the Church: That all the places which they had loſt in this warre ſhould be reſtored, paying to the Pope fiftie thouſand duckats, of the which, thirtie thouſand to be paid as ſoone as Iohn Iordan and Paul Vrſin ſhould be ſet at liberty, (for Virginio not many daies before died within the caſtle of the Egge, either of an ague, or as ſome thought, by poiſon) and the other twentie thouſand duckats within eight moneths: and that for aſſurance of the paiment, Anguillare and Ceruetre ſhould be committed of truſt into the keeping of the Cardinals Aſcanius and S. Seuerin: That all the priſoners taken in the iourney of Soriana ſhould be redeliuered, except the Duke of Vrbin, for whoſe libertie (albeit the Ambaſſadours of the Confederates made great ſute) the Pope would ſolicite nothing: for that he knew the Vrſins had no meanes to raiſe the money they were to pay to him, but by the ranſome of the ſaid Duke, for whom a litle after, was agreement made for fortie thouſand duckats, but with this addition, that he ſhould not be deliuered afore Paul Vitelli (who remained priſoner to the Marquis of Mantua at the rendring of Atella) had obtained his libertie without paying any ranſome.

Capitulations betweene the Pope and the Vrſins.

The Pope hauing thus to his litle honour rid his hands of the warre againſt the Vrſins, made diſtribution of the money to the companies which Gonſaluo brought with him, and as well theſe companies as his owne ioyned together, he ſent to take Oſtia, as yet holden in the name of the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula: before which the artillerie was no ſooner planted, but the caſtle-keeper rendred all to diſcretion. Oſtia recouered, Gonſaluo made his entrie into Rome almoſt in maner triumphant, with an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſe, and fifteene hundred footmen, all ſouldiers of the Spaniſh, leading before him as priſoner the caſtle-keeper, whom a litle after he ſet at libertie. There came to meete him many Prelates, the Popes houſhold, and all the Cardinals, followed with much people, and almoſt all the Court, running with great deſire to ſee a Captaine whoſe name bare ſo great fame through all Italy. He was brought brought to the Pope ſitting in the Conſiſtorie, who receiuing him with great honour, gaue him in teſtimonie of his valour, the Roſe which the Popes are wont to beſtow euery yeare. After this Gonſaluo returned to ioyne himſelfe with King Federike, who had inuaded the eſtate of the Preſect of Rome, and reſumed all thoſe places, which taken from the Marquis of Peſcaire in the conqueſt of the kingdome, were beſtowed vpon him by the French king; and hauing taken Sora and Arci (but not the Caſtles) he lay incamped before the rocke Guillaume, hauing had by accord the eſtate of the Count d'Oliuet, before he ſold his Duchie of Sora to the Prefect of Rome. Howbeit in theſe proſperities Federike was not without his perplexities, not onely by his friends, (for Gonſaluo kept one part of Calabria in the name of the King of Spaine) but alſo of his reconciled enemies: for that the Prince of Biſignian, being one euening ſore hurt by a certaine Greeke, as he went out of the new Caſtle of Naples, the Prince of Salerne was in ſuch feare that the blow was giuen by the Kings commandement in reuenge of offences paſſed, that immediatly (not diſſembling the cauſe of his ſuſpition) he went from Naples to Salerne. And albeit the King ſent to vſe at his will the Greeke detained in priſon, to iuſtifie (as the truth was) that he had giuen the blow for an iniury to him done long before by the Prince of Biſignian in the perſon of his wife: yet (as in ancient and great grudges it is hard to eſtabliſh a faithfull reconciliation, for that it hath his proper impediments either of ſuſpition or deſire of reuenge) the Prince of Salerne could neuer after diſpoſe himſelfe to truſt him: which giuing hope to the French (who kept ſtill the mount S. Ange, and ſome other ſtrong places) of ſome new innouation or inſurrection in the kingdome of Naples, procured them with more conſtancie to ſtand to their defence.

In theſe ſeaſons farre greater dangers appeared in Lombardie, by the emotions of the French, aſſured for the preſent by the threatnings of the Spaniſh: for that paſſing betweene them, rather light incurſions and apparences of warre, then any thing of notable action, ſauing that the French burned the towne of Sauſſes: they had begun a parly of accord, and for the more eaſie negotiation of it, had made a ſurceaſing of armes for two moneths: by meanes whereof the French King hauing more libertie to hearken after the affaires of Genes and Sauona, diſpatched to Aſt an armie of a thouſand lances, three thouſand Swiſſers, and a like number of Gaſcoines, commanding Triuulce his Lieutenant in Italy, to apply aides to Baptiſtin and the Cardinall of S. Peter ad Vincula: his intention was to ſend after the Duke of Orleans with a ſtrong armie, to execute in his proper name the enterpriſe of the Duchie of Millan. And to make more eaſie the action of Genes, he ſent Octauian Fregoſe to require the Florentines to inuade at the ſame time Lunigiana and the riuer of the Eaſt, ordaining alſo that the Southerne riuers ſhould be troubled by Paul Baptiſta Fregoſe with ſeuen galleys. This enterpriſe was begun with ſuch aſtoniſhment to the Duke of Millan, not prepared ſufficiently of himſelfe, and hauing leſſe ſuretie of the aides promiſed by the Venetians; that if it had proceeded as it ought, it could not but haue brought forth ſome effect of importance, and more eaſily in the Duchie of Millan, then in Genes. For at Genes Iohn Lewis de Fieſque, and the Adornes, who were reconciled by the meanes of Lodowike, had leuied many bands of footmen, and rigged at the charges of the Venetians and Lodowike an armie at ſea, to the which were ioyned ſixe galleys ſent by Federike: but the Pope entertaining the name of a Confederate, more in counſels and demonſtrations, then in workes and meanings, would not in thoſe dangers contribute to any expences, neither by ſea nor land. The proceedings of this expedition were, that Baptiſtin, and with him Triuulce, ſhould march to Nony, of which towne Baptiſtin had bene deſpoiled afore by the Duke of Millan, but not of the Caſtle, which he had alwayes kept, and yet held. But by reaſon of their coming in ſuch ſtrong order, the Count Caiazze, which was there in garriſon with threeſcore men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, and fiue hundred footmen, diſtruſting much to be able to defend it, retired to Seranall. The conqueſt of this towne augmented greatly the reputation of the baniſhed: for beſides that the towne is capable of many people, it ſtops the paſſage from Millan to Genes; and by reaſon of the oportunitie and ſeate of the place, it is very conuenient to endomage the countrey adioyning. After this, Baptiſtin made himſelfe Lord of certain other peeces neare to Nony, and at the ſame time the Cardinall with two hundred lances and three thouſand footmen, hauing taken Vintemille, coaſted ouer to Sauona, where finding no inſurrection by the inhabitants, and hauing eſpiall that Iohn Adorne approched with a ſtrong band of footmen, he retired to Altare, a place of the Marquis of Montferrat diſtant eight miles from Sauona. But Triuulce in the beginning did an action of greater importance, for that hauing a deſire to giue occaſion to kindle the warre in the Duchie of Millan, notwithſtanding the Kings commiſſion was to execute firſt the affaires of Genes and Sauona, he tooke Boſco, a borough of great importance in the countrey of Alexandria: wherein this was his pretext and colour, that for the ſuretie of the bands which were gone to the Eaſt riuers, it was neceſſarie to take from thoſe of the Duke, the meanes to go into Alexandria vpon the lands of the Genowayes. But tempring his deſire, with regard to the Kings commandement, which he thought not reaſonable to impugne manifeſtly, he forbare to paſſe further, loſing a moſt faire occaſion, for that all the countrey thereabout drew into great ſtirre and tumult for the taking of the place, ſome for feare, ſome for deſire of innouation. And of that ſide, there was no greater ſtrength for the Duke, then fiue hundred men at armes, and ſixe thouſand footmen: beſides, Galeas de Saint Seuerin, who being within Alexandria, began to diſtruſt his defence without greater forces: and Lodowike himſelfe, who ſhewed himſelfe no leſſe timorous in this aduerſitie, then by the propertie of his nature he expreſſed in all other accidents, ſolicited the Duke of Ferrara to worke ſome accord betweene the French King and him. But the ſoiourning of Triuulce betweene Boſco and Nouy, gaue ſufficient time to Lodowike to furniſh himſelfe, and good reſpite to the Venetians (who ſeeming moſt readie and prepared for his defence, had ſent afore to Genes fifteene hundred footmen) to ſend into Alexandria, bands of men at armes, and light horſemen: yea the Venetians appointed the Count Petillane Generall of their regiments, (for the Marquis of Mantua was withdrawne from their pay) to march with the moſt part of their companies to the ſuccours of that State. Thus things begun with ſo great hope, now growing cold, Baptiſtin hauing nothing profited at Genes (for the Citie was quiet for the prouiſions that were made) returned to ioyne with Triuulce, publiſhing that his exploits brought forth no ſucceſſe of ſeruice, for that the riuer of the Leuant was not aſſailed by the Florentines, who iudged it not a counſell wiſe to enter into warre, if firſt the things of France appeared not more proſperous and more puiſſant. In like ſort came and ioyned with Triuulce, the Cardinall ad Vincula, by whom was done no other thing, then that he had taken certaine places of the Marquis of Finale, for that he declared himſelfe for the defence of Sauona. The French companies drawing now all into one ſtrength, made certaine offers to Caſtellat, a place neare to Boſco, which had bene aforetime fortified by the Captaines of the Duke. But the armie of the Confederates which reaſſembled in Alexandria, increaſing dayly in qualitie of ſouldiers, and quantitie of prouiſions: and on the contrary, both money and victuals beginning to faile among the French, and their Captaines not a litle impatient to obey Triuulce, it was neceſſary for him to leaue Nouy and Boſco in garriſon, and retire neare the towne of Aſt.

It was beleeued that the diſtribution of the bands into ſeuerall places, brought great harme to the enterpriſe, as oftentimes hapneth in the like examples: and that if they all ioyned into one ſtrength, had bene at the beginning addreſſed to Genes, the expedition perhaps had drawne ſome better ſucceſſe: ſeeing that beſides the inclination of factions, and indignation conceiued for Pietraſanta, one part of the horſemen and footmen of the Almaines, which the Duke ſent thither, reuolted from the ſeruice, and returned vpon the ſudden into their countrey: it might be alſo, that euen thoſe who the yeare before had hindred the Kings deſcending into Italy, and the ſuccours of the kingdome of Naples, applying now the ſame meanes, did giue impediments to the preſent enterpriſe by the difficultie of prouiſions. This likelihood of truth was iuſtified by a bruite that ranne, that the Duke of Millan (to the oppreſſion of his ſubiects) made great preſents to the Duke of Bourbon, and others that had great fauour with the King; in which infamie the Cardinall of S. Malo had not the leaſt intereſt. But whatſoeuer it was, it is moſt certaine that the Duke of Orleans appointed to paſſe to Aſt, and called vpon by the vehement ſolicitation of the King, made all his preparations neceſſary for the expedition: but he lingred, either for that he diſtruſted the continuation of the prouiſions, or (as ſome interprete) he had no forwardneſſe to depart out of France, the King being continually ill diſpoſed of his health, and (in caſe of ſterilitie) the ſucceſſion of the Crowne appertaining to him.

But the King reaping no fruite of his hope for the mutation of Genes and Sauona, continued with more diligence his practiſes begun with the King and Queene of Spaine, which hitherto had bene lingred for this onely difficultie, that the French King deſiring that he might be in libertie to proſecute his enterpriſes on this ſide the Mounts, would not that in the Truce then in negotiation, ſhould be comprehended the things of Italy. And the Kings of Spaine ſhewing that they made no difficultie to conſent to his will for other reſpect then in regard of their honour, ſolicited much that the Italian actions might be comprehended, alledging that the common intention of them both being to make a Truce, to the end a peace might more eaſily ſucceed, they might afterwards with greater honeſty, depart from the confederation which they had with the Italians. In ſo much that after many meetings and diſcourſes of the Ambaſſadours of both ſides, (the Spaniſh ſubtilties in the end carrying it) they made a Truce for them, their ſubiects, and dependants, and alſo for ſuch as either of them ſhould name: which Truce beginning betweene them the fift day of March, (but betweene ſuch as ſhould be nominated, fiftie dayes after) ſhould laſt vnto the end of the next October. Euery one of them named thoſe Eſtates and Potentates of Italy which were their confederates and adherents; but the Kings of Spaine named moreouer King Federike and the Piſans. After this they agreed to ſend men to Montpellier to ſolicite a peace, where they ſhould find the Embaſſadours of the Confederates. In this practiſe, the Kings of Spaine gaue hope to vnite themſelues with the French King againſt the Italians, vnder a certaine occaſion iuſtifiable, and from that time they communed of conditions and meanes to deuide the kingdome of Naples. Which Truce, albeit it was made without the participation of the Confederates of Italy, yet it was agreeable to them all, but ſpecially to the Duke of Millan, who deſired greatly that the warre might ceaſſe in his quarter. But power remaining free to offend one another in Italy, vntil the xxv. of Aprill, Triuulce, Baptiſtin, and Serenon, taking the aduantage of that article, returned with fiue thouſand men to the riuer of the Weſt, where they aſſaulted the towne of Albinge: which albeit they had almoſt caried at the firſt aſſault, yet they ſuffered repulſe by a very ſmall ſtrength of the enemie, for that their entrie was in diſorder. Afterwards they fell vpon the Marquiſdome of Finale, giuing occaſion to the Italian armie to make to their ſuccours, hoping by that meanes to draw them to battell: which not ſucceeding according to their expectation, they did no further action of importance, the diſcord of their Captaines increaſing, and their paiments failing dayly more and more by reaſon of the truce. In which times the Confederates had recouered all their places loſt before (except Nouy) which alſo they obtained at laſt by compoſition, although the Count Caiazze which had beſieged it, had bene repulſed, and there remained in the power of the French no other thing of the places conquered, then certaine litle townes in the Marquiſdome of Finale. During all which emotions and ſtirres, the Duke of Sauoy, who had bene ſolicited on all parts with no ſmall promiſes, and the Marquis of Montferrat (whoſe gouernment had bene confirmed by the Emperour to Conſtantine of Macedonia) ſtood neuters, declaring neither for the King nor for the Confederates.

In this yeare was nothing done of importance betweene the Florentines and the Piſans, notwithſtanding the warre continued without intermiſſion; ſauing that the Piſans led, vnder the direction of Iohn Paul Manfron, foure hundred light horſemen, and fifteene hundred footmen, to recouer their Baſtillion vnder the bridge of the poole, which they loſt when the Emperour went to Liuorne. The Count Rainuce hauing aduertiſement of this enterpriſe, put himſelfe vpon the way of Liuorne, to reſcue the Baſtillion with a good troupe of horſemen: the Piſans not looking to be charged but by the way of Pontadere, and being ſet vpon as they began to aſſault the Baſtillion, were eaſily put to flight, many of them being made priſoners. But at laſt, armes and actions of warre ceaſſed alſo betweene them, by reaſon of the Truce; notwithſtanding it was with an ill will accepted of the Florentines, who iudged it very vnexpedient for their affaires to giue leiſure to the Piſans to take breath, ſeeing withall, that notwithſtanding the truce, neceſſitie compelled them to continue the ſame expences, both for doubt of Peter de Medicis, alwayes conſpiring againſt them, and for feare of the Venetian bands within Piſa. Thus armes being laid aſide on all parts, or at leaſt at point to ceaſſe, the Duke of Millan, albeit in his lateſt dangers he had expreſſed his great contentment with the Senate of Venice, for the ready and full ſuccours he had receiued from them; exalting with publicke and heroicke words the vertue and power of the Venetians, and greatly commending the prouidence of Iohn Galeas the firſt Duke of Millan, for that he had committed to the faith of the ſame Senate the execution of his Teſtament: yet hauing no patience to endure that the prey of Piſa, followed by him with ſo many paines and practiſes, ſhould be transferred to them, as manifeſtly appeared it would, he aſſayed to obtaine with induſtrie and policie, that which he could not by force; and ſo wrought, that the Pope and the Spaniſh Embaſſadour (to both which ſuch a greatneſſe of the Venetians was displeasing) should set downe, that to leaue to the French no foundation in Italy, as also to reduce all into one accord, it were necessary to induce the Florentines to enter into the common league; causing Pisa to be restored to them, seeing otherwayes they could not be brought to it: for that so long as they were separated from the residue, they would not cease to stirre vp the French King to descend into Italy, to whom in such an action, they might (hauing their situation in the midst of Italy) with their money, and with their forces, do things of great importance. But this proposition was impugned by the Embassadours of Venice, as very preiudiciall to their common safetie; alledging withall the inclination of the Florentines to be such to the French King, that euen with this benefite, it was no reason to trust them, if they deliuered not sufficient securitie to obserue the things they should promise: and that in a matter of such weight, there was no other suretie, then to put Liuorne into the hands of the Confederates: and this was very cunningly alledged by him, to the end to haue alwayes the greater meanes to gainsay this proposition; knowing well they would neuer consent to commit to deputation a place of such respect for their Estate: wherein, the matter drawing afterwards such successe as he looked for, he still opposed against it with such vehemencie, that the Pope and the Duke of Millans Embassadour, not daring to obiect against him for feare to estrange the Venetians from their friendship, the deuice rested there: and there began betweene the Pope and the Venetians a new plot, to turne away with violence the Florentines from the amitie of the French: the ill conditions of that Citie giuing courage to whomsoeuer would offend it. For since the time that the authoritie popular was established, there was not introduced such moderation, as assuring the libertie with due and reasonable meanes, might haue bene the let, that the Common-weale should not haue bene disordered by the ignorance and licence of the multitude: so as the Citizens of greatest qualitie and condition, being lesse esteemed then seemed conuenient; and on the other side, their ambition being suspected to the people, and many oftentimes intruding into deliberations weightie, who were but litle capable; and the soueraigne Magistrate, to whom was referred the issue of the most weightie affaires, being changed from two moneths to two moneths, the Common-weale was gouerned with a great confusion: To which was added the great authoritie of Sauonarola, whose auditors were almost entred into secret intelligence: and as there were amongst them many honorable Citizens, and they surpassing in number such as were of the contrary opinion; so it seemed that magistracies and publicke honours were distributed rather to those that followed him, then to others. And therefore the Citie being manifestly deuided, in the assemblies and counsels publicke, one faction quarelled another, no man making conscience (which hapneth in States fallen into diuision) to hinder the benefite publicke, to imbase the reputation of his aduersaries. These disorders were so much the more dangerous, by how much, for the long trauels and great expences suffered by that Citie, there was that yeare a generall dearth and want of all kind of victuals; by reason whereof it might be presumed, that the people vexed with hunger, would be desirous of new things.

Disorders in Florence for the gouernment.

This ill disposition of the ciuill affaires of Florence, gaue hope to Peter de Medicis (who besides these occasions was pushed on by certaine Citizens) to be able with ease to obtaine his desire: and therefore after he had communicated his intention with the Cardinall of Saint Seuerin his ancient friend, and with Aluiano; and being also secretly encouraged by the Venetians, to whom it seemed, that by the trauels of the Florentines the affaires of Pisa would be assured: he determined to surprise the towne of Florence, the rather being aduertised that they had created their supreme Magistrate (which they call Gonfalonnier of iustice) Bernardin de Nero, a man of great grauitie and authoritie, who had bene of continued friendship with his father and him: and that they had ioyned to him in assistance of that Magistracie certaine others, in whom, for old kindnesses and benefites, he supposed was no small inclination for his greatnesse. The Pope fauoured this plot, desiring to deuide the Florentines from the French King by iniuries, seeing he could not separate them by benefites: and the Duke of Millan was not against it, to whom it seemed, that he could not make a foundation or intelligence stable with that Citie, because of the disorders of the present gouernment: although on the other side, he tooke no delight in the returne of Peter, as well for the wrongs he had done him, as for doubt lest he should depend too much on the authoritie of the Venetians. Then as soone as Peter had leuied, what by his owne meanes, and with the aide of his friends and fauourers, as much treasure as he could possible, hauing receiued (as was beleeued) some small quantitie in prest of the Venetians, he went to Si- enna, and after him Aluiano with the horſemen and footmen, marching alwayes by night, and by wayes particular, to the end his coming might be concealed from the Florentines. At Sienna, by the fauor of Iohn Iaques and Pandolph Petrucci, principals in that gouernment, and friends to his houſe, he was alſo ſecretly refurniſhed with other bands of ſouldiers: ſo that with ſixe hundred horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen of choiſe, two dayes after the truce was begun (wherein they of Sienna were comprehended) he put himſelfe on the way to Florence, hoping that arriuing there by the breake of day, and at vnwares, he ſhould find his entrie eaſie, either for the generall diſorder, or ſpeciall tumult, which he expected would riſe in his fauour: a plot which haply had drawne ſome good iſſue for him, if fortune had not ſupplied the negligence of his aduerſaries. For, as in the beginning of the night he was lodged in the victualling houſes (certaine ſmall houſes vpon the high way) with intention to march the reſidue of the night, he was ſo hindred by great raines that fell, that he could not preſent himſelfe before Florence vntill long time after Sunne riſing: a chance which gaue leiſure to ſuch as made profeſſion to be his particular enemies (for the commonaltie and all the reſt of the citizens ſtirred not, expecting quietly what would be the iſſue of things) to take armes with their friends and followers, and to prouide that the citizens ſuſpected ſhould be called and reſtrained in the publick Pallace by the Magiſtrates: and to make themſelues ſtrong at the gate which leades to Sienna; whither at their requeſt went Paul Vitelli, who returning from Mantua, was by chance arriued the night before at Florence: in ſo much as no commotion appearing in the Citie, and Peter not ſtrong enough to force the gate (which he had approched within a bow ſhoote:) after he had remained there foure houres, fearing with his danger the ſudden comming of their men at armes, whom he thought (and his conceit was true) the Florentines had ſent for from the ſeruice of Piſa, he returned to Sienna; from whence Aluiano being departed, and let into Tody by the Guelffes, he ſacked almoſt all the houſes of the Gibelins, and put to ſlaughter three and fiftie of the principall bodies of that faction. According to which example, Anthonie Saulle being entred into Terny, and the Gatteſquies by the fauour of the Colonnoys being let into Viterbe, did the like executions againſt the Guelffes in both the one and the other place, and all the peeces thereabouts: without that the Pope prouided for ſo great diſorders in the ſtate Eccleſiaſticke, becauſe he abhorred all expences in like caſes; and bearing by the propertie of his nature no compaſſion to the calamities of others, he was nothing troubled with thoſe things that offended his honour, ſo that his owne profits or pleaſures were nothing hindred. Yet could he not auoide the domeſticall miſeries, which troubled his houſe with tragicall examples, and with luſt and crueltie horrible aboue all the barbarous nations. For he hauing determined from his firſt entrance into the Papacie, to appropriate all temporall greatneſſe to the Duke of Candie his eldeſt ſonne, the Cardinall of Valence (who caried a mind altogether eſtranged from the profeſſion of prieſthood, and aſpired to the exerciſe of armes) hauing no patience to ſuffer that place to be enioyed by his brother; and enuying withall that he had better part then he in the loue of the Ladie Lucretia their common ſiſter; inflamed with luſt and ambition (mightie miniſters to all miſchiefe) cauſed him to be killed in a night as he rode alone in the ſtreetes of Rome, and then ſecretly to be caſt into the riuer of Tiber. Likewiſe the brute was (if ſuch an enormitie may be beleeued) that in the loue of the Ladie Lucretia were concurrant, not onely the two brethren, but alſo the father, who as ſoone as he was made Pope, taking her from her firſt husband, (as one farre inferiour to her in degree) afterward he married her to Iohn Sforce Lord of Peſere: but not being able to ſuffer her husband to be his corriuall, he alſo diſſolued the ſecond marriage already conſummated, hauing formerly made proofe, before Iudges delegate and of his owne chuſing, by falſe witneſſes ſuborned, and afterwards confirmed by ſentence, that Iohn was cold by nature, and altogether vnable to cohabitation. The death of the Duke of Candie afflicted not a litle the Pope, paſſionate, as much as euer father was, in the loue of his children, and as not accuſtomed to feele the blowes of fortune; foraſmuch as it is manifeſt that from his infancie to that age all things had moſt happily ſucceeded to him: and he was ſo much grieued, that in the Conſiſtorie, after he had with a great compaſſion of mind, and publicke teares, grieuouſly bewailed his miſerie, and accuſed many of his proper actions, and the maner of liuing which he had vſed till that day; he aſſured, with words full of efficacie, that hereafter he would gouerne his life otherwiſe then he had done, and liue altogether after another faſhion: and aſſigned preſently certaine of the number of Cardinals, to ioyne with him in the reformation of manners and orders of the Court: wherein wherein after he had employed certaine dayes, at what time began to be manifeſt the author of the death of his ſonne, (for the which at the firſt he had the Cardinall Aſcanius and the Vrſins in ſtrong ſuſpition) he left off his former holy intention and his teares, and returned more diſorderly then euer, to thoſe thoughts and actions wherein he had conſumed his age till that day.

The factiõ & intelligence which Peter de Medicis had in Florence, is diſcouered.

There hapned in thoſe ſeaſons new trauels within Florence, by reaſon of the enterpriſe of Peter de Medicis. For ſhortly after the intelligence which he had with certaine particulars in the citie, was diſcloſed; by reaſon whereof many noble citizens were impriſoned, and ſome fled. And after the Magiſtrates had vſed meanes iudiciall to proue the maner of the conſpiracie, they not onely condemned to death Nicholas Ridolphi, Laurence Tornaboni, Ianot Pucci, and Iohn Cambi, who had ſolicited Peter to come, and receiued of him money for that end: but alſo Bernardine de Nero, to whom was imputed no other thing, then that knowing the practiſe, he had not reuealed it; which fault (of it ſelfe puniſhable by the head, by the ſtatutes of the Florentines, and by the interpretation which moſt part of lawyers giue to the common lawes) was found ſo much the more hainous in him, by how much he was chiefe Magiſtrate when Peter came to Florence, as if he had bene more greatly bound to do the office rather of a publicke perſon, then priuate. But the kindred of the condemned appealing from the ſentence to the great councel of the people, by vertue of a law made when the popular gouernment was eſtabliſhed; thoſe that had bene authors of the condemnation, fearing leſt the compaſſion of the age, of the nobilitie, and of the multitude of kinſmen, would moderate in the minds of the people the ſtraitneſſe of the iudgement, wrought ſo much, that they obtained, that to the leſſer number of the Citizens ſhould be referred the reſolution, whether the appeale ſhould be ſuffered to be proſecuted or reſtrained: wherein, being more ſtrong the authoritie and number of them which held it a thing dangerous, and no leſſe drawing to ſedition, ſeeing that the lawes themſelues ſuffered, that to auoide tumults, the ſtatutes in like caſes might be diſpenſed withall: ſome of thoſe that held the chiefe offices, were with great importunities, and almoſt by force, and with threatnings, conſtrained to conſent, that notwithſtanding the appeale interpoſed, execution ſhould be done the ſame night: and to this extreme iuſtice, were more affectioned then others, the followers of Sauonarola, not without his proper infamie, forbearing to diſſwade (euen his auditors) the violation of a law publiſhed a few yeares before by himſelfe, as very conuenient and almoſt neceſſary for the preſeruation of the common libertie.

The Pope inueſteth Federike in the kingdome of Naples.

In this yeare, Federike King of Naples hauing obtained of the Pope the inueſtiture of the kingdome, and making his coronation perfect with all ſolemnities, he recouered by accord the mount Saint Ange, which had bene valiantly defended by Dom Iulian de Lorraine, whom the French King left there: he reconquered alſo Ciuita, with other peeces holden by Charles de Sanguin: and (as ſoone as the truce was ended) he chaſed out of the Realme the Prefect of Rome, conuerting his forces to execute the like action vpon the Prince of Salerne, who being at laſt beſieged in the rocke of Diana, and abandoned of all ſuccours, had permiſſion to go his way in ſafetie with his goods, leauing that part of his eſtate which he had not yet loſt, in the hands of the Prince of Biſignian, with condition to paſſe it ouer to Federike, as ſoone as he vnderſtood that he was conducted in ſafetie to Sinigale.

New practiſes betweene the kings of France and Spaine.

About the end of this yeare (the Diet which had bene transferred from Montpellier to Narbonne, being afore interrupted by the immoderate demands of the King and Queene of Spaine) the French King and the ſaid King of Spaine returned eſtſoones into new practiſes, wherein were found the ſame difficulties: for that the French King had determined not to conſent to any accord wherein Italy ſhould be comprehended: and it was a thing diſpleaſing to the King and Queene of Spaine to leaue him free libertie, and a way open to ſubdue it. And yet it was farre from the deſires of the Spaniſh to entertaine warres with him on the other ſide the Mounts, becauſe it was a warre full of troubles and expenſes, and no hope of honour or profite. At laſt the truce was concluded betweene them, to endure till it were reuoked, and two moneths after: and there was no Potentate of Italy comprehended in it, to whom the King of Spaine gaue ſignification of the truce, alledging that in him was no leſſe power to make a contract without the knowledge of the other Confederates, then in the Duke of Millan (without their conſent or priuitie) to conclude the peace of Verceil: and that (when the league was made) he hauing begun the warre in France, and continued it many moneths without receiuing any of the money promiſed by the Confederates, although he had iuſt occaſion not to take care of them that had ſo diſ-appointed him; yet had he many times aduertiſed them, that if they would make paiment of the hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats which they ought to him for the expences of the warre he had made, he was contented to accept that paiment, in reckoning of all other actions and enterpriſes hereafter (hauing determined to enter France with a ſtrong armie,) but that the Confederates would not agree to theſe demands, and much leſſe keepe faith, or be carefull ouer the common ſafetie: and therefore perceiuing that the league made for the libertie of Italy, was turned into an vſurpation and oppreſſion of the regions of the ſame (for that the Venetians not contented with ſo many ports falne to their ſhare in the kingdome of Naples, had made themſelues Lords ouer Piſa without any right) it hath ſeemed to him reaſonable and iuſt, ſeeing by others the common affaires were diſordered, to prouide for his owne particular with a truce, made notwithſtanding in ſuch ſort, that it may rather be called an admonition, then a will to ſeparate from the league, for that it was alwayes in his power to diſſolue or reuoke it; which he would do, when he ſhould diſcerne another intention, and other prouiſions in the Potentates of Italy, for the common benefite. About this time died Iohn Prince of Spaine, onely ſonne to the King and Queene, to whom the accident brought no ſmall ſorrow and heauineſſe, for that, beſides diſappointing of the ſucceſſion, his death gaue no litle impediments to the ſweete delights and pleaſures which they reckoned to reape in their new tranquillitie and reſt. To this was alſo ioyned the death of Philip Duke of Sauoy, leauing onely one ſonne of litle age. This late Duke, after he had wauered long time in ſuſpence, ſeemed at laſt to fauour the faction of the Confederates, who had promiſed to pay him euery yeare twentie thouſand duckats: and yet euery one of them had ſo great doubt of his faith, that they could aſſure nothing of his promiſes, if the French King ſhould deſcend to make any ſtrong enterpriſe.

With this yeare, ended the two yeares touching the deputation of the Caſtle of Genes, which the Duke of Ferrara (receiuing it in truſt) did eftſoones render to Lodowike his ſonne in law: and firſt demanded of the French King, that according to the capitulations of Verceil, he would ſee him ſatisfied of the halfe of the expences employed in the guard of it; whereof the King conſented to make paiment, ſo that the Duke would put into his hands the Caſtle, as he ſaid he was bound for the diſobedience of the Duke of Millan: but the Duke of Ferrara anſwered, that that was not approued; and that to put the Duke of Millan in contumacie, it were neceſſary to haue interpellation. The King offered to commit the money into a third mans hand, to the end that afore paiment were made, there might be conſtruction in iuſtice and law, whether he ought not to render to him the Caſtle. But the inſtance made to the contrary by the Venetians and his ſon in law, carried more force in the fancie of the Duke of Ferrara; wherein he was not onely moued by the prayers and ſolicitations of Lodowike, who not many dayes before had indued the Cardinall Hippolito his ſonne with the Archbiſhopricke of Millan; but much more by the dangers that threatned him, if he ſhould prouoke the malice of ſo mightie enemies, in a time wherein was continuall diminution of the hope that the French men would deſcend. So then hauing firſt called home from the Court of France his ſon Ferrand, he ſurrendred the Caſtle to Lodowike, who ſatisfied all charges for keeping it, together with the portion which appertained to the King to pay. By reaſon whereof, the Venetians, to expreſſe how much they congratulated his doings, tooke his ſaid ſonne into their pay, with an hundred men at armes. This reſtitution made with no iuſtice, albeit it was of great importance againſt the Kings reputation in Italy, yet he diſſembled the wrong, and made no ſuch apparence of diſliking as had bene conuenient. And that which more is, the Duke of Ferrara excuſing the action by an Embaſſadour ſent to his Maieſtie, for that by reaſon of the neighbourhood of the Venetians and Duke of Millan (both prepared to denounce warre againſt him) he was conſtrained to obey neceſſitie; the King gaue as negligent eare, as if the nature of the matter had bene light and trifling; as one who beſides that he proceeded almoſt at aduenture in all his actions, was troubled with continuall care and trauell of mind, ioyned to his ancient deuotion to repaſſe into Italy, hauing now greater occaſions then euer, for that he had made truce with the King of Spaine, renewed the alliance with the Swiſſers, and withall many cauſes of diſagreement were lately hapned amongſt the Confederates. But he was hindred by the perſwaſions of the moſt part of ſuch as were neareſt about him: for ſome ſet afore him his pleaſures, others encouraged him to embrace the enterpriſe, but with ſo mightie preparations both by ſea and land, & with ſo great prouiſions of money, as could not be furniſhed but with a long ſpace of time; others propoſed many difficulties and occaſions; and the Cardinall of S. Malo forgat not his accuſtomed delayes in the expedition of money: in ſo much, that not onely the time to paſſe into Italy was more vncertaine then euer; but alſo many things were ſuffered to miſcarry, which were now almoſt brought to their perfection. For the Florentines (continually incenſing the King to march) had contracted with him, to take armes on their ſide, as ſoone as the warre ſhould be begun by him, and for that effect, they did agree that Monſieur d'Aubigny with an hundred and fiftie French lances (the hundred to be payed by the King, and the fiftie by them) ſhould paſſe by ſea into Tuſcane, to be Generall of their armie: and the Marquis of Mantua, who when he returned victorious from the kingdome of Naples, had bene diſhonorably diſappointed of the pay of the Venetians, for ſuſpition that he ſolicited to be mercenary to the French King, did now in good earneſt negotiate with him to that end; and the new Duke of Sauoy was confirmed in his amitie: beſides whom, Bentiuole promiſed to follow his authoritie, as ſoone as he was come into Italy: and the Pope doubting whether he ſhould ioyne with him, (as he was continually laboured) determined at the leaſt not to be againſt him.

But now began the ſpirits and minds of all men to grow cold, for the detraction and negligence which the King vſed: for that, neither his men of warre (as he had promiſed) paſſed into Italy to reaſſemble at Aſt; neither was Monſieur d'Aubigny diſpatched, and much leſſe money ſent to pay the Vrſins and the Vitellies his ſouldiers; a thing of no litle importance for the warre he meant to make. By reaſon whereof the Vitellies inclining to enter pay with the Venetians, the Florentines who feared they ſhould not haue ſufficient reſpite to giue aduertiſement to the King, kept them entertained for one yeare in common, for the ſeruice of the King and themſelues. The King commended much theſe actions in them, but he made no ratification nor prouiſion of paiment for his part: onely he ſent Gemel to them, to intreate them to lend him for the furniture of his enterpriſe, an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats. Laſtly, the King (as he did at other times) meaſuring the wils of others by his owne, left all things to confuſion, and departed almoſt vpon the ſudden from Lions to go to Tours, and then to Amboyſe, with his accuſtomed promiſes to returne immediatly to Lions. For which reſpects, hope failing in all thoſe that followed his faction in Italy, Baptiſta Fregoſe was the firſt that reconciled himſelfe with the Duke of Millan, who taking courage by theſe ſucceſſes, diſcouered euery day more and more the ill diſpoſition he bare towards the Venetians for the regard of Piſa, ſoliciting the Pope and the King of Spaine, eſtſoones to produce (but with more efficacie) a Parliament, for the reſtoring of the ſame Citie. And the better to aduance the practiſe, the Florentines, receiuing counſell and direction from him, diſpatched in the beginning of the yeare 1498, an Embaſſadour to Rome, but with a commiſſion qualified to proceed ſo aduiſedly, that the Pope and the reſidue might perceiue, that if Piſa were rendred to them, they would ioyne in vnitie with the others for the defence of Italy, againſt the French: and that in caſe the reſtitution of that Citie ſucceeded not, the French King ſhould haue no cauſe to hold them ſuſpected. This conference continued many dayes at Rome, wherein was omitted nothing by the Pope, the Embaſſadours of the Spaniſh, of the Duke of Millan, and of the King of Naples, that might reaſonably induce the Venetian Embaſſadour to hold it neceſſarie for the common ſuretie of Italy, that by the redeliuerie of that citie, the Florentines might participate in the generall league againſt the French. They told him, that the Senate of Venice ought to conſent thereunto together with others, to the end, that the rootes of all emotions and troubles being ſupplanted, there ſhould remaine to no eſtate or degree in Italy, any occaſion to call eſtſoones forreine armes ouer the Mounts: and that if in that regard the vnitie of Italy ſuffered impediment, there would perhaps be giuen occaſion to others to take new counſels, by the which, to the common preiudice, might happen ſome alteration of importance. But to this, was quite contrary the deliberation of the Senate of Venice, who couering their couetouſneſſe with many colours, and perceiuing from whom proceeded principally ſo great an inſtance, made anſwer by the ſame Embaſſadour, complaining not a litle that ſuch a motion proceeded not of a reſpectiue care to the vniuerſall benefite, but of an euill affection which ſome of the Confederates bare to them: for that the Florentines hauing with the French men a great affinitie and coniunction of mind, and being perſwaded that by their returning into Italy, the moſt part of Tuſcane would diuolue to their rule and iuriſdiction; doubtleſſe the reſtitution of Piſa would not ſuffiſe to draw them from this inclination. But of the contrary, the ſurrender was a thing moſt dangerous, for that by how much they ſhould be mightie and ſtrong, ſtrong, by ſo much the more would they be hurtfull to the ſuretie and quiet of Italy: That in this reſtitution, ſtood the honour and faith of euery one, but principally of their Commonweale; ſeeing that the Confederates hauing promiſed the Piſans with one conſent to protect their libertie, and afterwards (euery one in particular putting an vnwilling hand to furniſh the expences of the common buſineſſe) impoſed the whole burden vpon them alone, who (for that cauſe) had refuſed no charges nor trauels, it could not but turne to their ſpeciall diſhonour to leaue them abandoned, and to faile in their faith promiſed, which though others eſteemed litle, yet they hauing alwayes accuſtomed to keepe it, would not violate it in any ſort: That it was a thing moſt grieuous to the Senate of Venice, that (without reſpect) others ſought to impute vnto them, that which they had begun with one common conſent, and continued for the benefite of euery one; and that with ſo great an ingratitude, they were puniſhed for their good workes: That the intollerable expences which they had defrayed in this enterpriſe and in many others, ioyned to ſo many perils and trauels ſuſtained ſince the league was made, deſerued not ſuch recompence, ſpecially the trauels and expences which they had bene at, being of that nature, that they might boldly ſay, that Italy had bene preſerued by their meanes: for that neither the battell of Taro was fought with other armes then theirs, nor the kingdome of Naples recouered with other forces then of their Commonweale: That no other armie conſtrained Nouaro to render, and cauſed the French King to returne beyond the Mounts: That no other ſtrength then theirs was oppoſed againſt him in Piemont, as often as he aſſayed to returne: And that it could not be denied, that thoſe actions proceeded principally of the deſire they had of the ſafetie of Italy, ſeeing as their eſtates were alwayes furtheſt remoued from perils, ſo, by their occaſion, there were no diſorders hapned which they ought to redreſſe. For they had not called the French King into Italy, nor accompanied him when he was come ouer the Mounts, and much leſſe for ſparing their proper treaſures, haue they ſuffered to fall into perill the common affaires: but it hath bene often needfull, that the Senate of Venice ſhould giue remedie to the diſorders hapned by the faults of others, to the common harmes of the whole. The which actions, albeit they were not knowne, or though they were ſo ſoone committed to forgetfulneſſe, yet they would not, for all that (after the ill excuſable example of others) blemiſh neither the faith nor dignitie of their Commonweale; the rather, for that to the preſeruation of the libertie of the Piſans, was ioyned the ſuretie and welfare of all Italy.

Whileſt theſe things were debated amongſt the Confederates, with a manifeſt diſagreement, there hapned a new accident, which ingendred effects diuers and much different from the thoughts of men. The night before the eight day of Aprill, King Charles died at Amboyſe, of a Catarre, which the Phyſitians call Apoplexie, the ſame riſing in him with ſuch abundance as he beheld a match plaid at tenniſe, that within few houres he ended at the ſame place his life, during the which, he had with greater importunitie then vertue, troubled the whole world, with great apparence of danger to kindle new troubles: for that it was beleeued of many, that being puſhed forwards with a vehement deſire to returne into Italy, he had in the end, either of his owne motion, or by the incitation of ſuch as bare enuie to the Cardinall of S. Mallo, remoued all the difficulties that had withholden him. In ſo much, that albeit in Italy (according to his variations) ſometimes he increaſed, and ſometimes he diminiſhed the opinion that men had that he would march; yet he kept them in continuall ſuſpition: and for this cauſe the Pope ſtirred vp with a deſire to raiſe his ſonnes, had already begun to ſolicite with him ſecretly touching ſome innouation: and it was bruted afterward that the Duke of Millan had done the like, to the end not to liue in continuall feare. King Charles dying without iſſue, the Realme of France deſcended to Lewis Duke of Orleans, as nearer in bloud then any other of the maſculine line; to whom (remaining then at Bloys) came to do reuerence, the Kings guard, and all the generall traine of the Court, together with the Nobilitie of the kingdome, by whom he was ſaluted as King, and ſo acknowledged; notwithſtanding ſome did ſecretly murmure, that (according to the ancient lawes of the land) he was diſabled to aſpire to the Crowne, againſt the which he had taken armes in the warres of Brittaine. The day after the death of King Charles (a day obſerued in many places with great ſolemnitie) tooke end the authoritie of Sauonarola; who hauing bene long time afore accuſed to the Pope, that he preached ſlanderouſly againſt the manners of the Cleargie and Court of Rome, that he nouriſhed diſcords in Florence, and that his doctrine was not fully Catholicke; and for theſe reaſons called to Rome by many writs, he refuſed to appeare there, alledging many excuſes: and therefore had bene (the yeare before) ſeparated by the Pope, with cenſures, from the fellowſhip of the Church. Of which ſentence (hauing abſtained from preaching certaine moneths) he had eaſily obtained abſolution, if he had longer continued; for that the Pope, who made ſmall reckoning of Sauonarola, had proceeded againſt him more by the incenſing and perſwaſion of his aduerſaries, then any other occaſion. But he iudging that it was for his ſilence, that his reputation came ſo to be diminiſhed, or at leaſt, that it brake the purpoſe for the which he ſtirred, (for he was principally aduanced for his vehemencie in preaching) he fell eftſoones to deſpiſe the Popes commandements, and returned publickly to his old office, wherein affirming that the cenſures publiſhed againſt him were vniuſt, and of no force, as contrary to the will of God, and hindering the common good, he opened his mouth eftſoones to reuile the Pope and the whole Court of Rome with great vehemencie. Of this aroſe no ſmall emotion, for that his aduerſaries (whoſe authoritie increaſed daily in greatneſſe with the people) deteſted ſuch inobedience, rebuking the action, for that by his raſhneſſe, the Popes mind was drawne into alteration, in a time ſpecially, wherein the reſtitution of Piſa being negotiated by him and the other Confederates, it was neceſſary to do all things to confirme him in that inclination: and on the other ſide, his partakers defended him, alledging that men ought not for the regard of humane things, to trouble the operations diuine, nor conſent that vnder ſuch colours, the Popes of Rome ſhould begin to intrude into the affaires of their Commonweale. But after there were certaine dayes ſpent in this contention, and the Pope wonderfully inflamed, ſending out new thunderbolts, with threats of cenſures againſt the whole citie, he was at laſt commanded by the magiſtrates of the citie to forbeare to preach; to whom though he obeyed, yet diuers of his brethren did the like in ſundry Churches. But the diuiſion being no leſſe among the ſpiritualtie then the laitie, the Friers of other Orders ceaſſed not to preach feruently againſt him. And at laſt they fell into ſuch a heate, that one of the diſciples of Sauonarola, and one of the Frier Minors, agreed to enter into the fire in the preſence of the whole people, to the end that the diſciple of Sauonarola being either burned or preſerued, the people might be left ſatisfied whether Sauonarola were a Prophet or an abuſer: ſeeing that formerly he had affirmed in his ſermons, that for the iuſtification of the truth of his prophecies, he could in all neceſſities obtaine of God the grace, to paſſe without hurt through the middeſt of a flaming fire: and yet notwithſtanding being angrie becauſe they had agreed without his priuitie to make preſent experience, he laboured to breake it with all diligence: but the matter being ſo farre proceeded of it ſelfe, and earneſtly ſolicited by certaine citizens deſiring to haue the towne deliuered of ſo great troubles, it was neceſſary at laſt to paſſe further. And therefore the two religious brethren, accompanied with all their brotherhoods and Couent, being come at the day appointed to the place afore the publicke Pallace, where was not onely a generall concourſe of the people of Florence, but alſo many of the cities adioyning; the Frier Minors were aduertiſed that Sauonarola had ordained, that his diſciple and brother entring the fire, ſhould beare in his hand the Sacrament: which deuice they impugned greatly, alledging that there was ſought by that meanes to put in danger the authoritie of the Chriſtian faith, which in the minds of the ignorant would not a litle decline if that holy hoaſt ſhould burne: and Sauonarola being there preſent, and perſeuering in his reſolution, there aroſe among them ſuch a diſagreement, that the action of experience proceeded no further. For which cauſe he loſt ſo much of his credite, that the day following, in a tumult then hapning, his aduerſaries tooke armes, whereunto being ioyned the authoritie of the ſoueraigne Magiſtrate, they entred the Monaſterie of S. Marke where he was, and drawing him out of the place, they led him with two of his brethren to the common priſons. In this tumult, the kinſmen of thoſe that had bene executed the yeare before, killed Franciſque Valori a citizen of great authoritie, and the moſt apparent fauorer and follower of Sauonarola: and this hapned for that aboue all others, his authoritie had depriued them of the facultie to haue recourſe to the iudgement of the councell popular. Sauonarola was afterwards examined with torments, but not very grieuous, and vpon the examination a proceſſe publiſhed, which (taking away all imputations that were laid on him for couetouſneſſe, corruptions of manners, or to haue had ſecret intelligence or practiſe with Princes) contained, that the matters by him prophecied, were not pronounced by diuine reuelation, but by his proper opinion, grounded vpon the doctrine and obſeruation of holy Scripture: and that he had not bene moued by any wicked intention or purpoſe, and much leſſe by that meanes to aſpire to any office or greatneſſe in the Church; but that he had a holy deſire, that by his meanes a generall Councell might be called, wherein the corrupt cuſtome of the Cleargie might be reformed, and the eſtate of the Church of God (ſo farre wandered and gone aſtray) be reduced, as neare as might be, to the reſemblance of the times drawing neareſt the Apoſtles; a glorie, which, to giue perfection to ſo great and holy an operation, he eſteemed farre aboue the obtaining of the Popedome: becauſe that could not come to paſſe but by the means of an excellent doctrine and vertue, and a ſingular reuerence of all men: whereas the Popedome moſt often was obtained, either by ſiniſter means, or elſe by the benefite of fortune. Vpon which proceſſe confirmed by him in the hearing and preſence of many religious perſons, euen of his owne Order, but (if that be true which his owne faction bruted afterwards) with words darke, and ſuch as might receiue diuers interpretations: there were taken from him and his two other companions, with ceremonies inſtituted by the Church of Rome, the holy orders, by ſentence of the General of the Iacobins and of the Biſhop Romolin, who was after Cardinall of Surrente, Commiſſioners delegate by the Pope: and that done, they were paſſed ouer to the power of the ſecular Court, by the iudgement whereof they were hanged and burned, there being preſent at the ſpectacle of the degradation and execution, no leſſe multitudes of people, then at the day of the experiẽce of entring the fire, there were come to the ſame place to behold the iſſue of the miracle promiſed by Sauonarola. This death conſtantly endured (but without expreſſing word whereby might be diſcerned, either their innocencie or fault) quenched not the diuerſitie of iudgements and paſſions of men: for that many ſuppoſed he was but an abuſer; and others of the contrary beleeued, that the confeſſion that was publiſhed was falſly forged, or that in his weake complexion, the torments had more force then the truth: excuſing this frailtie with the example of S. Peter, who neither impriſoned, nor conſtrained with torments, or by any other extraordinary force, but at the ſimple words of the handmaids and ſeruants, denied that he was the diſciple of that maiſter, in whom he had ſeene ſo many holy miracles.

Lewis Duke of Orleans ſucceedeth to the Crowne of France: he determineth to recouer his Duchie of Millan. Piſa and Florence make warre: Lodowike Sforce flieth from Millan: the Florentines giue batterie to Piſa, and agree with the French King. Pope Alexander aſpireth for his ſonne to the iuriſdiction of Romagna. Lodowike Sforce recouereth Millan, but being betrayed by the Swiſſers, he is taken, and led into France.

BY the death of King Charles the eight, Italy was freed of the feare of imminent dangers, which the power of the French did threaten. For men were of opinion, that the new King Lewis the twelfth, newly aſcended to the Crowne, would not in the beginning of his reigne make warre in Italy. But the ſpirits of ſuch as conſidered the euent of things, nouriſhed alwayes a ſecret ſuſpition, that the afflictions then deferred, would with time grow more dangerous and more great, ſo large an Empire being fallen vpon a King ripe in age, full of experience in matter of warre, moderate in expences, and in all things (without compariſon) holding more of himſelfe then did his predeceſſor: and to whom withal, did appertaine (as he was King of France) not only the ſame right of the kingdome of Naples, but alſo he maintained that the Duchie of Millan was his freehold by the ſucceſſion of the Ladie Valentina his grandmother, who was married by John Galeas Viſcounte his father (afore that in ſtead of viccaire of the Empire, he had obtained the title of Duke of Millan) to Lewis Duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the ſixt. At which marriage, there was added to the ſtate of the dowrie (which was the Citie and countrey of Aſt, with great ſummes of money) an expreſſe condition, that when ſoeuer the line maſculine of Galeas ſhould faile, the Ladie Valentina ſhould ſucceed to the Duchie of Millan, or ſhe being dead, her next heires and deſcendents. Which couenant albeit ſtrong enough of it ſelfe, was confirmed (if the French traditions be true) by the authoritie of the Pope (the Imperiall ſeate being voide at that time; for the Popes of Rome pretend that the adminiſtration of the Empire vacant belongeth to them:) by which meanes, the bloud male of John Galeas determining afterwards by the death of Philip Maria Viſcounte, Charles Duke of Orleans, ſonne to the Ladie Valentina, began to lay claime to the ſucceſſion of the ſaid Dukedome. But as the ambition of Princes is readie to helpe on their titles with euery apparent colour, ſo there aſpired at the ſame time to the ſaid Dukedome, not onely the Emperour Federike, alledging that it was reuerted to the Empire, for that the line nominated in the inueſtiture made to John Galeas by Vinciſlaus King of Romanes, was extinct, but alſo Alphonſo King of Aragon and Naples, who was inſtituted heire by the teſtament of Duke Philip; and among the reſidue, Francis Sforce with a fortune, force and felicitie, more fauourable then the others, quarrelled the ſame title; who to giue a better ſhadow to the armies which he leuied in that cauſe, alledged that his wife Blanch, the onely daughter (but a baſtard) of Philip, had peculiar intereſt in that ſucceſſion: ſo that Charles Duke of Orleans, who (being taken priſoner at the battell of Agincourt in the warres betweene the Engliſh and French, and remaining reſtrained in England fiue and twentie yeares) was able to do nothing, by reaſon of his pouertie and hard fortunes, to iuſtifie his title, and much leſſe could he obtaine aide of King Lewis the eleuenth, notwithſtanding he was his neareſt kinſman: the reaſon was, that the ſame King, in the beginning of his reigne, hauing bene much moleſted and manifeſtly inuaded by the great Lords and Barons of the Realme, (who vnder vnder the ſhew of publicke profite, conſpired againſt him, by diſdaine, and for their particular intereſts) eſteemed that his eſtate and ſuretie was eſtabliſhed by the embaſing of the great ones: and for that reaſon, Lewis Duke of Orleans, ſon to Charles, albeit he was his ſonne in law, could obtaine of him no fauour at all: and Lewis after the death of his ſaid father in law, vnwilling to ſuffer that the Ladie Anne Ducheſſe of Bourbon the Kings ſiſter, ſhould be preferred afore him to the gouernement of Charles the eight then in minoritie, after he had troubled France with a very ſlender ſucceſſe, retired into Brittaine with a worſe fortune. For ioyning with thoſe that were vnwilling that Charles ſhould obtaine Brittaine, by marrying with Anne heire of that State by the death of Francis her father leauing no iſſue male, (yea aſpiring ſecretly to the ſame marriage) he was taken in an encounter betweene the French and the Brittons neare S. Aulbin in that countrey, and from thence being led into France, he remained priſoner there two yeates: in ſo much as meanes failing him, and finding no ſuccours in King Charles, after he was out of priſon, he ioyned no further action to that enterpriſe, but when the King left him within Aſt, he made himſelfe Lord of Nouaro with very litle profite. But being now become King of France, he deſired nothing with greater affection, then to reconquer the Duchie of Millan as a ſucceſſion iuſtly appertaining to him: which deſire planted in him from his youth, was eftſoones wonderfully increaſed by the ſucceſſe he had at Nouaro; and withall, for that he greatly hated Lodowike Sforce, by reaſon of the inſolent demonſtrations and behauiours which he vſed to him when he was in Aſt: therefore, not long after the death of King Charles, by reſolution ſet downe in his elect Councell, he intitled himſelfe not onely King of France, and (for the regard of the realme of Naples) King of Ieruſalem and both the Sicilies, but alſo Duke of Millan. And becauſe he would make knowne to the world what was his inclination to the things of Italy, he preſently wrote letters full of amitie and congratulation touching his aſcending to the Crowne, to the Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines, and withall diſpatched men of purpoſe to giue hopes of new enterpriſes, giuing plainly to vnderſtand, that he purpoſed to conquer the Duchie of Millan: wherein the time running, nouriſhed for him many fauours and oportunities, for that the death of his predeceſſor had bred in the minds of the Italians many new inclinations, much differing from the cogitations they had afore. For the Pope (whoſe ambitious thoughts could not be ſatisfied if Italy ſtood in tranquillitie) wiſhed that things might grow to hurly burly, ſeeking his peculiar aduancement thereby. And the Venetians, being now deliuered of the feare they had of King Charles for the wrongs and iniuries they had done him, expreſſed manifeſtly that they had no diſtruſt in the new King: which diſpoſition increaſed dayly more and more, for that Lodowike Sforce (notwithſtanding he knew that he had to do with an enemie more mightie and leſſe pliable) feeding himſelfe with this hope (the ſame alſo beguiling Federike of Aragon) that the French King could not with ſuch expedition execute any action on that ſide the Mounts, forbare not to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Venetians in the quarrell of Piſa, wherein his ſpite preſent would not let him ſee the danger that was to come. The Florentines onely began to eſtrange themſelues in mind from the amitie of the French: for albeit this new King had bene their protector afore, yet now that he is come to the Crowne, he had with them no bond of amitie, neither in regard of faith giuen, nor for benefites receiued, as his predeceſſor had by meanes of thoſe capitulations which were made at Florence and at Aſt: for regard of which they would alwayes lay themſelues open to many perils and perplexities, rather then to abandon his alliance. Beſides, the diſcord which continually increaſed betweene the Venetians and the Duke of Millan, was the cauſe that the feare being ceaſſed which they had of the forces of the Confederates, and withall hoping more in the fauours certaine and neare at hand of Lombardie, then in the ſuccours farre off and doubtfull of France, they tooke occaſion to make leſſe reckoning of ſuch friendſhip. In this different diſpoſition of minds, were alſo no leſſe diuerſe the embaſſages that were ſent. For the Senate of Venice diſpatched with great ſpeed to the King, one of their Secretaries remaining at that time in negociation with the Duke of Sauoy: and to eſtabliſh with theſe beginnings the foundations of a well aſſured alliance, as the dayly affaires and occurrents of times required, they made an election of three other Embaſſadours to go to his Maieſtie, not onely to congratulate his right worthy aſcending to the Crowne, but alſo to proteſt, in forme of excuſe, that what they had done contrary to the liking of the late King Charles, proceeded of no other motion, then of a ſuſpition which they had (when they perceiued by many ſignes) that not contented with the kingdome of Naples, he would lift vp his mind

to thoſe meanes which might make him Lord of all Italy. The Pope alſo, who had determined to appropriate to his ſonne Ceſar, at that time Cardinall, all temporall greatneſſe, raiſed his thoughts to high things, and ſending Embaſſadours to the French King, purpoſed to ſell to his Maieſtie ſpirituall graces, receiuing in recompence temporall poſſeſſions. For he was not ignorant that the French King had great deſire to refuſe Iane his wife, both barren and deformed, who was giuen him almoſt by force by Lewis the eleuenth: and that he had no leſſe liking to marry Anne now widow by the death of the late King, not ſo much for the ancient affection that was betweene them afore the encounter of S. Aulbin, as that by the prerogatiue of that marriage he ſhould infinuate into the Duchie of Brittaine, an Eſtate very conuenient for the Crowne of France: which could not be done without the authoritie of the Pope. The Florentines in like ſort failed not to ſend Embaſſadours to the King, as well to teſtifie the ancient cuſtome and deuotion of that Citie to the Crowne of France, as to put his Maieſtie in remembrance of their merites, and the bonds and promiſes of the late King: wherein they were much ſolicited by the Duke of Millan, hauing two intentions, the one that by their meanes the practiſes of the Venetians might be hindered, (both the one and the other Commonweale intreating of the affaires of Piſa) and alſo that if they obtained any credite, amitie, or authoritie, they might vnder ſome occaſion, employ all to worke an accord betweene him and the French King; a thing not a litle deſired by him. All theſe Embaſſadours were well receiued of the King, who began euen at the firſt to ſound euery of them ſeuerally, notwithſtanding he had no meaning to put any thing to action in Italy, afore he had firſt aſſured the realme of France, by new leagues and confederations with the neighbouring Princes.

But it was a thing fatall, that the fire of Piſa, which the Duke of Millan had firſt kindled, and nouriſhed by an earneſt deſire to aſſubiect it to himſelfe, ſhould in the end burne the author thereof: for that as well by his naturall iealouſie, as for the danger of the greatneſſe of the Venetians, which he ſaw to aſpire not onely ouer him, but alſo aboue all the other Potentates of Italy, he could not endure with patience, that the fruite of his deuices and trauels, ſhould be gathered by them: wherein, taking occaſion vpon the diſpoſition of the Florentines, reſolute to purſue in all accidents the quarrell of Piſa, and ſeeming to him that by the death of Sauonarola and Francis Valori, which were ſtrong parties againſt him, he might now repoſe more in that Citie then he could do in times paſt; he determined to aide the Florentines in the recouery of Piſa with armes, ſeeing that neither with practiſes, nor by his owne authoritie, nor the power of others, he could accompliſh his deſire: perſwading himſelfe vainly, that either afore the French King could execute any action, Piſa would be reduced by compoſition or force to the iuriſdiction of Florence, or elſe the Senate of Venice (guided by that wiſedome which he would neuer ſuffer to gouerne himſelfe) would neuer deſire either for enuie, or other leſſe occaſion, that (to the common danger of the whole) the French armies ſhould eftſoones returne into Italy, for the expelling of whom they had taken ſo great paines. And this indiſcreet reſolution was furthered by a diſorder which hapned againſt the Florentines in the countrey of Piſa. For their people which were at Pontadere, hauing aduertiſement by their eſpials that a troupe of ſeuen hundred horſemen and a thouſand footmen of the Piſans were returning home with a great prey of cattell which they had taken in the fields of Volterre, they iſſued out almoſt all vnder the conduct of Rainuce and Guillaume of Pazzi Commiſſioner for the Florentines, to cut betweene them and home for the recouerie of the bootie; and encountring with them in the valley of S. Real, they had almoſt put them to diſorder, and recouered the moſt part of the prey, when there ioyned to the Piſans an hundred and fiftie men at armes ſent out of Piſa to the ſuccours of their fellowes, who finding the Florentines armie both wearie and ſomewhat diſordered with the trouble of the pillage, and the authoritie of Count Rainuce not being able to range the horſemen to make head againſt their enemies, after the footmen had made ſome reſiſtance, they were put to the chaſe, among whom many of their footmen were ſlaine, and moſt of their horſemen taken priſoners, with the chiefeſt of their Leaders: in ſo much as the Count and Commiſſioner for Florence, ſaued themſelues with great difficultie within S. Real, where they impoſed vpon one another (as is the cuſtome in ſuch caſes) the fault of the diſorder happened. This ouerthrow much grieued the Florentines, who to prouide ſpeedily for ſo great a danger, and not being able to refurniſh their companies with expedition, and alſo Count Rainuce Generall of their whole armie hauing loſt his reputation, for that his regiment had bene ſtripped, determined ned to turne to the affaires of Pisa the Vitellies, who were then in the countrey of Aretze: but they were constrained to accord to Paul Vitelli the title of Captaine generall of their armie. This misfortune constrained them eftsoones to demand succours of the Duke of Millan, and that with so much the more instance, by how much since the chase, they had besought the French King, that to put them out of danger with his forces and with his authoritie, he would send them three thousand lances into Tuscane, and ratifie the retaining of the Vitellies according to the contract made in the time of the late King Charles, prouiding his portion of their paiment; and also that he would cause the Venetians to abstaine from further vexing of them: of all which requests, they reaped but gracious words without any effect; for that the King would not bring himselfe suspected with the Venetians, nor make any stirre in Italy afore he put beginning to the warres of Millan. But in this businesse the Duke of Millan was neither cold nor negligent, doubting lest the Venetians (by the occasion of this victorie) would enter further into the iurisdiction of Pisa, then they could be afterwards repulsed but with great difficultie; and therefore made knowne to the Florentines that he had a firme intention to succor them, but first he would establish with them, what prouisions were necessarie not onely for their defence, but also to atchieue the enterprise of Pisa; to the which (for there was no feare of any action in the French King for that yeare) were turned vniuersally the eyes of all Italy, being then free from all other troubles. For albeit in the territories of Rome the Colonnoys and the Vrsins had taken armes, yet their wisedomes preuailed more, then did either their hatreds or their iniuries. This was the substance of their quarrell: The Colonnoys and Sauelles, stirred vp for the occupation which Iaques Count made of the Tower Mathias, had inuaded the places and territories of the Counts: and of the other part, the Vrsins (for the affinitie and coniunction of factions) tooke armes in their fauour: so that many boroughs and villages being vsurped both by the one and other partie, they fought together at last with all their forces at the foote of Motitelle in the countrey of Tiuoli; where, after a long and braue battell, the inflamed passion of the parties pushing them on no lesse, then either regard of glory, or consideration of the danger of their estates, the Vrsins (whose armie contained two thousand footmen and eight hundred horsemen) were broken and put to the chase, their ensignes lost, and Charles Vrsin taken prisoner; and of the side of the Colonnoys was hurt Anthonie Sauelle a Captaine of no small reputation, who died of his wound not many dayes after. After this successe, the Pope, seeming to be displeased that the countrey so neare to Rome was disquieted, tooke vpon him to solicite an accord; which, whilest he entertained in action, not with good faith (for he was disguised in all his doings) the Vrsins hauing recouered new forces, went and incamped afore Palombare, a principall towne belonging to the Sauelles, which the Colonnoys (who after the victorie had occupied many places of the Counts) prepared to rescue. But both the parties finding at length the dissembled behauiours of the Pope, sometimes giuing courage to the Colonnoys, and eftsoones comforting the Vrsins, and that he did but nourish the warre, and giue them medicines to weaken them both, to the end he might with more facilitie oppresse them when their strengths were consumed, they came all together to a parley (without the interposing of a third) at Tiuoli, where, of themselues, they established an accord, by the which Charles Vrsin was set at libertie, the places taken in the controuersie restored to their proper owners, and the quarrell for the Earldomes of Albe and Taillecousse referred to the arbitration of King Federike, to whom the Colonnoys were mercenarie souldiers. These stormes thus resolued, and no warres discerned in any part of Italy, but about the countrey of Pisa, although the Duke of Millan had determined in the beginning not to succour the Florentines openly, but to minister to their wants with secret aides of money; yet suffering his mind to be continually ouer-ruled with passions of disdaine and enuie, and not abstaining from words insolent and full of threats against the Venetians, he determined now to declare himselfe publickly, and to cut off all regards and considerations of things, denying euen then passage to their bands of souldiers which marched to Pisa by the way of Parma and Pontrema, constraining them of necessitie to passe by the Duke of Ferraraes countrey; a way of farre more trauell and greater trouble; and wrought so that the Emperour commanded all those Embassadours which were resident in his Court (except the Spanish) to returne home, reuoking them all within a few dayes after, except the Embassadour for the Senate of Venice. He sent also to the succor of the Florentines, three hundred crossebow men, and contributed to the leuying of three hundred men at armes, partly vnder the Lord of Plombin, and some vnder Iohn Paul Baillon, and lent them at sundry dry times more then three hundred thouſand duckats, offering them continually greater aides when need required. Beſides all theſe, he made inſtance to the Pope (the importunities of the Florentines greatly inducing him) to aide them in ſome ſort: who anſwering that he knew well that it was dangerous to the eſtate of the Church, that the Venetians ſhould preuaile to make a foundation of Piſa, promiſed to refurniſh them with an hundred men at armes, and the three galleys which were in his pay vnder Captaine Villemarine, which ſhould giue impediments to the prouiſions of victuals that ſhould enter Piſa by ſea: yet after that with diuers excuſes he had deferred to ſend them any proportion, in the end he refuſed them openly, for that drawing dayly more and more into other deuices and thoughts, he made his reſolution to reſtraine himſelfe onely to the French King, by whoſe meanes he hoped to obtaine no ſmall nor common recompences, but euen the kingdome of Naples; following herein the propertie of men, who oftentimes do make eaſie with will and hope, that which in reaſon they know to be hard. And it was a thing almoſt fatall, that the refuſing of the alliance which the King of Aragon made to the Pope, ſhould breed in him the beginning of new things. For, before he had fully determined to ioyne himſelfe with the French King, he had requeſted King Federike to giue to the Cardinal of Valence (who was reſolued to giue ouer his hat vpon the firſt occaſion) his daughter in marriage, with the principalitie of Tarent in dowrie; perſwading himſelfe, that if his ſonne (whoſe wit was ſuttle and mind great) were once become Lord of ſo important a member of the kingdome of Naples, he might eaſily (hauing for wife one of the Kings daughters) take occaſion with the forces and authoritie of the Church, to diſpoile his father in law of the kingdome, both weake in forces and poore in money, and from whom alſo were eſtranged the affections of many Barons. This matter although it were hotly furthered and fauoured by the Duke of Millan, who debated with King Federike (by his Embaſſador the Marquis Stampe ſent purpoſely to Rome and Naples) how dangerous it would be for him, if the Pope (made fruſtrate of this deſire) went ſuddenly to ioyne with the French King: and withall he preferred to the Kings remembrance how much it would ſauour of puſillanimitie and indiſcretion (ſpecially the matter concerning wholy his ſafetie) to put in conſideration indignitie onely, and not to haue ſo much rule ouer himſelfe, as to preferre the protection of his Eſtate afore his proper will: yet Federike fearing that in this ſubtletie of Lodowike was layd the foundation of his ruine, refuſed the plot with continuall obſtinacie, confeſſing that the alienation or eſtranging of the Pope was a degree to put his kingdome in danger; but he ſtood aſſured, that to giue his daughter with the principalitie of Tarent to the Cardinall of Valence, were to put his life in danger, and therefore in two perils he had rather to abide the hazard of that which he might runne into with moſt honour and honeſtie, and which proceeded not of any fault or errour of himſelfe. By this meanes, the Pope turning wholly his mind to ioyne with the French, and deſiring that the Venetians would do the like, (whom he was loth to offend) he abſtained altogether to miniſter any fauours or ſuccours to the Florentines: who receiuing courage by the ready ſuccours of the Duke of Millan, and for the recommendation of the valour of Paul Vitelli their new Captaine, forgot nothing that might aduance the enterpriſe, notwithſtanding they eſteemed it of very hard action: for that beſide the numbers, experience, and courage of the Citizens and countrimen of Piſa, there was within Piſa a ſtrength of the Venetians of foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred eſtradiots, and more then two thouſand footmen: beſides that they were ready to refurniſh them with ſtronger ſuccours, for that euen ſuch as at the beginning had no will to conſent to accept the protection of the Piſans, were now no leſſe ready then the reſt to ſupport their quarrell for the regard of common honour.

The contract made in common by Lodowike and the Florentines, was ſo to increaſe the army, that it might be ſufficient to recouer all the places within the country of Piſa, and to do as much as was poſſible to cauſe the neighbours to forbeare to giue aide and fauour to the Piſans, or at leaſt, eſchuing the example of the Venetians, not to moleſt any more the Florentines in other places. Lodowike then hauing afore he determined to diſcouer himſelfe, entertained in common with the Venetians, Iohn Bentiuole with two hundred men at armes, laboured him ſo much, that he bound him with the ſtate of Bologna, to himſelfe onely: wherein the better to confirme Bentiuole, the Florentines tooke into their pay Alexander his ſonne: and to the end that if the Venetians (who had taken into their protection the Lord of Faenza) ſhould come to inuade them on the ſide of Romagnia, they ſhould find reſiſtance, the Florentines alſo tooke to their appointments and deuotion, together with fiftie men at armes, Octauian de Riare Lord of Imola and Furly, who was gouerned according to the direction and will of Katherine Sforce his mother, who followed without any regard the faction of Lodowike and the Florentines, many occaſions moouing her, but principally for that ſhe was ſecretly married to Iohn de Medicis, whom the Duke of Millan, nothing liking of the gouernment popular, laboured to make great at Florence, together with his brother. Lodowike alſo cauſed the people of Lucques (with whom he was in great credite) to promiſe not to comfort any more the Piſans as they had alwayes done; the which albeit they did not obſerue fully, yet they abſtained very much for his regard. There remained the Genowayes and thoſe of Sienna, ancient enemies to the Florentines, who had great cauſes of controuerſie againſt that State: the one for the intereſt of Montpulcian, and the other by reaſon of the countrey of Lunigiana: and touching the Siennoys, it was a thing much to be feared, leſt being made blind with enuie, they would giue way to euery one to trouble and moleſt the Florentines by the oportunitie of their eſtates (as they had ſometimes done, euen to their proper domage.) And for the Genowayes, albeit by reaſon of ancient iniuries, it grieued them not a litle that the Venetians ſhould be maiſters ouer Piſa, yet (in that Citie there being litle care of the common good) they ſuffered the veſſels of the Venetians to exerciſe trafficke in their riuers, in regard of the priuate gaine which ſome particulars got by it, by the which the Piſans receiued very great commodities. Therefore, by the counſell of Lodowike, the Florentines ſent Embaſſadours to Genes and Sienna, to ſolicite (the rather by his meanes) an accord of all their quarrels. But as touching the Genowayes, the practiſe brought forth no effect, for that they demanded franke reſtitution of Serezana, without giuing other recompence then a ſimple promiſe to bereaue the Piſans of all the commodities of their countrey: and the Florentines found the loſſe ſo certain, and in regard thereof the profite ſo litle and incertain, that they refuſed to buy ſo dearly their friendſhips. But whileſt theſe deuices occupied the minds of men in diuers places, the Florentine armie, more mightie in horſemen then ſtrong in footmen, aduanced into the field vnder their new Generall; by meanes whereof the Piſans, who ſince the victory of S. Real, had with their ſtradiots made incurſions at pleaſure ouer the whole countrey, retired from Pont de Sac where they laſt incamped, and Paul Vitelli hauing taken Calcinaia, and ſetling his armie there in expectation of new ſtrength of footmen, he beſtowed one day one part of his ſouldiers in ambuſh neare to Caſcina, whither the regiment of the Venetians were retired, who gouerned by Marke Martinengo were not onely without obedience, but alſo without order: in ſo much as when Paul Vitelli gaue the charge to them, he ſlue many of the ſtradiots, with Iohn Gradanic a Captaine ouer men at armes, and tooke priſoner Franque Coronell of the ſtradiots, with an hundred horſes. For this accident the companies of the Venetians ſuppoſing it was not ſafe for them to remaine at Caſcina, they retired to the borough of S. Marke, expecting new ſuccours to come from Venice. But Paul Vitelli, after he was furniſhed with footmen, making ſhew as though he would aſſaile Caſcina, and the Piſans beleeuing ſo, beguiling the coniectures of the enemies, he paſſed ouer the riuer of Arne, and pitched his campe before the borough of Buti, hauing ſent afore three hundred footmen to keepe occupied the hils and frontier places: and hauing drawne thither with the ſtrength of a great number of Pioners, the artillery by the way of the mountaine (not without great difficultie for the troubleſome wayes) he tooke the towne by force the ſecond day after he had planted his artilleri:. Paul made choiſe of this enterpriſe, for that he iudged that Piſa (wherein was an incredible obſtinacie, as well of the inhabitants as others retired out of the countrey, in whom by long vſe was great ſufficiencie touching actions of warre) could not be taken by force, the Citie of it ſelfe being ſtrongly walled, and hauing within it many bands of men at armes of the Venetians: he held it an action of better policie to deuiſe rather to languiſh and conſume them, then to enforce them; and ſetling the warre in that part of the countrey which is on the right hand of the riuer Arne, he eſteemed it a good counſel in warre to lay plots to take the peeces in that quarter, and to command all thoſe places by whoſe helpe and oportunitie he might giue impediment to the ſuccours that might come to them by land from any forrein countrey: and therefore after the taking of Buti, hauing raiſed a baſtion vpon the mountaines which be aboue S. Iohn de la Vene, he drew his campe right afore the fort which the Piſans had made neare to Vicopiſan, drawing thither his artillery with the ſame difficulties he did before: and taking almoſt in one ſeaſon Valdecalcio, and building aboue Vico in a place called Pietro Doloroſo, another baſtillion, to keepe that no ſuccours ſhould enter there,

he

he held beſieged the caſtle of Verrucola. And to the end that the Piſans (doubting that he would aſſaile Librafatta and Valdeſerclo) might be the leſſe hardie to be farre from Piſa, the Count Rainuce was incamped with other companies at Valdinieuolo. All which notwithſtanding, foure hundred footmen iſſuing out of Piſa, brake all the regiment of footmen which were negligently beſtowed in the Church of S. Michael to keepe Verrucola beſieged. But Paul Vitelli, after he had got the baſtillion, which yeelded vpon condition to carry their artillery to Vicopiſan, encamped afore Vicopiſan, not on that ſide where the Florentine campe was when he was within to defend it, but he lay towards S. Iohn de la Vene, to giue impediments to the ſuccours that were to come from Piſa. After the furie of his artillery had brought downe to the earth a great quantitie of the walls, the defendants, deſpairing of reſcue, rendred the place, their liues and goods ſaued; being diſcouraged to hold out to the vttermoſt, for that Paul when he tooke Buti (to giue terrour to others) cut off the hands of three Cannoniers Germains which were within the towne, and vſed his victory with many cruelties. Immediatly after the ſucceſſe of Vicopiſan, there followed another occaſion of happie exploit, for that the bands which were within Piſa, ſuppoſing it would be very eaſie to ſurpriſe the bulwarke of Pietro Doloroſo, they ſent thither afore day two hundred light horſemen, with many troupes of footmen, but finding there a ſtronger reſiſtance then they looked for, they loſt more time then their enterpriſe required: in ſo much that whileſt they were giuing the aſſault, the Generall of the Florentines diſcouering himſelfe vpon the mountaines thereabouts, and with part of the armie deſcending to ſuccour the fort, ſent Vitellozze with the reſidue of the bands to giue impediment to their returne: againſt whom as they entertained skirmiſh in the plaine towards Calci, the Generall came vpon them ſuddenly, and put them to flight, not without the loſſe of many horſemen, and the moſt part of their footbands. But in the meane while, the Florentines hauing ſome likely aduertiſements from the Duke of Ferrara and others, that the Venetians were not vnwilling to hearken to peace, if (as belonged to the dignitie of ſo great a Commonweale) they were proceeded withall, not as with equals, but as with a ſtate of more greatneſſe; they ſent as Embaſſadours to Venice to ſound their intentions Guid' Antonio Veſpuccio and Bernard Rucellai, two of the moſt honourable citizens of their Commonweale: a matter from the which they had abſtained till that time, partly for that they wold not offend the mind of King Charles, & partly for that whileſt they knew themſelues not to be ſtrong enough to oppreſſe the Piſans, they iudged that their petitions wold be vnprofitable, being not accompanied either with reputation or forces: but now that they were the ſtronger in the field, and that the Duke had publickly declared himſelfe againſt the Venetians, their hopes were greater then their doubts, to find ſome conuenient meanes of honeſt compoſition. The Embaſſadours were honorably receiued, and immediatly brought into counſell, the Duke ſitting and the whole reſort of Senators, in whoſe preſence after they had formed many excuſes for not ſending Embaſſadours to them afore, the ſame being refrained for many regards proceeding of the qualitie of times, and ſundry accidents of their Citie: they required frankly that they would abſtaine from the defence and protection of Piſa; a requeſt whoſe moderation put them in hope not to be denied, ſeeing that the Commonweale of Florence had giuen them no occaſion of offence, and alſo for that the Senate of Venice hauing alwayes had the reputation to be moſt iuſt, they hoped they would not abandon iuſtice, which being the pillar and foundation of all other vertues, it was but reaſonable to preferre it afore all other reſpects. To which propoſition the Duke made anſwer; that as it was true that in theſe times they had receiued no iniuries by the Florentines, ſo alſo the Senate was not entred into the protection of Piſa for any deſire to offend them; but for that the Florentines onely, hauing ſupported in Italy the faction of the French, the common ſafetie had induced all the Potentates of the League to giue faith to the Piſans, to helpe them to defend their libertie; wherein, though ſome others did forget themſelues after they had giuen their faith, yet they, contrary to the vſe of their Commonweale, would not follow them in a matter ſo vnworthy: but if the State of Florence would propound ſome meane by the which the liberty of the Piſans might be preſerued, they would make knowne to all the world, that neither for their particular auarice, nor for any reſpect of their owne profite, they haue thus long continued the defence of Piſa. Vpon this anſwer, they drew certaine dayes to diſputation vpon ſome meanes which might ſatisfie both the one and other parties; wherein ſome contention riſing, for that neither the Venetians nor the Florentine Embaſſadors would propound the meanes, they agreed that the Embaſſadour of Spaine, who encouraged them them to the agreement, ſhould interpoſe betweene them: who hauing propounded that the Piſans ſhould returne to the deuotion of the Florentines, not as ſubiects, but as people recommended, and vnder the ſame capitulations which had bene agreed vpon at Piſtoia, as a thing indifferent betweene ſeruitude and libertie; the Venetians anſwered, that they could not acknowledge any part of libertie in a Citie wherein the fortreſſes and adminiſtration of iuſtice were in the power of others. By reaſon whereof the Embaſſadours of Florence being out of hope to obtaine any thing, departed from Venice, with full aſſurance that the Venetians, vnleſſe they were compelled by neceſſitie, would not abandon the defence of Piſa, whither they ſent ſupplies of ſouldiers continually. Beſides, they had in the beginning no great feare of the enterpriſe of the Florentines, for that deferring the action till the moſt part of the Spring was paſt, they could not long keepe the field, the countrey of Piſa, by reaſon of his lowneſſe, being much ſubiect to waters. And laſtly hauing of new taken to their pay vnder the Duke of Vrbin (to whom they gaue the title of Gouernour) and vnder certaine other Captaines, fiue hundred men at armes, being holpen with diuers good intelligences, they determined (the more eaſily to turne the Florentines from offending the Piſans) to begin the warre in another place; ioyning to their plots the oportunitie of Peter de Medicis, at whoſe perſwaſions they entertained into their pay Charles Vrſin and Bartlemew Aluiano with two hundred men at armes. They were not without hope alſo to be able to induce Iohn Bentiuole to conſent that they might make warre vpon the Florentines on the ſide of Bolognia, for that the Duke of Millan (much diſpleaſed for that in the retaining which was made by Annibal his ſon, the Venetians were preferred before him; and ioyning to that new offence a recordation of old iniuries done againſt him, as he ſaid, when the Duke of Calabria paſſed into Romagnia) had taken certaine Caſtles, poſſeſſed by right of dowrie, by Alexander his ſonne, within the Duchie of Millan: and forbare not to vexe him vpon euery occaſion: yet the Caſtles being at laſt reſtored to him againe at the requeſt of the Florentines, the deuice to make warre on that ſide was broken.

Therefore the Venetians laboured to diſpoſe them of Sienna to grant that they might begin the warre in their quarters; wherein they grew into hope to preuaile (beſides their ordinary diſpoſition againſt the Florentines) by a diuiſion that was in Sienna amongſt the Citizens: for Pandolfe Petruccio with his wit and ſubtletie, hauing gotten to himſelfe great authoritie, Nicholas Borgheſe his father in law, and the family of the Belanties, to whom his greatneſſe was diſpleaſing, laboured that paſſage might be granted to the Duke of Vrbin and the Vrſins, who, with foure hundred men at armes, two thouſand footmen, and foure hundred eſtradiots, were ſtayed by commiſſion of the Venetians at Fratte in the countrey of Perowſe: and they alledged, that to make truce with the Florentines according to the ſolicitation of the Duke of Millan, and as Pandolfe perſwaded them, was no other thing then to giue them oportunitie to diſpatch the affaires of Piſa, which being reſolued, they would be ſo much the more able to offend them. And therefore they ought (making profite of occaſions, as wiſe men ſhould) to be reſolute, not to make other accord with them, then a peace, which might make them giue ouer the right they pretẽded to Montpulcian, a grant whereunto they knew the Florentines would neuer agree: whereof would follow by neceſſitie, that the demands of the Venetians muſt be conſented vnto: with whõ hauing obtained the firſt place of grace, they hoped eaſily to embaſe the authoritie of Pandolfe, who, hauing made himſelfe author of the contrary opinion by the perſwaſion of the Duke of Millan, found enough to do to maintaine it, for that the hatred which the people bare naturally to the Florentines, could do much, and it was not vnlikely that by this feare, it might be brought to paſſe, that they would diſclaime the right of Montpulcian. This couetouſneſſe accompanied with hatred, had more force then the conſiderations alledged by Pandolfe, either touching the trauels that would follow the warre, if it were drawne vpon their countrey, or in regard of dangers, which in time would afflict Tuſcane by the greatneſſe of the Venetians: for iuſtification whereof (ſaid he) we need not haue recourſe to the examples of others, ſeeing euen of late memory, for fauouring the faction of Ferdinand King of Naples againſt the Florentines, they were in perill to fall into ſeruitude, if Ferdinand, for the occupation which Mahomet Ottoman made of the towne of Otrante in the kingdome of Naples, had not bene compelled to call home from Sienna the perſon of Alphonſo his ſonne, and his regiment: And that their hiſtories do tell them (beſides theſe examples) that the ſame deſire to offend the Florentines by the meanes of the Earle of Vertus, together with the diſdaine conceiued for the reſpect of Montpulcian, was the

cauſe that of themſelues they had aſſubiected to him their proper countrey. Theſe reaſons, albeit they were true, yet being not ſufficient to repreſſe the furie and affections of the others, he was not without apparent danger of ſome tumult to be raiſed by his aduerſaries. Notwithſtanding to preuent them, he cauſed ſuddenly to enter into Sienna, many of his friends thereabouts, and wrought ſo cunningly, that at the ſame inſtant, the Florentines ſent to Poggi Imperial three hundred men at armes and a thouſand footmen, with whoſe reputation and force, hauing reſtrained the audacitie of his aduerſaries, he brought to paſſe a truce for fiue yeares with the Florentines: who, preferring the feare of perils preſent, afore regard to dignitie and honor, bound themſelues to pull downe one part of the bridge of Valiane, and to diſmantle euen to the earth, the baſtillion which had ſo much moleſted the Siennoys: condeſcending further, that the Siennoys within a certaine time might build what fortreſſe they would betweene the ſhoare and channell of Chianes and the towne of Montpulcian. By meanes of this accord Pandolfe riſing into more greatneſſe then before, found meanes ſoone after to kill his father in law, who too boldly oppoſed himſelfe againſt his deſignes: and ſo by the diſpatch of him, increaſing terrour to the reſidue, he confirmed himſelfe dayly more and more in tyrannie. By this accord the Venetians being depriued of the hope they had to diuert or turne by the way of Sienna the Florentines from the enterpriſe of Piſa, and being not able to obtaine licence of the Peruſins to manage the warre by their countreys, they determined to vexe them on that ſide to Romagnia, hoping with the ancient fauours and factions which Peter de Medicis had there, to aſpire eaſily to the occupation of thoſe places which they held in the Appenine. In ſo much as hauing obtained paſſage of the litle Lord of Faenza, by the vale of Lamone, with part of the regiment which they had in Romagnia, with whom Peter and Iulian de Medicis were ioyned, they occupied the borough of Maradi ſituate vpon the Appenine, on that ſide which lookes towards Romagnia, where was made againſt them no reſiſtance, for that Dennis of Nalde a man of the ſame vale, entertained by the Florentines with three hundred footmen to defend it, together with the ſtrength of that countrey, led thither ſo ſmall a force of footmen, that he durſt not abide there. By meanes whereof they incamped afore the rocke of Chaſtillon, built in a place aboue the ſaid borough, which they hoped to carry, though by no other meanes, yet by want of many things which they knew to be within it, but ſpecially the lacke of water, and ſo by the oportunitie of that, to haue free paſſage to paſſe into Mugelle, which is a countrey neare to Florence. But the conſtancie of the Caſtle-keeper, ſupplied the ſlender prouiſions of victuals that were within, and the liberalitie of heauen auoided the penurie of water, raining ſo much in one night, as all the veſſels and ceſternes being full, they were deliuered from that paine: and in the meane while, the Count Rainuce with the Lord of Plombin and other Captaines, being ſtolen vpon the enemie by the way of Mugelle, enforced them to retire, almoſt flying, hauing vndertaken this enterpriſe with a greater confidence in their diligence then with ſufficient ſtrength. Beſides, the Count Caiazze ſent to Cotignole by the Duke of Millan, with three hundred men at armes and a thouſand footmen, together with Fracaſſe entertained by the ſame Duke, who was within Furly with an hundred men at armes, prepared to charge them vpon the backe: by meanes whereof, to auoide this danger, they went and ioyned with the Duke of Vrbin, then departed from the countrey of Peronſe, and with the other regiments of the Venetians, who altogether were beſtowed betweene Rauenna and Furly, but with a very ſmall hope of happie enterpriſe, for that, beſides the bands of the Florentines, there was in Romagnia a ſtrength of fiue hundred men at armes, fiue hundred croſſebow ſhot, and a thouſand footmen of the Duchie of Millan; the impediment alſo which Imola and Furly gaue to them, being of great importance. But in this meane while Paul Vitelli (who after the taking of Vicopiſan had remained there certaine dayes expecting neceſſarie prouiſions) continuing in the ſame mind to cut from the Piſans the meanes of ſuccours, was gone to the enterpriſe of Librafatta: and the eaſier to approch that part of the towne which was moſt weake, and to preuent the diſpoſition of the enemy to inuade his army much troubled with artillery & carriage, he left the way which deſcends by the mountains to the plaine of Piſa, & cutting by force of Pioners a new way through the mountaines, he tooke in his marching the ſame day the baſtillion of the mount Maior, which the Piſans had built vpon the top of the mountaine, and ſo deſcended with great ſuretie into the plaine of Librafatta; where, the day after hauing eaſily brought into neceſſitie to yeeld the bands of footmen that had the charge of Potito and the old Caſtle, (two towers anſwering one another very neare Librafatta) he beſtowed in the ſecond cond tower and in other places, certaine peeces of artilleries to gouerne the Towne, which was well manned and guarded, containing two hundred footmen of the Venetians: from theſe places he battered the wall both on high and below, and from the firſt day had hope to carry it: but there fell by chance ſo great a part of the wall in the night, that the ruinous matter raiſed the rampier which was begun there aboue foure cubits; in ſo much as Paul aſſaying in vaine three dayes together to mount vp by ladders, began to doubt much of the ſucceſſe, the rather for that the armie receiued great harmes by a peece of artillerie which came from the Towne by a low loope hole: but his induſtrie and vertue was aided by the benefite of fortune (without whoſe fauour great Captaines are oftentimes deceiued in their enterpriſes) for that with a ſhot out of the campe, the peece which beat them was broken, and one of the beſt Cannoniers within the place killed, the bullet paſſing through the towne: which accident ſo amazed thoſe within the towne, being ſo commanded by the artillerie of the ſecond tower, that they durſt not aſſemble to make head, but yeelded the fourth day; and not long after, the Caſtle abiding ſome ſhot of the cannon, did the like. After the conqueſt of Librafatta, he deuiſed to make certaine baſtillions vpon the hils thereabouts, but chiefly he erected one of capacitie to receiue great numbers of men, aboue Santa Maria in Caſtello, called by the name of the Mount, where was built the baſtillion of la Ventura, commanding the countrey thereabouts (and where they ſay there had anciently bene another built by Caſtruccio of Lucques an excellent Captaine of that time,) to the end that this and Librafatta being guarded, all paſſage for commodities that might come to Piſa by the way of Lucques and Pietraſanta, might be ſtopped. But the Venetians ceaſſed not to ſtudie meanes whereby they might miniſter comfort to Piſa, ſomtimes with immediate ſuccors, and ſometimes by diuerting and drawing away the forces of the enemie: wherein they hoped to preuaile the rather for the differences which happened betweene the Duke of Millan and the Marquis of Mantua, entred of new into the appointments and directions of the Duke: who becauſe he would not take away the title of Captaine generall ouer all his companies from Galeas de S. Seuerin, more great with him by fauour then by vertue, had promiſed to the Marquis to honour him within three moneths with the place of Captaine generall in common, either with the Emperour, or with the Pope, or with King Federike, or with the Florentines: which being not performed by Lodowike at the terme promiſed, Galeas giuing many impediments againſt it, and adding thereto many other difficulties vpon the paiments of his entertainments, the Marquis determined to reenter into the pay of the Venetians, who practiſed to ſend him to the ſuccours of Piſa with three hundred men at armes: whereof Lodowike hauing doubt, he declared him immediatly, by the conſent of Galeas, Captaine to the Emperour and to him. But this Marquis hauing alreadie bene at Venice, and declared to the Senate the great confidence he had to enter Piſa in deſpite of the Florentine bands, was reentred into their pay: and receiuing part of his pay in preſt, he returned to Mantua, preparing himſelfe to the expedition; which he had further aduanced, and put his companies to march, if the Venetians had vſed the ſame diligence to diſpatch him, which they did to entertaine him: but becauſe they began to proceed ſlowly vpon the occaſion of a new hope they had, that by certaine ancient fauourers of the Medices, they ſhould be able to obtaine Bibienna, a borough in the countrey of Caſentin, they were of opinion that in regard of the difficulties to paſſe to Piſa, it would be more profitable to diuert then to ſuccour. The Marquis being diſpleaſed with theſe delayes, returned eſtſoones to the pay of Lodowike with three hundred men at armes and an hundred light horſemen, vnder the title of Captaine to the Emperour and to him, retaining the money he had receiued of the Venetians vpon an account or reckoning of payes due of old. The practiſe which was debated with the Venetians, was not without ſuſpition to the Florentines; who beſides their generall meanes of aduertiſement, had certaine dayes before, a more particular intelligence from Bologna. But diligent and wiſe counſels are vnprofitable when they are executed with negligence and indiſcretion: for the Commiſſarie whom they ſent thither to aſſure them from ſuch a danger, after he had apprehended ſuch as he doubted moſt, and were guiltie of the practiſe, hauing vnwiſely giuen credite to their words, he ſet them at libertie, and in other things was ſo negligent, that he made eaſie the purpoſe of Aluiano, appointed for the execution of this practiſe. For he hauing ſent before certaine horſemen attired like trauellers, and they marching all night, were at the gate by breake of day, which they wonne without difficultie, for that the Commiſſary had not onely left it without guard, but alſo had ſet no order that the gate ſhould be opened later then was accuſtomed in times nothing dangerous. And after theſe followed other bands of horſemen, who named themſelues, by the way, to be of the regiments of the Vitellies: when the conſpirators, riſing in their fauour, they were immediatly maiſters of the whole towne: and the ſame day arriued Aluiano, who albeit he had but a ſmall proportion of ſouldiers (his nature being alwayes to make benefite of occaſions, yea to preuent them with incredible diligence) yet he went ſuddenly to aſſaile Poppi, the principall borough of that valley; but finding a reſiſtance aboue his ſtrength, he ſought to get the places neareſt to Bibienna, albeit but litle and of no importance. The countrey of Caſentin, amid the which runneth the riuer of Arne, is a countrey narrow, barren, and full of hils, ſeated at the foote of the Appenine Alpes, at that time laden with ſnowes, for that the Winter was but then begunne: neuertheleſſe it had bene a paſſage very commodious to go to Florence, if the enterpriſe of Poppi had ſucceeded well to Aluiano; and no leſſe conuenient to make entrie into the countreys of Aretze and Valdarno, countreys which for the plentie of great townes and boroughs, were of great importance to the eſtate of the Florentines; who ſhewing themſelues not to be negligent in ſo great perill, refurniſhed with ſpeed all places needfull, breaking by that meanes the execution of a conſpiracie pretended in Aretze: and ſtudying aboue all other things, to cut from the Venetians all meanes to ſend new ſupplies to the countrey of Caſentin, they called from Piſa the Count Rainuce, and diſpatched him ſpeedily to occupie the wayes of the Appenine betweene Valdibagno and the pariſh of S. Stephen: and yet they could not let the Duke of Vrbin, Charles Vrſin and other Captaines from paſſing, who hauing in the ſaid valley ſeuen hundred men at armes, and ſixe thouſand footmen, with ſome bands of Lanceknights, commanded all the countrey of Caſentin, except a very few places, and aſſayed againe, but in vaine, to take Poppi: by meanes whereof the Florentines were compelled (according to the very intent of the Venetians) to call backe from the affaires of Piſa, Paul Vitelli with his bands, leauing ſufficient guard in the places of importance, namely the baſtillion of la Ventura. His coming into the countrey of Caſentin, cauſed the Venetians to retire, who were remoued to incampe the ſame day about Pratto Vecchio; and Fracaſſe being ioyned with him (ſent by the Duke of Millan with fiue hundred men at armes and fiue hundred footmen in fauour of the Florentines) he brought preſently into hard termes the ſtate of the enemies, who were diſperſed into diuers places, both for the ſmall meanes of lodging, and alſo for that (to the end they might haue free egreſſe and regreſſe in the countrey of Caſentin) they were compelled to keepe the wayes of Vernie, Chiuſa, and Montalona, places very high vpon the Alpes: by which meanes, being incloſed in that valley in a ſeaſon very ſharpe, they were without all expectation of aduancement, either there, or in any other place, the Count Rainuce being within Aretze with two hundred men at armes; and in the countrey of Caſentin the enterpriſe of Poppi not ſucceeding in the beginning; and the name of the Medices bearing no more authoritie, the men of the countrey being againſt them, where they could hardly haue any helpe by their horſes; they had receiued many harmes of the paiſants afore the coming of Vitelli: and therefore hauing intelligence of his coming, and the marching of Fracaſſe, they ſent backe beyond the Alpes, one part of their carriage and artillerie, and drew themſelues all together into one ſtrength, as the nature of the place would ſuffer. Againſt whom Paul Vitelli determined to vſe his cuſtome, which was (to carrie the victorie with more eaſe) to beare no regard either to the longneſſe of time, or to great paines and trauell, and much leſſe to expences, eſteeming it better to proceed with all neceſſarie prouiſions, then, for a deſire of the glorie to haue eaſily and ſpeedily ouercome, to put in perill the iſſue of things, and the whole armie in hazard. His counſell therein was, in the countrey of Caſentin, not to attempt ſuddenly any action vpon the places moſt ſtrong, but to labour firſt to make the enemie abandon the peeces moſt weake, and to ſtop the wayes of the Alpes and the ſtraits of the countrey, with baſtillions, guards, and intrenched wayes, with fortifications, both to cut off all ſuccours and ſupplies, and to take from them all meanes of mutuall aides and reſcue from one place to another: hoping that this forme and maner of proceeding would in the end breed occaſions to oppreſſe them further; beſides that the great numbers that were within Bibienna could not but conſume, both by the incommoditie of horſemen, and for the want of victuals. With this counſell, hauing recouered certaine places neare to Bibienna, of themſelues of ſmall importance, but very proper for his intention, with the which he looked in the end to preuaile: and dayly winning ground, he ſtripped many men at armes beſtowed in diuers places neare to Bibienna. And to cut off all wayes from the bands of the Venetians assembling beyond the mounts to minister rescue to their peoples, he deuised to command all the places about the mount la Vernia, and to intrench all the wayes thereabouts. In so much as many difficulties increasing by the enemies, togethet with want of victuals, many of them refused the campe, who stealing away by troublesome passages, were sometimes stripped by the paisants, and oftentimes by the souldiers. These were the actions of armes betweene the Venetians and Florentines. At the same time albeit the Embassadours of Florence were departed from Venice without any hope of accord, yet was there holden at Ferrara a new practise of composition, moued by the Duke of Ferrara at the instance of the Venetians; for as much as many of those which held the greatest authoritie in that Senate, being wearie of the warre, which was maintained with great expences and many difficulties, and being out of all hope to preuaile any further in the countrey of Casentin, desired to be rid of the studies and trauels they suffered for the defence of Pisa, and to find some honest pretext to giue it ouer. Meanes of accord.

But whilest the regions of Italy were in these afflictions for the quarels of Pisa, the new French King forgat not to make preparations to assaile the Duchie of Millan the yeare following: wherein he hoped to haue the Venetians on his side, who, carried with an incredible hate against the Duke of Millan, held strait negociatiõ with his Maiestie. But yet more earnestly did the Pope negociate with him; who, excluded from the alliance of Federike, and continuing in the same desire to the kingdome of Naples, was wholly conuerted into the hopes of the French, by whose meanes he sought to obtaine for his sonne the Cardinall of Valence, Charlotta daughter to Federike, who was not yet married, but trained vp in the Court of France: and for that the King gaue him some hope, in whose power he thought it was to giue her in marriage, the Cardinall entring one morning into the Consistorie, besought his father and the whole colledge of Cardinals, that seeing he neuer had any mind to be a Priest, that they would permit him to leaue the dignitie and the habite, to follow from that time forward the exercise whereunto his destinie drew him. And so resuming the habite of a person secular, he prepared speedily to go into France, by whom the Pope sent this comfort and promise to the King, to make it lawfull by the authoritie Apostolicke to refuse his wife: And the King, for his part, became bound to aide him (as soone as he had conquered the Duchie of Millan) to reduce into the obedience of the sea Apostolicke, the townes possessed by the Vicars of Romagna, and withall, to giue him presently thirtie thousand duckats, vnder this colour, that he was constrained to entertaine a greater force for the guard of his person; as though to knit himselfe with the French King, were to stirre vp many of the Potentates of Italy to seeke to hurt and oppresse him. For the execution of which couenants, the King began to make paiment of the money, and the Pope committed the action of the diuorce to the Bishop of Setto his Nuncio, and to the Archbishops of Paris and Roan; and in the trauerse of the cause, the Kings wife impugned the iudgement: but in the end being no lesse doubtfull of the consciences of the Iudges, then of the greatnesse of her aduersarie, she came to agreement, receiuing for the entertainment of her person, the Duchie of Berry, with thirtie thousand frankes of reuenue: and so the diuorce being confirmed by sentence of the Iudges, there was nothing else expected, for the dispencing and accomplishing of the new marriage, but the coming of Cæsar Borgia, lately of a Cardinall and Archbishop of Valence, become a souldier and Duke of Valentinoys: the King hauing giuen him a companie of an hundred Lances, and twentie thousand frankes pension: and for his title of Dukedome, he endued him with Valence a Citie of Dauphiné, with twentie thousand frankes of reuenue; who embarquing at Ostia vpon the galleys which the King sent him, arriued about the end of the same yeare at the French Court, where he entred with a pompe incredible, the King receiuing him most magnificently, and brought with him the Cardinals hat for George Amboise Archbishop of Roan, who hauing alwayes afore, participated in the dangers and fortunes of the King, was held with him in great authoritie. Neuertheless the new Dukes maner of dealing, at the first being not well liked, for that according to the counsell of his father, he denied that he had brought with him the Bull of dispensation; hoping that the desire to obtaine it, would make the King more easie to his designes, then would do the remembrance that he had receiued it. But the Bishop of Setto hauing very secretly reuealed the truth to the King, and the King holding it sufficient in respect of God, that the Bull was ratified, consummated the marriage openly with his new wife, without making more demands for the Bull: the same being the cause that the Duke could no longer keepe from him the Bull; and finding out after, that the Bishop of Setto had reuealed the matter, he cauſed him ſoone after by ſecret meanes to die of poiſon. And the King began to be carefull to renew amitie with his neighbours, making preſently a firme peace with the King of Spaine, who, bearing now no more regard to the things of Italy, called home all his Embaſſadours remaining there, except him that lay reſident with the Pope, and readiourned Gonſaluo into Spaine with all his regiment, leauing to Federike all the peeces in Calabria which he had holden till that day. But he had more trouble to accord with the Emperour, who was newly deſcended into Burgundie by occaſion of ſome commotions ſtirring there, being for that expedition aided with a round ſumme of money by the Duke of Millan, who perſwaded himſelfe, that either the warre which he ſhould make vpon the French King, would turne him from the enterpriſe of Italy, or at leaſt, if any agreement ſucceeded betweene them, he ſhould be comprehended in it, as the Emperour had aſſuredly promiſed him. But after many practiſes and much diſcourſe, the King made a new peace with the Archduke, by the which were to be rendred vnto him the places of the countrey of Artois; a thing which to the end it might bring effect and profite to his ſonne, the Emperour conſented to make truce with him for many moneths, without making mention of the Duke of Millan, againſt whom he ſeemed at that time much diſcontented, for that he had not alwayes ſatisfied his infinite demands of money. Laſtly, the French king ratified the peace made with the King of England by his predeceſſor, and reiecting all ſolicitations made to him to receiue the Duke of Millan to any compoſition, who with very large offers, and no leſſe corruptions endeuoured to induce him thereto, ſought meanes how he might at one time tie to him in amitie the Venetians and Florentines; and therefore he required with great importunities, that ceaſſing to vexe the Piſans, the Venetians wold put Piſa into his hands: whereunto the rather to draw the Florentines to conſent, he offered ſecretly to reſtore it to them within a ſhort time. This practiſe being found full of many difficulties, and concurring in it diuers ends and intereſts, was for many moneths debated with great varietie: for that the Florentines (holding it neceſſary that in that caſe they ſhould make alliance with the French King, and fearing by the remembrance that King Charles had not kept promiſe with them, leſt the like ſhould befall them in this preſent buſineſſe) could not agree amongſt themſelues in vnitie of opinion; and alſo for that their Citie being vnquietly toſſed betweene the ambition of the greateſt citizens and the vnbridled libertie of the gouernment popular, and being repoſed (by reaſon of the warre of Piſa) vpon the Duke of Millan, the whole Citie was fallen into ſuch generall diuiſion, that it was hard to deliberate in peace and quiet vpon matters of importance, ſome of the principall citizens deſiring the victory to the French King, and others of the contrary, bearing their whole affections to the Duke of Millan. The Venetians alſo, notwithſtanding all other difficulties had bene ouercome which might hinder the accord, had yet determined not to conſent to put Piſa into a third hand, hoping that for the regard of the repaiment of their charges, and to leaue Piſa with leſſe diſhonor, they ſhould obtaine better conditions in the negociation that was holden at Ferrara, which was vehemently ſolicited by Lodowike, both for feare leſt the deputation of Piſa falling to the French, both thoſe Commonweales would knit to the King: and alſo hoping that the controuerſie being accorded for the profit of Italy, the Venetians would ſhake off and leaue there the malice they had to hurt him. For which reſpect, both the practiſe that continued at Ferrara, diſpleaſed not a litle the French King: and the Pope, to make his profite of the trauels of others, ſought indirectly to hinder it: for that ſtanding in great credite with the King, ſo farre as concerned the affaires of Italy, he hoped that making Piſa to diuolue by deputation to the King, he ſhould in ſome ſort participate with him.

The French king requireth Piſa in truſt.

But at the ſame time it was conſulted at Venice, that if the King miſſed of his demand for the deputation, which they had determined neuer to conſent vnto, whether they might enter confederation with him touching the warre againſt the Duke of Millan, as the King with great importunitie had ſolicited, offering them for the reward of the victory the citie of Cremona and all Guiaradadda: an offer, which though greatly deſired of them all, yet it ſeemed to many of them to be a deliberation of great importance, and that the power of a French King in Italy was ſo dangerous to their eſtate, that the matter was brought into the counſell of the Pregati (the chiefeſt aſſembly amongſt them) and there was diſputed with no ſmall diuerſitie of opinions: but as one day they were aſſembled to ſet downe the laſt reſolution, Anthonie Grimany, a man of great authoritie, one of the Pregati named, ſpake in this ſort: When I conſider (moſt worthy Senators) the many good turnes which the Duke of Millan hath receiued of our Common-weale, by

by the which in theſe later yeares his whole eſtate hath bene protected; and of the contrary, the great ingratitude which he hath vſed, and the groſſe iniuries done to vs, to compell vs to abandon the defence of Piſa, whereunto he gaue vs the firſt ſuggeſtion and encouragement; I cannot chuſe but thinke, that you all know well enough how neceſſary it is for vs to vſe all our endeuor to be reuenged of him. For what greater infamie can there be, then by patient enduring of ſo many iniuries, to expreſſe to all the world that we are become degenerate from the magnanimitie of our elders? who as often as they were prouoked by offences, although not very great, neuer refuſed to embrace any danger, to preſerue the dignitie of the Venetian name: And not without reaſon: for that the deliberations of Commonweales require not regards and ends abiect and priuate, nor that all their actions ſhould bring them profite; but ends more excellent and honorable, by the which their glorie may be increaſed, and their reputation preſerued: a matter which nothing makes ſo ſoone to be loſt, as by giuing men occaſion to thinke, that there is not the courage, or at leaſt the abilitie to be touched with wrongs and iniuries, or no readineſſe ſhewed to be reuenged: an action very neceſſary, not ſo much for the pleaſure of the reuenge, as for that the puniſhment of the offender breeds ſuch example to others, that they will haue leſſe courage to attempt the like. Of ſuch conſequence is that glorie which is found to be ioyned with vtilitie, high and honorable deliberations alwayes declaring themſelues full of commodities and profites. Likewiſe one diſpleaſure takes away from men many others; and oftentimes by one onely ſhort puniſhment, men are found to be deliuered from many & very long troubles. And yet if we conſider the eſtate of the affaires of Italy, and the diſpoſitiō of many Princes againſt vs, together with the ambuſhes which Lodowike Sforce dreſſeth continually againſt vs, we may know, that we are led to this deliberation, no leſſe by the preſent neceſſitie, then in conſideration of other things. For, Lodowike puſhed on by naturall ambition, and by the hate he beares to this moſt excellent Senate, hath nothing in more care or ſtudie, then to diſpoſe the minds of all the Potentates in Italy againſt vs, to ſtirre vp the Emperour and the whole nation of the Germains againſt vs; and which is more, he begins for the ſame effect to entertaine intelligence with the Turke. You ſee alreadie with what difficulties (by his meanes) yea almoſt without hope, we ſuſtaine the defence of Piſa, and manage the warre in Caſentin: which if it be continued, it cannot be without heaping greater effects of dangers and diſorders; and if it be abandoned, without laying other foundations to our affaires, it cannot be but with ſo great a diminution of reputation, that it miniſtreth a wonderfull courage to whoſoeuer hereafter ſhall haue diſpoſition to oppreſſe vs: and you know that it is more eaſie to oppreſſe him that begins to decline, then him that ſtands yet in the fulneſſe of his reputation. Of which things the effects would clearly appeare to vs, and we ſhould alſo ſee our eſtate full of tumult and brutes of warre, if Lodowike were not kept in ſuſpence by the feare he hath, leſt we ioyne with the French; a feare which long time is not able to containe him. For who knoweth not, that the King, made fruſtrate of the hope which he hath that we will ioyne with him, will either attempt ſome other enterpriſe beyond the mounts, or elſe ouercome by the perſwaſions of Lodowike; and by the corruptions and great meanes he hath in the French Court, will fall to ſome accord with him? So that the neceſſitie to maintaine our ancient dignitie and glorie, conſtraines vs to ioyne with the French King, but much more the aſpect of the great and imminent dangers, which cannot be auoided by other meanes: wherein fortune ſeemeth to be very fauourable, ſeeing ſhe brings to paſſe that ſo great a King ſues to vs for that for which we ought to ſeeke to him; and beſides offereth vs ſo great and honorable recompences of the victorie, as by meanes thereof this Senate may promiſe themſelues great hopes, and employ their conceits in the compaſſing of great things, ſpecially the victory being to be gained with ſo great facilitie. For who doubts that Lodowike can by any meanes reſiſt two powers ſo mightie and ſo neighbouring? Vpon which deliberation, it is vaine, in my opinion, to feare, that the neighbourhood of the French King when he ſhall haue conquered the Duchie of Millan, will be either ſuſpitious or dangerous to vs: for that he that conſiders wel, may know, that many things which now are aduerſe to vs, will then be fauorable, ſeeing that ſuch an augmentation will breed a ſuſpition in the minds of all the principalities of Italy, and ſtirre vp the Emperour with the regions of Germany, for enuie and diſcontentment, that a French king ſhould occupie ſo noble a member of the Empire: in ſo much as euen thoſe whom now we feare to ioyne in vnitie with Lodowike to vexe vs, will then deſire (for their proper intereſts) to preſerue vs, and be conioyned with vs: And being great throughout the world the re-

« reputation of our Seigniorie, great the renowne of our riches, and moſt great the opinion, « confirmed with ſo many honorable examples, of our vnion & conſtancie to preſerue our eſtate,
« the French King dare not inuade vs, vnleſſe he haue coniunction with more, or at leaſt with the « Emperour: the vnitie and agreement of whom, ſeemes for many reaſons ſo hard, that it is vaine
« to occupie our minds either with the hope or feare of it. Beſides, the peace which now he hopes « to eſtabliſh with the Princes his neighbours beyond the mounts, will not be perpetuall, ſeeing « iealouſie, iniuries, and feare of his greatneſſe, will alwayes keepe waking all thoſe that hold him
« in hatred, or beare enuie to his glorie. And further, all men know that the French are more rea-
« die to conquer, then diſcreet to preſerue and keepe; and how ſoone by their pride and inſolencie
« they fall into the hatred of their ſubiects: ſo that after they haue got Millan, they will haue more « need to ſtudie how to preſerue it, then any oportunitie to occupie their thoughts with new en« terpriſes; for that a iuriſdiction newly gotten, failing in order and wiſe gouernment, doth ra« ther weaken then make more mightie him that hath got it. Wherein we cannot haue an exam« ple more freſh and notable, then the victorie of the late King Charles, againſt whom were con-« uerted into extreme hatred, the incredible deſires and gladneſſe with the which he was receiued « into the kingdome of Naples. Thus then the perils which may fall vpon vs at any time after the « victory of the French King, are neither ſo certaine, nor of ſuch nature, as for the auoiding of « them, we need to remaine in a danger preſent and of great conſequence; and to reiect for feare
« of dangers to come and vncertaine, ſo rich and ſo conuenient a part of the Duchie of Millan, « cannot but merite imputation of puſillanimitie and faintneſſe of courage: a thing reprochfull « euen in men priuate, but much more infamous to a Commonweale, more mightie and more « glorious, then euer was any (except the Romane eſtate) in any part of the world. There happen
« very ſeldome ſo faire occaſions, which being tranſitory and fleeting, it is an office in wiſedome
« and magnanimitie to embrace them when they be offered; and on the contrary, blame-worthy « to neglect them: and a curious wit ſtanding too long in conſidering of things to come, is of« ten hurtfull and reproueable: for that the things of the world are ſubiect to ſo many and ſundry « accidents, that rarely doth that come to paſſe which the wiſedome of man ſeemes to haue fore-« ſeene, and imagined would happen: and he that leaueth the benefite preſent, for feare of the « danger to come (if the perill be not certaine and neare at hand) finds himſelfe to haue loſt of« tentimes (to his diſpleaſure and ſhame) occaſions full of profite and glory, and all for ſtanding « in feare of dangers which afterwards turne to nothing. For theſe reaſons my aduice is, that we « accept the confederation againſt the Duke of Millan, for that it puts vs in ſuretie for the preſent, « breeds our credite with all the other Potentates, and offereth vs the poſſeſſion of moſt great « things, which another time we would be glad to get with intollerable expences and trauels, as « well for their importance, as for that they be the doore and entrie maruellouſly to augment the « glory and empire of this flouriſhing Commonweale. The author of this aduice was very atten« tiuely and fauourably heard, and the generoſitie of his ſpirit commended of many, together
The counſell of Melchior Treuiſan. « with the loue of his countrey. But Melchior Treuiſan ſpake thus on the contrary: It cannot be « denied (moſt prudent Senators) that the iniuries done by Lodowike Sforce to our Common-« weale, are many and great, and offend much our dignitie; yet, by how much the more they are « great, and by how much more they concerne vs, by ſo much the more belongs it to wiſedome
« to moderate her iuſt anger, with maturitie of iudgement, and with conſideration of the publick « benefite. For that, for a man to command ouer himſelfe, and to vanquiſh his owne paſſions, is « ſo much the more commendable, by how much leſſe often it hapneth, and by how much more « iuſt are the occaſions that kindle that anger, or any other humane affection. And therefore it « appertaineth to this Senate, which in reſpect of all other nations hath the fame to be moſt wiſe,
« and who not long ſince made profeſſion to haue deliuered Italy from the French, to ſet before « their eyes the infamie we ſhall incurre, if now through our occaſion they returne, and much « more the dangers that may threaten vs if the Duchie of Millan fall into the power of the French
« King: the which danger whoſoeuer cānot conſider of himſelf, let him call to memory what feares « were brought vpon vs by the conqueſt which the late King Charles made of Naples, of whom we « held not our ſelues aſſured, vntill we conſpired againſt him almoſt with all Chriſtian Princes.
« But there is great difference betweene the one danger and the other. For the late King, naked « almoſt of all kingly vertues, was a Prince almoſt ridiculous: and the kingdome of Naples, ſo farre « remoued from France, held his forces ſo deuided, that they weakened more then ſtrengthened

his power; and that conqueſt (for the feare of their eſtates, ſo neare neighbours to the Realme of Naples) procured him two great enemies, the Pope and the King of Spaine, in whom touching the one are occupied for the preſent many diuers intentions, and the other made weary with the things of Italy, will make himſelfe no partie without very great neceſſitie. But this new King, both for his proper vertue is rather to be feared then deſpiſed: as alſo the eſtate of Millan bordereth ſo neare vpon France, that in reſpect of commoditie to ſuccour or reſcue it, there is no hope to driue him backe, but by ſetting all the world in a ſtirre: and therefore we being neighbours to ſo great a power, ſhall in time of peace be ſubiect to expences and ſuſpitions, and in time of warre, ſo intangled with danger, that we ſhall find great difficultie to make our owne defence. And ſure I cannot but maruell much at him that hath reaſoned afore me, who on the one ſide makes no feare of a King of France being Lord ouer the Duchie of Millan, and on the other ſide holds for terrible Lodowike Sforce, a Prince in power much inferiour to vs, and with whom this hath bene alwayes a cuſtome, either with fearfulneſſe or couetouſneſſe, to put in danger all his enterpriſes. He alledged the feare of ſuccours which others might giue to him, as though it were eaſie, in ſo great diuerſitie of ſpirits and wils, and in ſo generall varietie of conditions, to make ſuch an vnitie: or rather, as if the abſolute vnion of ſo great a puiſſance, were not more to be feared then the power of many, which as it hath diuers ends and motions, ſo doth it bring forth actions diuers and diſcordant. He perſwades himſelfe, that in thoſe who for hate and many other reaſons deſire our embaſement, would be found that wiſedome to vanquiſh diſdaine and couetouſneſſe, which we find not in our ſelues to reſtraine ſuch ambitious thoughts. Beſides, I know not why we ſhould promiſe our ſelues, that the iealouſies and new and ancient diſdaines againſt the French King (aſpiring to the conqueſt of Millan) may do more with the Emperour and the Almain nation, then the inueterate hatred which they beare to vs, by reaſon of ſo many townes which we hold appertaining to the Empire and houſe of Auſtrich. Neither can I ſee any cauſe why the Emperour ſhould more willingly ioyne with vs againſt the French, then with the French againſt vs; but rather the vnion of the barbarous and perpetuall enemies to the name of the Italians, ſeemes to me more likely to make a prey: for that being vnited with him, he may the rather hope to be victorious ouer vs, then ouer him if he were knit with vs. And beſides, ſuch were his actions during the league paſt, and when he came into Italy, that I ſee not for what reaſon we ſhould ſo much deſire to haue him eftſoones reunited with vs. I denie not, but Lodowike hath done vs many iniuries; but it is farre from counſell and wiſedome, for a paſſionate deſire of reuenge, to put our owne affaires in ſo great hazard: and it is no ſhame to attend thoſe accidents and occaſions to reuenge, which a Commonweale may very well expect. Nay, rather it meriteth great blame, to be carried by diſdaine afore the oportunitie of time: and in matters of State, it is no ſmall ſlander, when vnaduiſedneſſe is accompanied with detriment. No man will ſay, that for ſuch reaſons, we were moued to make an enterpriſe ſo raſh, but all the world will iudge, that the deſire to haue Cremona hath puſhed vs forward; the ſame giuing cauſe to euery one to demand, what is become of the ancient wiſedom & grauitie of this Senate: and the world will maruel, that we are fallen into the ſame raſhneſſe to bring the French King into Italy, into the which our ſelues wondred ſo much that Lodowike Sforce ranne ſo farre. Great is the profite of Cremona, and very conuenient for many reſpects; but we ought to conſider whether it be not a greater loſſe to haue a King of France Lord of the State of Millan. We ought to conſider when it is that our power and reputation is moſt great in Italy, whether it be when of our ſelues we are of moſt eminence there, or when there is in the heart of Italy a Prince ſo mightie and ſo neare a neighbour to vs. We haue had at other times with Lodowike, both diſagreements and friendſhips, as may dayly happen betweene him and vs; neither is the difficultie of Piſa ſuch, but there may be applied ſome remedie, and much leſſe doth it deſerue, that for it we make our ſelues ſubiect to ſo great dangers. But the French being our neighbours, we ſhall be alwayes at variance with them, for that occaſions will dayly ariſe, in the diuerſitie of our minds from theirs, in the haughtie pride of the French nation, in the hatred wherein Princes do always purſue Commonweales, and in the vnbridled deſire which the moſt mightie haue continually to oppreſſe the moſt feeble and weake: for which regard, not onely the reſpect of Cremona cannot allure me, but it doth euen aſtoniſh me, for that in it is aggrauated the occaſion of the French King to vexe vs, which will be ſo much the more ſet forward by thoſe of Millan, by how much leſſe they can ſuffer Cremona to be diſmembred from the Duchie: and the ſame occaſion will

« will alſo ſtirre vp the Germain nation and the Emperour, for that Cremona and Guiaradadda be « alſo members of the iuriſdiction of the Empire. At the leaſt our ambition would not be ſo much « blamed, and we ſhould not ſearch with new conqueſts to get vs euery day new enemies, and to « make vs more ſuſpected to euery one. By reaſon whereof it muſt needs come to paſſe in the end, « that either we muſt be ſoueraigne and maiſters ouer all, or ſcourged and beaten of all; and which « of theſe two is ſooneſt to happen, it is eaſie to conſider by ſuch as take not pleaſure to beguile « themſelues. The wiſedome and grauitie of this Senate, is knowne and publiſhed through Italy « and all the world; blemiſh it not then by ſo raſh and dangerous a deliberation. For, to be carried « with paſſion againſt our proper profite, is nothing elſe but lightneſſe, and to eſteeme more dan- « gers that be litle then ſuch as be great, cannot but hold of folly and indiſcretion. Which two « things being directly contrary to the wiſedome and grauitie of this Senate, I cannot but per- « ſwade my ſelfe that the concluſion that you will ſet downe, will be moderate and well aduiſed, « according to your cuſtome. This counſell, though it was ſupported with ſo many mightie rea- ſons, and by the authoritie of many of the principall and moſt wiſe Senators, was not for all that of ſuch force, but that the contrary aduice carried it, as well for reſpect of hatred, as for deſire to beare rule, two things which leade men eaſily to dangerous deliberations. For the hatred which euery one had conceiued againſt Lodowike, was without meaſure, and no leſſe was the de- ſire to adioyne to the iuriſdiction of Venice the citie of Cremona with all the countrey about it, and all Guiaradadda: an enlargement of no ſmall value, for that it yeelded yearely a reuenue of an hundred thouſand duckats at the leaſt; but more to be eſteemed for this oportunitie, for that embracing by this increaſement almoſt all the riuer of Oglia, they ſtretched out their limits euen to Po, and much amplified their iuriſdiction along the riuer of Adda, and approching within fif- teene miles of the citie of Millan, and ſomewhat neare the cities of Plaiſance and Parma, it ſee- med in their coniectures that they had the way opened to occupie all the Duchie of Millan, as often as the French King was either carried with new thoughts, or troubled with great impedi- ments on the other ſide the Mounts: which they hoped would happen within a ſhort time, both for the nature of the French men, who are more apt to get then able to keepe; and alſo for that their Commonweale is perpetuall: whereas in the kingdome of France it often hapneth, by the death of Kings, that things deuolue to alteration, and gouernments and counſels change. They brought alſo into conſideration the difficulties of the French to continue the amities and good wils of their ſubiects, no leſſe for the generall diuerſitie of bloud, then for the difference of the French manners from the cuſtomes of the Italians. So that this ſentence being confirmed by the voices of the greateſt number, they ſent to their Embaſſadours reſident with the King, to con- clude the confederation vpon the offers made, not ſpeaking in any reſpect of the affaires of Piſa.

This exception of Piſa did not a litle trouble the King, for that he hoped by the oportunity of that deputation, to vnite the Venetians and Florentines with him: and knowing that the Venetians were inclined to withdraw themſelues by compoſition from the defence of Piſa, he held it but reaſonable, that in that action they ſhould rather haue regard to him to make eaſie the enterpriſe of Millan, as a thing nouriſhing cõmon benefite to them both, then ſeeking to haue better con- ditions in the compoſition, to be the cauſers that the Florentines ſhould remaine ioyned with Lo- dowike Sforce; by whoſe meanes the King knowing that the negociation continued at Ferrara, was in no litle doubt, that he ſhould not haue on his ſide either the Florentines or the Venetians, if Lodowike had power to bring the conference of Ferrara to a good concluſion. Then the King iudging that to be a reſolution both vaine and ill aduiſed, which ſhould leaue in doubt both the one and the other Commonweale; and being not a litle moued with the diſtruſt which they ſee- med to haue of him, be began to incline rather to conclude the peace which continually was ſo- licited with the Emperour, beating this condition, that it ſhould be lawfull to the one to make warre vpon Lodowike Sforce, and to the other to vexe the Venetians: he made anſwer then by the deputies which debated in his name with the Embaſſadours of Venice, that he refuſed to accord with them, if for their parts, they gaue not perfection to the deputation of Piſa, wherein he had ſolicited them before: and in his owne perſon he aſſured the Florentine Embaſſadours, that he would neuer make other agreement with the Venetians. But the Duke of Valentinois, and the o- ther agents of the Pope, with the Cardinall of S. Peter ad Vincula, Triuulce, and all the other Ita- lians, who for their particular intereſts incited him to this warre, would not ſuffer him to re- maine conſtant in that deuice: perſwading him with many and great reaſons, that weighing with the power of the Venetians, the oportunities they had to annoy the Duke of Millan, his Maiesty could not follow a counsell more hurtfull, then to suffer himselfe to be depriued of their aides and succours, for feare to lose the fauour of the Florentines, from whom, by reason of their owne troubles, and that they were farre remoued from the Duchie of Millan, could be drawne no great profite or commoditie to his purposes: and that it would easily come to passe, that Lodowike Sforce who, in fauour of the Florentines had forborne to reconcile himselfe with the Venetians, (a matter which had bene the very spring and originall of all the disagreements betweene him and the Venetians) would eftsoones reunite himselfe with them: by which vnion of the Venetians with Lodowike, if there were no other meanes to discerne what difficulties and impediments might ensue to the affaires of his Maiestie, at the least the experience of things past gaue sufficient warning: for that albeit in the league that was made against King Charles, the names of so many Kings were concurrent, yet the onely forces of the Venetians and Lodowike, tooke from him Nouare, and alwayes defended the Duchie of Millan against him: They told him, that it was a counsell dangerous and deceitfull, to make a foundation vpon the vnitie with Maximilian, in whom the world had seene, euen till that day, farre greater attempts and dispositions to enterprises, then were his meanes or wisedome able to colour: and that if his actions sorted to better effect then in times past, it ought to be well considered, how ill would agree with the intentions of the King, the augmentation of so great and perpetuall an enemie to the Crowne of France. With these reasons they so altered the Kings mind, that changing aduice, without speaking further of Pisa, he consented to the confederation with the Venetians, wherein was agreed, that at the selfe same time that his Maiestie with a mightie armie should assaile the Duchie of Millan, they for their parts should do the like vpon their frontiers: That the King hauing conquered the residue of the Duchie, Cremona with all Guiaradadda should be for the Venetians, except foure furlongs along the riuer of Adda. Lastly, that after the King had conquered the Duchie of Millan, the Venetians were bound to defend it for a certaine time, and with a certaine proportion of horsemen and footmen, the King promising to do the like office for Cremona, and all the rest that they possest in Lombardie, euen vnto the marrishes of Venice. This confederation was so secretly contracted, that Lodowike for many moneths could not vnderstand whether they had made betweene them a league onely for their common defence, as from the beginning had bene published both in the French Court and at Venice, or whether there was any article that touched him, or made mention to manage warre against him: and the Pope himselfe, notwithstanding his strait familiaritie with the King, could haue no certain aduertisement, but very late. The league being concluded with the Venetians, the King (without speaking further of Pisa) propounded to the Florentines conditions much differing from the former: by reason whereof, and for the displeasures which the Venetians did them, they were so much the more constrained to make their stay vpon the Duke of Millan, by whose aides their affaires continually prospered in the countrey of Casentin, where the enemies receiuing many hurts by the souldiers and paisants, and suffering want of victuals and forrage for their horses, were shut vp within Bibienna and other small places: yet they forgot not all necessary diligence to command the straits of the Appenine, to the end the way of their succours might be kept open, and the meanes more assured (when they should be constrained) to abandon the countrey of Casentin with lesse domage. By reason whereof Charles Vrsin was bestowed with his men at armes, and an hundred footmen, for the guard of the strait of Montalona, and a litle more below, Aluiano defended the passage of Vernia. But on the other side, Paul Vitelli proceeding discreetly, according to his custome, after he had restrained them into hard termes, laboured to compell them to abandon the country of Montalona, with intention afterwards to driue such as kept the passage of Vernia to do the like, to the end that the regiment of the Venetians being wholly penned vp in Bibienna, and enuironed on all sides with enemies and hils, they might either be the easilier vanquished, or at least be driuen to consume themselues: seeing their numbers were already much diminished, for that besides those that were stripped here and there, there were departed from the armie at sundry times, both for want of victuals, and ill suretie of their lodgings, more then fifteene hundred horsemen with may troupes of footmen, who being set vpon in the passage of the Alpes by the paisants, receiued great harmes. In the end the consideration of these difficulties constrained Charles Vrsin with his regiment to abandon the strait of Montalona, not without danger to be put to the chase, for that many of the Florentine bands (to whom his distresses were knowne) known) and companies of paisants embracing the present occasion, set vpon them on the way: yet the Vrsins hauing already take the aduantage of the strait, albeit they lost a great part of their baggage, performed notwithstanding such defence, that the companies that followed the chase in disorder, tasted of their valour. The example of Charles Vrsin (in regard of the same difficulties) was followed by those of Vernia and Chiusa, who forsaking that passage, were retired to Bibienna, wherein were inclosed the Duke of Vrbin, Aluiano, Aitor Baillon, Peter Marcel Superintendent to the Venetian companies, and Iulian de Medicis, who had reserued for the guard of that place (their onely fortresse in the countrey of Casentin) threescore horses and seuen hundred footmen, and sustained themselues with no other comfort then a hope in the succors which the Venetians prepared, iudging that for the regard of honour, but much more to haue better conditions by agreement, it imported them much not to abandon wholly the enterprise of the countrey of Casentin: and for that cause the Count Petillane mustred at Rauenna with great diligence the bands appointed for that rescue, whereunto he was solicited by the perpetuall complaints of the Duke of Vrbin and the rest, who signifying vnto him that their victuals began to faile them, protested that their necessitie was such, that without speedie succour they should be constrained for their safetie to offer composition to the enemie: and of the contrary, the Duke of Millan and the Captaines that were in the countrey of Casentin, desired much to preuent the succour, by the expugnation of Bibienna, and for that end demanded foure thousand footmen to be sent to ioyne with those in the campe. But their desire found many impediments, both for that in that countrey, cold and full of hils, the nature of the time hindred much all actions and exercise of warre, and also there was no great readinesse in the Florentines to furnish such prouision, partly being ouer-wearied with the long and intollerable expences they had bene at, and which increased dayly: and partly for that in the Citie, which on the other side was not very peaceable, there was disclosed a new dissention, some of the Citizens fauouring Paul Vitelli for his late merites in the warre, and others desiring to raise the Count Rainuce, an ancient and faithfull Captaine to that Commonweale, and which had parentage of great authoritie within Florence; who by his misfortune at S. Real hauing lost the hope of the first place, did very vnwillingly endure to haue that dignitie transferred to Paul Vitelli; and therefore leading his regiment in the countrey of Casentin, he expressed no readinesse to aduance the enterprises, whereby might grow increase of reputation to him whom he had a desire to embase. These difficulties also became the greater by the naturall propertie of Paul, who alwayes demanded money before the time, who could not agree with the Florentine Commissioners, and who oftentimes in the deliberation and expedition of affaires, tooke to himselfe more authoritie then seemed reasonable; and had euen at that time, without the priuitie of the Superintendents, giuen to the Duke of Vrbin being sicke, safeconduct to repasse in suretie out of the countrey of Casentin: vnder the warrant of which safeconduct, Iulian de Medicis was also gone with him, to the speciall displeasure of the Florentines, who perswaded themselues that if they had made difficultie to suffer the Duke of Vrbin to passe, his desire to go to recouer his health in his owne dominions, would haue constrained him to agree to the departing of the bands that were within Bibienna: and likewise they complained that without their priuitie Iulian de Medicis should communicate in such a fauour, expressing aforetime manifest action of rebellion, and euen then was in armes against his countrey. These things hindred much that at Florence they neither beleeued counsels, nor agreed to the demands of Paul Vitelli; but much more were they cause that the warre continued not with much reputation for him towards the people, for that many things of importance were performed more by the paisants then by the souldiers, and that for the great opinion they had of his valour, they promised to themselues with a quicker expedition the victorie of the enemies: wherein perhaps (according to the nature and iudgement of peoples) they attributed to the want of will, that which with more equitie they might haue referred to the want of power, hauing regard to the sharpnesse of the time, and want of things necessarie. By these occasions the supply of foure thousand footmen being too slow in coming, the Count Petillane had leisure enough to come to the borough of Elcie appertaining to the Duke of Vrbin, and very neare the limites of the Florentines, where were before Charles Vrsin and Peter de Medicis, and where were assembled all the bands to passe the Appenine, whose strength and order (as best agreeable to that rude and penurious countrey) stood more vpon footmen then horsemen, and the most of them lightly armed. This was the last attempt which the Venetians made in the countrey of Casentin;

ſentin, and to breake it, Paul Vitelli leauing about Bibienna a certaine forme of a ſiege, and ſufficient guard in the ſtraits and moſt neceſſary paſſages, marched with the reſidue of his armie to the pariſh of S. Stephen, (a towne of the Florentines ſeated at the foote of the Alpes) to withſtand the enemies deſcending from the hils: but the Count Petillane hauing before him the Alpes loden with ſnow, and at the foote of the Alpes ſo great an impediment, and the paſſages narrow, and very troubleſome to paſſe, euen when the ſeaſon is faire; durſt not aſſay to paſſe, notwithſtanding with great complaints he was perſwaded to it by the Senate of Venice, who were more forward to puſh him forward, then readie to prouide for him: and albeit they propounded to him diuers plots and meanes to withdraw Paul from whence he was, and that already in Valdibagna was done ſome enterpriſe of vexation vpon the peeces of the Florentines, yet he ſtood reſolute in his determination, and would not ſtirre in any ſort.

The Duke of Millan made aſtoniſhed with the league, ſolicited an accord betweene the Venetians and the Florentines

But by how much more coldly the warre proceeded, by ſo much the more hotly were recontinued the ſolicitations and practiſes of accord, equally deſired of both the one and other partie for diuers regards, and no leſſe followed and ſolicited by the Duke of Millan: who being diſmayed becauſe of the league made betweene the French King and the Venetians, had ſome hope, that the accord being made, the Venetians would haue leſſe deſire to the paſſage of the French, perſwading himſelfe alſo, that at the leaſt (contenting themſelues in that regard with his good will and with his workes) they would ſomewhat mitigate the rigor of their indignation conceiued againſt him. Therefore interpoſing amongſt them a meanes by Hercules d Eſte his father in law, he conſtrained the Florentines to condeſcend ſomewhat to the deſire of the Venetians, not ſo much with authoritie (for they ſeeing into his intentions, began to hold him for ſuſpected) as by letting them know, that if the agreement went not forward, his neceſſities would compell him, for the feare he had of the French King, to take from them, if not all, yet at leaſt ſome part of the forces which he had ſent to their aide. The matter was debated many moneths at Ferrara, where, after many difficulties diſputed, Hercules was required by the Venetians, to come in perſon to Venice for the more facilitie of the expedition, whereof he made ſome difficultie; but much more the Florentines, for that they knew that the Venetians deſired that a compromiſe might be made in the perſon of the Duke of Ferrara, which ſtood not with their liking. But ſuch were the importunities of Lodowike Sforce, that at laſt he conſented to go thither, and the Florentines to ſend with him Iohn Baptiſta Rodolpho and Paul Antonie Soderin, two of the chiefeſt and wiſeſt citizens of their Commonweale. The firſt thing that was diſputed vpon at Venice, was, to know if Hercules as arbitrator would put an end to the controuerſie, or as a friend indifferent, would labour to bring them to accord, interpoſing betweene the parties according to their order of proceeding at Ferrara, where they were not farre from reſoluing the articles moſt principall and important. The Florentines deſired that they ſhould continue as they had begun, knowing that Hercules, in as much as might depend vpon his arbitrement, would hold more account of the greatneſſe of the Venetians then of them; and that if he muſt pronounce the ſentence at Venice, he ſhould be ſo much the more compelled to beare reſpect to the Venetians: and though he would do nothing of himſelfe, yet they were aſſured that the Duke of Millan would induce him thereto, for that he deſired greatly to make knowne to the Venetians that he had ſerued their turne in that action. And albeit many difficulties were almoſt reſolued at Ferrara, yet both in their laſt perfection, and in many particularities, the power of the arbitrator was not little, who, notwithſtanding the compromiſe, would yet haue a libertie to depart from that which was firſt debated. On the other ſide, the Venetians were at a point, if the compromiſe went not forward, to paſſe no further; not ſo much for that they put more confidence in the arbitrator then did the Florentines, as for that there were riſen amongſt themſelues many contrarieties and obiections touching the matter in queſtion. For, albeit they were all wearie of their intollerable expences, with a very ſmall hope of profite, which not a litle aduanced their diſpoſitions to agreement; yet many of the yonger ſort in the Senate, would not conſent to agreement, vnleſſe the libertie of the Piſans were wholly preſerued, or at leaſt vnleſſe that part of the countrey remained ſtil to them which they poſſeſſed when they tooke them into their protection; for which opinion they alledged many reaſons, but chiefly this, that hauing by publicke decree ratified a promiſe to the Piſans to protect their libertie, they could not breake it without apparent blemiſh to their common honours, and perpetuall ſtaine to the reputation of their Commonweale: and ſome others, made eaſie touching all other things, were immoderate in the quantitie of the ex-pences, which they required to be repayed by the Florentines in abandoning of Piſa. But the opinion almoſt of all the chiefe of the Senate both for wiſedome and authoritie, was on the contrary; who, euen tired with ſo great expences, ſaw nothing but deſpaire in the defence of Bibienna, and leſſe poſſibilitie to ſuſtaine any longer the generall quarrell of Piſa, without increaſe of new troubles and charges, for the many difficulties that ſtill appeared, as well in ſuccouring them, as to diuert and draw away the forces of the enemies; for that the Florentines had wrought farre greater impediments then they expected in the beginning. Beſides, they conſidered that albeit the enterpriſe againſt the Duke of Millan might be ſuppoſed eaſie, yet the French King, being not pacified with the Emperour, and ſtanding ſubiect to diuers impediments ordinarily happning at home, might by many aduentures be hindred to proſecute the warre: and though he ſhould put it to action, yet in the buſineſſe of warre, many dangers vnlooked for, and difficulties no leſſe intricate, may chance dayly; but aboue all, being daunted by the great preparations which Baiazet Ottoman was ſaid to make both by ſea and land to inuade thoſe parts towards Greece, their reſolution was, (ſeeing they could not otherwiſe do) that it was neceſſary, rather to conſent that honeſtie in ſome part ſhould giue place to vtilitie, then, in ſtanding obſtinately vpon their promiſe, to perſeuere in ſo great troubles and perplexities: and becauſe they were well aſſured that theſe concluſions would be hardly conſented vnto in their councels, (albeit they knew from the beginning that of neceſſitie they muſt be allowed) they had (whileſt the negociation was at Ferrara) wiſely procured, that by the councell of the Pregati ſhould be giuen fulneſſe of authoritie touching the affaires of Piſa, and the reſolution of the accord treated with the Florentines, to the councell of the Dieci, which is a councell compounded of a farre leſſer number, none being called vnto it but ſuch as be of greateſt grauitie and authoritie, which contained the moſt part of thoſe that deſired the accord. But now the ſolicitation continuing at Venice, and being in no hope to be able to diſpoſe the councel of the Pregati to conſent to the articles which had bene debated at Ferrara, and knowing withall, that if onely the councell of the Dieci condeſcended to them, there might riſe occaſions greatly to charge thoſe that aſſiſted it: they ſolicited that the compromiſe might be made, hoping that touching the iudgement that might come of it, men would rather transferre the imputation to the arbitrator then to them, and that more eaſily would that be ratified which had bene alreadie publiſhed in ſentence, then that which ſhould be conſented vnto with the partie intreating by way of accord. So after theſe things had bene debated for certaine dayes, (the Duke of Millan threatning the Florentines refuſing to compromit, to withdraw immediatly all his companies out of Tuſcan) there was a free and abſolute compromiſe for eight dayes in the perſon of Hercules Duke of Ferrara, who, after he had well conſidered of all things, pronounced the ſixt day of Aprill, That within eight dayes next following, the Venetians and Florentines ſhould ceaſſe to offend one another, and that by the next S. Markes tide all the bands, ſuccours and aides of either partie, ſhould returne into their countreys: and that the Venetians at the ſame time ſhould cauſe to iſſue out of Piſa and all the places thereabouts, all their regiments of ſouldiers, which they entertained there: That they ſhould abandon Bibienna with all other peeces taken vpon the Florentines, and they to pardon thoſe of Bibienna all their faults and treſpaſſes: That for the recompence of all charges (which the Venetians aſſured to amount to eight hundred thouſand duckats) the Florentines ſhould be bound to repay them within twelue yeares, fifteene thouſand duckats by the yeare: That all the offences ſhould be pardoned to the Piſans, to whom ſhould be ſuffered to exerciſe by ſea and land all ſorts of ſciences and merchandize, and all the fortreſſes of Piſa and thoſe other places which were holden by them the day of the ſentence, to remaine in their guard; but vnder this charge, that if they beſtowed therin garriſons of the countrymen or others, that they ſhould not be perſons ſuſpected to the Florentines, and that they ſhould be payd of the reuenues which the Florentines ſhould collect of Piſa, increaſing neither the numbers of men, nor the payes accuſtomed afore the rebellion: That if the Piſans thought good, they might deface and diſmantle all thoſe citadels and fortreſſes of the proper countrey of Piſa, which had bene recouered by the Florentines for the time the Venetians held them in protection: That within Piſa the firſt inſtances of cauſes ciuill ſhould be iudged by a Podeſtat ſtranger choſen by the Piſans of a place not ſuſpected of the Florentines; and that the Captaine choſen by the Florentines ſhould not meddle but with cauſes of appellation, and haue no power to proceed in any caſe criminall concerning bloud, baniſhment, or confiſcation, without the counſell of a Superintendent to be choſen by by Hercules or his ſucceſſors, and of fiue Doctors of law which the Piſans ſhould name to him: That the goods moueable and vnmoueable occupied by the one and other partie, ſhould be reſtored to whom they appertained, not making reſtitution of the fruits, of the which euery one was abſolued: That in all other things they ſhould ſuffer the Florentines to enioy fully their rights in Piſa and the territorie, forbidding the Piſans, that neither for the regard of the citadels and fortreſſes, nor for other cauſe whatſoeuer, they ſhould practiſe or conſpire any thing againſt the Commmonweale of Florence. This ſentence was no ſooner publiſhed at Venice, but there were heard through the Citie great complaints, euen of the Nobilitie, againſt the Duke of Ferrara, and againſt thoſe ſpeciall Senators which had managed this buſineſſe, the moſt part blaming them, in that faith ſhould be broken to the Piſans, with ſo great ſhame to their Commonweale, complaining vehemently, that the article touching the expences of the warre was paſt ouer with ſo light conſideration; a matter which greatly inflamed the Embaſſadours of the Piſans: who before the ſentence being cunningly entertained by the Venetians, in hope, that vndoubtedly they ſhould remaine in full libertie, and that not onely the reſidue of the countrey ſhould be adiudged to them, but haply alſo the port of Liuorne; they were ſo much the more grieued, by how much the effects fell out contrary to the perſwaſions wherein they had bene nouriſhed. And then they began to complaine, that the promiſes to protect their libertie ſo oftentimes reiterated by the Senate (vnder the aſſurance of whoſe faith they had not onely reiected the amities of all other Potentates, but alſo refuſed farre better conditions offered by the Florentines) were vnworthily violated, their ſecuritie being no otherwiſe prouided for then with vaine apparences. For, how could they be aſſured, that the Florentines, reeſtabliſhing their magiſtrates within Piſa, and their merchants and ſubiects returning to trafficke there, and on the other ſide their paiſants, who had ſerued as a principall member in the defence of the Citie, retiring to their houſes and farmes, would not bring vnder their iuriſdiction by ſome propertie of fraud, the whole gouernment of their towne? hauing withall the guard and command of the gates. And what ſuretie can that be, to haue in their hand the fortreſſes, if ſuch as ſhal be appointed to guard them, muſt be payed by the Florentines, and not to be lawfull in a time ſo doubtfull, to beſtow a ſtronger guard then had bene accuſtomed in ſeaſons peaceable and aſſured? That the pardon for treſpaſſes committed, was likewiſe a thing vaine, ſeeing the Florentines had good meanes to deſtroy them by wayes iudiciall and by iudgements: for that the merchandizes and ſuch other goods as had bene made pillage in the time of rebellion, amounted to ſuch a value, that in recompence they would not onely confiske their ſubſtances, but alſo their perſons ſhould not be aſſured from impriſonment. But to cut off the importunitie of theſe complaints, the principals of the Senate brought to paſſe the day following (although the terme of the compromiſe was expired) that Hercules (to whom the generall indignation of the citie brought not a litle feare) added to the ſentence publiſhed, a declaration without the knowledge and priuitie of the Florentines: that vnder the name of fortreſſes, was comprehended and meant the gates of the towne of Piſa, with other peeces that had fortreſſes, for whoſe guard, and the entertainment of the Podeſtat and Superintendent, ſhould be aſſigned to the Piſans a certaine part of the reuenues of Piſa: and that the places not ſuſpected, whereof mention was made in the ſentence, and from whence they might draw ſouldiers, ſhould be the ſtate of the Church, of Mantua, of Ferrara, and of Bologna, not comprehending therein ſouldiers of the appointment or in the pay of others; and that touching reſtitution of goods, there ſhould neuer be ſpeech of it: That it ſhould be in the power of the Piſans to name the Superintendent, borne in any place not ſuſpected: That the Captaine ſhould not proceed in any cauſe criminall (how litle ſoeuer it were) without the Superintendent: That the Piſans ſhould be well intreated of the Florentines, according to the cuſtome of other noble cities of Italy, and that there ſhould not be impoſed vpon them any new charges. This declaration was not ſolicited for any deſire the Venetians had that it ſhould be obſerued, but ſomewhat to qualifie the importunities of the Piſan Embaſſdours, and ſo to iuſtifie themſelues to the counſell of the Pregati, that if the libertie of the Piſans were not altogether obtained, yet at leaſt they had ſo well prouided for their ſuretie and commoditie, that they could not be charged to haue paſſed them ouer as a prey, or left them abandoned. In this counſell of the Pregati, after much diſputation and reaſoning, at laſt what with conſideration of the conditions of the time, and the difficulties to maintaine Piſa, but ſpecially for feare of the Turkes armies, it was reſolued, that the ſentence ſhould not be ratified with an expreſſe conſent, but that things which were of greateſt importance ſhould be put in execution, making to ceaſſe within eight dayes all offences, and drawing all their bands out of Tuſcan at the time determined, with intention to meddle no more with the quarrell: yea many of the Senators began to deſire, that the Florentines ſhould rather recouer Piſa, then that it ſhould fall into the power of the Duke of Millan. And at Florence, after the tenour of the ſentence was communicated to the Citie, moſt of the multitude began to murmure in their minds, and not onely held themſelues oppreſſed in this, that they muſt make repaiment of the expences of the warre to thoſe who had vniuſtly vexed them; but much more for that it ſeemed to them they had obtained no other thing but the naked and ſimple name of Lords, ſeeing, both the fortreſſes were in the guard of the Piſans, and the adminiſtration of criminall iuſtice, one of the principall members to preſerue eſtates, could not haue his courſe without their magiſtrates: neuertheleſſe, the ſame proteſtations of the Duke of Millan which had induced them to compromit, conſtrained them to ratifie it, and hoping withall that within a litle time, by induſtry and good behauiour to the Piſans, they might redreſſe things in a better forme, they ratified by name, the ſentence publiſhed, but not the additions and declarations which were not yet come to their knowledge. But farre greater were the indignations and doubts of the Piſans, who moued not a litle againſt the name of the Venetians, and iealous of ſome greater deceit, as ſoone as they vnderſtood the purpoſe of the ſentence, diſcharged their ſouldiers from the guard of the fortreſſes and the gates; and not ſuffering them any more to lodge in the Citie, they ſtood many dayes in great doubt, whether they ſhould accept the conditions of the ſentence or not. On the one ſide, feare ouer-ruled their wils, ſtanding now abandoned of euery one: and on the other ſide, the generall hate to the Florentines made them ſtand reſolute, but much more their deſperation to obtaine pardon for their heauy and infinite tranſgreſſions, and for that they had put the ſtate of Florence to infinite expences and harmes, and many times had brought into hard termes their proper libertie. They being in theſe doubts, the Duke of Millan counſelled them to giue place, offering that he would worke ſo much with the Florentines that the conditions of the ſentence ſhould be more in their fauors and to their aduantages: yet they, to make triall if he remained ſtill poſſeſſed with his ancient couetouſneſſe, determining in this caſe to giue themſelues wholly to him, ſent to him Embaſſadours; and at laſt, after many thoughts and variations, they determined rather to make triall of all extremities, then to returne vnder the yoke of the Florentines, whereunto they were ſecretly incited by the Genoways, Lucquoys, and Pandolfe Petrucci. And the Florentines were not without ſuſpition, that the Duke of Millan (the truth being otherwiſe) had encouraged them to that obſtinate reſolution, ſo litle expectation is there of ſinceritie and faithfull actions in that man, whom the world hath taken into opinion to be double and cautelous.

The Piſans not keeping the accord, are beſieged by the Florentines.

Thus the Florentines being out of hope to reconcile Piſa by accord, thought they had a great occaſion to vanquiſh and force that Citie; and therefore cauſing Paul Vitelli to returne eſtſoons into that countrey, they leuied with ready diligence the prouiſions by him demanded: but whileſt that ſtrength was in preparing to action, the dangers of Lodowike Sforce increaſed continually, for that his interpoſition into the accord had in no ſort appeaſed the minds of the Venetians, who, for hate to the man, and hope of their profite, were wholly bent to conſpire his ruine: and Maximilian was nothing ſo readie to make warre on the French King, as he was importunate in continuall demands of money of Lodowike: yea, contrary to his many promiſes, he prolonged the truce for the whole moneth of Auguſt next; taking from him at one time the hope that he had that his ſuccours would ſtand him in more ſtead then had done his counſell to diuert the warre; and likewiſe Maximilian being vnited with the league of Sweaden, began warre vpon the Swiſſers, declared rebels of the Empire for many controuerſies betweene them: which warre continuing on both ſides with great furie, with ſundry accidents and fortunes on both parts, Lodowike began to aſſure himſelfe, that in no neceſſitie he could hope for ſuccours from Maximilian, vntill that warre againſt the Swiſſers tooke end, either by victorie or compoſition. And yet Maximilian, promiſing him that he would neuer accord with the French King or with the Swiſſers, without comprehending him in it, Lodowike was ſtill conſtrained to refurniſh the expences of that warre, and to entertaine the Emperours prodigalities with new ſupplies of money. This being knowne to the new King of France, and how much it imported him to haue the Pope and the Venetians for him, he eſteemed litle the perſwaſions of many that counſelled him, that in regard he was newly aſcended to the Crowne, and his treaſures very ill furniſhed, he might put

off the warre till the yeare following: but he hoped to obtaine the victorie in few moneths, and ſo could ſuffer no great neceſſitie of money, and therefore entred into open preparation for the warre, alwayes furniſhing the Swiſſers vnder hand with ſome proportion of money, to the end to keepe Maximilian in buſineſſe. And for this cauſe the Duke of Millan, diſcerning ſuch manifeſt tokens of the warre, laboured with a wonderfull diligence and care not to be alone in ſo great dangers; for that he had an abſolute diſtruſt in all poſſibilities and meanes of accord with the King, or reconciliation with the Venetians; and likewiſe in the King of Spaine (notwithſtanding his many ſolicitations) he found no care of his perils. Then ſounding in one inſtant the wils almoſt of all the other potentates, he ſent Galeas Viſcount to Maximilian and the Swiſſers to negociate an agreement betweene them. And knowing, that according to the Popes deſire, the mariage of Charlotta with his ſonne Ceſar Borgia, could not well ſucceed, for that the yong Ladie either moued with the loue and authoritie of her houſe and parents, or elſe gouerned by the perſwaſions of the French King (in whom notwithſtanding were expreſſed many faire apparences to the contrary,) refuſed with great conſtancie to make him her husband, if withall he put not an end to the affaires of Federike her father, who offered to the French King a yearly tribute, with very large conditions; he entred into hope, to alien and eſtrange him from the fauours he bare to the enterpriſes of France, ſoliciting him with many importunities to draw him into confederation with him, wherein he promiſed the aſſociation of King Federike and the Florentines, with many faire offers, that as well he as the Confederates, would contribute with him in a common ſuccour againſt the Vicars of the Church, and indue him beſides with a great quantitie of money to purchaſe ſome honorable eſtate for his ſonne. Theſe offers, as the Pope at the firſt motion ſeemed to heare them with a diſſembled eare: ſo in the end he was content to giue them leaue to vaniſh and become meerly vaine. For, hoping to receiue by the ſocietie and fauour of the French King, farre greater recompences then thoſe which he looked to obtaine if Italy were not againe filled with the armies of France, he conſented that his ſonne excluded already from the marriage of Charlotta, ſhould take one of the daughters of the Lord Albret, who for his affinitie with the bloud royall, and for the greatneſſe of his eſtates, was one of the greateſt Lords in all the kingdome of France. But Lodowike who was daily more certified of the euill inclination of the Venetians, ceaſſed not by expreſſe ſolicitors, but in ſecret maner (King Federike concurring in the ſame action) to ſtirre vp againſt them the Prince of the Turkes, hoping that being aſſailed and vexed by him, they would haue no oportunitie to moleſt the ſtate of Millan. And being withall well aduertiſed of the preparations which the Florentines made to haue Piſa, he laboured, offering them all ſorts of ſuccours, to bind them to his defence with three hundred men at armes and two thouſand footmen after they had recouered Piſa. And on the other ſide, the French King required their promiſe to furniſh him for one yeare with fiue hundred men at armes: and for recompence he offered to bind himſelfe, as ſoone as he had accompliſhed the conqueſt of Millan, to aide them for one whole yeare with a thouſand Lances, for the aduancement of their enterpriſes, with promiſe to make no accord with Lodowike, if at the ſame time they were not repoſſeſſed of Piſa, and their other places withholden: beſides, he would bring to paſſe that the Pope and the Venetians ſhould ioyne to their protection, if afore the conqueſt of Millan, any would offer to moleſt them. Vpon theſe ſo contrary demands, the Florentines could not reſolue, no leſſe for the difficultie of the matter, then for their diuiſion of minds. For, Lodowike requiring their aide no otherwiſe, then in caſe they recouered Piſa, his ſuccours were farre more preſent and certaine, then the helpes promiſed by the French King, in whom they iudged litle oportunitie of action to the aide of Piſa, for that, being abandoned of euery one, they determined to haue it that ſommer: and beſides, many were moued with the memory, that the Venetians were confederate with the French king againſt Lodowike, for that he had miniſtred to them in their perils: but much more were they moued with feare, leſt in refuſing to gratifie his demands, he would for very ſpite hinder them to get Piſa, a thing which he might eaſily do. And of the contrary, iudging it a thing impoſſible for him to reſiſt the French King and the Venetians, it ſeemed a counſell dangerous to make themſelues enemies with a King whoſe armies they expected within few moneths to runne ouer all Italy: and the memory of the fauours receiued of Lodowike in the warre againſt the Venetians, to the which they referred the originall of all their dangers, was eaſily defaced by this conſideration, that the rebellion of Piſa was firſt kindled by his meanes; and that nouriſhing alwaies ambitious deſires to aſpire to the iuriſdiction of it, he had ſuſtained them, and for many moneths cauſed them to be ſuſtained by others, hauing done at that time many other wrongs and iniuries againſt the Florentines: ſo that his offences had bene greater then his fauours, which yet he did not communicate in liberalitie and frankneſſe, but for that he could not endure that the Venetians ſhould take from him that which with hope and ambition he had long ſince iudged to be duly appertaining to him: and further, that if they declared themſelues for Lodowike, the French King alſo by meanes of the Pope and Venetians his confederates, might hinder them in the recouering of Piſa. Then, at laſt, they determined not to ſtirre either in fauour of the French, or of the Duke of Millan, and in the meane time to follow the enterpriſe of Piſa, for which they iudged their owne ſtrength ſufficient; & yet to the end to giue Lodowik no occaſion to hinder them, vſing with him his owne wiles, to entertaine him in hope as much as they could. And therfore after they had for many daies made delayes in anſwering, they diſpatched at laſt a Secretarie of eſtate to giue him vnderſtanding, that the intention of the Commonweale was conformable to his deſires as touching the effect, but concerning the maner there was ſome difference: for that as they had reſolued, that as ſoone as Piſa was recouered, he ſhould not faile of the ſuccours he had demanded; ſo they deſired him to conſider how perillous it was to contract their promiſe vnder expreſſe couenant, for that in free cities, ſuch things being not to be diſpatched without the conſent of many, there was no poſſibilitie to hold them ſecret; and being diſcloſed, they would giue occaſion to the French King to draw the Pope and the Venetians to adminiſter ſuccours to Piſa: by which it would come to paſſe, that their promiſe would bring harme to themſelues, and proue vnprofitable to him, for that Piſa being not taken, neither ſhould they be bound to him, neither were they able to helpe him. For theſe reaſons, they ſaid, that faith and promiſe might ſuffice giuen in words with the conſent of the chiefe citizens, vpon whoſe authoritie all their publike deliberations depended; and that it was for no other occaſion that they refuſed to couenant with him by writing; offering him at laſt for better declaration of their will and intention, that if he knew any other meanes whereby his deſire might be ſatisfied, and ſo great domages auoided, they would be as ready to put it in practiſe. By which anſwer, ſubtill and full of art, and for that alſo they did not accept the offers of his ſuccours, Lodowike ſaw there was no hope left to haue bands of ſouldiers from them, and leſſe expectation of ſuccours from other parts, for that the comforts promiſed ſo continually by the Emperour, proued very vncertaine, no leſſe by his naturall inconſtancie, then for the impediment of his warres with the Swiſſers. And for Federike, where he promiſed to ſend him a ſtrength of foure hundred men at armes, and fiue thouſand footmen vnder the leading of Proſper Colonne, he doubted not ſo much of his will (for the defence of the Duchie of Millan turned to his profite) as of his diſabilitie and delayes: and Hercules, his father in law, when he deſired his aid, (reproching in a maner the ancient iniuries done by him in the compoſition of Poleſina) had anſwered him, that it brought no ſmall griefe to him to be reſtrained to ſuccour his diſtreſſe, for that the lands of the Venetians ioyning ſo neare to the gates of Ferrara, he was conſtrained to be carefull ouer the ſuretie of his owne eſtate. Then Lodowike thus made naked of all hopes, ſauing ſuch as depended of himſelfe, began carefully to fortifie Anon, Nouaro, and Alexandria de la Paille, townes ſtanding in the mouth of the firſt inuaſions of the French: and his reſolution was to ſend out againſt the furie of the French armie Galeas de S. Seuerin with the greateſt part of his ſtrength, and to oppoſe the reſidue againſt the Venetians, vnder the gouernment of the Marquis of Mantua, although a litle after, either by indiſcretion, or by couetouſneſſe, or for that there is no power to reſiſt the counſels of God, he became eſtranged from the Marquis: for that falling into this vaine perſwaſion, that the Venetians (againſt whom Baiazet Ottoman had opened the warre as well by land as by ſea with a wonderfull preparation) would haue no oportunitie to moleſt him, being conſtrained to defend their owne eſtates againſt ſo ſtrong an enemie: and deſiring withall to ſatisfie Galeas de S. Seuerin, who could not brooke that the Marquis ſhould enioy a title more honourable then he, he began to make difficulties, as refuſing to pay him a certaine remainder of old payes, and required of him oathes and cautions not accuſtomed, for the aſſurance of his faith: and notwithſtanding that, afterwards being aduertiſed that the Venetians diſpatched many bands of men into Breſſe, to be readie to enter into the warre at the ſame time that the French ſhould begin it, he ſought by the meanes of the Duke of Ferrara father in law to them both, to reconcile him; yet the difficulties could not ſo ſoone be reſolued, as the dangers increaſed, growing dayly more more great and terrible. For the Duke of Sauoy, being eftſoones conioyned with the King, gaue paſſage for his bands to march continually through Piemont, which were beſtowed about the confines of Aſt: and the hopes of Lodowike diminiſhed dayly, for that King Federike, either by diſabilitie or by negligence, was ſlow to miniſter to his perils: and that ſmall remainder of hope which he entertained as his chiefeſt comfort, that the Florentines hauing once gotten Piſa, would ſend to his ſuccours Paul Vitelli (whoſe valour held great reputation in all the parts of Italy) was cut from him by the diligence of the French King, who, debating with their Embaſſadours with words ſharpe and full of threatnings, wrought ſo much with their Commonweale, that they made him ſecret promiſe by writing to miniſter no aide at all to the Duke of Millan; a promiſe, for the which they receiued in recompence no couenant or grant of him. Lodowike leauing the Count Caiazze on that ſide to the Venetians with a very ſmall companie, not ſufficient for any great reſiſtance, ſent Galeas de S. Seuerin beyond the riuer of Po, with an armie of ſixteene hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horſemen, ten thouſand footmen Italians, and fiue hundred footmen Almains, but more with intention to defend his places, then to reſiſt in the plaine field: for that he eſteemed it moſt to his profite to entertaine and hold things in delay, chiefly for that he had dayly expectation of the concluſion of an accord ſolicited in his name by the Viſcount, betweene Maximilian and the Swiſſers: which if it were accompliſhed, he was fed with many promiſes of mightie ſuccours, which otherwiſe he could not onely not hope for, but it was very hard for him to draw any proportions of footmen from thoſe quarters, for that by reaſon of the great troubles that were thereabout, almoſt all the countrey was kept trauelled in that warre.

Touching the warres of Millan, there was performed neither of the one nor other part, any exploit of warre, other then certaine light incurſions, vntill the regiments of the Lords de Ligny, of Eberard, of Aubigny, and of Iohn Iaques Triuulce were paſſed the Mounts: for though the King was come to Lions, and the bruite ranne that he would paſſe into Italy in ſeaſon conuenient, yet he referred the direction of this warre to his Captaines. But when the French armie was fully aſſembled, which conſiſted of ſixteene hundred Lances, fiue thouſand Swiſſers, foure thouſand Gaſcoins, and foure thouſand of other parts of France: the Captaines pitched a campe the thirteenth of Auguſt, afore the rocke Arazze, ſituate vpon the ſhore of the riuer Tanare, the which though it was guarded with a ſtrength of fiue hundred footmen, yet was it taken within a very ſhort time, the furie of the artillerie being the cauſe, and no leſſe the cowardize of the garriſon that was within. The rocke of Arazze being taken, they drew their campe to Anon, a litle towne in the high way to Aſt and Alexandria, vpon the bankes of Tanare, and right ouer againſt Arazze, the which being ſtrong by ſituation, the Duke of Millan had ſtrongly fortified it certaine moneths before. And albeit Galeas de S. Seuerin who with his army had taken the field neare Alexandria, vnderſtanding of the loſſe of Arazze, had determined to ſend thither other bands of footmen better reſolued, for that the ſeuen hundred beſtowed there firſt, were of the new leuies, and not trained to the warre: yet he could not put his deuice in execution, for that the French men, to cut off all recourſe of ſuccours thither, had manned Filizana which is betweene Alexandria and Anon, and that by the ſufferance and conſent of the Marquis of Montferrat Lord of the place. In ſo much that they that were within Anon, expreſſing in action and experience no better proofe of their valours, then anſwered the expectation and opinion of moſt men, fell into the danger of the French, who after they had firſt battered the ſuburbes, and afterwards ſhaken the walls of the towne in foure ſeuerall quarters, they enforced it in two dayes, and likewiſe the Caſtle, making ſlaughter of all the footmen that were withdrawne thither. The which ſucceſſe being more ſudden then was expected, brought ſuch aſtoniſhment to Galeas de S. Seuerin, that he retired with all his armie into Alexandria, colouring his feare with an excuſe, that both in his ſouldiers wanted valour, and in the people was litle faith towards Lodowike; which gaue occaſion of greater courage to the French, who drew their campe within foure miles of Alexandria, and at the ſame ſeaſon tooke Valence plentifully ſtored with artillerie and ſouldiers, and that by the treaſon of Donat Raffagnin of Millan, at that time Captaine of the Caſtle, corrupted by the promiſes of Triuulce: who hauing let them into the Towne by the Caſtle, beheld with his eyes all the ſouldiers that were within either ſlaine or taken, and amongſt others Octauian baſtard brother to S. Seuerin was made priſoner: and it is to be noted, that this Captain twentie yeares before falſifying his faith to Madame Bonne and the yong Duke

The French king deſcendeth into Italy

The French men take diuers peeces of the Duchie of Millan.

Iohn Galeas, deliuered vp to Lodowike Sforce one of the ports of Tortona, the ſelfe ſame day that he put the French men into Valence. Then the French men as a violent thunder running ouer the whole countrey, Baſigniana, Voguera, Newcaſtle, and Pont Corona, yeelded to them without reſiſtance, as alſo the caſtle and towne of Tortona, from whence Anthonie Maria Palueiſin gouerning the garriſon there, retired beyond the riuer of Po without tarying for any aſſault. The aduertiſement of theſe accidents being come to Millan, Lodowike Sforce ſeeing afore his eyes nothing but a lamentable face of all extremities, and that his eſtate haſtened with a violent ſwiftneſſe to his ruine, became confuſed (as hapneth in ſuch ſudden extremities) both in counſell and courage, and had recourſe to thoſe remedies, (whereunto men being accuſtomed to run when things be ſo farre afflicted, that they be almoſt brought to the laſt deſpaire) which declare to euery one rather the greatneſſe of the danger wherein they are, then miniſter any helpe: he cauſed to muſter and enroll all the men of the towne of Millan that were able to beare armes, and cauſing to aſſemble the people, which hated him not a litle for the many exactions he had impoſed vpon them, he acquited them of one part of the tributes and impoſitions, vſing perſwaſions accompanied with words and geſtures pitifull, that if they thought he had at any time too heauily burdened them, that they would not aſcribe it to his diſpoſition and nature, nor to any deſire to heape to himſelfe a particular treaſure, but rather to the eſtate of the time, & to the dangers of Italy, firſt for the greatneſſe of the Venetians, and then for the deſcending of the late King Charles of France, matters which conſtrained him to thoſe actions, to the end to be the better able to protect the peace and ſuretie of that State, and to reſiſt againſt all oppreſſions and inuaſions, iudging that he could not ſhew a greater affection to his countrey and to his people, then to foreſee they ſhould not be trauelled with warres: That the fruits which they had reaped, gaue good teſtimonie of the ineſtimable profite of ſuch a pollicie and counſell, ſeeing they had liued many yeares vnder him in great peace and tranquillitie, by reaſon whereof their citie was augmented wonderfully in riches, magnificence and glorie, as is well expreſſed in the aſpect of ſo many ſtately buildings, pompes, and ſo great increaſe of wealth, with the multiplication almoſt of infinite ſciences and inhabitants: benefites, wherein the towne and Duchie of Millan, doth not onely not giue place, but exceed all other cities and regions of Italy: That they ſhould remember, that he had gouerned them without any crueltie, and with what affabilitie and readineſſe he had heard euery one, and that he onely, aboue all the Princes of his time, without bearing reſpect to the paines and trauels of his perſon, had obſerued the dayes appointed for publike audiences, and alwayes had giuen to euery one ready and vpright iuſtice: That they ſhould beare reſpect and remembrance to the merites and gracious behauiours of his father, who had gouerned them rather in an affection of children, then in the propertie and condition of ſubiects: and withall to ſet before their eyes, how hard and grieuous it would be for them to beare the proud and inſolent yoke of the French, who, for the neighborhood of the realme of France (if they once came to command ouer the ſtate of Millan) would plant there their perpetuall dwelling, and chaſe out the ancient inhabitants; as they had heretofore done in Lõbardy. That for theſe reaſons he deſired them that hauing in horror the barbarous manners of the French, they wold ioyne all together with minds reſolute for the defence of their countrey and proper ſafetie, not doubting if they could ſuſtaine themſelues for a while againſt the firſt brunt of dangers (which like a ſtorme would be violent and but ſhort) but the reſidue of the action would be eaſie, for that this was a propertie infallible in the French nature, to be more furious to aſſaile, then conſtant to continue, and for that alſo he had in expectation a ſpeedie and mightie ſuccour from the Emperour, who being alreadie at accord with the Swiſſers, prepared to reſcue him in perſon; and beſides, the regiments which the King of Naples ſent to him vnder the leading of Proſper Colonne, were on the way. Laſtly, that they ſhould beleeue that the Marquis of Mantua (all the controuerſies betweene them being now reſolued) was alreadie armed, and with three hundred men at armes entred the countrey of Cremona: to which ſuccours and forces, if he might adioyne the readineſſe and faith of his people, he made himſelfe aſſured againſt his enemies, yea if their armie contained all the power of France. Theſe perſwaſions were heard with more diligence then profite, and ſerued him to as litle purpoſe, as the forces which he oppoſed againſt the French; for feare of whom, weighing lightly the preſent dangers of the Venetians, who had begun the warre in Guiaradadda, and taken the towne of Caranage with other peeces neare the riuer of Adda, he called backe the Count Caiazze with the moſt part of

of thoſe bands which he had ſent for the defence of that quarter, and cauſed him to march to Pauie to ioyne with Galeas for the defence of Alexandria. But his ruine was alreadie aduanced on all ſides: for the Count Caiazze was a litle before ſecretly at accord with the French King; being more carried with diſdaine that Galeas his brother, yonger in yeares, and of leſſe exerciſe in armes, was preferred before him in the gouernment of the armie, and in all other honors and fauours, then with the memorie of the innumerable benefites which he and his brethren had receiued of Lodowike. Some are of opinion, that Lodowike was aduertiſed of his reuolting certaine moneths before, and after many deepe cogitations of the diſpoſition of the man, he anſwered at laſt with many ſighs to him that gaue him the aduertiſement, that as he could not be perſwaded of ſo great an ingratitude, ſo, if it were a thing true, it was an euill whoſe nature reſiſted all remedies, and for his part, he knew not in whom to repoſe confidence, ſince in his fauorites and familiars, and ſuch as had moſt communicated with his liberalities and benefites, were found diſpoſitions of treaſon: affirming that he eſteemed it not a calamitie leſſe hurtfull to depriue himſelfe by a vaine ſuſpition of the ſeruice of perſonages faithfull, then by too haſtie and light credulitie to repoſe his ſuretie in the faith of thoſe of whom he had reaſon to doubt. But in the meane while, the Count Caiazze makes a bridge ouer Po to ioyne with his brother, and entertaining with cunning delayes the execution, whileſt the bridge is in worke, he deferreth to paſſe, notwithſtanding the French army was two daies afore entred into Alexandria, which they did batter: and Galeas whoſe ſtrength was twelue hundred men at armes, twelue hundred light horſemen, with three thouſand footmen, in the night of the third day, without the priuitie of any of the Captaines except Luke Maluezze, flieth ſecretly out of Alexandria with part of the light horſmen, giuing the whole world to know, to his great diſhonour, and no leſſe reproch to the wiſedom of Lodowike, how great difference was between the ſport to manage a Courſer and to run at tilt and tourney with huge lances (exerciſes wherein he exceeded moſt Italians) and the office to be a Captaine of an armie: and how much thoſe Princes beguile themſelues, to their great harmes, who, in the election of men to whom they will commit the charge to manage affaires of great importance, beare more regard to the fauour of ſuch whom they chooſe, then to their vertue. As ſoone as it was knowne in Alexandria that Galeas was fled, ſuch as remained in the armie began in great tumult ſome to flie and ſome to hide themſelues, by occaſion whereof, the French armie being entred the towne at the breake of day, not onely ſtripped all the ſouldiers that were there, but with a libertie of warre, put the whole citie to ſacke. There ranne a bruite, that Galeas was commanded by ſecret letters ſubſigned with the name of Lodowike Sforce that for a certaine mutinie then riſen at Millan, he ſhould retire thither immediatly with all his bands: but ſome were of opinion, that the letters were falſly made and forged by the Count Caiazze, by that meanes to make more eaſie the victorie of the French: the which letters Galeas was wont to ſhew afterwards for his iuſtification, as though he had bene charged by the ſame to abandon raſhly his armie, and not to leade it ſafe into places where he knew he could leaue it in ſecuritie. But this is not ſo certaine, as is that which all men hold for certaine, that if in Galeas had bene found any counſell of a Captaine, or any courage of a man reſolute, he might haue made eaſie the defence of Alexandria, and almoſt all the reſidue beyond Po, with the ſtrength he had; wherein haply he might haue had good ſucceſſe, for that one part of the French armie being paſſed the riuer of Bornia a few dayes before, and by reaſon of the ſudden raines falling, they were incloſed betweene the riuers of Bornia and Tanaro, yet Galeas had not the heart to ſet vpon them, notwithſtanding he was told, that certaine of his light horſemen, iſſuing out of Alexandria by the bridge vpon Tanaro which ioyneth the ſuburbes to the citie, had charged them, and almoſt put to the chaſe the firſt bands.

The diſhonourable flight of Galeas from Alexandria.

The loſſe of Alexandria brought no litle aſtoniſhment to all the reſidue of the Duchie of Millan, afflicted more and more with freſh calamities, in ſo much as the French men hauing paſſed ouer the riuer of Po, were gone to beſiege Mortaro, which made them of Pauie put themſelues in accord with them: and the Venetians hauing taken the rocke of Caranage, and paſſed the riuer of Adda vpon a bridge made for the preſent ſeruice, commanded almoſt all the countrey euen to Loddi, the whole reſidue of the places being for the moſt part drawne into rebellion. And euen at Millan there was no leſſe confuſion and feare, then in the other places, for that the whole citie conſpired and tooke armes, and that with ſo ſlender reuerence to their Lord, that Anthonie Landriane his treaſurer generall coming from the Caſtle from ſoliciting affaires with him, him, was ſlaine at noone dayes in the ſtreets (particular hatreds working no leſſe in the conſpiracie, then the counſels of ſuch as deſired innouation.) By reaſon of which accident, Lodowike entring into great feare of his perſon, and ſtanding naked of all hopes to be able to make reſiſtance, determined, leauing the caſtle of Millan in good guard, to flie into Germanie with his children, to auoide the danger preſent, and to ſolicite (as he ſaid) Maximilian to come to his aide and ſuccours, hauing already concluded, or at leaſt held for reſolued, the peace with the Swiſſers. Following this reſolution, he ſent away his children accompanied with the Cardinall Aſcanius (who not many dayes before was come from Rome to ſuccor, as well as he could, the affaires of his brother) and with the Cardinall of S. Seuerin; with whom alſo he ſent his treaſure, very much diminiſhed from that it was wont to be: for it is credibly knowne to many, that not eight yeares paſſed, Lodowike, to make a glorious brag of his power, ſhewed to Embaſſadours and to many others, the eſtate and ſubſtance of his treaſure, which at that time, as well in money as in plate of gold and ſiluer (beſides iewels of no ſmall number) amounted to a million and a halfe of duckats; but at this time, according to the opinion of men, it amounted not much aboue two hundred thouſand. As ſoone as his children were departed, he appointed (notwithſtanding many of his friends laboured to turne him) for the guard of the caſtle, Bernardin de Corto borne at Pauie, whom he had nouriſhed of a long time, and being at that time Captain of the Caſtle, he preferred the faith of him afore that of his brother Aſcanius, who offered to take vpon him that charge; and left for that defence three thouſand footmen vnder the authoritie of Captaines in whom he repoſed moſt, with proportions of victuals, munitions and money, ſufficient for many moneths: and touching the affaires of Genes, he determined to recommend them to the truſt of Auguſtin Adorne gouernour preſent, and to his brother Iohn, who had maried one of the ſiſters of the S. Seuerins, and ſent them forthwith the aſſignation of the Caſtle. To the Borromeys, gentlemen of Millan, he reſtored Anguiara, Arona and other lands vpon the lake Maior which he had taken from them: and to Iſabel of Aragon the widow of Iohn Galeas, he gaue by reaſon of her dowrie, the Duchie of Barie and the principalitie of Roſſane, for thirtie thouſand duckats, notwithſtanding ſhe denied to truſt him with the ſonne of Iohn Galeas, whom he deſired to ſend with his children into Germany. And after he had eſtabliſhed this forme of direction, and in his owne ſeeming had ſet downe as much as might ſuffice for the ſuretie of things, leauing the towne to the gouernment of it ſelfe, he departed the ſecond of September with his eyes full of teares to go into Almaine, accompanied with the Cardinall of Eſte and Galeas de S. Seuerin, and for his ſafetie by the way, he had Luke Maluezze with a good troupe of men at armes and footmen. And as he was iſſuing out of the Caſtle, the Count Caiazze ſeeking to ſhadow his diſloyaltie with ſome colour, met him and ſaid, That ſeeing he abandoned his eſtate, he held himſelfe acquited of the oath of warre which he had made to him, and from thence forward to be in full power to profeſſe what ſeruice he would; and at the inſtant diſcloſed himſelfe to be for the French King, into whoſe pay he entred immediatly with the ſelfe ſame regiment which he had leuied with the treaſure of Lodowike: who, from Coma, where he left the Caſtle in the power of the people, went along the riuer to Bellaſia, and from thence, being ſet on land, he paſſed by Bormy and all thoſe places, where at other times, when he was in glorie and felicitie, he had receiued Maximilian, paſſing then into Italy rather as a Captaine to him and the Venetians, then as Emperor. Betweene Coma and Bormy he was purſued with bands of the French and the companies of the Count Caiazze; from which places, leauing garriſon within the caſtle of Tiran, occupied not many daies after by the Griſons, he tooke his way towards Inſpruch, where he vnderſtood was the perſon of the Emperour. Lodowike was no ſooner departed, then the inhabitants of Millan diſpatching Embaſſadours to the French Captaines, who were alreadie approched with the whole armie within ſixe miles of the citie, conſented with readie wils to receiue them, reſerting the capitulations till the Kings coming, in whom they had many hopes to find great fauours and graces, (regard to particular profite preuailing much with them:) and all the other places of the Duchie of Millan did the like incontinently. The Citie of Cremona which was beſet with bands of the Venetians, (whoſe gouernment the inhabitants abhorred) would alſo haue done the like; but for that the French King would not breake the contract made with the Venetians, they were compelled to yeeld to them. The Citie of Genes followed this vniuerſall reuolt, the people, the Adorneys, and Iohn Lewis de Fieſque, ſtriuing who ſhould giue vp the Citie vnto the King. And to the end that with ſo great and ſudden ruines againſt Lodowike, loſing

loſing in eight dayes ſo mightie an eſtate, the world might alſo diſcerne the examples of ingratitude, the Captaine of the Caſtle of Millan, choſen aboue all others for the reputation of his faith, not abiding ſo much as one bullet, or any forme of aſſault, deliuered to the French King within twelue dayes after the departure of Lodowike, the Caſtle, which was ſuppoſed to be impregnable: and receiued in recompence of ſo great diſloyaltie a great proportion of money, a companie of an hundred Lances, a perpetuall penſion, with many other priuiledges and graces; but with ſuch infamie and hate, euen among the French, that being eſchued and reiected of euery one, as an abhominable beaſt, and mocked whereſoeuer he went with words full of reproch, he died of thought within few dayes after, tormented with ſhame and the guilt of his conſcience, two mightie and moſt aſſured ſcourges to vexe euill doers. The Captaines aſſigned to him for the ſeruice of the Caſtle, did communicate in the ſame infamie, but chiefly Philippin de Fieſque, who, trained vp and aduanced by the Duke, and left there for the credite and opinion of his faith, in ſtead of encouraging the Caſtle-keeper to ſtand firme, (being made blind with large promiſes that were made him) perſwaded the contrary, and agreed the yeelding vp of the Caſtle with Antonie Maria Palauoiſin who came thither in the Kings name. The King receiuing at Lions the newes of ſo great a victorie, ſucceeded with a ſpeed ſwifter then his expectation, made way with great diligence to Millan, where, being receiued of the people with great ioy, he agreed to the exemption of diuers tributes and impoſitions, (the people notwithſtanding vnmeaſurable in their deſires, were not fully ſatisfied, for the opinion they had conceiued that they ſhould be freed from all exemptions) and diſtributed honorable gifts of reuenues to many gentlemen of Millan, and amongſt other things gaue Vigeuena to Iohn Iaques Triuulce in recompence of his merites.

The French King commeth to Millan.

In the ſelfe ſame ſeaſon that the French King made warre againſt the Duke of Millan, Paul Vitelli hauing now reaſſembled the bands and prouiſions of the Florentines to carrie with more eaſe the victorie of Piſa, planted his campe afore the towne of Caſina, which, notwithſtanding it was ſufficiently manned and victualled, with a wonderfull ſtrength of trenches and rampiers, was taken, after the ſummons of the artillerie, within leſſe then ſixe and twentie houres: for that the defendants beginning now to feare the great ruine which the artillery had made of their wals being of no great ſtrength, the forrein ſouldiers that were within preuenting them, rendred the place, and compounded onely for their liues and goods, leauing the commiſſioners and ſouldiers of the Piſans wholly to the arbitration of the victors. Immediatly after this, the Tower builded to guard the mouth of the riuer of Arne, and the Baſtillion of the poole, being abandoned of the Piſans, yeelded at the ſummons of one onely trumpet: ſo that the Piſans held no other peeces within the whole countrey then the Caſtle of Verrucola and the litle Tower Aſcanius, which ſuffered no vexation of the enemies, both for the incommoditie of the riuer of Arne which hindred all actions of aſſault, and alſo being ſo neare Piſa, it ſtood poſſible to ſpeedie and readie ſuccours, the importance alſo of the enterpriſe not ſuffering ſo much loſſe of time: in ſo much as there remained now no more to get but Piſa, which was an enterpriſe very hard (according to the opinion of ſuch as ſounded things with diſcretion) as well for the fortreſſe of the towne, as for the numbers, valour, and reſolution of the men that were within it. For, albeit there were within Piſa no forrein ſoldiers, other then Gurlin de Rauenna with ſome very ſmall troupes, who coming at firſt in the pay of the Venetians, remained ſtill poſſeſſed of that ſeruice after their regiment was withdrawne: yet there was a great number of citizens and paiſants of no ſmall account, for that by a continuall experience of fiue yeares, they were made ſeruiceable and fit for the warre, and that with ſuch an immoueable purpoſe and reſolution of mind not to returne eſtſoones vnder the power of the Florentines, that in reſpect thereof they held for nothing all other aduerſities. And albeit there were no ditches nor trenches before the walls of the Citie, yet were they very thicke, and of ancient building, with ſtones ſo well couched by the facultie of the lime and ſand proper to that countrey, that their reſiſtance was more mightie againſt the artillerie then is the common ſort of wals; and by that benefite, afore they were beaten flat with the earth, the defendants had time and leiſure to reenforce their rampiers. All this notwithſtanding the Florentines determined to aſſault it, prouoked thereto by Paul Vitelli and Rainuce de Marciane, who gaue no ſmall hopes to take it within fifteene dayes: and therefore hauing muſtered together a ſtrength of ten thouſand footmen, with many horſemen, and drawne together according to direction, many other great prouiſions, Paul planted his campe there the laſt of Iuly, not not (as many aduiſed him, and the Florentines deſired) on that ſide of Arne, which hindred that ſuccours might not come from Lucques, but on the other ſide the riuer, right ouer againſt the baſtillion and tower of Stampace, either for that it ſeemed to him, that by taking that fortreſſe he might the eaſilier carry the towne, or for the great commoditie of victuals brought from the boroughs about the hils, or at leaſt for the knowledge that he had, that the Piſans not ſuſpecting the ſiege to be planted on that ſide, had not begun any rampier there, as they had done on the other ſide. The battery containing twentie peeces of great artillery, beat vpon the baſtillion of Stampace and a great part of the wall as well on the right as left hand, namely from S. Anthonie vntill Stampace, and from thence vnto the gate towards the ſea, built vpon the banke of Arne: and of the contrary, the Piſans not ceaſſing to labour day and night, and with them their wiues, no leſſe reſolute and well diſpoſed then the men, had made in very few dayes, right againſt the wall that was battered, a rampier of great height and largeneſſe, and a ditch of more then common depth, being nothing amazed to ſee many of their companies ſlaine by the artillerie, either directly with the bullet, or by the reuerberation. The ſhot alſo out of the towne ſo thundered vpon the ſouldiers in the campe, ſpecially from a platforme that was vpon the Tower of S. Marke, that the whole campe was conſtrained either to remoue their tents to haue better couerture, or elſe to pitch their cabbins within the ditches. Many dayes paſt in this ſort, wherein albeit they had throwne to the ground a great quantitie of the wall from S. Anthonie vnto Stampace, and had reduced that fortreſſe into ſuch termes, as the Generall hoped to obtaine it without great difficultie, yet, to make the victorie more eaſie, he continued the batterie from Stampace to the ſea gate, entertaining in the meane while many skirmiſhes betweene the wall which they battered, and the rampier, ſo farre ſeparate from the walls that Stampace remained wholly without the rampier: in one of which skirmiſhes the Count Rainuce was hurt with the ſhot of an harquebuze. The Generall determined, as ſoone as he had wonne Stampace, to plant there his artillerie, and alſo vpon the wall which he had battered, by which meanes, giuing in the flanke vpon that ſide which the Piſans defended, he made his hope of the victorie almoſt certaine. He made at the ſame time fall towards the rampier (to the end the ditch being filled, the ſouldiers might enter with more eaſe) one part of the ruine of the wall which was betweene Stampace and the rampier, which being already ſhaked, was now ſupported no otherwiſe but with props of wood. On the other ſide, the Piſans, who in defending were altogether directed by the counſell of Gurlin, had made towards S. Anthonie certaine murthering houſes within the ditch, to the end that if the enemie deſcended, it ſhould not be filled vp by them: they had alſo beſtowed vpon the rampiers towards S. Anthonie, much artillerie, and placed their footmen at the foot of the rampier, to the end that things drawing to extremities, they might be oppoſed with their proper perſons againſt their enemies. At laſt, Paul Vitelli not willing to deferre any longer the taking of Stampace, the tenth day after he had planted his campe there, gaue the aſſault at the breake of day: and notwithſtanding his ſouldiers were grieuouſly vexed with the artillerie of the old citadell, yet they tooke it, both with more ſpeed and more eaſe then was looked for, and with ſuch terror to the Piſans, that abandoning the rampiers, they fled in all quarters of the Citie, yea many, amongſt whom was Peter Iambecourte a noble citizen, with fortie croſſebow-ſhot on horſebacke which he had in charge, fled out of Piſa: and many others would haue done the like, if that the Magiſtrates had not made reſiſtance at the gates: and in ſuch ſort as if the others had followed that fortune, they had certainly caried the towne, to the great glorie of the Captaine, to whom had bene moſt happie the ſucceſſe of that day, which indeed was the beginning of his calamities: for that he not knowing (ſo he excuſed himſelfe afterward) of the vnexpected occaſion that hapned, and hauing not determined to giue the aſſault with all the campe, nor to other place then to that tower, he not onely ſent not his men to aſſault the rampier where they ſhould haue found no reſiſtance, but alſo made the moſt part of his footbands retire, who vnderſtanding that the fortreſſe of Stampace was wonne, deſiring to make pillage of the towne, ranne thither by heapes to enter: and in the meane while the Piſans (a bruite running through the Citie that the enemies followed not the victorie) puſhed forward by the lamentable cries of the women, who encouraged them rather to chuſe death, then to liue vnder the yoke of the Florentines, began to returne with a new valour to the guard of the rampiers: whither Gurlin being returned, and remembring that from a part or iawne of Stampace bending towards the towne, there was a way that led to the gate of the ſea, which they had before

filled vp with earth and wood, and fortified on that ſide to the campe, but not on that part that looked to Stampace, he cauſed it to be rampierd and filled vp on that ſide, and caſting a platforme of earth, he cut off the entry on that part with the artilleries that were beſtowed in flank. As ſoone as Stampace was wonne, Paul cauſed to be mounted there certaine Falconets and portpeeces, which ſhot through the towne of Piſa, but offended not the rampiers, the which albeit they were much afflicted with the artillerie that was planted below, yet the Piſans abandoned them not: and at the ſame inſtant they battered the murthering houſe towards S. Anthonie, the water gate, and the defences: and Paul Vitelli ceaſſed not to vſe all his endeuor to fil vp the trench with ſagots, the more eaſily to take the rampier. Againſt theſe endeuors the Piſans (to whoſe aid were ſent the night following from Lucques a ſuccour of 300 footmen) riſing in courage, hurled into the trench many ſorts of wildfires: and labouring with all diligence to conſtraine the campe to abandon the tower of Stampace, they turned directly thither a very great port peece called Buſole, by whoſe furie the campe was compelled to diſmount the artillerie which they had mounted aboue: againſt which albeit Paul cauſed to be braked certaine port peeces, by which the mouth of Buſole was broken, yet, ſparing not for all that to ſhoot, they brought in certaine days the tower to that reaſon, that Paul was cõſtrained, not only to remoue his artillery, but alſo to abandon the place: neither had the battered wal any better ſucceſſe, for that the Piſans hauing propped it within ſide, to make it fall towards the ditch; when Paul would haue ouerthrowne it, it ſtood vnmoueable. Notwithſtanding all this, the Generall found not himſelfe fruſtrate of the hope he had to carry the victory in the end, which (according to his cuſtome) deſiring to haue with the moſt ſuretie, and the leaſt hurt to the armie that could be, albeit in many places there was more then fiue hundred yards of the wall vpon the earth, he laboured continually to increaſe the batterie, to fill vp the ditches with earth, and to fortifie the tower of Stampace, to replant new artilleries, and to beate in flanke the great rampiers which the Piſans had made, laboring with all policie and induſtrie to winne alwayes ſome commoditie to giue with more ſuretie the aſſault generall and determined: which laſt exploit (notwithſtanding he had brought things into that eſtate, that as often as he would haue followed the aſſault, he might haue had great hope of the victory) he prolonged willingly, to the end the harmes of the armie might not deface the honor and reputatiõ of the victorie: notwithſtanding the aſſiſtants of the Florentines, to whom euery litle reſpite was troubleſome, and being prouoked by continuall letters and meſſages from Florence, ceaſſed not to haſten him to the aſſault, the better to preuent thoſe impediments that might happen. Which counſell of Paul (being haply more wiſe, and more agreeable to the diſcipline of warre) had a contrary fortune: for that the countrey of Piſa, which is full of lakes and mariſhes betweene the next ſea and the citie, being in that ſeaſon of the yeare ſubiect to aires peſtilent, and ſpecially on that ſide towards the campe, there came vpon the armie in two dayes many diſeaſes, which ſo waſted and weakened the bodie of the campe, that when Paul gaue order to prepare to the aſſault the foure and twentieth day of Auguſt, he found ſo many of his regiments made vnprofitable, that thoſe that remained whole, ſufficed not to giue the aſſault. Which vnhappie accident, albeit the Florentines and he (who was alſo ſicke) laboured to helpe by leuying new bands of footmen, yet the influence of the aire made the infection ſo vehement, that euery day the diminution was found greater then the ſupply; and therefore being out of hope in the end to obtaine the victory, and fearing ſome domage, he determined to raiſe the campe, the Florentines being much againſt it, who aduiſed him that leauing garriſon ſufficient within the fortreſſe of Stampace, he would ſtay with the armie about the confines of Piſa: but he, making this counſell no direction to him, abandoned the tower of Stampace, which he held not tenable, for that it had bene firſt ſhaked with his artilleries, and then battered with the great ſhot of the Piſans, and the fourth day of September he drew the whole armie to the way of the ſea, and diſtruſting to be able to bring his artilleries by land to Caſſina, for that the wayes were drowned with waters, he embarked them in the mouth of the riuer of Arne to conuey them to Liuorne. But fortune ſtriuing againſt him in all things, many of the artilleries were ſunke in the water, and a litle after drawne vp againe by the Piſans, who at the ſame time recouered againe the Tower that guards the mouth of the riuer. By reaſon of theſe accidents the ill diſpoſition conceiued alreadie by the people of Florence againſt Paul, was ſo much increaſed, that within few dayes after being called to Caſſina by the Commiſſioners, vnder colour to conſult into what places they ſhould diſtribute the companies, he was by them made priſoner,

by commandement of the ſoueraigne Magiſtrate of the towne, and from thence ſent to Florence: where the ſame night he arriued, being rigorouſly racked, he was beheaded the day following by the ſentence of the Magiſtrate; and his brother failed not much to haue runne with him the ſame fortune, whom the Commiſſioners ſent to apprehend at the ſame inſtant. But Vitellozze, ſicke as he was, of the diſeaſe he had taken in the campe, making ſemblance to obey them, aroſe out of his bed, and in the time they gaue him to array himſelfe, by the helpe of his ſeruants, being well mounted vpon a horſe, he fled to Piſa, where he was receiued with great ioy of the whole inhabitants. The principall points for which they condemned Paul Vitelli, were theſe: That it proceeded of his will onely that Piſa was not taken, hauing good oportunitie thereunto the ſame day that the rocke of Stampace was forced: That for the ſame reaſon he had deferred to giue the aſſault: That he had many times giuen audience to men coming to him from Piſa, and neuer communicated their buſineſſe with the Florentines: That he had raiſed the campe againſt the publike commandement; and with the like contempt had abandoned Stampace: That he had drawne diuers others of the Captaines to occupie with him Caſſina, Vicopiſan, and the artilleries, to the end that in paiments and other conditions he might vſe the Florentines as be liſted: That in the countrey of Caſentin he had ſecret intelligences with the Medices, and at the ſame time treated and almoſt concluded with the Venetians, to ſerue them as ſoone as the time of his pay with the Florentines ſhould be determined, which was now almoſt expired: which practiſe took not effect, for that the Venetians being come to accord with the Florentines, would not entertain him: That in that reſpect he had giuen ſafeconduct to the Duke of Vrbin & to Iulian de Medicis. He was ſtraightly examined vpon all theſe points, and albeit he confeſſed nothing particularly that might charge him, yet they cut off all further examinations, and fearing leſt the French king, who was now come to Millan, would vrge his deliuerie, they haſted his excecution: neither did any of his ſeruants, which after his death were examined at leiſure, confeſſe any thing, ſauing that he was much diſcontented with the Florentines for that they had made the Count Rainuce concurrant with him in authoritie; and for the difficulties they vſed in the expedition of prouiſions which he demanded, and ſometimes in his affaires particular; and for that at Florence they ſpake ordinarily to his diſhonor. By which teſtimonies, albeit ſome remained poſſeſſed of this opinion, that he behaued himſelfe not loyally in his charge, hauing a pretence to be Lord of Piſa, and to occupie ſome other part of the demaine of Florence, where he entertained many intelligences and amities; yet the moſt part beleeued well of his innocencie, and were perſwaded that he nouriſhed a great deſire to take Piſa, for the reputation and glorie that would redound to him, which is the principall reſpect of euery great Captaine.

The French King being at Millan compoundeth with the moſt part of the Potentates of Italy.

The French King being now arriued at Millan, all the Potentates of Italy, except King Federike, came to him, ſome in perſon, and ſome by Embaſſadours, ſome to congratulate his victorie, and ſome to iuſtifie themſelues of the imputation to be more inclined to Lodowike Sforce then to him, and ſome to ſeeke ſuretie hereafter of their proper eſtates. The King receiued them all graciouſly, and compounded with them all, but diuerſly, according to the diuerſitie of conditions, and according to the greatneſſe of the profite which he might draw. He tooke the Marquis of Mantua into his protection, and endued him with a companie of an hundred Lances, with an honorable penſion and the Order of S. Michael. He receiued likewiſe into his protection the Duke of Ferrara (he and the Marquis were with his Maieſtie in perſon) who partaked not in that benefite without well paying for it, & not without great difficultie, for that euer ſince he rendred the caſtle of Genes to Lodowike, he had bene eſteemed to beare a mind contrary to the French. He accepted alſo into his grace and protection (but vnder a great ſumme of mony) Iohn Bentiuole, who had ſent to him Annibal his ſonne. But of all the reſidue, the Florentines compounded with him moſt hardly and moſt chargeably, for that (their merites all forgotten, and the harmes they had ſo long time endured during the life of the late King, in following the friendſhips of France) almoſt all the Court was againſt them: and thoſe reaſons were not accepted, which, not to ſtirre vp Lodowike Sforce againſt them for the matters of Piſa, had conſtrained them to remaine neuters: for that the impreſſion which the French men tooke when King Charles gaue libertie to the Piſans, remained yet firmly fixed in their minds, and the men of warre of the campe were of opinion (by reaſon of the generall bruite) that they were valiant men, and fit for ſeruice, which drew not a litle their diſpoſitions to beare them fauour. Beſides this, the authoritie of Triuulce was no ſmall impediment to the purpoſes of the Florentines, for

for that aſpiring to the Lordſhip of Piſa, he fauoured the cauſe of the Piſans, who deſired to receiue for their Lord, either him or any other in whom was abilitie to defend them againſt the Florentines, who were generally blamed by the whole Court for the death of Paul Vitelli, as to haue cauſed to be executed without occaſion, a Captaine of ſo great merite, and to whom the Crowne of France was much beholding, for that his brother was killed, and he made priſoner in the French ſeruice during the warres of Naples vnder the late King Charles. But in the end, the King inclining more to his proper profite then to things vaine, compoſition was made, by the which his Maieſtie receiuing them into his protection, bound himſelfe to defend them againſt all men with ſixe hundred Lances and foure thouſand footmen, as alſo the Florentines to defend his eſtates in Italy with foure hundred men at armes and three thouſand footmen: That the King at their requeſt ſhould aide them with Lances and artilleries neceſſarie for the recouering of Piſa, and of the places occupied by them of Sienna and Lucques, but not of thoſe peeces which the Genowayes held: And that, if theſe companies were not demanded of him before, he ſhould be bound, when he ſent an armie to the enterpriſe of Naples, to conuert either the whole or part of it to this expedition: and that when they had recouered Piſa, and not otherwiſe, they ſhould be bound to miniſter to him for the conqueſt of Naples fiue hundred men at armes, and fiftie thouſand duckats to pay fiue thouſand Swiſſers for three moneths: alſo that they ſhould reſtore to him thirtie thouſand duckats which Lodowike Sforce had lent them, rebating (according to the account which Iohn Iaques Triuulce ſhould make) ſo much as they had paid or diſpended for him: That they ſhould take for Captaine generall of their men of warre, the Prefect of Rome, brother to the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula, in fauour of whom this demand was made. The ambition of the Pope ſlept not in ſo faire an occaſion, who ſoliciting earneſtly to haue promiſe kept with him, the King gaue to the Duke Valentinois (coming with him out of France) three hundred Lances defrayed vpon the treaſures of the King, and guided by Iues d'Alegre, and foure thouſand Swiſſers vnder the charge of the Bailiffe of Dion, to be payed by the Pope; which companies were for his aide in the warre which he meant to make vpon the Vicars of Romagnia.

The Digreſſion which was omitted.

For the declaration whereof, and of many other things which happened afterwards, it is requiſite that mention be made, what right the Church hath ouer the Cities of Romagnia and many other places, which either ſhe hath held heretofore, or poſſeſſeth at this preſent: and by what meanes the ſaid Church, which at the firſt had meerly the charge and adminiſtration of ſpirituall things, is come to theſe worldly ſtates and principalities: and likewiſe that it be ſet downe as a matter of neceſſarie dependance, what amities and enmities haue bene at diuers times, vpon theſe other occaſions, betweene the Popes and the Emperours. The Biſhops of Rome, of whom Peter the Apoſtle was the firſt, their authoritie in ſpirituall matters being layed by Ieſus Chriſt, being men renowmed for their great charitie, humilitie and patience, and for their holy life accompanied with miracles, were at the firſt not onely voide of all temporall power, but being perſecuted by the ſame, remained for many yeares obſcure, and as it were vnknowne; their name being made manifeſt by nothing more, then by the perſecutions which they and their followers endured. For although (through the great multitude of people, and the diuerſitie of nations and religions that then were at Rome) ſmall regard was had to their proceedings, and ſome of the Emperours perſecuted them not at all, but when they were of opinion that their publike actions might not be paſſed ouer with ſilence; yet ſome others, either through crueltie, or for the loue they did beare to their particular gods, perſecuted them with all rigor, as bringers in of new ſuperſtitions, and ſubuerters of true religion. In which eſtate, famous for their voluntarie pouertie, holineſſe of life and martyrdome, they continued vntill the time of Pope Silueſter; in whoſe time the Emperour Conſtantine being conuerted to the Chriſtian faith, through the holy conuerſation and miracles which were dayly ſeene in thoſe that made profeſſion of the name of Chriſt, the Biſhops were freed from the dangers wherein they had bene for the ſpace of three hundred yeares (or thereabout) and had libertie publikely to exerciſe diuine Seruice, and Chriſtian ceremonies. So that through the reuerence of their manners, and the diuine precepts which our Religion containes in it, and for the readineſſe which ordinarily is found in men to follow the example of their Prince, oftentimes through ambition, and ſometimes for feare, the name of Chriſtians began maruellouſly to ſpread it ſelfe euery where, and withall the pouertie of Eccleſiaſticall perſons to diminiſh. For Conſtantine hauing built in Rome the Churches of S. Iohn in the Lateran, of S. Peter in the Vatican, and of S. Paul, and many others in diuers places, he not onely adorned them with rich veſſels and ornaments, but alſo endowed them with poſſeſſions and other reuenues, for the maintenance of thoſe Churches in their apparaments and buildings, and of the Clergie that ſerued in that holy Miniſterie. So likewiſe in times ſucceeding, many others, being perſwaded that by almes and legacies to the Church, they ſhould eaſily purchaſe the kingdome of heauen, did either build and endow other Churches, or gaue part of their wealth to thoſe already built. And further, (whether it were by law or by ancient cuſtome, following the example of the old Teſtament) euery man payed to the Church the tenth part of his fruites. Whereunto men were ſtirred vp with the greater zeale, becauſe at the firſt the Eccleſiaſticall perſons employed all that remained of the neceſſarie expences for their poore and moderate maintenance, partly in the building and repairing of Churches, and partly in other godly and charitable vſes. And then (pride and ambition hauing not yet ſeized on their hearts) was the Biſhop of Rome generally acknowledged of all Chriſtians, for the chiefe of all other Churches, and of the Spirituall iuriſdiction; as the ſucceſſor of the Apoſtle Peter, and becauſe that Citie for her ancient dignitie and greatneſſe, kept ſtill the name and maieſtie of the Empire, and alſo becauſe from her, Chriſtian Religion was diſperſed through the greateſt part of Europe; and laſtly for that Conſtantine being baptized by Siluester, did willingly yeeld that power to him and his ſucceſſors. It is further reported, that Conſtantine being conſtrained by the troubles of the Eaſterne prouinces to remoue the ſeate of the Empire to the Citie of Bizantium, which afterward, by his owne name, was called Conſtantinople, he gaue to the Popes the gouernment of Rome, and of many other cities and countries of Italy. The which report, although it haue bene entertained with great diligence by the ſucceeding Popes, and by reaſon of their authoritie hath bene beleeued of many, yet the ſame is reproued by Authors beſt worthy of credit, but much more by the matter it ſelfe. For it is moſt certaine, that at that time and long after, Rome and all Italy was gouerned by Magiſtrates deputed by the Emperours, as ſubiect to the Empire. And there are alſo that denie (ſo great is the obſcuritie oftentimes of matters ſo ancient) all that is reported of Conſtantine and Siluester, affirming that they liued in diuers times. But no man gainſayeth, that the tranſlation of the ſeate of the Empire to Conſtantinople, was the firſt beginning of the Popes greatneſſe. For the authoritie of the Emperours by ſucceſſe of time decreaſing in Italy, as well by reaſon of their continuall abſence, as for their vrgent affaires in the Eaſt parts, the people of Rome withdrawing themſelues from the obedience of the Emperours, and ſo much the more leaning to the Pope, began to yeeld vnto them, not a ſubiection, but a kind of voluntarie obedience; although this appeared but very ſlowly, by reaſon of the ouer-running of the Gothes, Vandales, and other barbarous nations, which came into Italy, by whom Rome being often taken and ſacked, the Pontificall name, touching temporall cauſes, was of long time baſe and obſcure, and the authoritie of the Emperours very ſmall in Italy, becauſe they ſo ſhamefully left it in prey to barbarous nations. Amongſt which barbarous people, the power of the Gothes continued for the ſpace of threeſcore and ten yeares, the furie and violence of the other being no other then as a torrent. Theſe were Chriſtians by name and profeſſion, deſcended from the parts of Dacia and Tartaria; who at length being driuen out of Italy by the armies of the Emperours, the countrey began againe to be gouerned by Magiſtrates of Greece, of whom he which was the chiefe, was by a Greeke word called Exarch, and was reſident at Rauenna, an ancient Citie, and in thoſe dayes very rich, and very populous, by reaſon of the fertilitie of the countrey thereabouts, and alſo for that it was inhabited by diuers Captaines and men of command, euer ſince the enlargement it had by the great nauie that Auguſtus Ceſar and other ſucceeding Emperours vſually kept there: as alſo for that a long time it had bene the reſidence of Theodoricus King of the Gothes and of his ſucceſſors, who being iealous of the Emperours power, choſe this place rather then Rome for the ſeate of his Court, in regard of the conueniencie of the ſea, being nearer to Conſtantinople. Vpon which oportunitie of ſituation (but for a contrary reaſon) the Exarchs made that their reſidence, and deputed other particular Magiſtrates for the gouernment of Rome and other Cities of Italy vnder the title of Dukes. From thence aroſe the name of Exarchat of Rauenna, vnder which title is vnderſtood all the countrey, which hauing no particular Duke, did immediatly obey the Exarchat. In this time the Popes of Rome hauing nothing to do with the temporall ſword, and the reuerence in ſpirituall matters, which men before did beare vnto them, waxing cold, by reaſon of the difference

of their manners, which now were much corrupted, they liued as ſubiects to the Emperours, without whoſe confirmation, or of their Exarchs, they durſt not exerciſe or take vpon them the Papacie, although they were choſen by the Clergie and people of Rome. Moreouer, the Biſhops of Conſtantinople and Rauenna did often diſpute with the Biſhops of Rome for ſuperioritie; as commonly the ſeate of Religion doth follow the power of the Empire and of Armes. But not long after the ſtate of things altered; for the Lombards, a fierce nation, entring Italy, made themſelues Lords of Gallia Ciſalpina, (which of them was called Lombardie.) Likewiſe they tooke Rauenna, with all the Exarchat, and many other townes of Italy, and extended their armes as farre as the Marquiſate of Ancona, Spoleto, and Beneuent, in which two laſt places they eſtabliſhed particular Dukes. In the meane ſeaſon the Emperors not looking to theſe matters, partly through negligence, and partly through the troubles they had in Aſia, Rome being deſtitute of their ſuccour, and the Exarchat being worne out of Italy, the Romanes began to be gouerned by the aduice and power of the Popes, who a long time after (together with the Romanes) being ſore afflicted by the Lombards, at laſt had recourſe to Pepin King of France for ſuccour, who paſſing into Italy with a mightie armie, draue them from part of that which they had held there aboue two hundred yeares; and gaue to the Pope and Church of Rome (as things fallen to him by right of Armes) not onely Vrbino, Fano, Agobbo, and many other places neare vnto Rome, but alſo Rauenna with her Exarchat, vnder which title (they ſay) is included all that lieth from the confines of Placentia, which ioynes to the territorie of Pauie, vnto Rimini, betweene the riuer Po and the Appenine hils, the Marriſhes of Venice and the Adriaticke ſea: and from Rimini, to the riuer Toglia, then called Iſaurum. But after the death of Pepin, the Lombards made warre againe with the Popes, and would haue taken from them all that was giuen them by Pepin: for which cauſe Charles his ſonne (who for the great victories obtained by him, was worthily ſurnamed the Great) hauing vtterly deſtroyed the Lombards, confirmed and renewed his fathers donation to the Church of Rome; and during the time of this his warre, reaſſured to the Pope the gift of the Marquiſate of Ancona and the Duchie of Spoleto, which comprehendeth the citie of Aquila and a part of Abruzzo. Theſe things are holden for true: to which ſome Eccleſiaſticall writers do adde this alſo, that Charles gaue to the Church all Liguria, as farre as the riuer Varo, which is the furtheſt limite of Italy, Mantua, and all that the Lombards held in Furly and Iſtria. And as much writeth ſome other of the Ile of Corſica, and all the country which lieth between the cities of Luni and Parma. For which benefites the Kings of France being magnified and extolled by the Popes, purchaſed the title of Moſt Chriſtian Kings. And afterward in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred, Pope Leo with the people of Rome (without any other authoritie then as head of that people) elected Charles Emperour of Rome, ſeparating in name and title this part of the Romane Empire, from that of the Emperour of Conſtantinople: as if Rome and the Weſt prouinces not being defended by them, had need of an Emperour of their owne. Notwithſtanding this diuiſion, the Emperours of Conſtantinople were not depriued of the Ile of Sicilie, nor of that part of Italy, which reacheth from Naples to Manfredonia, and is bounded with the ſea: for they continued ſtill vnder the gouernment of thoſe Emperours. Neither for all this was that cuſtome abrogated, whereby the election of the Popes was wont to be confirmed by the Emperours of Rome, vnder whoſe name the citie of Rome was gouerned. Nay the Popes in all their Buls, charters, and grants, expreſſed the date in theſe formall words: Such a one our Lord the Emperour reigning. In which eaſie dependance or ſubiection, they continued till the ſucceſſe of things emboldened them to gouerne by themſelues. For the power of the Emperours began much to decline: firſt through the warres and diuiſions ariſing among the ſucceſſors of Charles, while the dignitie of the Empire was yet among them: and afterwards for that it was tranſlated to the Princes of Germanie, who were not of like power to the ſucceſſors of Charles, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the kingdome of France. Furthermore, the Popes and people of Rome, by whoſe magiſtracy ſhe now began to be gouerned (though very diſorderedly) derogating by all meanes as much as they could from the iuriſdiction of the Emperours, made a law, by which they decreed, That the election of the Pope ſhould be no more confirmed by the Emperours; which law for many yeares was diuerſly obſerued, according as by the alteration of their affaires the Imperiall power increaſed or diminiſhed. And their power being greatly increaſed, ſince the Empire came to the houſe of the Othoes of Saxonie, Gregorie the fift, by birth a German, being made Pope through the fauour of Otho the third, who was then in Rome, moued by the loue

he bare to his owne countrey, and prouoked by the perſecutions he had endured by the people of Rome, transferred, by his decree, the power of chuſing the Emperours to his owne nation, in ſuch maner and forme as is obſerued at this day; forbidding the Emperours elect to take vpon them the title of Emperour or Auguſtus, vntill they had receiued the Imperiall Crowne (to the end to reſerue alwayes ſome prerogatiue to the Popes.) Hence grew the cuſtome of their going to Rome to be crowned, and till then to vſe no other title then King of Romanes or Cæſar. But afterward the race of the Othoes being extinct, and the power of the Emperours diminiſhed, by reaſon the Empire remained not hereditarie, and continued not in the houſes of mightie Kings, Rome began openly to withdraw her ſelfe from the obedience of the Emperours, and many other cities rebelled in the reigne of Conradus of Sweuia: and the Popes of Rome, who ſought nothing more then the enlargement of their owne authoritie, became as it were Lords of Rome, although oftentimes through the inſolencies and diſſentions of the people, they found many oppoſitions. To reſtraine the people, by the fauour of Henrie the ſecond being then at Rome, it was ordained by a law, that the power to create a Pope ſhould remaine in the Cardinals onely. To the greatneſſe of the Pope, hapned yet a new augmentation. For the Normans, of whō the firſt was William ſurnamed Iron-arme, hauing vſurped frō the Emperors of Conſtātinople the countries of Powilla & Calabria, Robert Guicciard, one of that race, after he had rendred Beneuent to the Church, as rightly belonging thereto, acknowledged to hold the Duchies of Powilla & Calabria in fee of the Church of Rome: the which he did, either to ſtrengthē himſelf with ſome colour of right, or to be the better able to defend himſelf againſt the ſaid Emperors, or for ſome other reſpect. The which example was followed by Roger one of his ſucceſſors, who driuing William one of the ſame ſtocke out of Powilla and Calabria, recoguized to hold thoſe prouinces in fee of the Church of Rome in the yeare a thouſand one hundred and thirtie, vnder the title of King of both the Sicilies, the one on this ſide the Far, the other beyond: the Popes not refuſing for their owne particular ambition and profite, to nouriſh and fauour the vſurpation and violence of others. By all theſe meanes the power and authoritie of the Pope dayly increaſing (as the couetouſneſſe of men is neuer ſatisfied) they began to depriue of theſe kingdomes ſuch Kings as were not obedient to their commandements, & to beſtow the ſame vpon others. And by this meanes they came to Henrie the ſonne of Fredericke Barbaroſſa, and from Henrie to Fredericke the ſecond his ſonne, all three ſucceſſiuely Emperours of Rome. But Fredericke becoming a great perſecuter of the Church, (in whoſe time ſprang vp the two factions of the Guelfes and Gibellines, the Pope being head of the one, and the Emperour of the other) the Pope after the death of Fredericke granted the inueſtiture of thoſe kingdomes to Charles Earle of Aniow and Prouence, impoſing vpon them a yearely tribute of ſixe thouſand ounces of gold, and with condition, that none of thoſe Kings ſhould hereafter accept the title of Emperour of Rome: which condition is euer ſince expreſly ſpecified in the inueſtitures of the Kings of Naples. For the kingdome of the Ile of Sicilia being afterwards poſſeſſed by the Kings of Arragon, was in ſhort time freed of that tribute, and of the acknowledgement to hold of the Church. There is alſo a report (although not ſo certaine as the former things) that a long time ago Maud the Counteſſe, a great Princeſſe in Italy, gaue to the Church that part of Toſcane which is limited on the one ſide by the riuer Peſcia and the borough of S. Quirico in the country of Sienna, and on the other ſide by the lower ſea and the riuer Tiber, which is called at this day the Patrimonie of Saint Peter; and ſome others do adde, that ſhe gaue to the Church the Citie of Ferrara. Theſe later things are not very certaine: but yet much more vncertaine is that which ſome one hath written, that Arithpert King of the Lombards in their moſt flouriſhing time, did giue to the Church the Cocceian mountaines, wherein they ſay Genes is included, and whatſoeuer is betwixt Genes and the borders of Prouence: and that Luitprandus a King of the ſame nation, gaue her Sabina a countrey neare vnto Rome, Narni and Ancona, with diuers other places. Thus as the ſtate of things altered, ſo varied likewiſe the affaires of the Popes with the Emperours. For at the beginning they were perſecuted many yeares by the Emperours, but afterwards being freed from that feare by the conuerſion of Conſtantine, they liued in quiet; and attending onely to ſpiritual things, they liued a long time vnder the ſhadow of the Emperours, in very poore eſtate, as it were meerly their ſubiects, being quite debarred from medling with them by reaſon of the Lombards greatneſſe in Italy. But afterwards by the meanes of the Kings of France, hauing obtained temporall authoritie, they held ſtrict amitie with the Emperours, and depended wholly vpon

their authoritie, ſo long as the dignitie Imperiall continued in the ſucceſſors of Charles the Great, as well for the memorie of reciprocall benefites, as in regard of the Imperiall greatneſſe: the which declining afterwards, the Popes withdrew themſelues wholly from their friendſhip, and began to make open profeſſion, That the Pontificall dignitie was rather to giue lawes to the Emperours, then to receiue any from them. And therefore hating aboue all things to returne to their former ſubiection, and that the Emperours might not attempt to recouer their ancient right both in Rome and other places, (as ſome of them, either of greater force, or of more noble ſpirits had aſſayed to do) they oppoſed themſelues openly by force of armes againſt the Emperours, being aſſiſted by thoſe tyrants, who calling themſelues Princes, and by thoſe cities which hauing freed themſelues, acknowledged no longer the authoritie of the Emperours. Hereupon it came to paſſe, that the Popes taking dayly more and more vpon them, and vſing the feare and terrour of their ſpirituall weapons for temporall occaſions, and interpreting that as the Vicars of Chriſt vpon earth they were aboue the Emperours, and that in many caſes the charge of worldly matters appertained to them, they ſometimes depriued them of their Imperiall dignitie, and ſtirred vp the Electors to chuſe others in their roomes: and on the other ſide the Emperours either choſe, or cauſed to be choſen other Popes. By reaſon of theſe controuerſies it happened, (the ſtate of the Church being much weakened, and no leſſe for that the Court of Rome remained for the ſpace of threeſcore and ten yeares in the Citie of Auignon, as alſo by reaſon of the ſchiſme which followed the Popes returne into Italy) that in the townes ſubiect to the Church, and ſpecially in thoſe of Romagna, many puiſſant citizens tooke vpon them to gouerne in their owne countrey, and after were purſued by the Popes: who finding themſelues not able to ſuppreſſe them, made grants of thoſe places to the ſame men, to be holden in fee of the Church; or elſe ſtirring vp ſome others againſt them, gaue thoſe the inueſtiture. Thus the Cities of Romagna began to haue ſeuerall Lords, vnder the title for the moſt part of Vicars of the Church. So Ferrara, the gouernment thereof being giuen by the Pope to Azzo d'Eſte, was granted vnto him afterwards vnder the title of a Vicarſhip; whoſe family in proceſſe of time was dignified with more noble titles. So Bologna being taken by Iohn Viſcount Archbiſhop of Millan, was after granted him by the Pope, vnder the title of a Vicarſhip. By like meanes, in many cities of the Marquiſate of Ancona, of the Patrimonie of Saint Peter, and of Vmbria, (now called the Duchie of Spoleto) there ſtart vp ſeuerall Lords, either againſt the Popes will, or with his forced conſent. The like variations happening alſo to the Imperiall cities of Lombardie, it fell out very often, that according to the current of the times, the Vicars of Romagna, and of other places of the Church ſtate, reuolting openly from her gouernment, acknowledged to hold thoſe places in fee of the Emperour: and ſometimes thoſe that had Millan, Mantua, and other Imperiall cities in Lombardie, would acknowledge to hold them in fee of the Church. And in theſe very times, though the Church held the name of the gouernment, yet Rome was gouerned of her ſelfe. For albeit at the firſt when the Popes returned from Auignon into Italy, they were obeyed as Lords of the towne, yet ſhortly after the Romanes hauing created a Magiſtrate called the Banderez, they fell to their old obſtinacie: whereupon the Popes hauing very ſmall authoritie left them, withdrew themſelues from Rome, vntill ſuch time as the Romanes being growne very poore, and fallen into great diſorder, through the abſence of the Court, and the yeare 1400 approching, in which they hoped (if the Pope were at Rome) there would be a great concourſe of people from all parts of Chriſtendome, by reaſon of the Iubiley: they made humble ſupplication to Pope Boniface, that he would returne thither; offering to aboliſh their Banderez, and to ſubmit themſelues wholly to his obedience. Vpon which conditions he returning to Rome, and the Romanes attending to the gaine of that yeare, he poſſeſſed himſelfe abſolutely of the gouernment of that Citie, and fortified it, and put a garriſon in the caſtle of Saint Angelo. And though his ſucceſſors till the time of Eugenius had ſomewhat to do, yet afterwards they gouerned that Citie at their pleaſure, without any further trouble. By theſe foundations and by theſe meanes, being raiſed to an earthly power, forgetting by litle and litle the ſaluation of ſoules, and the commandements of God, and bending all their thoughts to worldly greatneſſe, no longer vſing the ſpirituall power, but as an inſtrument of the temporall, reſembling rather ſecular Princes then Popes or Biſhops; their cares and endeuours were now no longer ſanctitie of life, no longer propagation of Religion, no longer zeale and charitie towards their neighbours; but to raiſe armes, and to make warre againſt Chriſtians, managing their ſacrifices with bloudie hands and thoughts: they began to gather treaſure, to make new lawes, to inuent new trickes, and new deuices to get money on all ſides: to vſe the ſpirituall armes without reſpect, for this onely end: to prophane ſacred things without ſhame, for this onely purpoſe. The great wealth lauiſhly beſtowed vpon them and their whole Court, was accompanied with pride, luxurie, diſhoneſtie, luſt, and abhominable pleaſures; their ſucceſſors hauing no care of the perpetuall dignitie of the Papacie. In ſtead whereof, they had an ambitious and peſtilent deſire to exalt their children, niephewes and kindred, not onely to exceſſiue riches, but to principalities and kingdomes: no longer conferring dignities and preferments vpon men of deſert and vertue, but almoſt always either ſelling them to the moſt giuer, or diſtributing them to perſons fit for their ambition, auarice, and other ſhamefull pleaſures. By which acts of theirs, the Papall reuerence being vtterly decayed in the hearts of men, yet their power is in ſome ſort vpheld by the name and by the effectuall and powerfull maieſtie of Religion, and aided much by the meanes they haue to gratifie great Princes, and thoſe great perſonages that are in authoritie about them, with Eccleſiaſtical liuings and dignities. Whereby knowing themſelues to be in great reſpect among men, and that who ſo takes armes againſt them, purchaſeth much infamie, and oftentimes the oppoſition of other Princes, with ſmall gaine whatſoeuer be the euent; and that if they conquer, they vſe the victorie as they liſt, and being conquered, they obtaine what conditions they will: and pricked forward with a deſire to aduance their kindred from priuate callings to principalities, they haue bene of a long time, and very often, the inſtruments to ſtirre vp warres and new fires in Italy. But to returne to my principall purpoſe, from which my iuſt ſorrow for the publike loſſe hath withdrawne me farther then becomes the law of an hiſtorie.

The ſtate of Romagna in the time of the Duke Valentinois.

The townes of Romagna, with others that are ſubiect to the Church, being afflicted with ſundry accidents, had bene for many yeares gouerned with a iuriſdiction in effect almoſt ſeparate from the demaine of the Church: for that ſome of the Vicars payed not their tributes, as they ought, in homage of ſuperioritie; others payd them, but with difficultie and hardneſſe, and for the moſt part out of ſeaſon: but they all indifferently, without licence of the Popes, put themſelues in pay with other Princes, and without this exception, not to ſerue them againſt the Church, they bound themſelues to protect them euen againſt the authoritie and armes of the Popes; of which Princes they were ſo much the more plauſibly receiued, by how much they were conuenient for their ſeruice, both for the oportunitie of their eſtates and forces, and no leſſe to hinder that the power of the Popes ſhould not increaſe. Now at that time the Venetians poſſeſſed in Romagna the cities of Rauenna and Ceruia, which they had (many yeares before) taken from the family of Polenta, who at the firſt, of citizens priuate of Rauenna, were become Lords ouer their countrey, and afterwards had the inueſtiture of Vicars. Faenza, Furly, Imola, and Rimini, were in the power of Vicars particular: Ceſena, that had bene long poſſeſſed by the family of the Malateſtes, was eſtſoones returned to the Church, Dominicke the laſt Vicar of the ſame citie being dead without children certaine yeares before. The Pope therefore pretending that thoſe Cities for many reſpects were diuolued to the ſea Apoſtolicke, and that he would reduce them to their ancient iuriſdiction, (but indeed with intention to appropriate them to Ceſar his ſonne) had contracted with the French King, that when he had accompliſhed his conqueſt of the Duchie of Millan, he ſhould aide him for the recouerie only of thoſe townes which were poſſeſſed by the Vicars, comprehending the citie of Peſera, whereof was Vicar Iohn Sforce, aforetime his ſonne in law: for the greatneſſe of the Venetians did not ſuffer, that thoſe thoughts ſhould ſtretch out againſt them, who did not aſpire at that time to thoſe litle townes, which confining vpon the riuer of Po, were holden by the Duke of Ferrara. Then the Duke Valentinois, as ſoone as he had obtained of the King the bands promiſed, and ioyned them to the regiments of the Church, entring into Romagna, preſently he tooke the citie of Imola by accord, in the later end of the yeare a thouſand foure hundred ninetie and nine, in which yeare Italy being afflicted with ſo many turmoiles, felt alſo a ſcourge by the Turkes armies. For, Baiazet Ottoman hauing aſſailed with a mightie armie at ſea the peeces which the Venetians held in Greece, ſent by land an armie of ſixe thouſand horſemen to ranſacke the countrey of Furli, who finding the country without guard, not doubting ſuch a miſchiefe, they ouer-ranne it, making pillage and burnings euen vntill Liuence: and hauing taken an innumerable proportion of priſoners, when they came neare the riuer of Tagliamente (to returne with the more eaſe) they reſerued ſuch as they thought thought they might leade with them, and made cruell ſlaughter of all the reſt. And in Greece the affaires of the Venetians trained no better ſucceſſe, for that Anthony Grimani Captaine generall of the armie which the Venetians oppoſed againſt the enterpriſe of the Turkes, being accuſed to haue let ſlip the occaſion to vanquiſh the enemies that iſſued out of the port of Sapience, and another time at the mouth of the Gulfe of Lepanto: another being preferred to his place, he was cited to Venice, and the cauſe committed to the councell of the Pregati, where the matter was debated many moneths with no ſmall expectation of the iſſue (his authoritie and greatneſſe defending him on the one ſide, and on the other part, his accuſers purſuing him with many arguments and teſtimonies:) at length, ſtanding in great likelihood to haue the vpperhand, either by his authoritie, or the great number of his kindred, or laſtly for that in that councell compounded of many wiſe men, there would not be ſo much regard had to the generall bruites, and ſlanders which were not well proued, as to a deſire to vnderſtand ripely the truth of the fact: the knowledge of the cauſe was transferred ouer to the iudgement of the great councell, by the Magiſtrate of the aduocates of the communaltie, where fauours ceaſſing, or rather the lightneſſe of the multitude carying more then the grauitie of the Senators, he was in the end paſſed into exile perpetuall in the Ile of Oſſera. Such and ſo great matters were brought to paſſe in the yeare 1499.

But in the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred, were accompliſhed things of no leſſe importance, nor leſſe worthy of memory, ſpecially for the full remiſſion of the Iubiley, the which being inſtituted by the Popes at the firſt, to be celebrated according to the example of the old Teſtament from an hundred yeares to an hundred yeares, not for pleaſure and pompe, as the Romanes did in their ſports and feaſts ſecular, but for the health of ſoules, for that in the ſame (according to the deuout beliefe of Chriſtian people) were aboliſhed wholly all the ſinnes of thoſe, who acknowledging with true repentance their faults committed, made viſitation of the Churches of Rome dedicated to the Princes of the Apoſtles; it was afterwards ordained to be celebrated from fiftie yeares to fiftie, and in the end reduced to fiue and twentie. But for the more ſolemne memorie of his primitiue inſtitution, the hundredth yeare was celebrated with a greater affluence of people then the others. In the beginning of this yeare, the Duke Valentinois obtained without reſiſtance the Citie of Furly, for that the Ladie of the place hauing ſent her children and riches moſt precious to Florence, and abandoned that which ſhe could not defend, determined to hold onely the Citadell and Rocke of Furly refurniſhed with ſufficient ſtrength of men and artilleries. She then being reſolute and of a manly courage, entring the Citadell, ſhe ſtudied, to her great glorie, how to defend it. But the Duke Valentinois, after he had aſſayed in vaine to diſpoſe her to yeeld, began to batter the wall of the Citadell with a great fury of artillerie, the ſame beating to the ground a great quantitie of the wall, with the which the earth of the rampier which was behind being choked, filled almoſt the depth of the ditch or trench, and made the entrie more eaſie to his ſouldiers. By meanes whereof, the defendants loſing courage, ſought meanes to retire into the Rocke, whither the Ladie made alſo her retrait after ſhe had performed all that could be required in the office of a defendant. But in the entrance, feare raiſing a tumult and confuſion among them, and the Dukes ſouldiers coming faſt vpon them, almoſt all the ſouldiers were cut in peeces, ſo that the victors entring with the ſame furie into the Rocke, tooke it, and made ſlaughter of ſuch as were there for defence, except certaine of the chiefeſt, which were retired with the Ladie into a Tower, who were made priſoners together with her, whom the Duke (hauing leſſe regard to her valour then to her ſexe) ſent priſoner to Rome, where ſhe was kept in the Caſtle of S. Ange, being notwithſtanding deliuered a litle after at the requeſt of Iues d'Alegre. After the Duke Valentinois had obtained Imola and Furly, he marched towards the other townes, but new accidents happening vnlooked for, hindred his expedition: for, the French King after he had eſtabliſhed the things he had gotten with orders conuenient, hauing left ſufficient garriſon and prolonged the truce with the Emperour (comprehending therein the Duchie of Millan) vntill the moneth of May next enſuing, he returned into France, leading with him the litle ſonne of John Galéas giuen to him indiſcreetly by the mother; whom he made a Monke, and left Iohn Iaques Triuulce Gouernour generall of the Duchie of Millan, in whom he repoſed much, as well for his valour and merites, as for the great enuie he bare to Lodowike Sforce. But (the faith of men changing with the alteration of kingdomes) the people of that ſtate kept not fidelitie with the King, partly for that the cuſtomes and behauiours of the French were displeasing to many, and partly for that they had not found in the King that liberalitie in exempting all their tributes, which vnwisely they perswaded themselues he would: and all the Gibelline faction, which was mightie in the towne of Millan and the confines, were grieued that Triuulce chiefe of the Guelfes should be preferred to the gouernment. This euill disposition was wonderfully augmented by himselfe, who being of nature factious, and of a spirit haughtie and busie, fauoured (vnder the authoritie of Magistrate) much more then was conuenient, those that were of his partie: and besides this, he estranged much from him the minds of the communaltie, for that in the open market place he slue with his owne hand certaine butchers, who, following the rashnesse of the other populars, refusing to pay the tributes from the which they were not exempted, resisted with force the ministers deputed to gather the reuenues. For these reasons the most part of the nobility, and all the people, naturally desirous of new things, wished the returne of Lodowike, and began already to call vpon his name, with words plaine and to be vnderstood. But now the Emperour (before whom Lodowike presented himselfe with his brother Ascanius) not onely receiuing him with all humanitie, but also shewing many tokens of goodwill, and to be much discontented with their calamities; he nourished them with continuall promises to descend in person in their aide, with a strong armie, for the recouery of their estates, hauing thereunto good oportunitie, for that he was then at accord with the Swissers. But those hopes, both for the variation of his nature, and for that his intentions ill grounded, were as easily confounded, appeared euery day to be more vaine; yea being continually pressed with his accustomed necessities, he made them wearie with his importunate demands for money. Therefore Lodowike and Ascanius hauing no more hope to receiue succours from him, and being continually solicited by many gentlemen of Millan, determined to make the enterprise of themselues, and did leuie for their better strength eight thousand Swissers and fiue hundred Burgonion men at armes. Wherefore Triuulce hauing many feares and doubts, sent immediatly to the Senate of Venice to cause their companies to march along the riuer of Adda, signifying withall to Iues d'Alegre, that it were necessary to leaue for a time the seruice of the Duke Valentinois, and returne with speed to Millan with the French men at armes and the Swissers: and to resist the first furie of the enemies, he sent one part of his souldiers to Coma, the iealousie he had of the people of Millan not suffering him to turne thither with all his forces. But the care and quicknesse of Sforce and his brother surmounted all diligence in the others, for that not tarying for the whole armie they had leuied, but leauing order to march after them with all speed, they passed the mountaines, and with a diligence aboue all expectation, being embarked in those vessels which were in the lake of Coma, they approched neare that towne, which they tooke without resistance (the French being retired for the knowledge they had of the ill disposition of the inhabitants.) The bruite of the losse of Coma being come to Millan, so altered the minds of the people, and almost all the chiefest of the Gibelin faction, that they began to draw into manifest tumult, and rise into such insolent disposition, that Triuulce seeing no other remedie to the Kings affaires, retired suddenly into the Castle, and the night following fled to Nouaro, together with the men at armes which were retired into the Parke ioyning to the castle (the people in their retrait following them by heapes euen to the riuer of Thesin): and leauing within Nouaro foure hundred Lances, he with the residue of his strength went to Mortaro, thinking (and the other Captaines also) that they should more easily recouer the Duchie of Millan with the new succours that were to come out of France, then be able to defend it being thus deuided. After the French men were gone from Millan, the Cardinall Ascanius made his entrie first, and then Lodowike, who recouering it in as short time and with as litle difficultie as he lost it (except the Castle) was also made glad at his returne with a more generall shew of affection and ioy of the people of Millan, then they expressed when he departed. The like disposition was found in other cities and communalties, as in Pauie and Parma, declaring immediatly for Lodowike, whose example Lodi and Plaisance had followed, if the bands of the Venetians (marched afore towards the riuer of Adda) had not bene entred. Alexandria and almost all the places beyond Po, being furthest from Millan and neerest to Ast which was French, stirred not, determining to take aduice what they should do vpon the issue and traine of things. Lodowike hauing recouered Millan, made speedie leuies of as many Italian footmen, and men at armes as he could; labouring, by petition, by offers, and all maner of hopes, all those of whom he had any reason to expect succours in so great necessitie. Therefore he aduertised the Emperour by

Galeas de S. Seuerin of his happie beginning, beſeeching him to ſupply him with men and artilleries. And deſiring not to haue the Senate of Venice his enemie, he gaue direction that the Cardinall Aſcanius ſhould ſpeedily ſend the Biſhop of Cremona to Venice, to offer them the ready will and inclination of Lodowike to accept ſuch conditions as it pleaſed them to demand: but the conſtancie of the Senate of Venice made vaine all that labour, for that they determined not to depart from their confederation with the French King. The Genoways, notwithſtanding the importunate ſolicitations of Lodowike, refuſed to returne vnder his obedience: and the Florentines would not heare his requeſt touching the repaiment of the mony which he had lent them; onely the Marquis of Mantua ſent to him his brother, with a certaine proportion of men at armes: and there came to him alſo the Lords of Mirandola, of Carpy, and Corege; and the Siennoys relieued him with a ſmall ſumme of money: ſuccours almoſt contemptible in ſo great dangers; as alſo did litle import the aides of Philip Roſſe and of the Verminesques, who though their fathers had bin deſpoiled by him of their ancient liuings, to wit, the Roſſes of S. Second, of Torchiare, and many other villages of Parmeſan; and thoſe of Verma, Bobie, and the neighboring places, which are in the mountaine of Plaiſance: yet Philip, leauing without leaue the pay of the Venetians, went thither to recouer his lands, and hauing obtained them, ioyned himſelfe to the armie of Lodowike: the family of Verma doing the like, both the one and the other to reenter into grace by that occaſion. But Lodowike after he had aſſembled fifteene hundred men at armes, beſides the Burgonian bands of horſemen, and layed to the regiments of Swiſſers many Italian footmen, he left the Cardinall before the Caſtle, and paſſed ouer Theſin: and obtaining by accord the towne and caſtle of Vigeuena, he layd ſiege to Nouaro, chuſing that enterpriſe rather then the expugnation of Mortaro, either for that the French had made ſtrong fortifications at Mortaro, or elſe for that he eſteemed Nouaro (a towne renowmed and plentifull with all things) to import more for the reputation and ſubſtance of the warre, or that the recouery of that towne would breed want of victuals, and ſo conſtraine the French that were within Mortaro to abandon it: or at leaſt, that it would hinder Iues d'Alegre from entring Nouaro, who was now marching from Romagna. For, as ſoone as he had receiued aduertiſements from Triuulce (leauing the Duke Valentinois in the enterpriſe of Peſero) he departed ſpeedily with all the horſemen and the Swiſſers, and vnderſtanding neare to Parma the rebellion of Millan, he accorded with thoſe of Parma and Plaiſance not to offend them, ſo that they would not hinder his paſſage: and being come neare Tortona, he entred the towne, where, at the inſtigation of the Guelfes of that citie, burning in deſire to be reuenged of the Gibelins, who (returned to the deuotion of Lodowik) had expulſed them, he put all to ſack and ſpoile, the Guelfs crying out in vaine of his faith, for that their loyaltie was no better reſpected, but being the Kings faithfull ſeruants, they were no otherwiſe vſed, then belonged to the deſeruings of his moſt traiterous enemies. From Tortona he marched into Alexandria, where he ſtayed, for that the Swiſſers of his armie, either becauſe they were not payed, or for ſome other ſecret reaſon, left him, and went to the Duke of Millans campe; whoſe ſtrength being now greater then his enemies, he prepared ſpeedily to the battery of Nouaro, to the end to carry it, afore the French (expecting ſuccours from the King) were ſtrong enough to encounter him in the field; a matter which ſucceeded happily to him: for that the French bands that were within Nouaro, hauing no reaſon of hope, or poſſibilitie to defend it, agreed to deliuer vp the towne, receiuing the promiſe of his faith to depart in ſafetie with all their goods, which he kept iuſtly with them, protecting them with ſafeconduct to Verceil, although he was perſwaded by many, that the ouerthrowing of thoſe bands was of great importance for his victory; wherein they occupied theſe reaſons, that if it were lawfull, according to the authoritie and examples of great men, to breake faith to conquer a Lordſhip, that it was more lawfull to breake it to keepe that which was his owne. After he had got Nouaro, he deuiſed how he might haue the caſtle: but it was beleeued, that if he had aduanced to the enterpriſe of Mortaro, all the French bands would haue fled afore him ouer Po, (Triuulce and the Lord Ligny not agreeing well together.)

But whileſt Lodowike vſed all carefull diligence in theſe expeditions, no leſſe care and diligence occupied the French King, who, vnderſtanding the rebellion of Millan, digeſted it with no litle griefe and diſcontentment: and therefore he diſpatched with a wonderfull ſpeed into Italy, Monſieur Trimouille with ſix hundred Lances, and ſent to leuie a great regiment of Swiſſers: and to the end there might be an exact diligence in all prouiſions, he created the Cardinall of

Am-

Amboiſe his Lieutenant for Italy, and diſpatched him immediatly to Aſt: in ſo much as all things prepared with a quicke readineſſe, there was muſtered in Italy for the King in the beginning of Aprill, a ſtrength of fifteene hundred Lances, ten thouſand Swiſſers footmen, and ſixe thouſand of the Kings ſubiects, vnder the leading of Trimouille, Triuulce, and Ligny. Theſe companies being drawne into one campe at Mortaro, marched to Nouaro, hauing no leſſe confidence in treaſon then in their forces: for that the Swiſſer Captaines which were with Lodowike, (though in the action of Nouaro they ſhewed faith and valour) had ſecret intelligence with them by the meanes of the Swiſſer Captaines which ſerued in the French armie. Whereof Lodowike being iealous by many apparent coniectures, laboured much to ioyne to him the foure hundred horſemen and eight thouſand footmen which were leuied at Millan. But at Nouaro the Swiſſers, ſtirred vp by their Captains, began to mutine, taking their occaſion for that their payes were not performed at the iuſt daies that were promiſed. And albeit the Duke ranne to the ſtirre in perſon, and beſides his pitiful requeſts and praiers, training with them great occaſion of compaſſion, gaue amongſt them all his ſiluer plate and veſſel, deſiring them to reſt contented but till the money came from Millan; yet the Swiſſer Captaines fearing that if the bands which were leuied at Millan ſhould be ioyned to the campe, their treaſon would ſort to no effect, wrought ſo, that the French campe being all put into armes and readineſſe, approched the walls of Nouaro, and enuironing a great part of the towne, they diſpatched certaine horſemen to occupie the wayes betweene the citie and the riuer of Theſin, to cut off from the Duke and all others, all meanes to flie to Millan: who ſeeing more and more into his perils, ſought to iſſue out of Nouaro with his whole armie to fight with the enemie, hauing already ſent out in order the light horſemen and the Burgonions to begin the skirmiſh; but he was apparently reſiſted by the Swiſſer Captaines, who told him they would not come to blowes with their kinſmen, brethren, and countrimen, without the leaue of their Lords, and then mingling themſelues with the others, as if they had bene all of one armie, they ſaid they would depart ſuddenly into their countrey. The Duke not being able neither by prayers, nor with teares, nor by infinite promiſes to pacifie any whit their barbarous diſloyaltie, recommended himſelfe wholly vnto them, to the end that at leaſt they would leade him to a place of ſafetie. But becauſe they had contracted with the French Captaines to go their wayes, and not to leade him with them, being not willing to grant to his full demand, yet they conſented that he ſhould march away amongſt them, taking the habite of one of their footmen; and ſo, if he were not knowne, to ſaue himſelfe by the helpe of his fortune. The which condition being accepted of him for a laſt neceſſitie, was not ſufficient for his ſafetie: for that they marching by direction through the midſt of the French armie, he was knowne by the diligent eſpiall of ſuch as were aſſigned to that charge; or rather diſcloſed by the Swiſſers themſelues, as he marched in a Squadron on foote, attired and armed in all points as a Swiſſer; and was by that meanes made priſoner: A ſpectacle ſo lamentable, that it brought teares into the eyes of many, yea euen of his very enemies. Galeas de S. Seuerin, Fracaſſe, and Anthony Maria his brethren, communicated with his fortune, being betrayed by the ſame diſloyaltie of the Swiſſers: And the Italian ſouldiers were taken and ſtripped, ſome within Nouaro, and others as they fled towards the riuer Theſin: as for the Burgonians and Lanceknights, the French men not willing to prouoke thoſe nations, let them go freely. The Duke being taken, and the army diſperſed, no more reſiſtance appearing, and all things being full of feare and confuſion, the Cardinall Aſcanius, who had already ſent towards the campe thoſe bands that were leuied at Millan, being aduertiſed of this great misfortune, departed ſuddenly from Millan, to ſeeke ſome place of ſuretie. Many of the Nobilitie of the Gibelins followed him, who being too apparenly declared for Lodowike, deſpaired to find pardon with the French. But as it was ſet downe in deſtinie, that in the calamitie of the two brethren, treaſon ſhould be mingled with euil fortune: ſo he hauing determined to repoſe himſelfe ſomwhat the night after at Riuolta in the countrey of Plaiſance, which is a borough appertaining at that time to Conrard de Lande, a gentleman of the citie of Plaiſance, his kinſman and ancient friend: the ſame Conrard, changing will with fortune, ſent preſently to Plaiſance for Charles Vrſin and Sonzin Benzon, who were then in the pay of the Venetians, to whom he deliuered the ſaid Aſcanius, and Hermes Sforce brother to the late Duke Iohn Galeas, with part of the Gentlemen that came with him; for the reſidue, being more happie or more wiſe, forbare their reſt that night, and paſſing further, preuented their perill. Aſcanius was immediatly led priſoner to Venice; but the French King conſidering how neceſſary ſary it was for the ſuretie of the Duchie of Millan to be poſſeſſed of him, ſent for him to Venice, where finding ſome difficultie to deliuer him, he required him with proteſtations and threats, alledging that he appertained to him by right, for that he was taken in a countrey of his obedience. A requeſt, which albeit ſeemed very ſharp and vnworthy of the name of the Venetian ſtate, yet, to auoide the furie of his armies, it was granted; and together with him they deliuered all thoſe of Millan that were taken with him: yea, Baptiſte Viſcounte with other gentlemen of Millan, which were withdrawne for the ſame occaſion into the townes of Guiaradadda vnder ſafeconduct to remaine there in ſuretie with expreſſe mention of the French, were put into the Kings hands for feare of the French armies: ſo much did preuaile with the Senate of Venice the terrour of the French forces, more then the regard to the dignitie of their Commonweale. But the citie of Millan abandoned of all hope, ſent ſpeedie Embaſſadours to the Cardinall of Amboiſe to ſolicite for pardon: who receiued them into grace, and pardoned the rebellion in the name of the King, but vnder this bond, to pay three hundred thouſand duckats, of the which notwithſtanding the King acquited them afterwards of the greateſt part; and likewiſe the Cardinall pardoned other townes that had rebelled, which he taxed according to their qualitie, making the victory profitable, and the tranſgreſſions of the offenders an increaſe of the Kings treaſure.

Cardinall Aſcanius betraied and taken.

Cardinall Aſcanius deliuered ouer to the Frenchmen.

Thus the enterpriſe ſucceeding happily, and the regiments of men of warre diſmiſſed, the footmen of the foure Cantons of Swiſſers which be more neare then the others to the towne of Belinzona ſituated within the mountaines, ſurprized the towne as they returned to their countrey: which place the French King might haue drawne from them in the beginning for a very ſmall portion of money; but as he loſt oftentimes by the propertie of his nature occaſions of great things, by ſparing ſmall proportions of expences: ſo refuſing ſo to do, times and accidents came ſo about afterwards, that many times he would haue purchaſed it of them with a very great price, for that it is a ſtrait very conuenient to hinder the deſcending of the Swiſſers into the Duchie of Millan. Lodowike Sforce was caried to Lions where the King was, and entring the towne at noone dayes, an infinite multitude of people flocked to ſee a Prince, who, from ſuch a greatneſſe and maieſtie, and for his felicitie enuied of many, was fallen into ſo great a miſerie: and not being able to obtaine leaue to be brought to the Kings preſence, which he much deſired, he was conueyed within two dayes after to the Tower of Loches, wherein he remained priſoner about ten yeares, euen to the end of his life, the thoughts and ambition of him, which earſt could ſcarcely be contained within the limits of all Italy, being now incloſed in one ſtrait priſon: A Prince, certainly moſt excellent for his eloquence and induſtry, and for many gifts of nature and ſpirit, a creature of very rare perfection: and laſtly not vnworthy of the name of milde and merciſull, if the death of his Nephew had not blemiſhed that reputation. But on the other ſide, he caried a mind vaine, and full of thoughts buſie and ambitious, and nouriſhing alwayes intentions diſſembled, he kept no reckoning of his promiſes and faith. He alwayes preſumed ſo much of himſelfe, that ſeeming to be diſcontented when praiſes were giuen to the wiſedome and counſels of others, he perſwaded himſelfe to be able by his induſtry to alter the conceptions of euery one to what purpoſe he liſted. The Cardinall Aſcanius followed him a litle after, who being receiued with more honour and humanitie, and graciouſly viſited by the Cardinall of Amboiſe, was ſent to the great Tower of Bourges, a priſon more honorable, wherein the King that ſent him, had bene reſtrained two yeares: So variable and miſerable is the deſtinie of man, and ſo incertaine to euery one what will be his condition in time to come.

The Argvment.

THE warre of Piſa continueth: The Duke Valentinois purſueth his enterpriſe of Romagna: The Kings of Spaine and France invade ioyntly the kingdome of Naples: they occupie it, and deuide it betweene them, and afterwards make warre one vpon another. The Duke Valentinois putteth to death the Vrſins. The Swiſſers deſcend into the Duchie of Millan. The Spaniards remaine victors ouer the French at Corignolo, and take Naples.

THE abſolute and happie conqueſt of the Duchie of Millan did ſo increaſe the ambition and boldneſſe of the French King, that the ſelfe ſame ſommer he would haue proceeded to the enterpriſe of the kingdome of Naples, had not the feare which he had of the deſcending of the Almains reſtrained him. For, notwithſtanding he had the yeare before obtained a contract of truce of the Emperour Maximilian, wherein the Duchie of Millan was comprehended; yet, Maximilian conſidering better how much the maieſtie of the Empire would be diminiſhed by the alienation of ſo principall a Chiefe, and what diſhonour would follow him for ſuffering Lodowike Sforce to be ſo ſpoiled, who had put himſelfe vnder his protection, and repoſed wholly in the hopes which he gaue him, and of whom he had receiued great ſummes of money; he would no more heare the Embaſſadours of the French, nor thoſe of the Venetians, as vſurpers of that which belonged to the Empire: and laſtly, being the more inflamed for the miſerable calamities of the two brethren, together with the memory of the ancient iealouſies and iniuries done to him and his predeceſſors at ſundry times by the Kings of France and by the Venetians, he held many diots and aſſemblies, to ſtirre vp the Electors and other Princes of Germany to ioyne in reuenge of ſo great a wrong, committed no leſſe againſt him then againſt the whole German nation, to whom the Imperiall dignitie was proper: and likewiſe he layed before them the conſideration of the dangers that might happen, if the French King, preſuming more and more by ſo great a patience of the Princes of the Empire, and riſing into pride by ſo many fauors of fortune, would ſo far aſpire, as to ſet the Imperiall Crowne vpon the heads of the French Kings, as had bene done afore times: whereunto the Pope would conſent eaſily, partly by neceſſitie (not able to reſiſt his power) and partly for the deſire he had to raiſe his ſonne in greatneſſe and dignitie. This was the cauſe why the King, not knowing what would be the end of theſe practiſes, deferred till another time the execution of his thoughts touching the warre of Naples: by reaſon whereof, his men of warre being not employed in any other enterpriſe, he was content to giue to the Florentines thoſe bands which they demanded for the recouering of Piſa and Pietraſanta, and yet not without many doubts and difficulties; for that the Piſans together with the Genowayes, the Siennoys, and they of Lucques, made great inſtance to the contrary, offering to giue the King preſently an hundred thouſand crowns vpon condition that Piſa, Pietraſanta, and Montpulcian might be freed from the warres of the Florentines, and adding withall that they would pay him yearly fifty thouſand duckats for euer, if the Piſans by his means obtained the fortreſſes of the port of Liuorne, with all ỹ country of Piſa; to which offers it ſeemed the mind of the King was much inclined, by a couetous deſire of ỹ mony. Notwithſtanding (as was his familiar cuſtom in things of importance) he referred the reſolution of this matter to the Cardinal of Amboiſe who was then at Millan: afore whō did negociate for the Piſans, Iohn Iaques Trimulce, and Iohn Lewis de Fieſquo, they both deſiring to manage the iuriſdiction of Piſa, and in that reſpect offered to pay to the King for the grant, a great proportion of money, alledging withall, withall, that it was an action meete for his suretie (hauing now the oportunitie) to hold vnder the Florentines and the other Potentates of Italy. But the Cardinall preferring integritie afore particular fauour, ioyned to the faith and promise giuen by the King, the consideration of the late merites of the Florentines; who, expressing a liberall and ready aide to his enterprise and conquest of Millan, conuerted at his request into bands and strength of men, the paiments of money which they were bound to pay in that case: and therefore it was resolued to refurnish the Florentines for the recouery of Pisa (besides the restitution of Pietrasanta and Mutron) with a regiment of sixe hundred Lances payed by the King, and fiue thousand Swissers vnder the Bailiffe of Dion, with a proportion of Gascoins at their owne charges, together with all such sorts of artilleries and munitions as should be necessary for that enterprise. They had also against the Kings will and their meaning, a strength of two thousand Swissers more (such is the custome of that nation,) of all which companies Monsieur Beaumont had the charge, for that the Florentines, retaining a memory of his ancient readinesse to render to them Lauorne, demanded him for their Generall, not considering, that in matters of enterprise, authoritie and knowledge in things of warre, is no lesse necessary in a Leader of an armie, then faith; although the King with a more sound and better counsell, had determined to giue them Monsieur d'Alegre, a Captaine of great experience, and to whom, for his nobleness of bloud and reputation of vertue, the armie would haue giuen a more ready and willing obedience. But the troubles and difficulties which accompanied the succours of the French, began already to appeare: for that the paiment of the footmen beginning from the first day of May, they had spent all that moneth in Lombardy in the seruice of the King, who desired by means of that marching to draw mony from the Marquis of Mantua, and the Lords of Carpy, of Correge, and Mirandola, to punish them for that they had ministred aide to Lodowike Sforce: in so much that the Florentines beginning to be suspitious by reason of their slow proceeding, and being of opinion likewise that they gaue too much time to the Pisans to fortifie and strengthen themselues, they were at a resolution to abandon the enterprise: but yet being very vnwilling to lose so faire an occasion, they furnished the second pay, and solicited them to come forward. At length the Lords of Carpy, of Mirandola, and of Correge (for whom the Duke of Ferrara made intercession) hauing compounded for twentie thousand duckats, and the labour being vaine to stay to force the Marquis of Mantua, who, on the one side fortified himselfe, and on the other side alledged his pouertie and want of money, and sending withall his Embassadours to the King to solicite his pardon; the armie went and incamped at Montchiarucola, a village in the countrey of Parma appertaining to the family of the Torellies, who had succoured Lodowike Sforce: and this was not so much for any desire they had to punish them, as to threaten Iohn Bentiuole by drawing vpon the limits of Bologna, hauing amongst the residue, bene a fauourer of Lodowike Sforce: who, to auoide the danger, agreed to pay fortie thousand duckats, and the King tooke him of new into his protection, together with the citie of Bologna; but with this expresse limitation, not to preiudice the prerogatiues or rights which the Church had there. After the contract of Bologna, and Montchiarucola being taken by force, the armie returned backe to passe ouer the Appenin by the way of Pontremo: and as they entred the countrie of Lunigiana (following more profite then honestie) at the instance of the Fregoses, they tooke the borough of Massa and other lands from Aubry Malespina, being vnder the protection of the Florentines. And passing further, they of Lucques (notwithstanding they were in great strife for the matter, the communaltie much impugning it) deliuered ouer Pietrasanta to Monsieur Beaumont in the Kings name, who leauing garrison in the Castle, tooke not away their officers of the towne, for that the Cardinall of Amboise, in whom remained small reckoning of the promises made to the Florentines, for that he had receiued a certaine proportion of money of the Lucquoys, had receiued them into the protection of the King, with agreement that his Maiestie should hold Pietrasanta in deputation vntill he had declared to whom the right did appertaine. But in the meane season the Pisans became the more resolute to defend themselues, and had by the helpe of Vitellozze (with whom they were entred into great coniunction, being also enemie to the Florentines) certaine enginists to dresse their fortifications, with whom trauelled both men and women in great abundance: and yet not forgetting to entertaine the French with their accustomed subtilties, by the generall consent of the people, they submitted the towne to the King, whereof they sent instruments autenticke not onely to Monsieur Beaumont, but also to Philip Rauastin gouernour for the King at Genes; who rashly accepted them in the Kings name. And Monſieur Beaumont, ſending an Herald to Piſa to demand the towne, they made anſwer with many humilities, that they deſired nothing with greater affection then to liue vnder the Kings obedience, and that they were ready to giue themſelues vp to his deuotion, ſo that his Maieſtie would promiſe them, that he would not put them vnder the power of the Florentines; ſtriuing as well by the teares of women, as by all other meanes to perſwade the Herald, that their hearts, wils and affections were wholly dedicated to the Crowne of France, which had firſt put them in libertie. But Monſieur Beaumont denied to accept the offers of the Embaſſadours ſent to him from Piſa, and encamped before the towne the laſt day ſauing one of Iune, betweene the gate of Plages and the gate Calceſana, right ouer againſt the quarter called Barbagianni: and hauing battered all that night with great fury, and continued the action the moſt part of the day following, the artillery, both good of it ſelfe, and planted to all conueniencie, had made euen with the earth threeſcore cubites of the wall; and as ſoone as the battery ceaſſed to ſhoote, the horſemen and footmen mingled together, ranne without order of diſcipline to giue the aſſault, not conſidering in what ſort they might paſſe a deepe trench which the Piſans had made betweene the wall that was battered and the rampier that was within: in ſo much as when they had diſcouered the greatneſſe of it, and wondered much at the depth, they conſumed the reſidue of the day rather as beholders of the difficultie then diſpoſed to make good the aſſault. After which day, the hopes to carry Piſa diminiſhed dayly; partly for that the French men had loſt their courage, as well for the qualitie of the rampiers, as for the reſolution of thoſe in the towne; and partly for that by the practiſes and meanes which the Piſans dayly vſed, they had ſtirred vp the ancient inclination of the French towards them: in ſo much as the French men beginning to entertaine meetings and familiarities with thoſe within the towne, who continued the ſame offer to reſigne themſelues wholly to the Kings deuotion, vpon condition, not to be eſtſoones paſſed ouer to the oppreſſion of the Florentines; and many alſo entring ſecretly into Piſa, and paſſing out again as from a friend towne, the cauſe of the Piſans was fauoured through the whole campe, and oftentimes defended with ſuch declarations of good meaning euen afore the Captaines, that the greateſt part of the campe gaue them courage to maintaine their defence; wherein (beſides the incitation of the French men) they were ſpecially encouraged by Francis Triuulce Lieutenant of the regiment of Iohn Iaques, and by Galeas Paluoiſin, which led a band in the French campe. By the oportunitie of theſe diſorders, and ſufferance of the campe, Tarlatin (of the towne of Caſtello) entred into Piſa on that ſide towards the ſea, with certaine old ſouldiers which Vitellozze ſent to the ſuccors of Piſa; a man at that time obſcure and vnknowne, but aſpiring afterwards to the place of Captaine, he continued in the defence of that Citie to the end, to his great honour. To this common inclination, as well of horſemen as of footmen, were added many other inſolencies, for that, deſiring that the ſiege might be raiſed, they began to make ſpoile of the victuals that were brought to the campe: and ſo farre multiplied they all diſorders (the authoritie of the Generall being not ſufficient to reſtraine them) that the footbands of the Gaſcoines abandoned the armie in maner of tumult, whoſe example was followed of all the reſidue: and at parting, certaine footbands of the Swiſſers which were come from Rome, according to the Kings direction, ſtayed as priſoner Luke d'Albiſſe Commiſſary for Florence: the occaſion (as they alledged) was, for that their payes were detained which were due for a ſeruice they had bene at afore time within Liuorne. The Swiſſers and other footbands went away forthwith; onely the men at armes ſtayed ſomewhat neare about Piſa, where they had not ſpent many dayes in repoſing themſelues, but they returned into Lombardie without tarrying till they knew the Kings pleaſure; leauing the affaires of the Florentines in great diſorder, for that they had diſmiſſed all their footbands, to be more able to furniſh the payes of the Swiſſers and Gaſcoines. The Piſans not letting ſlip ſuch an occaſion, went and encamped afore Librafatta, which they tooke eaſily, no leſſe by the indiſcretion of the enemie, then by their proper ſtrength: for that whileſt the aſſault was in charging, all the footmen that were within running to the breach, ſome of thoſe of the campe by ſcaling ladders entred by the higheſt Iawne of the Caſtle which was not guarded. Which ſurpriſe both ſudden and terrible ſo aſtoniſhed the footmen, that they yeelded themſelues: and after that they drew their campe with preſent ſpeed afore the Baſtillion Ventura, and whileſt the aſſault was in action, the footmen yeelded, either by faintneſſe of courage, or by treaſon of the Captaine S. Brandano Conſtable of the Florentines, of nation a Luequois, and there remaining in garriſon: and the conqueſt

of theſe places was very profitable to the Piſans, for that by this meanes they had ſcope and libertie on that ſide towards the Lucquoys. This ſucceſſe of the things of Piſa, troubled not a litle the mind of the French King, who ſaw how much it would diminiſh the reputation of his army; and tooke it very impatiently, that one particular citie, ſupported onely by her inhabitants, and wherein was not any one Captaine of name, ſhould reſiſt the armies of France, which had run through all Italy, to the generall terrour and aſtoniſhment of all men: wherein as men in things that be grieuous to them, do oftentimes beguile themſelues, he occupied in himſelfe this perſwaſion, that the cauſe why Piſa was not taken, was for that the Florentines had not made due prouiſions of victuals, pioners, and munitions, as his people aſſured him for their diſcharge; beleeuing that all other things had rather failed in the armie then valour. He complained alſo, that by reaſon of the importunities of the Florentines, he had yeelded to commit ſo great an armie rather to Monſieur Beaumont then to Monſieur d' Alegre, which had bene the cauſe of many diſorders. And on the other ſide, deſiring to recouer the reputation loſt, he ſent to Florence Monſieur de Corocu his Chamberlaine, not ſo much to be informed if the reports of his Captaines were true, as to perſwade with the Florentines, that not loſing hope to haue hereafter better ſucceſſe, they would conſent that his men at armes might returne to lie in the countrey of Piſa, to the end to keepe that Citie for the Winter following in continuall feare, with intention in the Spring time to beſiege it with an armie more reaſonable and better prouided of Captains of experience and ſouldiers more obedient: which offer was refuſed of the Florentines, as deſpairing of any better iſſue by the aide of the French armies, which had already made worſe their condition. For, a bruite running in all places, that the King had left them, the Genowayſ, the Lucquoys, and the Siennoys began to miniſter openly to the Piſans both men and money, and whoſoeuer deſired to offend them, took courage. And euē at Florence, the diuiſions ſo increaſed among the Citizens, that they were not onely in diſabilitie to recouer the things loſt, but alſo they prouided not in any ſort for the diſorders that were in their iuriſdiction. For, at Piſtoya ſome particular factions falling into open armes, amongſt whom were done as well in the towne as in the fields, many hoſtilities and burnings, proceeding ſometimes with forreine aide, euen as if it were a warre ordained and ſet; they applied no order, to the great reproach of their Commonweale.

In this time Ceſar Borgia aduanced much his affaires: for though the King was much diſcontented with the Pope, for not aiding him to recouer the Duchie of Millan, the ſame being the cauſe why his Maieſtie had deferred to ſend him bands of men to proſecute the enterpriſe begun againſt the Vicars of Romagna: yet the deſire he had to keepe amitie with him, for the feare he had of the deſcending of the Almaines, hauing no meanes to eſtabliſh an accord with the Emperor, made him change aduice: but much more the authoritie of the Cardinall of Amboiſe, for the ambition he had to obtaine the legation for the Realme of France. The Pope then promiſed the King to aide him with men, and with the perſon of his ſonne, whenſoeuer he would aduance the enterpriſe of Naples, and to endue the Cardinall of Amboiſe with the Legation of the Realme of France for eighteene moneths, which was eſteemed a great matter, as wel for that it was new and rare, as for that it diminiſhed much the doings and profits of the Court of Rome (although Brittaine were not compriſed.) And the King for his part, ſent to him vnder the leading of Monſieur d' Alegre, three hundred Lances and two thouſand footmen, making knowne to euery one, that what ſoule ſoeuer would oppoſe againſt the enterpriſe of the Pope, he would take it to heart, as if the iniurie were done to his proper perſon. With which reputation, ioyned to his proper forces, containing ſixe hundred men at armes and ſixe thouſand footmen, the Duke Valentinois entred already into Romagna, tooke without reſiſtance the cities of Peſera and Rimini, whoſe Lords and owners fled; and afterwards turned his force to Faenza, which had no other defence then of the people of the place: for, not onely Iohn Bentiuole, vnkle by the mothers ſide to Aſtor a litle child, contained himſelfe, as well for feare to ſtirre vp the armes of the Pope and his ſonne, as to obey a commandement he had receiued from the King: (the Florentines and the Duke of Ferrara doing the like for the ſame occaſions:) but alſo the Venetians, who were bound to defend him, ſignified vnto him (obſeruing the requeſt the King made to them) that they had renounced the protection of him; as they had likewiſe done afore for the ſame occaſion to Pandolfe Malateſte Lord of Rimini: and which more is, to make it the better knowne that they fauoured the Pope, they created at the ſame time the Duke Valentinois Gentleman of their Towne, an action not accuſtomed to that Commonweale, but for recompence of benefites receiued, or elſe in token of deare and ſtraite amitie. The Duke Valentinois entertained in his pay Denis de Nalda natiue of Briſiquelle, a man of great opinion in the Vale of Lamona; by whoſe meanes he tooke without any difficultie the towne of Briſiquelle, and almoſt all the valley: and hauing taken the old Citadell, he had the new Caſtle by accord made with the keeper: and had hope likewiſe to enter into the Caſtle of Faenza by meanes of a practiſe entertained by the ſaid Denis with the caſtle-keeper, who was of the ſame Valley, and had a long time gouerned the eſtates of Aſtor: but the intelligence being diſcouered, he was made priſoner by the Fauentines, who ſhewing no ſignes of feare, for that they were abandoned of euery one, nor yet for the loſſe of the Valley, which was of great importance; they determined to vndergo all dangers to maintaine themſelues in the ſubiection of the family of the Manfredi, vnder whoſe obedience they had liued a long time, and therefore looked carefully to the fortifying of their citie. From which diſpoſition, the Duke Valentinois being not able to turne them, neither by promiſes nor threatnings, he incamped neare the walls of their Citie, betweene the riuers of Lamona and Maſſana, and planted his artillery on that ſide that is towards Furly, which though it be incompaſſed with walls, is commonly called the Suburbes, where the Fauentines had erected a ſtrong Baſtillion: and hauing battered it with great fury, together with the poſterne that is betweene the ſuburbes and the towne, the fifth day he gaue the aſſault: but thoſe within making a braue defence, he ſounded the retrait, (his ſouldiers bringing away many wounds and maimes, and Honorius Sauella a principall man ſlaine in the action.) The campe ſuffered litle reſt all the reſidue of the dayes it remained there, as well for that they were continually beaten vpon by the artillery from the towne, as alſo for that the inhabitants, notwithſtanding they had a very ſlender ſtrength of forrein ſouldiers, yet made many ſallies and skirmiſhes with great courage. But aboue all other perplexities, (albeit the moneth of Nouember was not yet finiſhed) the time, which was more extreme then agreed with the cuſtome & nature of that ſeaſon, troubled him much, both for the great ſnowes that fell, and the intollerable cold, (grieuous impediments to the trauels of warre) and alſo for that his lodging was naked and open, (the Fauentines afore the campe came neare their walls, hauing burned all the houſes, and cut downe all the trees neare their Citie.) By reaſon of theſe difficulties the Duke Valentinois found himſelfe in ſuch a ſtrait, that he leuied his campe the tenth day, and diſperſing his regiments to winter in places thereabouts, he bare his fortune with manifeſt impatience, ſpecially for that beſides his French forces, he had an armie flouriſhing with Captaines and ſouldiers Italians, wherein were Iohn Paul and Iulio Vrſins, Vitellozze, and Iohn Paul Baillon, with many men of choiſe; and hauing promiſed himſelfe in his ambitious conceits, that neither the ſeas nor the mountaines had power to reſiſt him, he could not endure that the reputation of his firſt exploits of warre ſhould be obſcured by a people that had long liued in peace, and at that time had no other commander then a litle child: wherein he gaue ſuch libertie to his paſſion, that he ſwore, and that with many ſighes, that as ſoone as the ſeaſon would permit, he would returne to the ſame enterpriſe, with a reſolution of a man determined either to carry the victory, or to die in the action. In which time Alexander his father, to the end there might be a correſpondencie in all his actions, (hauing created the ſame yeare, to his great infamie, twelue Cardinals, not of ſuch as deſerued beſt, but of thoſe that offered moſt) to omit no meanes to get money, ſent out and ſowed through all Italy, and through ſtrange prouinces, the Iubiley, which was celebrated at Rome with great concourſe of people, euen of nations farre remote from Italy, giuing power to obtaine it, to all thoſe who not being able to come to Rome, ſhould giue a certaine ſumme of mony; the which, together with all other treaſures he could draw in what ſort ſoeuer, as well of the ſpirituall treaſures as of the temporall demaine of the Church, he ſent to the Duke Valentinois, who ſtaying at Furly, made preparation of things neceſſary for the ſiege of Faenza; the Fauentines being no leſſe carefull to fortifie their towne. Theſe things were done in the yeare 1500. But matters of farre greater importance were decreed by the French king for the yeare following: and to the end to haue the more libertie to execute them, he had ſought by continuall ſolicitation to haue vnitie with the Emperour, whereby obtaining the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, he might haue ſufferance to aſſaile the Realme of Naples: and to this purpoſe he vſed the helpe of the Archduke his ſon, who was well diſpoſed to peace, for that his peoples, fearing the entercourſe of merchandize would ceaſſe, brooked vnwillingly to heare of warre againſt the French: and alſo for that the French King hauing no iſſue male, offered to giue in mariage his daughter Madame Claude to Charles ſonne of the Archduke, and to endue her with the Duchie of Millan for a dowrie when they had abilitie to conſummate the mariage, for neither of them had yet attained to three yeares of age. By whoſe interceſſion, (for that many difficulties which hapned in the negociation of the peace could not ſo ſoone be reſolued) the French King obtained in the beginning of the yeare 1501. of Maximilian a truce for many moneths, giuing him for the obtaining thereof a certaine ſumme of money. This truce was voide of all mention of the King of Naples, notwithſtanding that Maximilian in conſideration of fortie thouſand duckats, with bond, to miniſter to him monethly fifteene thouſand duckats (his neceſſities ſo requiring,) had promiſed to make no accord without comprehending him in it, and to vexe the Duchie of Millan with inuaſions and warre, when it ſhould be needfull to turne away the powers of the French king. Thus the King dwelling aſſured that the Almaines would not ſtirre, and hoping in ſhort time to make the peace abſolute, and to obtaine the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, by meanes of the ſame Archduke, he turned all his thoughts to the enterpriſe of the Realme of Naples; againſt the which enterpriſe, fearing leſt the King of Spaine would make ſome oppoſition, and that both the Pope and Venetians (iealous ouer his greatneſſe) would ioyne with him, he renewed the practiſes that had bene begun in the time of King Charles for deuiding of the ſame Realme, whereunto indeed Ferdinand King of Spaine pretended alſo to haue right. For albeit Alphonſo King of Aragon had conquered it with rights and titles ſeparate from the Crowne of Aragon, and therefore had diſpoſed it to the perſon of Ferdinand his baſtard ſonne as his owne; yet, Iohn his brother which ſucceeded him in the kingdome of Aragon, and Ferdinand the ſonne of Iohn, had alwayes ſecretly quarrelled that title as lawfully appertaining to the Crowne of Aragon, for that Alphonſo had conquered it with the armes and treaſures of the ſame Realme. Which quarrell Ferdinand had couered with a ſubtletie and patience of a Spaniard, not forgetting any thing that belonged to the dutie of a parent towards Ferdinand King of Naples, and the others, but alſo more aſſuring and augmenting them with bonds of new affinitie, for that he gaue to Ferdinand for wife, Iane his ſiſter, and conſented afterwards that Iane the daughter of her, ſhould be maried to yong Ferdinand; and yet he could not carry the matter ſo, but that the Kings of Naples perceiued his couetouſneſſe long before. In ſo much as the French King and Ferdinand coeurring in one inclination, the one to remoue all impediments and difficulties, & the other to obtaine part of that he had long deſired, ſeeing there was no oportunitie offered to obtaine the whole, they made an agreement to inuade at one time the kingdome of Naples, and to deuide it betweene them, in this ſort: That the French King ſhould haue the Citie of Naples, with all the land of Lauoro, and the prouince of Abruzzo: and to Ferdinands part ſhould fall the prouinces of Powilla and Calabria: and that either one ſhould conquer his owne part by himſelfe, the other not being bound to help him, but onely not to hinder him. But ſpecially it was agreed, that this contract ſhould be holden very ſecret vntill the army which the French King ſhould ſend to that enterpriſe, were arriued at Rome: at what time the Embaſſadours of them both, alledging this contract to be made for the benefite of Chriſtendome, and to inuade the Infidels, ſhould require the Pope with a ioynt voice, to grant the inueſtiture according to the diuiſion that had bene made betweene them, receiuing Ferdinand into faith and homage, vnder the title of Duke of Powilla and Calabria, and the French King no more vnder the title of King of Sicilie, but of Ieruſalem and Naples: the which title of King of Ieruſalem, being come to Federike the ſecond, Emperour of Rome and King of Naples, by his wife, which was daughter of Iohn King of Ieruſalem (in name, but not in effect) was alwayes kept by the Kings following, although at the ſame time the Kings of Cyprus, being of the houſe of Luſignan, likewiſe pretending right to it, would appropriate it to them with a deſire as great as the reſt: So violent are the deſires of Princes to embrace colours whereby they may with any ſhew of honeſtie (albeit moſt often againſt all law and reaſon) torment and inuade the eſtates that are in the poſſeſſion of another. This capitulation was no ſooner eſtabliſhed betweene the two Kings, then the French king began openly to prepare his armie.

Truce betweene the French king and the Emperour. 1501.

The Kings of Spaine and France deuide betweene them the realme of Naples.

But whileſt this armie was in preparing, the Duke Valentinois working by intelligence, was returning by night in the firſt dayes of the new yeare to the ſuburbes of Faenza, with a great number of ſcaling ladders, aſſaying in vaine to poſſeſſe it; and repoſing no more hope in the treaſon, he tooke in few dayes after Ruſſi, with the other places of that countrey, and laſtly returned eftſoones with his campe to Faenza in the beginning of the Spring: and incamping before the Caſtle, he battered the wall on that ſide, and followed the aſſault pell-mell with the French and Spaniſh that were in his pay; who going to the ſeruice in diſorder, retired without doing any thing. But three dayes after he gaue another aſſault with the ſtrength of the whole campe, of which aſſault, the firſt charge fell to Vitellozze and the Vrſins, who hauing culled out the choiſe men of their bands, marched to the breach with a wonderfull boldneſſe, and in very good order, and were ſo forward, that they had hope at that time to carry the victory: but thoſe that were within, carried themſelues no leſſe valiantly, who ſo intrenched and fortified themſelues, that the aſſailants finding afore them a great ditch, and being beaten in the flanke with the fury of the artillery, were conſtrained to retire, Ferdinand of Farneſa remaining dead with many other men of marke, beſides a great number of others that were wounded in their bodies. The Fauentines notwithſtanding hauing receiued great harmes by this aſſault, began to take ſuch counſell of their preſent condition, that ſeeing on all ſides generall apparence of danger, and no expectation of ſuccours in a ſtate ſo abandoned, their confidence began to turne into feare: and as there was no poſſibilitie that their proper valours onely, without freſh ſuccours, could make long reſiſtance againſt ſo great an army alwayes renewed; ſo they ſaw that with increaſe of more harmes and worſe conditions, they ſhould in the end either be taken by force, or conſtrained as a laſt neceſſitie, to put themſelues vnder the power of the victors: and therefore a few dayes after they yeelded to the Duke, vpon couenant to haue their goods and liues ſaued, and that Aſtor their Lord ſhould remaine in his libertie, and that it ſhould be lawfull for him to go whither he would, enioying wholly the reuenue of his proper poſſeſſions. Theſe couenants the Duke kept faithfully on the behalfe of the people of Faenza: but Aſtor a yong man of eighteene yeares of age, & of an excellent beautie (his age and innocencie yeelding to the diſloyaltie and crueltie of the victor) was retained by the Duke with very honourable demonſtrations, vnder colour that he ſhould remaine in his Court: but within few dayes after being ſent to Rome, after ſome had ſatisfied their vile vnnaturall luſt on him, (ſo went the bruite) he was ſecretly put to death, together with his baſtard brother. The Duke Valentinois hauing gotten Faenza, marched towards Bologna, laying his plot not onely to occupie that Citie, but alſo afterwards to moleſt the Florentines which were now become much vnderfoote, there being ioyned to the firſt diſpleaſure of the French King, new occaſions of diſcontent: for, being weary of the huge expences which they had made, and were conſtrained ſtill to be at, by reaſon of their warre with Piſa, and hauing ſuſpition of the forces of the Pope and Duke Valentinois, they payed not to the King, notwithſtanding his great inſtance, the reſidue of the moneys which had bene lent them by the Duke of Millan, nor yet thoſe ſummes which he pretended to be due to him for the Swiſſers whom he had ſent againſt Piſa: for as much as the Florentines (contrary to their contract with the Cardinall of Amboiſe) refuſing to furniſh one pay for them to returne into their countrey, for that they departed long afore the terme of the ſeruice for which they had receiued pay was expired, the King, to entertaine alwayes that nation in his friendſhip, had payed them of his proper treaſure, which he demanded of the Florentines with ſharpe words, not admitting the excuſe of their inabilitie, which was made greater by the ciuill diſcords that tooke their beginning of the diſorders which were in the gouernment popular: wherein no man hauing a ſound care of the affaires, and many of the principall citizens being ſuſpected either for friends to the Medices, or as men deſiring another forme of gouernment, things were ouer-ruled more with confuſion then with counſell: by reaſon whereof no prouiſion being made to ſatisfie the demands of the King, but letting paſſe without effect, the reſpites and delayes which he had giuen them, they had made him much diſcontented; ſo that he required them further to prepare to pay him the moneys, and the aide which they promiſed for the expedition of Naples: and ſaid, that albeit they owed him none according to the couenants that were made betweene them, vnleſſe they had recouered Piſa, yet, in reſpect of him, they ought to hold it for recouered, ſeeing it was through their owne fault, that they obtained it not: and this was cauſed either through the deſire of money, which of his owne nature he loued much, or elſe for the diſcontentment, that they had not obſerued the reſpites he had granted them; or rather the opinion he had, that for the diſorders in their gouernment, and the great number of friends the Medices had in Florence, he was able to make no foundation in the occurrence of affaires: and to bring them by ſharpneſſe to that, which his authoritie could not leade them vnto, he deliuered publikely very angrie termes to their Embaſſadour reſident about his perſon, whom he aſſured, that he was no more bound to their protection, for that they failing to accompliſh the capitulation made at Millan, in not making him ſatisfactiõ at the time appointed of the moneys promiſed in the ſame, he was at libertie from all right or lawes of obſeruation. By meanes whereof, Iulian de Medicis being gone to his Court with the priuitie and recommendation of the Pope, to beſeech his Maieſtie in his name, and in compaſſion of his brethren, to be reſtored to their countrey, promiſing him great quantities of moneys; he heard him willingly, and deuiſed continually with him of the meanes for their returne. And on the other ſide, the Duke Valentinois vſing the oportunitie of theſe occaſions, and puſhed forward withall by Vitellozze and the Vrſins then in his pay, and who were great enemies to the Florentines, the one for the death of his brother, and the other for the coniunction he had with the Medices, had, for that cauſe, ſent afore to the ſuccours of Piſa, Liuerot de Ferme with an hundred light horſemen, and ſince the conqueſt of Faenza ſtood determined to moleſt them, although neither his father nor he had receiued of them any harmes, but rather pleaſures and commodities, ſeeing that at their requeſts, they had renounced the protection of them of Riara, whereunto they were bound, and had conſented to giue them paſſage of victuals continually through their lands to his campe. Being departed then out of Romagna in this deliberation, and ſince the conqueſt of Faenza, being declared by the Pope, with the approbation of the Conſiſtory, Duke of Romagna, whereof he obtained the inueſtiture, he entred with his armie into the territories of Bologna, with great hope to obtaine it. But the ſame day that he lodged in the borough of S. Peter, ſtanding almoſt vpon the confines betweene Imola and Bologna, he receiued commandement from the French King to proceed no further in the ſubduing of Bologna, nor to chaſe out of it Iohn Bentiuole, for that he had taken as well him as the Citie into his protection: alledging, that the expreſſe exception which he had made, not to preiudice the rights of the Church, ought to be vnderſtood of thoſe rights and preheminences which the Church did then enioy; for that being conſtrued without diſtinction, and not according as the words ſounded, as the Pope pretended, it had bene a thing vaine and of no moment for the Bolognoys and for the Bentiuoleys to be receiued into his protection. Therefore the Duke Valentinois leauing for that time, with no ſmall complaints of the Pope and himſelfe, the ambitious hopes he had conceiued, made a couenant with Bentiuole by the meanes of Paul Vrſin, which bare theſe articles: That they of Bologna ſhould giue him libertie of paſſage and victuals: That he ſhould pay to him yearely nine thouſand duckats: That he ſhould ſerue him with a certaine proportion of men at armes and footmen for his expedition into Tuſcane: and to leaue him Caſtelbologna, a place betweene Imola and Faenza, and of the iuriſdiction of Bologna, which he gaue to Paul Vrſin. When this accord was made, Bentiuole, either for a fearfull ſuſpition he had of himſelfe, or for that the Duke Valentinois (as the ſaying was) to make him more hateſull in that Citie, had told him that the family of the Mariſcotti (a faction very puiſſant in friends and partakers, who for that reaſon, and for their inſolencie were much ſuſpected of him) had deſired him to make the enterpriſe of Bologna; he cauſed preſent ſlaughter to be made of almoſt all that family that were within Bologna, vſing for miniſters in that crueltie, together with his ſon Hermes, many noble yong gentlemen, to the end that for the memory to haue defiled their hands in the bloud of the Mariſcotti, and by that meanes become enemies to that family, they ſhould be conſtrained to deſire the preſeruation of his eſtate. The French bands followed no further the Duke Valentinois, but ſtayed to ioyne with the armie of the King, which contained a thouſand Lances and ten thouſand footmen, marching vnder Monſieur d'Aubigny to the enterpriſe of Naples. But the Duke Valentinois tooke his way through the countrey of Bologna, to the lands of the Florentines, with ſeuen hundred men at armes and fiue thouſand footmen of choiſe, and with fiue hundred men of armes and two thouſand footmen, which Bentiuole gaue him vnder the leading of his ſonne the Pronotary. And hauing ſent to demand of the Florentines paſſage and victuals through all their lands, he marched on without tarrying their anſwer, entertaining with gracious words the Florentine Embaſſadours vntill he was paſt the Appenins: But as ſoone as he was arriued at Barberina (his curteſie turning into churliſhneſſe) he required that they would make confederation with him: and that they would take him into their pay with ſuch regiments of men at armes and other conditions agreeable with the greatneſſe he held. And that changing the preſent gouernment, they would eſtabliſh another, ſuch a one as he might repoſe more in. And that which gaue him the boldneſſe to demand theſe things, was not so much his power or strength (for he had no great armie or artilleries to batter walls) as the ill estate of the Florentines, who had very few men at armes, and no other footmen then those of the countrey, whom they commanded dayly: besides, the feare, suspition, and great disagreements that were in Florence; for that he had in his armie Vitellozze and the Vrsins, and for that by his direction Peter de Medicis was abiding at Loiana in the countrey of Bologna: and lastly, for that the people were full of iealousies, by an opinion they had conceiued, that the greatest citizens had procured his coming, to the end to erect a gouernment according to their fancies. Notwithstanding the Duke Valentinois had no great desire to set vp againe Peter de Medicis, for that he esteemed not the greatnesse of the Vrsins and Vitellozze conuenient for his enterprise, with whom he knew that Peter had great affinitie vpon his returne into his countrey. And besides this, I haue vnderstood by men worthy of credite, that he kept fixed in his mind the memorie of an ancient indignitie offered him, when being Archbishop of Pampeluna, and his father not yet Pope, he studied the common lawes in the schooles of Pisa; for that being come to Florence to speake with Peter touching a certaine crime committed by one of his familiars, after he had in vaine waited many houres to haue accesse to him (being occupied either in his affaires or pleasures) he returned to Pisa, not so much as speaking with him, esteeming himselfe much disgraced and iniured. And yet he made other semblance to the Vitellies and Vrsins, rather to entertaine them in deuotion, then that his thoughts were simple: but much more to augment the mutinies and disagreements of the Florentines, by the which he hoped either to range them to better conditions, or to be able to occupie some place of importance in their iurisdiction. But being already in great doubt, that the French King brooked not his entrie in that sort into their countrey, when he came to Campy, sixe miles from Florence, he accorded with them in this sort: That betweene the Commonweale of Florence and him, there should be a confederation indifferent for the defence of their estates, with prohibition to aide rebels either of the one or other part; and chiefly, that the Duke should not succour the Pisans: That the Florentines should pardon to whomsoeuer, all faults committed by his coming, and should not oppose themselues against him in defence of the Lord of Plombin, who was vnder their protection: That they should entertaine him for three yeares with three hundred men at armes, and a pay of sixe and thirtie thousand duckats for euery yeare, and he to send that aide to them as often as they should haue need, either for their owne defence, or to offend others. After this accord was ratified, he went to Signa, marching by easie iourneys, and remaining certaine dayes in euery reposing place, did great harmes in the countrey by fire and robberies, no otherwise then if he had bene an enemie professed. He demanded besides (according to the custome in the payes of men at armes) the fourth part of the money due for one yeare, and that they should prepare for him artilleries for the enterprise of Plombin. The one of which demands the Florentines denied him flatly, as being not bound vnto it; the other they deferred, for that they determined not to obserue that which they were compelled by force to promise: and following the aduertisements of their Embassadour with the French King, they hoped to be deliuered from those oppressions by his authoritie. A hope which they found not altogether vaine; for that it was very pleasing to the King that the Duke should threaten them, but not that he should assaile them: as well for that the change of the present gouernment would haue bene to his discontentment, as also though he could haue wished another forme of gouernment, yet it would haue greatly displeased him, if it had bene introduced with other forces, or other authoritie then his owne: and therefore as soone as he vnderstood that the Duke Valentinois was entred vpon the dominions of the Florentines, he charged him to depart thence with speed, and commanded Monsieur d'Aubigny, who was then in Lombardie with the armie, that in case he would not obey, he should go against him with the whole armie to compell him to depart. By reason whereof the Duke without receiuing a quarters pay, or any furniture of artillery, tooke his way towards Plombin, and gaue order that the Pisans, who by meanes of Vitellozze, whom he had sent thither for artillery, were incamped before a borough of the Florentines, should raise their siege.

Capitulations betweene the Duke Valentinois and the Florentines.

Being entred into the territories of Plombin, he tooke Sugeretta, Scarlina, and the Ile of Elba and Pianosa, and furnishing euery peece with sufficient garrison, as well for the defence of the places already occupied, as to entertaine continuall vexation vpon them of Plombin, he returned to Rome with the residue of his regiments, to follow the Kings armie that marched to the enterprise of Naples; whereof one part led by Monsieur d'Aubigny was entred into Tuscane by the

the way of Caſtroeare, and the other followed by the countrey of Lunigiana: and the whole armie aſſembled in one ſtrength, contained a thouſand Lances, foure thouſand Swiſſers, and ſixe thouſand footmen as well French as Gaſcoines, to whom was ioyned (according to their maner) a great quantitie of artilleries: and one thing was notable, that that part which came by the country of Lunigiana paſſed very friendly by the citie of Piſa, with great reioycing as well of the French as of the Piſans. About the ſame time alſo, the armie by ſea departed out of Prouence for the ſame expedition, vnder the leading of the Lord of Rauaſtin Gouernour of Genes, wherein were three Caricks of Genes and ſixteene other ſhips, together with many other ſmall veſſels fraught with bands of footmen. Againſt theſe preparations of warre, King Federike (ignorant that the Spaniſh armies vnder ſhadow of friendſhip were prepared againſt him) ſolicited Gonſaluo (abiding in Sicilia with the regiments of the Spaniards, and making ſemblance to ſuccor him) to come to Caietta, after he had put into his hands certaine places of Calabria which he demanded, to the end to make more eaſie the conqueſt he intended, but vnder colour that it was for the ſuretie of his people. King Federike made his reckoning, that Gonſaluo being ioyned to the armie, his ſtrength in particular would containe ſeuen hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen, compounded vpon bodies, partly entertained already by him, and partly of ſuch as the Colonnoys leuied at Marina: a force which he ſuppoſed ſufficient to reſiſt the French, without being conſtrained to incloſe himſelfe in townes, although he were out of all hope to receiue any aide from the Prince of the Turkes, of whom he had required ſuccours with no ſmall inſtance, ſhewing him that he had more reaſon to feare perill by the victory of the preſent King, then of the late King his predeceſſor. And to preuent treaſons, he apprehended and put in priſon the Prince of Biſignan and the Count of Melete, being accuſed afore him to haue had ſecret intelligence with the Count Caiazze who was in the French armie. With theſe hopes (hauing alſo ſent Ferdinand his eldeſt ſonne, being very yong, to Tarenta, more for his ſuretie if things ſucceeded ill, then to defend the Citie) he incamped with his army at S. Germein, where attending the ſuccors of Gonſaluo and the bands which the Colonnoys leuied, he hoped to obtaine a more happie ſucceſſe in the defence of the entrie into the kingdome, then Ferdinand his nephew had againſt the enterpriſe of King Charles. In this eſtate of affaires, all the regions of Italy were repleniſhed with incredible doubts and perplexities, euery one iudging that this enterpriſe would be a beginning of moſt great calamities: for that the preparations of the French King ſeemed not ſo mightie, as to be able to ſurmount the ioynt forces of King Federike and Gonſaluo, and therefore it was iudged, that the ſpirits of ſo mightie Kings beginning once to waxe angrie, both the one and the other partie would continue the warre with far greater forces, which would eaſily ſtirre vp through all Italy both great and dangerous emotions, by reaſon of the diuers inclinations of the other Potentates. But as ſoone as the French armie was arriued at Rome, the world ſaw eaſily into the vanitie of thoſe diſcourſes: for that the Embaſſadours of France and Spaine, entring together into the Conſiſtory, made publication afore the Pope and Cardinals, of the league made betweene their Kings, intending chiefly (as they ſaid) to an expedition to be made againſt the enemies to Chriſtian Religion: and demanding the inueſtiture of the kingdome according to the tenor of the conuention made, it was agreed vnto by the Pope with the ſame ſpeed it was required. In ſo much as no man doubting now what would be the end of this warre, the feares of men were conuerted into admiration, euery one taxing the French King, for that he was more willing that the one halfe of the Realme ſhould fall into the hands of the King of Spaine, bringing into Italy (where before he was the onely Arbitrator of all things) another King his corriuall, to whom all his enemies and ſuch as ſhould be diſcontented with him, might haue recourſe, and who was alſo ſtraightly allied to the Emperour by many bonds of affinitie; then to endure that King Federike might remaine Lord of the whole, acknowledging to hold it of him, and paying him tribute for it, as by ſundry meanes he had ſought to obtaine it. But all men in their minds condemned the vnfaithfulneſſe of Ferdinand, maruelling much that by an ambitious luſt to occupie one part of the kingdome, he had conſpired againſt a King of his bloud; and to draw him the more eaſily to his ruine, had alwayes entertained him with falſe promiſes to ſuccour him; defacing the glory of the title of King Catholicke, which he and Queene Elizabeth his wife had obtained certaine yeares before of the Pope; and that renowme and glorie which held their names raiſed vp to the heauens, for driuing the Moores out of the Realme of Granado. To theſe accuſations againſt both the

the one and the other King, there was answered no other thing for the French King, but that his power was sufficient to remedy all these disorders in conuenient season. But for Ferdinand, it was said, that albeit King Federike had giuen him iust occasion to be moued against him, as knowing that he had long time before practised secretly with the French King to his preiudice; yet that had not stirred him, but in regard the King had determined in what sort soeuer to vndertake the enterprise of Naples, he was constrained either to defend it, or abandon it: and in taking vpon him the defence thereof, he should kindle so great a fire, that it could not but be very dangerous to the common weale of Christendome, chiefly the Turkes armies being so mightie against the Venetians both by sea and land; and if he should abandon it, he knew his Realme of Sicilia stood in manifest perill; and also that it was a thing that would turne to his great detriment, that the French King should occupie the Realme of Naples, which of right belonged to him, and might eftsoones reuert to him by new rights, if the line of Federike should faile: and therefore amidst so many difficulties, he had chosen the way of deuiding, with hope that by the ill gouernment of the French, their moytie might also descend to him in time: and that in this case, as the regard of publike vtilitie counselled him, which he had alwayes more highly esteemed then his proper profite, he might either keepe it in himselfe, or restore it to Federike, or rather to his children, for that he denied not that he held his name almost in horror; for that he knew, that afore the French King did any action vpon the Duchie of Millan, he had practised with the Turkes. The report of this contract betweene the two Kings, brought such an astonishment to Federike, that although Gonsaluo, seeming to despise that which was published at Rome, promised him with great protestations to go to his succours: yet he forsooke his first determination, and retired from S. Germein towards Capua, where he expected the bands which according to his direction were leuied by the Colonnois: who, leauing garrison within Amelia, abandoned all the residue which they held in the territory of Rome, for that the Pope, by the consent of the French King, had taken armes to occupie their estates. But in the end, when Gonsaluo vnderstood that the French armie was passed Rome, he discouered his commissions; and sending to Naples sixe galleys to bring away the two old Queenes, the one sister, and the other neece to the King, in these difficulties Prosper Colonne aduised King Federike to retaine the galleys, and drawing all his power into one strength, to make resistance to the enemies in the plaine field: for that in making triall of fortune, there would be some hope of victory, the issues of battels being farre more incertaine, then all other humane actions: and that otherwise it was most certaine that he had no abilitie to resist two so mightie Kings, inuading him in diuers parts of his kingdome. But Federike iudging this counsell to be of litle hope, determined to looke to the guard of his townes. Therefore, S. Germein with other peeces neare about it, being already drawne into rebellion, yea euen before Monsieur d'Aubigny parted from Rome, he determined to make the first defence in the towne of Capua, wherein he bestowed Fabricio Colonne with three hundred men at armes, certaine light horsemen, and three thousand footmen, and ioyned with him Rainuce de Marciano, whom he had newly taken into his pay. He left Prosper Colonne for the guard of Naples, and himselfe, with the residue of his companies, entred Auerso. But Monsieur d'Aubigny in his marching from Rome, burned Marina and Caua, with certaine other peeces of the Colonnois, being angry that Fabricio had caused to be slaine in Rome, the messengers of certaine Barons of the Realme holding with the French, which were gone thither to contract with him. Afterwards he tooke his way to Montfortin, where he thought Iulio Colonne would make resistance: but hauing left it abandoned with very litle honour, Monsieur d'Aubigny passing further, commanded all the places which be along the way to Capua vnto the riuer of Vulturno neare Capua; where the riuer being too deepe for the armie to wade ouer, he marched vp more high towards the mountaine to passe them ouer there: whereof Federike being aduertised, he retired to Naples, and abandoned Auerso, which with Nola and many other places gaue themselues to the French, whose whole strength was now brought into the confines of Capua, where they encamped, some on this side, some beyond the riuer, on the vpper side where the riuer beginneth to runne neare the towne: and hauing violently battered it on all parts, they charged it afterwards with a furious assault, which though it succeeded not well vnto them, being constrained to retire from the walls with many harmes; yet it was of such great danger to the defendants, that the minds of the Captains and souldiers began to incline to accord, perceiuing the people of the Citie to begin to draw into mutinie, together with the countrey people, who were retired thither thither in great numbers. But Fabricio Colonne, the eighth day after the campe was planted, hauing begun to parley with the Count Caiazze vpon a Baſtillion, the negligent guard of thoſe that were within (as often hapneth when men be neareſt accord) gaue occaſion to the enemies to enter: who for the greedineſſe of pillage, and deſire to reuenge the harmes receiued at the firſt aſſault, put the whole towne to ſacke, and made a wonderfull ſlaughter, retaining for priſoners ſuch as remained free from their crueltie: neither ſhewed they any pitie towards women of any ſort or qualitie, not ſparing the virgins in religion, whoſe bodies were a miſerable prey to the luſt and auarice of the ſouldiers; and many of them were ſold afterwards at Rome for a very ſmall price: and the report goeth, that at Capua, ſome of them leſſe fearing death then the loſſe of their honour, threw themſelues ſome into wels, and ſome into the riuers. It is ſaid further, that beſides other abhominations worthy of perpetuall infamie, many of the women which had eſcaped the firſt furie, being withdrawne into a Tower, the Duke Valentinois who followed the army as the Kings Lieutenant, went to take a view of them all, accompanied onely with the Gentlemen of his houſe and his guard; and after he had diligently conſidered them, he retained for his owne vſe fortie of the faireſt of them. Fabricio Colonne, Dom Hugo of Cardonna, and all the other Captaines and men of eſtimation, were made priſoners, amongſt whom Rainuce de Marzano, who at the aſſault had receiued a wound with a croſſebow ſhot, being in the keeping of the ſouldiers of the Duke, died within two dayes, not without ſuſpition of poiſon.

The infatiable luſt of Duke Valentinois.

The loſſe of Capua cut off all hopes to King Federike to be able hence forward to defend any thing. Caietta yeelded with as great ſpeed: and Monſieur d'Aubigny being come with his armie to Auerſo, Federike abandoning Naples, which made compoſition for threeſcore thouſand ducats, he retired into the new Caſtle, and a few dayes after agreed with Monſieur d'Aubigny to deliuer vp within ſixe dayes all the townes and forts which he held, appertaining to that moytie of the diuiſion which ſhould deſcend to the French King: reſeruing onely for ſixe moneths the Ile of Iſchia, during which time it ſhould be lawfull for him to go whither he would, except into the Realme of Naples; and to ſend an hundred men at armes to Tarenta: That he might take out of the new Caſtle and the Egge Caſtle what he would, except the artilleries of King Charles which remained there: That free pardon ſhould be giuen to all men for all faults committed ſince the late King Charles conquered the Realme of Naples: and that the Cardinals Colonne and Aragon ſhould ſtill enioy thoſe Eccleſiaſticall reuenues which they had in the kingdome. But in the rocke of Iſchia were truly ſeene (as a miſerable ſpectacle) all the infelicities of the line of the old Ferdinand heaped together: for that beſides Federike, newly depriued of ſo noble a Realme, and more grieued for the hard fortune and ill condition of ſo many litle children of his, together with his eldeſt ſonne, who was ſhut vp in Tarenta, then for his owne calamitie; Beatrice his ſiſter was alſo in the ſame rocke; who after the death of her late husband Matthias that renowmed King of Hungarie, hauing receiued promiſe of mariage of Lancelot King of Bohemia, inducing her to aide him in the conqueſt of that Realme; ſhe was refuſed by him with great ingratitude, after he had obtained his deſire, who afterwards maried another by the diſpenſation of Pope Alexander. In this infelicitie was alſo concurrant Iſabel aforetime Ducheſſe of Millan, but now no leſſe wretched then the others, for that almoſt at one time, ſhe ſuffered priuation of her husband, of her eſtate, and of her onely ſonne. Amongſt theſe tragicall accidents, I may not forget this notable example of the affection of a ſonne to his father, a matter ſo much the more ſtrange, by how much in thoſe times the loue of children was rare towards their fathers. One of the ſonnes of Gilbert de Montpenſier being gone to Pozzuolo to viſite the ſepulcher of his father, was ſo ouercome with paſſion, that after he had vnmeaſurably ſhed teares, he fell downe dead vpon the ſepulcher. Now Federike being reſolued, by reaſon of the ſetled hatred he bare to the King of Spaine, to recommit himſelfe rather to the clemencie of the French King, he ſent vnto him to demand ſafe conduct; and hauing obtained it, he left all the reſidue in the rocke of Iſchia, where remained alſo Proſper and Fabritio Colonne, who hauing payed a ranſome, were deliuered by the French: and the Ile remaining as it did before vnder the gouernment of the Marquis of Guaſt and the Counteſſe of Franqueuille, after he had ſent part of his people to the defence of Tarenta, he went into France with fiue light galleys: a counſell very ill taken, for that if he had bene in a place of libertie, ſeeing to what termes the warres grew afterwards betweene thoſe two Kings, he might haply haue had many occaſions afterwards to returne into his kingdome: but chuſing a more quiet life, and peraduenture iudging that to be his beſt courſe, he accepted ſuch conditions as were offered him by the King; who gaue him, to the end he might remaine in France, the Duchie of Anioy, with ſo liberall a penſion, that it amounted euery yeare to thirtie thouſand duckats: and he ſent order to thoſe in whom he had left the gouernment of Iſchia, that they ſhould deliuer it vp to the gouernment of the French king; who refuſing to obey his commandement, kept it a long time, vnder the pretext notwithſtanding of Federike. Gonſaluo was marched at the ſame time into Calabria, where albeit almoſt all the people of the countrey deſired to liue rather vnder the rule and Lordſhip of the French, yet, for that they had no body to defend them, all the townes receiued him willingly, except Manfredonia and Tarenta. But after he had forced Manfredonia and the Caſtle, he incamped with his army in the confines of Tarenta, where albeit he found greateſt difficulties, yet in the end he had it by accord, for that the Count Potenſo, to whoſe guard the yong Duke of Calabria had bene recommended by his father, and Frier Leonard of Naples, Knight of Rhodes, and gouernour of Tarenta, ſeeing no hope or poſſibilitie of further defence, compounded to giue vp the Citie and Caſtle, if within foure moneths they were not ſuccoured. In which compoſition they receiued of him a ſolemne oath vpon the Sacrament, that he would leaue in libertie the Duke of Calabria, who had ſecret commandement from his father to come to him into France when he could no more reſiſt his fortune. But both the feare of God, and the regard to his honour, had leſſe force then the intereſt of the eſtate. For Gonſaluo, iudging it a matter of great importance for the time to come, if the perſon of the Duke were not in the power of the King of Spaine; making no reckoning of his oath, would not ſuffer him to depart, but as ſoone as he could, ſent him well accompanied into Spaine; where the King receiued him, and retained him neare about him in high familiaritie and honours due to his greatneſſe. In theſe ſeaſons the affaires of the Pope proceeded with a proſperitie accuſtomed, for that he had eaſily got all the eſtates which the Colonnois and Sauelles held in the confines of Rome, part whereof he diſpoſed to the Vrſins. And the Duke Valentinois continuing his enterpriſe againſt Plombin, ſent thither Vitellozze and Iohn Paul Baillon with new regiments: for whoſe comming, Iaques Appian the naturall Lord, leauing the towne and Caſtle manned with garriſons, went by ſea into France, to ſee if he might obtaine of the King (who long afore had receiued him into his protection) that for the regard of his owne honour, he would not ſuffer him to periſh: whereto the King, without couering his infamie by art, anſwered very roundly, that he had promiſed the Pope not to oppoſe againſt him, and that he could not oppoſe againſt him, without doing him great wrong. But whileſt the miſerable Lord of Plombin was in vaine ſoliciting for ſuccours, the towne rendered to the Duke Valentinois by the meanes of Pandolfe Petrucci, and within few dayes after the Caſtle did the like. In this courſe of the Popes felicities, he maried his daughter Lucrecia (wife afore to three husbands, and now widow by the death of Giſmon Prince of Viſelle, baſtard ſonne to Alphonſo King of Naples, whom the Duke Valentinois had ſlaine) to Alphonſo eldeſt ſonne to Hercules d'Eſte, with a portion of an hundred thouſand duckats in ready money, and many other gifts of great value. To this marriage, vnworthy of the houſe of Eſte, which was wont to ſeeke ſocietie with the families moſt noble, Hercules and Alphonſo conſented, for that the French King deſiring to ſatisfie the Pope in all things, was an importunate procurer of it; but they were chiefly incited hereto by a deſire they had by this mean (if againſt ſo great a diſloyalty there be any ſurety ſufficient) to aſſure themſelues frõ ỹ armes & ambition of the Duke Valentinois; who being of great power by reaſon of the treaſure and authoritie of the ſea Apoſtolike, ioyned to the fauors which the French King bare him, was now greatly feared throughout the greateſt part of Italy, euery one knowing that his ambition was infinite, and his couetouſneſſe without limite. At this time the French King continued with great diligence the negociation of peace with the Emperour, not onely for the hopes he had to ſhake off by that meanes expences and ſuſpitions, and to obtaine of him the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan which he deſired much; but alſo to haue oportunitie to offend the Venetians, being incited thereto for that he knew well that his proſperities were grieuous to them, and withall nouriſhing this opinion, that they laboured ſecretly to breake the peace betweene the Emperour and him. But that which moſt ſtirred him to this inclination, was a deſire (as well of himſelfe, as at the perſwaſions of the Millanois) to recouer Cremona and Guiaradadda, townes which himſelfe had accorded to them a litle before: and alſo to get againe Breſſe, Bergame, and Crema, ancient appertenances of the Duchie of Millan, and lately poſſeſſed by the Venetians in the warres which they had with Philip Maria Viſconte. And to bring theſe things to good effect,

and to ordaine neceſſary prouiſions for the expedition of Naples, he had long time before ſent to Millan, the Cardinall of Amboiſe, the tongue and authoritie of whom, were the proper tongue and authoritie of the King, and who had remained there many moneths, being not able, for the ordinary variations of the Emperour, to eſtabliſh any thing with him. About this time, the Florentines ſolicited by meanes of the Cardinall, to be receiued of new into the Kings protection, but without any effect, for that the King propounded vnto them very hard conditions, and ſhewed himſelfe to be eſtranged in mind from them: and pretending to be no further bound to the couenants made at Millan, he cauſed to be aſſigned ouer to the Lucquoys (receiued of new into his protection) Pietraſanta and Mutron, as being ancient members of that Citie; but not without the ſumme of foure and twentie thouſand duckats, which he receiued of them as Lord of Genes, for that the Lucquoys ancient owners of Pietraſanta, had by reaſon of ſome neceſſities engaged it for the like ſumme to the Genowayes, from whom it was deſcended afterwards to the Florentines by force of armes. Beſides, the Cardinall treated with them of Sienna, Lucques, and Piſa, to knit them all together for the reeſtabliſhing of Peter de Medicis in Florence: wherein the Cardinall caſt his plot, that the King ſhould obtaine by this action a round ſumme of money of euery of them; which practiſe tooke ſuch proceeding, that they were almoſt at accord, and yet the deuice diſſolued without effect, for that they were not reſolued to pay the proportion of money that he demanded. At length the Cardinall had a more certaine hope then before to contract ſome accord with the Emperour: and in that regard he went to Trent, to communicate with him, where they treated of many things concerning the order for the mariage of Madame Claude the Kings daughter, with Charles the eldeſt ſonne to the Archduke, with conceſſion of the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan to both the one and other of them. They treated alſo to leuie warre againſt the Venetians, to recouer thoſe places which either of them pretended to be vſurped vpon them: and laſtly, they conſulted to call a generall Councel to reforme the Church, not onely (as they ſaid) in her members, but alſo in her head: to which motion the Emperour made ſemblance of conſent, to giue hope to the Cardinall of Amboiſe to obtaine the Popedome, whereunto he aſpired with manifeſt ambition, the King his maiſter being a ſpeciall furtherer of the action, for the intereſt of his proper greatneſſe. On the behalfe of the French King, it was accorded in that contract, that what confederation or alliance ſoeuer he made, it ſhould be vnderſtood with this clauſe, Sauing the rites of the Empire; by meanes whereof it ſhould be lawfull to the Emperour to cauſe it to be acknowledged as well by thoſe that ſhould be now named of the King, as by ſuch as he had afore taken into his protection. There reſted onely the principal difficultie touching the inueſtiture, for that the Emperor refuſed to grant it to the iſſue males if the King ſhould haue any: and they ſtood alſo vpon ſome difficultie for reſtitution of the exiles of the Duchie of Millan; which being inſtantly demanded by the Emperour, the King refuſed flatly to grant; for that they were many in number, and perſonages of importance and authoritie. Yet conſtrained by his importunities, he was content to deliuer Cardinall Aſcanius, and gaue hope of the like grace to Lodowike Sforce, with aſſignatiō of a penſion of twentie thouſand duckats by yeare, wherewith he might liue honeſtly in the Realme of France. By reaſon of theſe difficulties, they fell not otherwiſe to accord, then with hopes to be able to introduce ſome conuenient forme, and therefore the truce being eftſoones prolonged, the Cardinall returned into France, holding almoſt for certaine, that the matters which they had debated, would with ſpeed diuolue to their perfection. Which opinion was augmented by reaſon that a litle after, the Archduke, before he went into Spaine to receiue in his perſon, and the perſon of Iane his wife eldeſt daughter of the King there, the oath of fidelitie of the peoples, as ordained to that ſucceſſion: he made his way by land, accompanied with his wife, and met at Blois with the French king, who receiuing him with many honours, they reſted agreed touching the mariage of their children. In this yeare died Auguſtin Barbarig Duke of Venice, who caried himſelfe ſo proſperouſly, that in many things he ſurpaſſed the degree of his predeceſſors. The power therefore of his ſucceſſors being limited by new lawes, Leonard Loredan was elected in his place, the Commonweale feeling no change in publike things, neither by the death of the Duke, nor for the election of a new: ſo excellent was the forme of their gouernment. In this yeare the Florentines and the Piſans (contrary to the cuſtome of the former yeares) did no great matters one againſt the other: for that the Florentines being no more vnder the protection of the French, and ſtanding in continuall ſuſpition of the Pope and the Duke Valentinois, ſtudied more to keepe their owne, then to offend others: and the Piſans not hauing of themſelues any power to vexe them, had leſſe poſſibilitie to do it by the aide of others, for that there were none that ſtirred otherwiſe in their fauour, but onely to ſuſtaine them when they were in perill of ruine. But in the yeare 1502. 1502 might be ſeene a recontinuation of their actions accuſtomed, for that the Florentines, almoſt in the beginning of the yeare, contracted of new with the French King, after they had ouercome all difficulties, more by the benefite of fortune then by the fauour of the King, or other occaſions: ſeeing that the Emperor (ſince the Cardinall of Amboiſe departed) being entred into new thoughts and purpoſes, and refuſing the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan to the French King, yea euen to his daughters maried, had ſent as his Embaſſadours into Italy, Hermes Sforce, whom the King had acquited of his impriſonment at the requeſt of the Empreſſe, ſiſter of the ſaid Sforce, and the Prouoſt of Breſſina, to deale with the Pope and the other Potentates touching his deſcending into Italy, to take the Crowne of the Empire: who hauing ſoiourned certaine dayes in Florence, obtained promiſe of that Citie to contribute to his aide, with an hundred men at armes and thirtie thouſand duckats, as ſoone as he was entred into Italy: and therefore the French King who feared leſt the Florentines, deſpairing of his friendſhip, would turne their fauours to Maximilian, was content to qualifie the immoderate demands he had made to them, and contracted an accord vnder conditions more tollerable: the ſubſtance whereof Accord betweene the French King and the Florentines. was this: That the King receiuing them into his protection, ſhould be bound for three yeares following, to defend them with armes at his proper expences, againſt who ſoeuer would directly or indirectly moleſt them touching the ſtate and dominions which at that time they poſſeſſed: That the Florentines ſhould pay to him within the ſaid three yeares, ſixe ſcore thouſand duckats, euery yeare a third part: That all other capitulations made betweene them, with all bonds and promiſes depending on the ſame, ſhould be voide: That it ſhould be lawfull to the Florentines to proceed with armes againſt the Piſans, and all others that occupied their lands. In regard of which confederation, the Florentines taking heart againe, determined to make ſpoile of the corne and graine of the countrey of Piſa, to the end that by time and famine, they might reduce the towne of Piſa to their obedience, ſeeing they had with ſo many misfortunes aſſayed to force them by ſiege. This counſell was propounded in the firſt yeare of their rebellion by a certaine well experienced citizen, alledging that by thoſe meanes, more certaine, though not ſo ſpeedie, they ſhould afflict and conſume the Piſans with litle expences and leſſe danger: for that in regard of the preſent conditions of Italy, much troubled, if they would make ſtore of their treaſures, they might make good vſe of them in many occaſions; but if they would ſeeke to force them, it would proue a difficult enterpriſe, that Citie being ſtrongly walled, and full of inhabitants well reſolued to defend it: and alſo for that as often as there ſhould be perill to loſe it, it would be reſcued by all thoſe that deſired to ſee it preſerued, which were many in number: in ſo much as the expences would be great, and the hope ſmall, yea with euident danger to raiſe new troubles. The which counſell being at the firſt reiected as hurtfull, after the courſe of many yeares, was found profitable, but in a time when they had waſted huge expences, and attempted the victory with many dangers. After they had ſpoiled their corne, hoping that in regard of the Kings protection, no man would ſtirre againſt them, they planted their ſiege before Vicopiſan, for that not many dayes before, the Piſans had taken it from them by treaſon of certaine ſouldiers that were therein; and the Captaine of the Caſtle not abiding for the ſuccours which ſhould haue arriued within few houres, did render it to them with great cowardize: and they made no doubt to carry it, knowing well that there was not victuals therein to ſuffice for fifteene dayes; and they had good confidence to let that none ſhould enter, for that by the benefite of their Baſtillions, which they had builded ſeparate vpon the mountaines, they commanded all the paſſages: and in the ſame ſeaſon being aduertiſed that Fracaſſe, being but poore and without pay, was going with a few horſemen to enter Piſa, in the name and with letters of Maximilian, they gaue direction that he ſhould be charged on the way, where he was made priſoner as he fled, ſeeking his ſafetie in a Church within the iuriſdiction of the Duke of Ferrara. Theſe things were done in Tuſcan, no man as yet perceiuing what would happen, contrary to the expectation of euery one.

The French & the Spaniards do diſagree vpō the deuiding of Naples.

But more great and farre more dangerous emotions, and which would produce effects of right great importance, began to be diſcloſed in the kingdome of Naples, by the diſcords which hapned the yeare paſſed, betweene the French and Spaniſh Captaines: which tooke their beginning

ning, for that in the diuiſion made betweene both the Kings, the countrey of Lauoro and Abruzzo being adiudged to the one, and to the other Powilla and Calabria, the confines and limites of the prouinces were not well expreſſed in the diuiſion: in ſo much as either of them began to pretend, that that part which is called Capitanato did appertaine to him. To this controuerſie gaue a great occaſion the alteration and change made by Alphonſo of Aragon King of Naples, firſt of that name, of the ancient denomination of the prouinces: who intending to make eaſie the exaction of reuenues, deuided all the kingdome into theſe ſix principall prouinces, Lauoro, Principato, Baſilicato, Calabria, Powilla, and Abruzzo: of theſe Powilla was diſtinguiſhed into theſe three members, Ottranto, Bary, and Capitanato, which Capitanato adioyning to Abruzzo, and deuided from the reſidue of Powilla by the riuer Lofanto, anciently called Aufido, the French men taking rather the aduantage of the ancient diuiſion, then ruled by the late denomination, pretended that either Capitanato was not comprehended vnder any of the foure prouinces deuided, or elſe that it was rather part of Abruzzo then of Powilla: and the importance of the countrey moued them not ſo much, as for that not poſſeſſing Capitanato, they had no part in the reuenue which was drawne of the tribute of cattell, a reuenue of greateſt profite in all the Realme of Naples; and for that Abruzzo and Lauoro being made naked of graine and corne which came to Capitanato, thoſe prouinces in time of ſterilitie might be eaſily reduced into great extremities, as oftē as the Spaniſh wold make reſtraint that none ſhould be fetched out of Powilla and Sicilia. But it was alledged on the contrary, that Capitanato could not appertaine to the French, for that Abruzzo which is ended in the high places, ſtretcheth not ſo farre as the plaines: and for that alſo in caſes of differences of the names and limites of prouinces, the preſent vſe is alwayes to be conſidered. By reaſon of theſe controuerſies they were content, for the yeare before, to deuide equally the reuenue of the cattell; but in the yeare following, not contenting themſelues with ſuch ſharing, either partie tooke as much as he could get, whereunto alſo were added afterwards new quarrels, nouriſhed till that time (as the bruite went) more by the wils of the Captaines, then by the conſent of their Kings. For the Spaniards pretended that Principato and Baſilicato were included in Calabria, which is deuided into two parts, Calabria Citra and Calabria Vltra, that is, the one higher and the other lower: and alſo that the valley of Beneuent which the French held, was part of Powilla; and therefore ſent officers to keepe Courts of iuſtice at Tripaldo, which is within two miles of Auelino, where were reſident the French magiſtrates. Theſe beginnings of open diſſention being troubleſome to the principall Barons of the Realme, they interpoſed betweene Gonſaluo and Lewis d'Armignac, Duke of Nemours, Viceroy for the French King; and by their meanes Lewis being come to Melfe, and Gonſaluo to Atelle a towne of the Prince of Melfe, after the trauell of certaine moneths (in which time the two Captaines ſpake together) finding in them no maner of accord, they agreed to expect ſuch reſolution as their Kings ſhould ſet downe, and that in the meane time they ſhould forbeare to innouate any thing. But the Duke of Nemours preſuming much that he was the mightier in power, within few dayes after publiſhed another declaration, proteſting to make warre vpon Gonſaluo, if he would not vpon the ſight leaue Capitanato; and preſently after he made his ſouldiers runne vp euen to Tripaldo. Of which inuaſion, which was made the nineteenth day of Iune, the warre tooke his beginning, wherein the French perſeuering ſtill, they endeuoured without regard, to occupie by force in Capitanato and other quarters, the townes which the Spaniſh held. The French King in ſtead of putting remedy hereto, being aduertiſed that the Spaniſh meant not to yeeld him Capitanato, diſpoſed himſelfe wholly to the warre; and ſending by ſea, for the ſtrength of his people, two thouſand Swiſſers, he kept ſtil entertained in his pay the Princes of Salerne and Biſignian, and ſome other of the principall Barons. Beſides, the King came to Lyons, to the end in his owne preſence to furniſh more conueniently the prouiſions neceſſary for the conqueſt of the whole kingdome, whereunto (not content with the places in queſtion) he now aſpired manifeſtly, with intention to paſſe into Italy if need required: which he was quickly conſtrained to do, by reaſon of the new tumults hapned in Tuſcan, to the which Vitellozze gaue beginning, with the priuitie and conſent of Iohn Paul Baillon and the Vrſins, but eſpecially by the counſell and authority of Pandolfe Petrucci, who all deſired that Peter de Medicis might be reeſtabliſhed in the eſtate of Florence. Of this began the mutinie: William Paſſi Agent for the Florentines in Aretze, being aduertiſed that certain of the citizens had conſpired with Vitellozze to ſtirre the Citie to rebellion againſt the Florentines, not beleeuing that the minds of euery one were corrupted, and perſwa-ding himſelfe that the authoritie of the name publike, would ſupply the want of forces, (without looking to make ſufficient prouiſion to ſuppreſſe the conſpirators, and ſuch as meant to reſiſt him, as he might quickly haue done) he ſodainly made priſoners two of the acceſſaries to the treaſon: by reaſon whereof the reſidue of the conſpirators hauing raiſed the people, the moſt part of whom bare no great good will to the Florentines, the two priſoners were reſcued in that tumult, and the Agent made priſoner, together with the reſidue of the officers; and the whole Citie publiſhing the name of libertie, made manifeſt declaration of rebellion, the Citadell onely remaining in the deuotion of the Florentines, to the which, in the beginning of the tumult, was retired Coſma Biſhop of the ſame place, and ſonne to the Agent. After this the men of Aretze ſent ſpeedily to Vitellozze, who was not well content that the matter was burſt out afore the time he had agreed with the conſpirators, for that he had not yet ſent downe ſufficient direction for the prouiſions he meant to make to reſiſt the bands of the Florentines, if (as was very likely) they made any attempt to enter Aretze by the Citadell. For which feare, although he went ſuddenly from Citta de Caſtello to Aretze, with his men at armes and a choiſe ſtrength of footmen, and Iohn Paul Baillon ſent to him from Perouſa, and Pandolfe Petrucci furniſhed him ſecretly with money; yet leauing his companies there, and leauing order that they ſhould looke diligently to hold thoſe in the Citadel ſtraitly incloſed, to the end that through it there might be no entrance made into the Citie, he returned eftſoones to Citta de Caſtello, promiſing to come againe with the ſame ſpeed, but with a greater ſtrength. But at Florence thoſe to whom it appertained to prouide for this miſchiefe, conſidered not well in the beginning of what importance it was: for that the principall citizens, by whoſe counſell the weightie affaires of the Citie had wont to paſſe, giuing this direction, that the regiments which were incamped before Vicopiſan (a number ſo ſufficient, that marching with diligence they might haue vanquiſhed all reſiſtance) ſhould be conuerted to Aretze, many others which occupied the greateſt roomes and offices (their knowledge being leſſe then their authoritie) crying out that it was a matter but of ſmall moment, and that it might be redreſſed with the forces of their other ſubiects, neighbours to the ſame Citie; and thoſe whoſe mindes were eſtranged from the preſent gouernment, making the danger farre greater then it was, for a deſire they had to hinder the action of Vicopiſan, and by that meanes to take away the oportunitie to recouer Piſa: they deferred ſo long to ſend ſtrength thither, that Vitellozze taking courage by their delayes, returned to Aretze with an increaſe of forces, drawing thither after him with other bands Iohn Paul Baillon, Fabio the ſonne of Paul Vrſin, Peter de Medicis, and the Cardinall; who hauing receiued munitions from Sienna, they began to batter the Citadell, wherein (according to the cuſtome of many which are more carefull to erect new fortifications, then diligent to preſerue thoſe already built) was no leſſe want of victuals, then of all other prouiſions neceſſary for defence; and beſides they enuironed it ſtraightly with trenches and mounts on the out-ſide to giue impediment that no ſuccours might enter, in ſuch ſort that all neceſſary prouiſion failing them within, and knowing that the forces of the Florentines led by Hercules Bentiuole, arriued at laſt at Quarate, which is a borough neare Aretze, deſpairing of ſuccour, durſt paſſe no further, they rendred by neceſſitie, the fourteenth day after the rebellion, making this agreement, that the reſidue remaining in libertie, the Biſhop with eight others which they of Aretze would chuſe, ſhould abide priſoners, to exchange them for ſome of their citizens which were priſoners at Florence. The commons of Aretze diſmanteled the Citadell; and the army of the Florentines, fearing leſt Vitellozze and Iohn Paul, who were farre ſtronger then they, would charge them, retired to Monteuarcho, leauing to the diſcretion of the enemies all the places thereabout. It was beleeued, that this enterpriſe was made without the priuitie or knowledge of the Pope and Duke Valentinois, in whom was no contentment that Peter de Medicis ſhould returne to Florence, for that he was ſtraightly allied with Vitellozze and the Vrſins, whom they had ſecretly determined to oppreſſe: and yet hauing alwayes giuen them hope of the contrary, they conſented that Vitellozze, Iohn Paul, and Fabio, mercenary in their pay, ſhould proſecute this enterpriſe: yea they did not diſſemble, that they were very glad of the rebellion of Aretze, hoping, that by thoſe diſpleaſures done to the Florentines, it might happen, that either they might get ſome part of their dominion, or at leaſt conſtraine them, for their profit, to ſome hard condition. But the Florentines not beleeuing but that they were the authors of the whole miſchiefe, were ſo much the more terrified, and therefore repoſing litle in the remedies which of themſelues they were able to apply, for that, by the ill diſpoſition of the Citie, they had in their

pay but a very ſmall proportion of men at armes, and not being able to refurniſh their power ſo ſoone as the neceſſitie of their danger required; they had ſpeedy recourſe to the French king, laying afore him not onely that which concerned his honour, binding himſelfe ſo lately to their defence, but alſo the apparent danger to the Duchie of Millan, if the Pope and Duke Valentinois (againſt whom was no litle ſuſpition to be the kindlers of this commotion) became Lords ouer Tuſcane: That they were mightie in armes, hauing an army compounded of excellent Captains and ſouldiers of choiſe; and that now it appeared plainly, that neither Romagna nor Tuſcane would ſuffice their infinite ambition, aſpiring into matters more ample and immoderate: And laſtly, ſeeing they had offended the honour of the King, by inuading ſuch as were in his protection, neceſſitie now conſtrained them to thinke no leſſe vpon their owne ſuretie, then to take from him the meanes to be reuenged of ſo great an iniury. Theſe reaſons moued the King not a litle, who had already begun to diſlike the inſolencie and ambition of the Pope and his ſonne; and conſidering that the warre was begun in the kingdome of Naples betweene him and the Spaniſh, and the negociation of accord with Maximilian broken, and laſtly that he was not (for many reaſons) to truſt the Venetians, he began to doubt leſt the inuaſion of Tuſcane (practiſed by the ſecret counſell of others) ſhould turne to his great diſaduantage. In which opinion he was confirmed greatly by certaine aduertiſements from Charles d'Amboiſe the Cardinals Nephew, and Lieutenant to the King in all the Duchy of Millan, who ſuſpecting ſuch innouations, perſwaded the King to prouide carefully for his proper danger: and therefore hauing determined to paſſe into Italy with all poſſible ſpeed, and to ſuccour readily the Florentines, he gaue charge to the ſaid Lord Charles, to ſend forthwith to their reſcues, foure hundred Lances, and diſpatched in all haſte Normandie his Herald in poſt to command not onely Vitellozze, Iohn Paul, Pandolfe and the Vrſins, but alſo the Duke Valentinois, to forbeare to offend any more the Florentines; wherein himſelfe made great inſtance to the Popes Embaſſadour, and threatned with very ſharp words Iulian de Medicis, and the agents of Pandolfe and Vitellozze which were in his Court.

The Florentins haue recourſe to the French King.

But at this time the Duke Valentinois, who ſince the accident of Aretze, was come out of Rome with his army, making ſemblance to take Camerin, whither he had ſent before the Duke of Grauino and Liuerot de Ferme with part of his bands, to make ſpoile and hold it beſieged, but in true meaning to ſurpriſe vnder that ſemblance the Duchie of Vrbin: after he had aſſembled the reſt of his army vpon the confines of Perouſa, he demanded of Guidobald Duke of Vrbin, money and artillery: which was eaſily condeſcended vnto, for that it was neither for his ſuretie to refuſe a Prince who had his ſtrength ſo neare, and alſo for that hauing a litle before compounded with the Pope touching the controuerſie of a tribute, he had no occaſion to feare: and hauing by this meanes made him leſſe able to defend himſelf, he departed ſuddenly from Nocere, and marching with ſuch diligence, that he gaue his men no leiſure to repoſe or baite, he arriued the ſame day at Cagly a towne of the Duchie. The ſuddenneſſe of whoſe comming, and againſt a people vnprouided, brought ſuch a generall amaze, that the Duke and Francis Maria de la Rouero Prefect of Rome his nephew, had ſcarce leiſure to find ſafetie in flying; ſo that the Duke Valentinois obtained in very few houres a victory of all that ſtate, except the Rocke of Saint Leon, and Mariuola, to the great diſpleaſure and feare of Pandolfe Petrucci, Vitellozze and the Vrſins, who now began plainly to diſcerne their proper perils by the harmes of another. After the conqueſt of the Duchie of Vrbin, the Duke Valentinois had diuers thoughts; ſometimes he determined to make an end of the enterpriſe of Camerin, and ſometimes he reſolued to inuade openly the Florentines. In which counſell he had ſtood ſetled, if the commandement he receiued from the French King had not reſtrained him, beſides his certaine knowledge, that notwithſtanding the Popes trauell to alter him, his Maieſtie had ſent men at armes in fauour of the Florentines, and was reſolutely determined to defend them; and that which moued him moſt, was the Kings inclination to paſſe in perſon into Italy. He being in this doubt, ſtayed within Vrbin to conſider what he had to do, and what would be the ſucceſſe of things: during which time the Pope and he ſolicited many matters with the Florentines, hoping to bring them ſomewhat to condeſcend to their deſires: and on the other ſide, he ſuffered many of his ſouldiers to go continually to the campe of Vitellozze; who hauing aſſembled an army of eight thouſand horſmen and three thouſand footmen, and for the better reputation of his doings, calling his army the Campe Eccleſiaſticall, had, ſince the rendring of the Citadell of Aretze, occupied Mount S. Souin, Chaſtillon d'Aretze, and the Citie of Cortono, with all the other townes and boroughs of Valdichiano: of the which, not one of them tarried an assault, both for that they saw the succours of the Florentines not in readinesse, and also, the time seruing them to gather the fruites, it stood not with their abilities to lose the profite of their reuenues, alledging that in that respect they were not rebels to the Florentines, seeing Peter de Medicis was in the army, for whose restoring it was said that enterprise was made. And it is not to be doubted, that if Vitellozze, after the taking of Cortona, had suddenly entred the country of Casentin, but it had bene in his power to haue marched euen to the walls of Florence, both for that the French bands were not yet come, and also the most part of the Florentine footmen were dispersed, for that almost all the townes being lost, the occasion of seruice ceassed, and they were returned to their houses. But the desire he had to win for himselfe the borough of S. Sepulcher (a place neare to Citta de Castello) hindered the better counsell, notwithstanding (to couer his couetousnesse) he alledged that it was not sure to leaue behind his backe any place that was enemy; therefore he returned towards Anguiaro, which place hauing onely this constancie to abide till the artilleries were planted, hauing no meanes of defence, yeelded to discretion, without excepting any thing. From thence he marched to the borough of S. Sepulcher, which he tooke by accord, and so drawing towards Casentin, and arriuing at the village of Rassina, he sent to summon the towne of Poppie, of strong situation, but wherein were very few souldiers: but the reputation of the French armes supplied their want of forces, for that two hundred Lances arriued already neare Florence vnder Captaine Imbault, and not daring for lacke of footmen to affront the enemy, were marched to S. Iohn d'Arno, with intention to reassemble in that place all the bands. Which being knowne to Vitellozze, and fearing lest his absence would be inconuenient for them of Aretze, he retired with great diligence from la Vernia to the hill called Ciciliana, within two miles of Quarata, and from thence drawing on three miles further, to declare that he feared not the enemy, and to assure Rhondina with other places thereabouts, he incamped in a strong place on that side to Rhondina, hauing left certaine bands of footmen for the guard of Ciuitella and Gargonse, which were the wayes by the which the Florentine bands might enter into the countrey. These companies (there being also arriued two hundred Lances more vnder Captaine la Hire) assembled betweene Montcuarche and Laterina, with intention, that as soone as they had gathered a strength of three hundred footmen, to go incampe neare Vitellozze vpon some high hill: whose coming he not purposing to attend, being neither able to keepe that place, nor leuie his campe without great danger, he retired neare to the walls of Aretze. But the French taking the field with their whole army, and incamping right ouer against Quarata, he was driuen to retire within Aretze; and though he had alwayes said, that he would performe a notable defence therein, yet new accidents hapning, he was constrained to turne to new thoughts. For Iohn Paul Baillon was come to Perouse with his regiment, fearing (by that that was done to the Duke of Vrbin) lest he should fall into the like danger. By reason of which example, and no lesse for that which hapned in Camerin, Vitellozze, Pandolfe Petrucci, and the Vrsins, fell into great confusion of mind: for, in the very time that the Duke Valentinois communed of accord with Iules de Varana Lord of Camerin, he surprised that Citie by subtle meanes; and hauing Iules in his power with two of his sonnes, he caused them to be strangled with the same inhumanitie which he vsed against others. But that which most amazed Vitellozze, was, that the French King, already come to Ast, had sent Lewis Trimouille into Tuscan with two hundred Lances, and a great strength of artilleries; who already arriued at Parma, expected there three hundred Swissers, which the King sent, for the recouery of Aretze, at the charges of the Florentines: for that being much moued against the Pope, he purposed to despoile the Duke Valentinois of Romagna with other estates occupied by him; and for that effect had sent for all those that either feared his power, or had bene offended by him, whom he assured that he would execute that intention in person, and protested publikly with great affection, that it was an enterprise no lesse full of pietie and deuotion, then if the action were prepared against the Turkes. He laid also his plot, at that time to chase out of Sienna Pandolfe Petrucci, for that he had sent money to Lodowike Sforce when he returned to Millan, and alwayes had made open profession to be for the Emperour. But the Pope and Duke Valentinois knowing that they were not able to resist so great a storme, had recourse to their subtleties and accustomed crafts, excusing themselues that the action against Aretze was done by Vitellozze without their knowledge, and that their authoritie sufficed not to restraine him, and much lesse to keepe from aiding him, the Vrsins and Iohn Paul Baillon, who albeit they were in their pay, yet they were ouer-

ruled with the regard to their proper intereſts: and the better to bring the mind of the King to moderation, the Duke Valentinois ſent to tell Vitellozze, that if he reſtored not Aretze and the other places of the Florentines, he would come with his whole army, and compell him. Which ſummons ioyned to the conſideration of the preſent eſtate of their affaires, bred no litle aſtoniſhment in the mind of Vitellozze, fearing leſt (as hapneth for the moſt part) that the ſtrongeſt being reconciled among themſelues, the indignation of the King would turne againſt him, which was the weaker in ſtrength: and therefore he called into Aretze the Captaine Imbault (contrary notwithſtanding to the wils of the Florentines, who defired that the townes loſt might be redeliuered freely in the field) who compounded that Vitellozze departing immediatly with all his companies, ſhould conſigne Aretze with all the other places to the French Captaines to hold them in the Kings name, vntill the Cardinall Vrſin, who went to the King, had ſpoken with his Maieſtie: and that in the meane while, there ſhould enter into Aretze no other companies then one of the French Captaines with fortie horſemen; for whoſe ſuretie, and no leſſe for obſeruation of the articles promiſed, Vitellozze ſhould giue two of his Nephewes in hoſtage to Captaine Imbault. But as ſoone as the accord was paſſed, he went with all his companies and artillery from Aretze, leauing to the French men the whole poſſeſſion of all the other places, which were preſently by the Kings commiſſion deliuered ouer to the Florentines, who found true the anſwer that Captaine Imbault made whileſt the parley of accord continued, flowting at their complaints; who ſaid, that he could not diſcerne wherein conſiſted that famous wiſedome of the Florentines, ſeeing they knew not, the ſooner to aſſure the victory without difficultie and expences, and to auoide the perill of other diſorders, which by the nature of the French might happen by want of victuals or by other meanes; that they ought to deſire that Aretze in any ſort might fall into the hands of the King, who was not bound to beare regard (but in ſuch ſort as he thought good) to the promiſes made by his Captaines to Vitellozze. But the Florentines being deliuered with great facilitie, but not without huge expences, of ſo terrible and vnlooked for an aſſault, began to looke to the redreſſing of the policie of their Cõmonweale; by the confuſion and diſorders whereof, experience had made knowne, yea euen to the eſtate of the communaltie, that they were fallen into ſo great dangers, for that by the often change of magiſtrates, and for the name of a few that were ſuſpected to the people, there was not one, whether he were a publike or a priuate perſon, in whom reſted a perpetuall care of the affaires. But for that tyrannie was abhorred almoſt of the whole Citie, and the authoritie of perſonages moſt honeſt was ſuſpected of the multitude, it being not poſſible to ordaine with common deliberation a perfect forme of gouernment, the ignorant ſort and incapable being not able to be conuinced with reaſon; it was determined to introduce for the time, this onely new thing, that the Gonfalonnier of iuſtice, chiefe of the dominion, and whoſe creation (together with it) was for the time of two moneths, ſhould be choſen hereafter for his whole life, to the end that ſo he might haue a continuall ſtudy and care ouer the publike affaires, ſo that through negligence they might not fall eſtſoons into ſo great dangers. And it was hoped, that with the authoritie which the qualitie of his perſon would giue him, and for that he was to remaine perpetually in ſo great dignitie, he ſhould winne ſuch opinion of faith and credite with the people, that with time he might eaſily reeſtabliſh the other parts of the gouernment; and withall, placing citizens of greateſt condition in ſome degrees honorable, he might conſtitute a meane betweene himſelfe and the communaltie, by the which the ignorance and libertie popular being tempered, and all ſuch bridled as ſhould ſucceed him in the ſame dignitie, if they would aſpire or riſe too high, he might leaue eſtabliſhed a wiſe and honorable gouernment, with many good circumſtances to containe the Citie in peace. After this deliberation was well debated and reſolued, there was choſen for Gonfalonnier, by the great Councell, with a concourſe and conſent of almoſt all the Citizens, Peter Soderin, who was a man of ripe yeares, of great wealth, and noble parentage, bearing a reputation of integritie, continencie, and to haue alwayes nouriſhed great care of the publicke buſineſſe; and he was alſo without children, a point not of the leaſt conſideration, for that they might breed occaſions to lift vp his thoughts to ambitious purpoſes.

But now to returne to the affaires common and generall: As ſoone as the French King was come to Aſt, all the Princes and free cities of Italy (according to their cuſtome) ranne to him, ſome in perſon, and ſome by Embaſſadours; amongſt whom was the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantua (who was but litle truſted, and as litle welcome,) and Baptiſtin Vrſin Cardinall,

nall, who went thither againſt the Popes will, to iuſtifie his brethren and Vitellozze touching the action of Aretze, and to ſtirre vp the King againſt the Pope and the Duke Valentinois, againſt whom (conſidering the vehemencie ſhewed afore by the King) all Italy expected with great deſire, that the French forces might be oppoſed. But experience declareth this to be true, that that which many deſire, ſucceedeth rarely; for that the effects of humane actions depending ordinarily of a few, & the intentions and ends of them differing from the meanings and ends of many, hardly can things ſucceed otherwiſe then according to the intention of thoſe that plotted them. Euen ſo it happened in this caſe; for intereſts and ends particular induced the King to make deliberations contrary to the deſire vniuerſall: and that which moued the King, was not ſo much the diligence of the Pope, (who ceaſſed not, by the negociation of men ſpeciall, to labour to appeaſe him) as the counſell of the Cardinall of Amboiſe, who nouriſhed a perpetuall deſire to maintaine amitie between the Pope and the King, induced perhaps thereunto (beſides the weale and vtilitie of his King) for his owne particular profite; both for that the Pope continued vnto him his legation ouer the Realme of France for eighteene moneths, and alſo for that ſtudying carefully to lay foundations to raiſe himſelfe to the Popedome, he ſought to obtaine of him the promotion of his kindred and dependants whileſt he was in the Cardinalſhip; and withall he iudged that to haue the reputation to be a louer and protector of the eſtate Eccleſiaſtike, was a thing that might much ſerue to his intention. Touching theſe deuices, the conditions of the time preſent were very conuenient to draw the King to fauour his counſels, for that he was in ſuſpition with the Emperour, who could not be appeaſed nor kept in quiet, hauing of new ſent to Trent many bands of horſemen with a certaine proportion of footmen, and made alſo great offers to the Pope to aide him to paſſe into Italy to take the Crowne Imperiall; and euery enterpriſe of the Emperour fell into more great conſideration, for that the King knew that it ſtood not with the liking of the Venetians, that the Duchie of Millan and Realme of Naples ſhould be in his poſſeſſion. To this was added the controuerſie which he had with the foure Cantons of the Swiſſers, who required him to giue vp to them the rights he had to Bellinzone, and withall to redeliuer into their poſſeſſion Voltelino, Schafouſe, with other immoderate demands, threatning him that otherwiſe they would enter confederation with Maximilian: which difficulties ſeemed to the King ſo much the more great, by how much he was out of all hope at that time to accord with the King of Spaine. For, albeit the French King had made motions to haue Federike reſtored to the kingdome of Naples, and for that cauſe had brought him with him into Italy, and that the negociation ſtill continued to eſtabliſh a truce for a time, euery one retaining that he poſſeſſed; yet both in the one and the other practiſe, there concurred ſo many difficulties, that the French King with great diſcontentment diſmiſſed from his Court the Spaniſh Embaſſadours. For which reaſons the Pope hauing ſent to his Maieſtie, one Trochio his Chamberlein, in whom he had put great confidence, and as well he as the Duke Valentinois promiſing to aide him with all their power in the warre of Naples, he determined to remaine in the amitie of the Pope: and therefore vpon the returne of Trochio to Rome, the Duke Valentinois following the anſwer he brought, went ſecretly in poſt to find the King, arriued then at Millan; of whom, contrary to the common expectation, and no leſſe to the diſpleaſure of all men, he was receiued with honours and entertainments farre greater then was the Kings cuſtome. By reaſon whereof, the King holding it now no more neceſſary to keepe his army in Tuſcan, ſent a countermand to haue them come into Lombardie, hauing afore receiued into his protection the Sienneys and Pandolfe Petrucci, with condition to pay him fortie thouſand duckats at dayes limited. After this the ſtirres of Maximilian began to grow cold, in ſo much as the Kings thoughts had now no other exerciſe, then to deuiſe vpon the things of Naples, which till then ſeemed to haue ſucceeded happily to him, there being yet for the time to come hopes of greater proſperitie. For, he was no ſooner come into Italy, then he diſpatched thither by ſea two thouſand Swiſſers, and more then ten thouſand Gaſcoines, who ioyning to the ſtrength of the Viceroy (occupying already all Capitanato except Manfredonia and S. Ange) incamped before Canoſa, which Peter of Nauarre kept with ſixe hundred Spaniards; who, after he had made a valiant reſiſtance for many dayes, and receiuing direction from Gonſalue, not to abide the extremitie of dangers, for feare to loſe ſo many well trained and reſolute bodies, rendred the towne to the French, their goods and liues ſaued. By reaſon of this accident, the Spaniards holding now no more place neither in Powilla, Calabria, nor Capitanato, beſides the peeces afore named, and Barletto,

Duke Valentinois with the French king.

Iesto, Andria, Gallipoli, Tarenta, Cosenze, Quierace, Seminare, and a few others by the sea; and being farre inferiour in strength and numbers, Gonsalue retired with the army to Barletto, without money, with scarcitie of victuals, and with no lesse want of munitions. But touching the last want, he was somewhat recomforted by a secret consent of the Venetians, who did not restraine him to buy at Venice a great quantitie of saltpeter: whereof the French King complaining, was answered, that it was an action without their knowledge done onely by certaine particular merchants; and that at Venice, which is a free Citie, it was neuer forbidden to any to exercise their negociation and traffike for merchandize. When Canosa was taken, the French Captaines (debating the present difficulties, but chiefly that for want of water the whole army could not continue incamped about Barletto, an opinion maintained against the counsels and protestations of Monsieur d'Aubigny) determined that one part of their people, which they said were in number twelue hundred Lances, and ten thousand footmen of all natures, should remaine still to continue a forme of siege about the confines of Barletto, and the other part should be employed to recouer the residue of the Realme: a deliberation (in the coniectures of wise men) which, ioyned to the ordinary negligence of the French nation, brought great hurt to their enterprise. The Viceroy immediatly vpon this resolution, made himselfe Lord of all Powilla, except Tarenta, Otrante, and Gallipoly: after which successe he returned to the siege of Barletto, and Monsieur d'Aubigny at the same time entring into Calabria with the other part of the army, sacked the Citie of Cosenze, the Rocke remaining still in the power of the Spanish; and afterwards all the Spaniards that were in that prouince, ioyning with the other bands that were come from Sicilia, were broken by Monsieur d'Aubigny in one encounter. These prosperities being all happened, or vpon the point to succeed whilest the French King was in Italy, made him not onely negligent in the continuation of necessary prouisions (by the benefite whereof he might easily haue chased the enemies out of the whole kingdome,) but also tooke from him all doubt to returne into France, and that so much the more, by how much he hoped to obtaine (which hope was not in vaine) a long truce with the Emperour. But at his departure out of Italy, men began to discerne, to their great maruell, what had bene treated vpon with the Duke Valentinois, whom (accepting his iustification touching the action of Aretze) he had not onely receiued againe into grace, but also in recompence of the oath and promise made by the Pope and him to aide his Maiestie in the warre of Naples when need should be, he had for his part giuen them promise to support the Duke with three hundred Lances to conquer Bologna in the name of the Church, and to oppresse Iohn Paul Baillon and Vitellozze: being drawne to beare such immoderate fauours to the greatnesse of the Pope, either for the ill aduised opinion he had to make him his whole and true friend by so great benefites, which would be a meanes that not one durst offer to attempt any thing against him in Italy; or else for that he did not so much assure himselfe of his friendship, as he feared his ill will. To these respects were adioyned, the particular disdaine which he bare against Iohn Paul, Vitellozze, and the Vrsins, for that they made no reckoning of the authority of his commandements to forbeare to offend the Florentines: and Vitellozze in particular, had refused to restore the artilleries he tooke at Aretze, and also hauing demanded safe-conduct to come to the Kings presence, and obtained the same, did after refuse to go. Besides all these, the King held it a thing not vnprofitable to the course of his affaires, to hold the Italian Captaines oppressed; besides that either by the subtiltie of the Pope and the Duke Valentinois, or by the perswasions of some others, he began to feare lest they and the Vrsins might in the end embrace the faction of the Spanish King, and enter into his pay. Then the Duke Valentinois hauing leaue of the King at Ast, returned into Romagna, notwithstanding the King afore had giuen hopes to such as feared his ambition, that for the common suretie, he would take him with him into France. His returning touched not onely the minds of those against whom were kindled his former indignations, but also of many others, for that the same feare occuped Pandolfe Petrucci and the Vrsins, who were conioyned almost in one selfe cause with Vitellozze and Iohn Paul Baillon: and the Duke of Ferrara had more feare for the infidelitie and ambition both of him and his father, so that he had no assurance in regard of kindred: and the Florentines, notwithstanding they had recouered their places by the Kings fauour, had no lesse feare then the others (being ill prouided of men at armes) for that the King reposing no trust in the Marquis of Mantua, for the intelligences he had with the Emperour, at such time as he had feare of his armes, and albeit at Millan he receiued him to reconcilement and grace; yet would he neuer consent

that they ſhould entertaine him as their Captaine generall: knowing withall by many ſignes, that the Pope and the Duke Valentinois continued in the ſame inclination which they had againſt them, and ſpecially, for that (to keepe them in perpetuall ſuſpition) they gathered together all the exiles of Aretze and the other townes. And the feare of all theſe increaſed, when they conſidered how mightie ſuch enemies were in armes, in money, and in authoritie, how much in all actions fortune had bene fauourable vnto them; and that notwithſtanding the great riches they had gotten by their victories, their couetouſneſſe was neuer the more ſatisfied, nor moderated, but (like vnto a fire continually nouriſhed with wood) it became infinite and vnmeaſurable. Beſides, it was feared leſt they abuſing the reſpect the King bare them, wold riſe into boldneſſe to attempt any thing euen againſt his wil; wherein both the father & the ſon publiſhed now with open mouth, that it repented them too much of the great regard and doubt they had vſed touching the action of Aretze, being aſſured that the King, according to the French nature, and by the many fauours and meanes they had in his Court, would alwayes beare with any thing they ſhould do, notwithſtanding they were to his diſliking. And thoſe that were occupied with theſe feares, could promiſe themſelues no ſecuritie for being taken into the Kings protection; for that of very late and freſh memory, notwithſtanding his promiſe, he had ſuffered the Lord of Plombin to be deſpoiled, and was nothing moued at the wrong that was done to the Duke of Vrbin, whom he had taken into his defence, when he ſent his army to Naples, becauſe he furniſhed him with fiftie men at armes for his ſeruice in that warre. But the example of Iohn Bentiuole was more freſh, and gaue them more cauſe of feare: for, notwithſtanding his Maieſtie in the yeares before, had commanded Valentinois not to moleſt thoſe of Bologna, alledging that the bonds and couenants which he had with the Pope, were not to be vnderſtood but touching the preheminence and authoritie which the Church had there at that time that the confederation was made betweene them: yet in that very ſeaſon, Bentiuole hauing recourſe to his Maieſtie for ſuccours, fearing the great preparations that were made againſt him, the King changed the interpretation of the words according to the diuerſitie of his ends and intentions, and making gloſes vpon the capitulations paſt, rather like a Lawyer then a King, he anſwered, That the protection by the which he was bound to defend him, hindred not the Popes enterpriſe, but touching his perſon and goods particular: for that notwithſtanding the words were generall, yet they were expreſſed with this relation, not to preiudice the rights of the Church, to the which it could not be denied but that the Citie of Bologna did appertaine: and for that alſo, in the confederation he had made with the Pope, which was the firſt which he contracted in Italy, he was bound that what couenants ſoeuer he ſhould make with others, they ſhould be without conſtruction of preiudice to the rights of the Church. In which deliberation he continued with ſuch impudencie, that by the perſwaſion of the Cardinall Amboiſe, contrary to the aduice of all the reſidue of his Councell, he ſent an expreſſe meſſenger to ſignifie at Bologna, that that Citie appertaining to the Church, he could not, nor would not deſiſt from fauouring the enterpriſe of the Pope: and that in vertue of his protection, it ſhould be ſuffered to the Bentiueles to remaine at Bologna as priuate perſons, enioying their particular goods. And this ſo great proſperitie of Valentinois, was not onely ſuſpected to theſe men, but euen the Venetians alſo began to enter into iealouſie ouer his ambition, being offended with him for that not many moneths afore, ſhewing that he litle eſteemed the authoritie of that Senate, he had rauiſhed the wife of Iohn Baptiſta Caracciolle the Generall of their footmen, as ſhe paſſed from Vrbin through Romagna to ſeeke her husband. Therefore, to giue occaſion to the King to proceed more moderately in his fauour, ſhewing that the reſpect that led them, was the amitie they bare him, and the iealouſie of his honour, they put him in remembrance by their Embaſſadours with words worthy of the grauitie of ſuch a Commonweale: That he ought to conſider what a charge it was to ſupport ſo greatly Valentinois, and how ill it became the nobleneſſe of the houſe of France, and the glorious title of Chriſtian King, to fauour ſuch a tyrant, ſeeking the ruine of peoples and prouinces, and thirſting ſo ſtrongly after mans bloud, that he might ſerue for an example to all the world of moſt horrible crueltie and infidelitie; by whom, as by a publicke thieſe (notwithſtanding faith giuen) had bene ſlaughtered ſo many Lords and Gentlemen: and not abſtaining from the bloud of his brethren and neareſt kindred, ſometimes by the ſword, and ſometimes with poiſon, he had ſtretched forth his crueltie euen ouer ſuch, who for their age would haue moued the moſt barbarous hearts of the Turks to compaſſion. To which words (the interceſſion of the Venetians making him perhaps more firme in his opinion) the King answered, that he neither would nor ought to restraine the Pope to dispose according to his wil, of the places that appertained to the Church: in so much as where others abstained in his regard, to oppose against the armes of the Duke Valentinois, such as were neareſt the danger determined to prouide for themselues. Therefore the Vrsins, Vitellozze, Iohn Paul Baillon, and Linerot de Ferme, who albeit as souldiers of the Duke (who made shew as though he aimed onely at Bologna) they had newly receiued mony of him, yet they retired seuerally their companies into places of surety, with intention to knit themselues together for a common defence: to which deuice gaue speedy furtherance, the losse of the Castle S. Leo, which reuerted into the power of the Duke of Vrbin, by the meanes of a peasant hauing the guard of a certain wall. After which beginning, their naturall Duke being called home by almost all the people of that estate, and coming by sea from Venice (whither he was retired) to Sinigalle, he quickly recouered all the Duchie, except the fortresses. The Duke of Vrbin recouereth his estate.

Then the Cardinall Vrsin, who since the Kings departure, fearing to come to Rome, stayed at Montrotonde, Paul Vrsin, Vitellozze, Iohn Paul Baillon, Linerot de Ferme, Hermes the sonne of Iohn Bentiuole, and in the name of the Siennois, Anthonie de Venafre, in whom Pandolfe Petrucci reposed much, assembled together at Maisons, which is a towne in the countrey of Perousa, where, after they had discoursed of their manifest dangers, and of the oportunitie they had by the rebellion of the state of Vrbin; and for that Valentinois (whom they had abandoned) had now but small forces, they made a confederation for their common safetie, against Valentinois, and for the succours of the Duke of Vrbin, binding themselues one to another, to put into the field seuen hundred men at armes, and nine thousand footmen, with couenant that Bentiuole should make warre in the territories of Imola, and the others with a greater strength should draw towards Rimini and towards Pesere. In which league the confederates hauing great care not to incense the mind of the French King, and hoping that haply it would not much displease him, that Valentinois were vexed by the armes of others, they declared vnder an expresse article, that they both meant and would be bound to rise readily in their proper persons and with their ioyne forces, to obey any commandement or request of his against all men. And for that occasion, they did not admit into that vnion the family of the Colonnoys, notwithstanding they were great enemies of the Pope, who had alwayes tormented them. Besides all these, they sought to haue the fauour of the Venetians and Florentines, offering the Florentines to procure restitution of Pisa, which they said was in the deuotion of Pandolfe Petrucci, for the authoritie he had with the inhabitants. But the Venetians remained in suspence, as expecting first what would be the inclination of the French King: which also the Florentines did, both for the same occasion, and also holding both the one and the other partie as enemie, they feared the victory of either of them. This accident vnlooked for, hapned to the Duke Valentinois, in a time wherein he being vpon the point to vsurpe the estates of others, he thought nothing lesse then that others would make inuasions vpon him. But he for the greatnesse of his perill, lost neither courage nor counsell, and reposing much (as he said) in his good fortune, he looked with great diligence into the remedies that were conuenient: and specially for that he saw himselfe almost disarmed, he sent to solicite succours of the French King, declaring to him how much it imported him in all aduentures, to serue his turne rather of the Pope and him, then of his enemies, and how fraile was the confidence of Vitellozze, and of Pandolfe, who, besides that he was the chiefest counseller and inducer of the residue, had in times past giuē many demonstrations of an ill mind to his Maiesty, as in ministring aide to the Duke of Millan, and entertaining intelligences with the Emperour. All this notwithstanding he forgat not carefully to make leuies of new companies, his father and he not forgetting in the meane while their old subtilties and ambushments: for the Pope sometimes excusing things that were too apparent, and somtimes denying such as might be doubted, labored with great study to appease the mind of Cardinall Vrsin by the trauell of his brother Iulius: and the Duke Valentinois with disguised apparences and faire promises, sought to appease now one and then another of them, as well to hold them negligent in making their prouisions, as in hope that those practises separate, wold in the end breed them some suspition and disagreement among them, determining not to depart from Imola afore he were furnished with a mightie army, but to keepe it and the other places of Romagna from giuing succours to the Duchie of Vrbin: in which determination he gaue direction to Dom Hugues de Cardona, and Dom Michel, (who were for him in those quarters with an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse- Confederation against Valentinois. Duke Valentinois demādeth succours of the French king.

horſemen, and fiue hundred footmen) to returne to Rimini, a commandement which they refuſed to obey, following another occaſion preſented to them to recouer and ſacke Pergola and Foſſambrona, whereunto they were induced by the caſtle-keepers of thoſe places. But it was eaſily diſcerned by the effect, how much better it had bene to them to haue followed the deliberation of the Duke, for that as they marched towards Cagly, they encountred neare Faſſambrona, Paul and the Duke of Grauina (both of the family of the Vrſins) with whom there were ſixe hundred footmen of Vitellozze, and coming to blowes, the troupes of the Duke Valentinois were ouerthrowne, of whom many remained ſlaine, among whom was Bartholomew Capraniquo Captaine of threeſcore and ten men at armes, and many were led away priſoners, as Dom Hugues de Cardona: Dom Michel fled to Fano, from whence by the commandement of Valentinois he retired eſtſoones to Peſere, leauing Fano as a place moſt faithfull in the power of the people, for that his ſtrength was not ſufficient to miniſter defence to both the places. In the ſelfe ſame ſeaſons, the regiments of the Bolonnois which were incamped in the borough of S. Peter, made incurſions to Doccio neare to Imola. And truly the affaires of Valentinois had bene brought into hard ſtraits, if the Coufederates had bene more diligent to offend him: but whileſt they ſtood in expectation one of another, either for that the regiments of men agreed vpon at the dyot, were not yet ready, or elſe that the practiſes of accord held them in ſuſpence; the occaſion, which at the beginning ſeemed fauourable towards them, began to vaniſh: for that the French King had giuen direction to Monſieur Chaumont to ſend foure hundred Lances to the Duke Valentinois, and to aduance beſides, all his other meanes to reduce his affaires into reputation: which being knowne to the Confederates, and they not a litle confuſed and amazed with it, euery one began to looke to his owne buſineſſe. Therefore the Cardinall Vrſin continued the practiſes he had begun with the Pope, and Anthonie de Venafra (ſent by Pandolfe Petrucci) went to Imola to ſolicite with Valentinois: with whom likewiſe treated Iohn Bentiuole, hauing at the ſame time ſent an Embaſſadour to the Pope, and cauſed to be reſtored the things that were robbed at Doccio. Theſe practiſes were nouriſhed with wonderfull art by the Duke Valentinois, who, iudging that Paul Vrſin would be a good meanes to diſpoſe the reſidue to him, he made as though he repoſed great confidence in him, and ſent for him to come to Imola, and for his ſuretie, the Cardinall Borgia went to the lands of the Vrſins. The Duke Valentinois vſed very gracious words to Paul, complaining not ſo much of him and the reſidue, (who hauing ſerued him long with ſo great fidelitie, were of late eſtranged from him for ſome vaine ſuſpitions) as of his owne indiſcretion, being himſelfe the very occaſion of their iuſt iealouſies, and the onely inſtrument of that diſtruſt that had bene nouriſhed betweene them: but he hoped that this contention and alienation of affection, growing by no other occaſion, would turne it ſelfe into another habite, and in place of grudge and ill will, would breed betweene them and him, a perpetuall and indiſſoluble friendſhip, ſince they might now perceiue they could not oppreſſe him, ſeeing the French King was ſo well determined to ſupport his greatneſſe: and he on the other ſide, being made wiſer by the experience of harmes paſt, confeſſed frankly, that all his felicities and reputation proceeded of their counſels and vertue: and therefore deſiring aboue all other things to returne to that ancient faith with them, he was ready to aſſure them in what ſort they would, and alſo to make them iudges (ſo that there were regard had to his dignitie) of the quarrels that were betweene him and the Bolonnois. To theſe words appertaining generally to them all, he added particular demonſtrations of the great confidence he had in Paul, whom he filled ſo full of hopes and peculiar promiſes, and with ſo great cunning, that he eaſily perſwaded him to beleeue all that he ſaid: a thing eaſie to the Duke by the propertie of his nature, and no leſſe familiar, by the quickneſſe of his wit. But whileſt theſe things were in ſolicitation, the people of Camerin called home againe Iohn Maria de Varana, ſonne of the late Lord of Camerin, who was in Aquilea; and Vitellozze, with the great complaint of Valentinois and Paul Vrſin, tooke the Rock of Foſſambrona: and the Caſtle of Vrbin being likewiſe loſt, with the fortreſſes of Cagly and Agobbio, there remained no more to him in that ſtate, but Saint Agatha, hauing alſo loſt all the countrey of Fano. And yet Paul continuing the practiſe begun, after he had gone many times from Imola to Bolognia, to eſtabliſh ſome forme to the affaires of the Bentiuoles, who were his kinſmen (for his daughter was married to Hermes the ſonne of Iohn,) he contracted with Valentinois in this ſort; but with this condition, if the contract ſhould be approued by the Cardinall Vrſin, by whoſe aduice all the reſidue were gouerned: That all old grudges ſhould be forgotten, together with the memory of all iniuries paſt: That the ancient payes ſhould be confirmed to the Confederates, with further obligation to go as ſouldiers with Duke Valentinois to the recouering of the Duchie of Vrbin, and other eſtates which were rebelled: but, for their ſuretie, they ſhould not be bound to ſerue in perſon, otherwiſe then one at a time, nor the Cardinall Vrſin to remaine in the Court of Rome: That touching the matters of Bolognia, there ſhould be made a compromiſe in the perſons of the Duke, Cardinall Vrſin, and Pandolfe Petrucci. With this concluſion, Paul Vrſin (aſſuring himſelfe euery day more and more of the good intention of Valentinois) went to find the reſidue, to induce them to ratifie the articles. But Bentiuole holding it neither honorable, aſſured, nor reaſonable, that the arbitration of his affaires ſhould be paſſed ouer to another, ſent the Pronotary his ſonne to Imola, and receiuing hoſtages from Valentinois, he made an accord with him and the Pope, whereunto they condeſcended ſo much the more eaſily, by how much they conſidered that the French King coming better to conſider either what an infamy it would be to him, or how much it would import him, that the Citie of Bolognia were in their deuotion, would alter his firſt deliberation, and not ſuffer them to obtaine it. Theſe were the conditions of the accord: That there ſhould be a perpetuall confederation betweene the Duke Valentinois on the one part, and the Bentiuoles together with the communaltie of Bolognia on the other part: That the Duke ſhould haue of the Bolonnois, appointment of an hundred men at armes for eight yeares, which ſhould be conuerted into the pay of twelue thouſand duckats by the yeare: That the Bolonnois ſhould be bound to ſerue him with an hundred men an armes, and an hundred Crosbow ſhot on horſebacke, but onely for the yeare to come: That the French King and the Florentines ſhould promiſe obſeruation for both the one and other parties: That for the better aſſurance of the peace, the Biſhops ſiſter of Luna (who was Nephew to the Pope) ſhould be married to the ſonne of Annibal Bentiuole.

Capitulation betweene the Vrſins & Duke Valentinois.

But for all this, the Duke Valentinois ceaſſed not to ſolicite the coming of the French bands, and the three thouſand Swiſſers which he had taken into his pay, vnder colour that he would not employ them againſt the Confederates, but for the recouery of the Duchie of Vrbin and Camerin, for that the Confederates were already at a point to ratifie the accord paſt. The Cardinall Vrſin being then at Hoſpitalet in Sienna, was ouer-ruled by the perſwaſion of Paul, and much prouoked by Pandolfe Petrucci: whereunto (although after long contradiction) conſented alſo Vitellozze and Iohn Paul Baillon, who held the faith of Valentinois much ſuſpected. After the ratification of theſe men, the Pope hauing likewiſe ratified, the Duke of Vrbin, notwithſtanding the importunities of his people not to go from thence, (promiſing to die at his feet) yet hauing more feare of his enemies then confidence in their popular voices, he returned to Venice, and gaue place to the fury of the enemies, hauing firſt diſmantled all the fortreſſes of that ſtate, except thoſe of Saint Leo and of Maiuola: and the people (Anthonie Sanſouin who was afterwards Cardinall, going thither with commiſſion from Valentinois to pardon them) agreed to returne vnder his obedience. The Citie of Camerin did the like, for that their Lord was fled into the kingdome of Naples, being in great feare for that Vitellozze and the others, hauing ſent for their bands which were in the countrey of Fano, prepared to go againſt him as ſouldiers to Valentinois. At which time the Pope made the campe march to Palombaro, which the Sauelles had recouered, together with Senzana and other places appertaining to them, and that by the occaſion of the armies leuied by the Confederates. But the Duke Valentinois minding to put to execution his moſt ſecret thoughts, went from Imola to Ceſena; where he was no ſooner arriued, then the French men at armes who were come thither a few dayes before, called backe by Monſieur Chaumont, departed ſuddenly from thence, not by commiſſion from the King, but (as was ſuppoſed) for a particular indignation which hapned betweene him and Valentinois, or perhaps at his requeſt, to the end he might be leſſe fearfull to thoſe whom he deſired greatly to aſſure. At Ceſena, he looked to redreſſe his bands, which were ſtronger then the report went of them, for that expreſly he had made very few great leuies of men, but well payed, and entertained continually many Lanceknights and particular Gentlemen. At the ſame time Vitellozze and the Vrſins, being ſent by his direction to encampe afore Sinigalle, tooke the towne and caſtle, from whence the widow of the Prefect, ſiſter to the Duke of Vrbin, fled, being left abandoned and deſolate, notwithſtanding her litle ſonne was vnder the protection of the French King, who excuſed himſelfe, for not giuing aide, in that ſhe was a competitor to the league made at Maiſons. After the taking of Sinigalle, Valentinois went to Fano, where after he had ſtayed certaine dayes, to bring all his companies together, he aduertiſed Vitellozze and the Vrſins, that the day following he would come to lodge at Sinigalle, and that in that regard they ſhould beſtow the ſouldiers that were with them within the towne, abroad in the plaines; which was executed according to his direction, the footmen being lodged in the ſuburbes of the towne, and the men at armes diſperſed ſeuerally in the countrey. The ſame day that the Duke came to Sinigalle, there went to meete him, Paul Vrſin, the Duke of Grauina, Vitellozze, and Liuerot de Ferme, who being receiued by him with very great entertainment, they accompanied him to the gate of the towne, afore the which all the bands of Valentinois were beſtowed in order: a maner of dealing, which they could not but ſuſpect, ſpecially to behold a ſtrength greater then they looked for: and when they offered to take their leaue to withdraw to their lodgings which were without the towne, they were deſired to enter with him into the towne, ſeeming to haue need to communicate with them in ſome priuate matter: which they being not able to refuſe, although they began almoſt to deuine of the miſchiefe that was prepared for them, they followed him to his lodging: and being retired with him into a chamber, after he had held them a litle in talke, (for he left them preſently, vnder colour to go ſhift his apparell) he ſent men into the chamber to apprehend them all priſoners, and at the ſame inſtant appointed other companies to ſtrip their ſouldiers. The day following being the laſt of December, to the end that that yeare 1502 might determine with this tragedie, retaining the other priſoners, he cauſed Vitellozze and Liuerot de Ferme to be ſtrangled in a chamber, whereof the one had no power to eſcape the deſtinie of his houſe, to die a violent death, as all his other brethren had done, after they had won great experience and reputation in armes, the miſchiefe hapning to one after another according to the order of their ages. Iohn hauing bene ſlaine by a Canon ſhot, in the campe which Pope Innocent ſent againſt Oſima; Camille being in the pay of the French, by a blow with a ſtone before Circelle, and Paul beheaded at Florence. But touching Liuerot, no man could denie that he had not an end worthy of his wickedneſſe, being but iuſt and reaſonable, that he ſhould die by treaſon, who a litle before had killed by treaſon (to make himſelfe great in the Citie of Ferme) his owne Vnkle, together with many of the principall citizens, whom he had inuited to come banquet with him. That yeare brought forth no other thing worthy of memory, ſauing that Lodowike and Federike who were of the family of the Piques, Counts of Mirandola, being chaſed afore by Iohn Franciſco their brother, and pretending (notwithſtanding his prerogatiue of yeares and age) that they had the ſame rights that he had, expulſed him by force by the helpe of the Duke of Ferrara and Iohn Iaques Triuulce father in law to Lodowike: a matter not ſo much worthy of memory for it ſelf in particular, as for that in times after, the quarels of theſe brethren ingendred effects of ſome conſequence. The yeare following was farre more full of things memorable and accidents more notable, then any of the former yeares: to the which the diſloyaltie and impietie of the Prince of Chriſtian religion gaue beginning, not knowing what was to happen that yeare as well to his perſon as to his affaires. For the Duke Valentinois hauing aduertiſed his father (according to a priuate reſolution betweene them) how well his ambuſhes had ſucceeded with him at Sinigalle, the Pope for his part, holding ſecret the aduertiſement, preſently called to the Pallace of Vatican vnder colour of ſpeciall occaſions, the Cardinall Vrſin, who, truſting in the ſuretie of the accord that was made, and in the faith of him, whom all the world knew neuer to keepe faith with any man, and being driuen more by his deſtinie then by reaſon, was a litle afore gone to Rome; and entring the Pallace, he was ſodainly made priſoner: and at the ſame time were alſo taken in their houſes Renald Vrſin Archbiſhop of Florence, the Pronotary Vrſin, the Abbot Aluiano brother to Bartholomew, and Iaques de S. Croix a Romane Gentleman, one of the principalleſt of that faction: and after they were led to the Caſtle S. Ange, the Pope ſent his ſonne the Prince of Squillace to take poſſeſſion of the lands of Paul and the others, and with him went the Pronotary, and Iaques de S. Croix to make deliuery of them, who were afterwards returned vnder the ſame guard. Then the Pope gibing with a Spaniſh ſubtiltie at the traine which his ſon had made, ſcoffed and ſaid, that Paul Vrſin and the others being the firſt that had falſified their faith to him, (for that they were bound to go to him but one at once, and came notwithſtanding all together) it was no leſſe lawfull to him to breake his promiſe with them. The Cardinall remained priſoner about twentie dayes, the Pope alledging that he had impriſoned a Cardinall ſo ancient in place, in age, and in authoritie, for many reaſons: but at length the bruite running that the Cardinall was ſicke, he died in the Pallace, of poiſon, as is aſſuredly beleeued: and the Pope, to take away the

the opinion, albeit it was his custome not to care for infamies, caused the dead body to be caried to his graue in the broad day, and all bare, accompanied with the kindred of his house, and all the other Cardinals: and the other prisoners were deliuered a litle after, giuing caution to returne when they should be called. The death of Cardinal Vrsin

But the Duke Valentinois, seeking to ioyne recompence to his wickednesse, departed immediatly from Sinigalle, and addressed himselfe to the towne of Castello, where finding that such as yet remained of the family of the Vitelles had abandoned the citie, he continued his way to Perousa; from whence John Paul fled, who, destinated to a more slow, but to a greater punishment, being held backe by suspition, was made wiser then the residue touching his going to Sinigalle. The Duke left both the one & other cities vnder the name of the Church, hauing placed within Perousa, Charles Baillon, the Oddies, and all the other enemies of John Paul. And purposing with so great an opportunitie to ally, to make himselfe Lord ouer Sienna, being followed by certaine exiles of the same Citie, he went with the whole army (wherein were newly arriued the aides promised by Bentiuole) towards the borough of Pisa, where knowing that the Cardinall Vrsin was prisoner, he caused the Duke of Grauina and Paul Vrsin to be strangled, and sent Embassadours to Sienna to warne them of the towne to chase out Pandolfe Petrucci as his enemy, and the common troubler of the tranquillitie of Tuscan; promising that as soone as they had expulsed him, he would returne to Rome with his armie, forbearing to do any other oppression to their frontiers. And on the other side, the Pope and he burning in desire, that as Pandolfe had bene a companion to the others in life, so he might be also in death, they studied to lull him asleepe with the same subtilties wherewith they had gulled all the others, writing to him billets and letters full of humanitie, and sending to him by messengers expresse, embassages full of affection and kindnesse: But the suspition that occupied the people of Sienna, that the Dukes intention was to vsurpe that citie, made his enterprise against Pandolfe more hard; for that albeit many of the citizens were oftentimes ill contented with the gouernment of Pandolfe, yet they held it better to temporize vnder the tyrannie of a citizen, then to fall into the seruitude of a stranger: so that at the beginning he could obtaine no answer by the which he might hope that Pandolfe would depart thence: and yet Valentinois continuing vnder the same semblance, that he desired no other thing but that, he won dayly on them, hauing passed Picnsa and Chiusa, with other places neare to Sienna, which yeelded to him by composition. By reason whereof, feare increasing in Sienna, and not onely the people, but also some of the chiefest, giuing out, that it was not reasonable, that to support one citizen, the whole citie should suffer so great a danger: Pandolfe determined to do that with the good liking and fauour of euery one, which he feared to be constrained to do in the end with the vniuersall hatred of the citie, and his owne greater danger: and therefore by his consent it was signified to Valentinois, in the publike name of the Citie, that they were content to gratifie his demands, so that he would retire with all his armie from off their lands. This resolution was accepted (notwithstanding the Pope and he were fixed vpon an action of greater importance) for that they knew how hard a matter it would be to take Sienna, both for the greatnesse and strong seate of the towne, and also for the vertue of John Paul Baillon commanding within it, who with the souldiers and naturall people of the place, would ioyne in one strength to resist him, if they were once assured that his intentions were contrary to the publication of his promises. To this were added, that the Pope held it necessary for his proper suretie, that his sonne should retire his armie into Rome, where he was iealous of some conspiracie, for that Iulio and others of the Vrsins with many horsemen were withdrawne into Petillano and Fabio, and Organtin Vrsin into Ceruetre; and Mutio Colonno newly come from the Realme of Naples, was entred into Palombaro to succour the Sauellies, who were newly entred into alliance with the Vrsins, and had intelligence with them. But that which tooke from the one and the other, the hope to occupie Sienna, was, that it was now manifestly perceiued (although from the beginning men perceiued that he was in great doubt) that the enterprise was directly displeasing to the French King: for albeit he could haue wished that Vitellozza and the other Confederates should be kept vnder, yet he saw that their whole ruine, ioyned to the conquest of so great estates, made the Pope and Valentinois too mightie: and the Citie of Sienna and Pandolfe, being vnder his protection, and no member of the Church, but an appertenance of the Empire, he thought he might with good reason oppose himselfe against such a conquest. They had hope also that the remouing of Pandolfe would cause some confusion in the gouernment Paul Vrsin strangled.

of that Citie, and that by that meanes, time would breed occaſion to giue ſome colour to their enterprife. Then Pandolfe departed out of Sienna, but left there the ſame guard, and the ſame authoritie to his friends and dependants, in ſo much as there appeared no ſigne of alteration in the gouernment. Valentinois tooke his way to Rome, to deſtroy the Vrſins, who, with the Sauellies, had won the bridge Lamentano, and runne ouer the whole countrey: but they ſtayed from further action, becauſe of the arriuall of the Duke Valentinois, who ſuddenly aſſailed the eſtates of Iohn Iordan, without any regard that he was not declared againſt him: that he had the Order of S. Michael: that he was in the protection of the French King, and at that time in the kingdome of Naples in his ſeruice. The which action the Pope ſeeking to iuſtifie before the King, alledged that he was not moued by any deſire to deſpoile him of his eſtates, but for that there being ſo great quarels and offences betweene him and the family of the Vrſins, he could not ſafely haue him his ſo neare neighbour; and that therefore in recompence of his harmes, he was content to giue him the principalitie of Squillace, with other lands of the ſame value and reuenue. But the French King not taking theſe reaſons for paiment, was much grieued for that inuaſion, not ſo much for that the regard to his protection preuailed more with him then of cuſtome; but becauſe his affaires in the kingdome of Naples ſucceeded not ſo proſperouſly as they had wont to do, he began to hold for ſuſpected the pride and inſolencie of the Pope and his ſonne, calling to mind how in the yeare paſt they had aſſailed Tuſcan, and that which afterwards they had aſſayed againſt Sienna, notwithſtanding he had promiſed to protect it: and conſidering that by how much the more they had already obtained of him, and for time to come might obtaine, by ſo much the more was their ambition growne great, and hereafter would grow more great, he ſent to command Valentinois with a ſharpe meſſage to forbeare to moleſt the ſtate of Iohn Iordan, who was come to Bracciano by wayes vnknowne, not without great perill. And further, conſidering how neceſſary it was to be aſſured that there ſhould riſe no commotion in Tuſcan, ſpecially for that he vnderſtood that in Sienna there was ſome beginning of ciuill diſcords; he began by the counſell of the Florentines to ſolicite that Pandolfe Petrucci (who was retired to Piſa) might returne eftſoones to Sienna; and that betweene the Florentines, Siennois, and Bolonnois, might be contracted an vnitie for their common defence, rendring Montpulcian to the Florentines, to take away all occaſion of diſſention: and that euery one of them, according to his power, ſhould make prouiſion of men at armes for their common defence, to the end to take from the Pope and his ſonne, all meanes to ſtretch further their iuriſdiction into Tuſcan. In this meane while the Duke Valentinois, with one part of his armie, had taken Vicouaro, wherein were ſixe hundred men for Iohn Iordan: but hauing receiued the commandement from the French King, he left (to the great diſpleaſure of the Pope and him) the enterpriſe of Bracciano, and went to incampe afore Cery, where, with Iohn Vrſin Lord of the place, were Ranſe his ſonne, with Iulio and Francis of the ſame family: and at the ſame time his father proceeded by way iudiciall againſt all the houſe of Vrſins, except Iohn Iordan and the Count Petillane, againſt whom the Venetians would not endure that any wrong ſhould be done. Cery is a towne very ancient, and no leſſe notable for the ſtrong ſituation, for that it is ſeated vpon a litle hill, or rather vpon a litle rocke which is all of one onely ſtone, whither the ancient Romanes after their ouerthrow by the French men, neare the riuer of Alie, now called Caminate, deſpairing to be able to defend Rome, ſent for this cauſe their Veſtall virgins, and the moſt ſecret and celebrate images of their gods, with many other things ſacred and religious, as into a place of ſpeciall ſuretie: and for the ſame reaſon in the times following, it was free from violation in the rage of the Barbarians, at ſuch time as by the declination of the Romane Empire, they ranſackt all Italy with wonderfull furie. By meanes whereof, as well by his naturall ſtrength, as for that it was manned with a reſolute companie, the enterpriſe was hard to Valentinois, who, to obtaine it, forgat no diligence nor induſtrie, vſing, beſides the ordinary engines of warre, certaine inſtruments of wood to ſurmount the height of the walls. But whileſt he was there, Francis Nardy (ſent to Sienna by the French King) publiſhed his Maieſties intention, that Pandolfe ſhould returne, of whom he had receiued promiſe before to continue in his deuotion, and for his ſuretie to pay to him that which was due of the reſidue of the fortie thouſand duckats which had bene accorded, and to reſtore Montpulcian to the Florentines, to ſend his eldeſt ſonne into France: a reſolution plauſible to them of Sienna, who, becauſe there ſhould be no impediment to the coming of Pandolfe, ioyned to the reputation of the Kings name, the open fauours of the Florentines, and the diſpoſition

of thoſe in the towne that were his friends, who drawing into armes and ſtrength the night before he ſhould come, held ſuppreſſed, or at leaſt kept in a compelled quietneſſe all ſuch as were of the contrary opiniõ. This hapned to the great diſpleaſure of the Pope, whoſe affaires in other places ranne in a happie courſe, for that Palombare with other peeces of the Sauelleis, were rendred to him: and thoſe that were within Cery, ſuffering many and continuall afflictions of warre, after the fury of ſundry aſſaults, at laſt yeelded, with couenant that the Pope ſhould pay a certaine proportion of money to Iohn who was Lord of the place, and to let go with him in ſafetie all the reſidue within Petillane; which was ſincerely obſerued, contrary to the cuſtome of the Pope, and againſt the expectation of all men.

The affaires of the French in the kingdom of Naples, proceeded not with ſuch good ſucceſſe, being incumbred with many difficulties euen from the beginning of the yeare. For, the Count de Melete being incamped at Villeneufue with the regiments of the Prince of Salerne and Biſignian, Don Hugues de Cardona paſſed from Meſſina into Calabria with eight hundred footmen Spaniſh, (who hauing bene in the pay of Valentinois, he had brought from Rome,) and with an hundred horſemen, and eight hundred other footmen as well Calabrians as Sicilians, and being arriued at Seminare, marched towards Villeneufue to reſcue it: which as ſoone as the Count Melete vnderſtood, he raiſed his ſiege from before Villeneufue, and went to meete him. The Spaniards marched along a plaine, ſtrait and narrow, betweene the mountaine and a brooke, where was not much water, but is ioyned to the way with a litle riſing: and the French men who were the greater number, marched right to them beneath the brooke, deſiring to draw them into a large place; but ſeeing how they marched cloſe and in firme order, and fearing that if they cut not off their way, they would get in ſafetie into Villeneufue, they paſſed ouer to the other ſide of the brooke to charge them: in which encounter they were broken, the valour of the Spaniſh footmen no leſſe then the aduantage of the place, helping indifferently to the victory. Soone after arriued by ſea out of Spaine at Meſſina, two hundred men at armes, two hundred horſemen mounted vpon Iennets, and two thouſand footmen, led by Manuel de Benauide, with whom came into Italy Anthonie de Leua, at that time a meane ſouldier, but afterwards riſing by all degrees of warre, to the eſtate of Captaine generall, he obtained in Italy many goodly victories. Theſe companies being paſſed from Meſſina to Regge in Calabria, which the Spaniſh had taken before, (Monſieur d'Aubigny being then in the other part of Calabria) and from thence incamped at Loſarna, within fiue miles of Calimere: into which place Ambricourt was entred two dayes before with thirtie Lances, and the Count de Melete with a thouſand footmen, and preſenting themſelues the morning following by breake of day before the walls of the towne, wherein were no gates but barres onely, they forced it at the ſecond aſſault, although thoſe within defended themſelues valiantly. Captaine Eſprit remained dead, and Ambricourt made priſoner; but the Count de Melete in flying to the rocke, found ſafetie, the victors retiring forthwith to Villeneufue for feare of Monſieur d'Aubigny, who came on marching with three hundred Lances, three thouſand footmen ſtrangers, and two thouſand of the countrey. After which accident, Monſieur d'Aubigny incamping at Poleſtrina within two miles of them, and their perill increaſing by neceſſitie of victuals, they diſcamped ſecretly in the night to go to Quiercy: but being followed by the bands of Monſieur d'Aubigny vnto the riſing of a crabbed mountaine, they loſt threeſcore men at armes and many footmen: and of the French was ſlaine Captain Grigni putting himſelfe too forward, whom they eſteemed much, leading the regiment that had bin vnder ỹ Count Caiazze who died by a natural death a litle afore the taking of Capua. At the ſame time came out of Spaine by ſea into Sicily theſe new companies, two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, and two thouſand footmen, gouerned by Captaine Porto Carrera, who dying at Regge as he paſſed with his regiment, the charge remained to Fernand d'Andrado his Lieutenant: for the arriuall of whom, the Spaniards that were retired to Quiercy tooke new courage, and returned to Villeneufue, where they fortified themſelues in that part of the towne which they held ioyning to the Caſtle, which is at the entry of a valley, whereunto is conioyned the reſidue of the towne: and this they did, and not in vaine, for the feare they had of Monſieur d'Aubigny; who being come from Poleſtrina with great diligence, was incamped in that part which was not holden by the Spaniſh, euery one planting barres and fortifications requiſite for their proper ſafetie. But Monſieur d'Aubigny vnderſtanding that the Spaniſh regiments that were deſcended to Regge, drew neare to make one ſtrength with the other bands, retired to Loſarno, and the enemies following lowing the commoditie of victuals, put themſelues altogether within Seminare. Whileſt things went in this ſort in Calabria, the Viceroy for the French returning towards Barletto, lodged at Matera, and diſperſed his bands in ſeuerall places thereabouts, to giue impediments that no victuall ſhould enter Barletto, and hoping that by reaſon of the plague and ſcarſitie of victuals which was therein, the Spaniſh could not remaine there long, nor reduce themſelues into Trany where the ſame difficulties raged. But in ſuch incommodities and dangers, their reſolution was wonderfull, confirmed by the vertue and diligence of Gonſaluo, who ſometimes giuing them hopes of a ready arriuall of two thouſand Lanceknights, which he had ſent Octauian Colonne into Almaine to leuie, ſometimes promiſing other ſuccours, and laſtly cauſing a bruite to be publiſhed that he would go to Tarente by ſea, he entertained them in their courage, but much more by his owne example, chearfully ſuffering in his owne perſon all their trauels, with the great want of victuals and other neceſſaries. The warre brought to this paſſe, thoſe that till that day had bin inferiours, began now by the negligence and inſolencie of the French, to become ſuperiours. For, the men of Caſtellanetto, a place neare to Barletto, becoming deſperate for the oppreſſions & wrongs which fiftie men at armes of the French which were lodged there, did them, drew into armes by common aſſent, and ſtripped them. And not many days after, Gonſaluo being aduertiſed that Monſieur de Paliſſa remaining with an hundred lances and three hundred footmen in the towne of Rubos, twelue miles from Barletto, ſtood negligently vpon his guard, he marched one night from Barletto to Rubos, where hauing with a wonderfull diligence, planted certaine peeces of artillery, which he had eaſily brought thither, by reaſon of the plainneſſe of the way, he aſſaulted the towne with ſuch a fury, that the French (who looked for nothing leſſe) being aſtonied at ſo ſodain and vnexpected an aſſault, after a weak reſiſtance, rendred the place,

Monſieur de Paliſſa with the reſidue remaining priſoners; and the ſame day Gonſaluo returned to Barletto, without danger to receiue in retiring any domage by the Duke of Nemours, who a litle before was come to Canoſa, for that his companies being diſpoſed into ſeuerall places to keep Barletto beſieged on many ſides, and haply for their greater commoditie, could not be aſſembled in ſufficient time: and beſides that, fiftie French Lances, ſent to make prey of certaine money caried from Trany to Barletto, were ouerthrowne by ſuch as Gonſaluo had ſent for the ſuretie of the treaſure. To theſe alſo might be added another accident, which diminiſhed greatly the valour of the French men, and which was the proper worke and effect of valour, and not to be attributed to the iniquitie of fortune. For a Trumpet going to Barletto to ſolicite the ranſome of certaine ſouldiers taken at Rubos, certaine ſpeeches were vttered againſt the French, by ſome of the Italian men at armes, which being carried by the Trumpet to the French campe, and anſwer eſtſoones returned to the Italians, bred ſuch enuie in both parts, that to iuſtifie the honour of their ſeuerall nations, they agreed that thirteene men at armes of the French and thirteene Italians ſhould fight in combat to the vtterance within liſts, vntill the one or the other were maſters; and that the place of the combat ſhould be aſſigned in a champaine betweene Barletto, Andria, and Quadrato, where they ſhould be accompanied with an equall number of attendants. Neuertheleſſe to aſſure them from ambuſcados, the Captaines with the greateſt part of both the armies, accompanied their Champions to the mid way, comforting them, that for that they were choſen out of the whole armie, they ſhould with action and courage anſwer the expectation that was had of them, the ſame being ſuch, that in their hands and vpon their valour was repoſed by common conſent, the honour of ſo noble nations. The Viceroy of the French declared to his, that their aduerſaries were the ſelfe ſame Italians, who hauing no courage to abide the French men, had alwayes made them way, without expreſſing any triall of their vertue ſince they had runne euen from the Alpes to the vtmoſt limites of Italy: and that they were not now puſhed forward with any other nobleneſſe of ſpirit, or new reſolution of mind; but being mercenary to the Spaniards and ſubiect to their commandements, they had no libertie to reſiſt the will of thoſe men, whoſe cuſtome being to fight not with valour but with ambuſhes, made them ſelues beholders and idle lookers on the dangers of others: and that aſſoone as the Italians ſhall be entred into the liſts, and ſee before them the armes and fury of ſuch as had alwaies ouercome them, returning to their accuſtomed feares, they will not haue the courage to fight, or fighting fearfully, ſhould eaſily become their prey; the foundation layed vpon the vaine brags and braueries of the Spaniſh, being no ſufficient target againſt the weapons of the victorious. On the other ſide, Gonſaluo kindled the minds of the Italians with perſwaſions no leſſe forcible, reducing

to their remembrance the ancient honours of that nation, and the reputation and glory of their armes, wherewith they had heretofore tamed the whole world: That it was now in the power of a few, (not being inferiour to the vertue of their elders) to make knowne to all men, that though Italy, whose valour had vanquished the most regions of the world, had bene of late yeares ouerrunne by forreine armies, it was by no other occasion, then the indiscretion of her Princes, who by ambition disagreeing among themselues, had called in strange armies to ruinate one another: That the French had neuer obtained any victory in Italy by their owne strength or vertue, but by the aide of the counsell or armes of the Italians, who had suffered them to passe so farre into the bowels of their countrey, not by the terrour or agilitie of their armes, but by the fury of their canons, which were fearfull, being new and vnaccustomed in Italy: That they were now to fight with the force and vertue of their proper persons, and that not onely in the presence of so great a Nobilitie of their owne side, but also in the spectacle and eye of the principall nations of Christendome; who, as well of the one part as of the other, had an honourable desire of their victory: That they had to remember that they were brought vp by the most famous Captaines of Italy, and by them continually trained in armes, and that euery one of them had in many actions giuen an honorable experience of their vertue: and that therefore either the honour to readdresse the name of Italy with that glory wherein it had bene not onely in the yeares of their elders, but also in their owne times, was by destinie appointed to them; or else (so great an honour not being won by their hands) there could be no expectation, that Italy should remaine in any other state, then dishonorable and in perpetuall seruitude. And the other Captains and particular souldiers of both the armies, did no lesse encourage the parties appointed for the combat, vehemently vrging them to shew themselues such as they were, to raise by their proper vertue the noblenesse and glory of their nation. With these perswasions being brought into the field full of courage and eagernesse, and the one part being placed on the one side of the Palissado, directly opposite to the place where their aduersaries were placed; when the signe was giuen, they ranne together furiously with their Lances; at which encounter no aduantage inclining to either part, they shewed the same emulation of mind in the action of their other weapons, euery one of them excellently shewing what he could do; so as it was secretly confessed by all those that were lookers on, that out of all the armies on both factions, could not be chosen more valiant and worthy souldiers to performe so glorious a proofe. But when they had fought a good space of time, the ground being couered with tronchions and peeces of their armours, and somewhat dyed with the bloud that dropped from all parts, without that the aduantage of the fight could be iudged; as they were beholden with a wonderfull silence by such as were present, and almost in no lesse trauell and passion of mind, then if they themselues had bin the combatants, it hapned that William Albemont one of the Italians was striken from his horse by a French man, who as he ran furiously to kill him, Francis Salamone running hastily to help his companion, killed the French man with a wonderful blow; who vsing all his diligence to dispatch Albemont, tooke no heed to the other: and then together with Albemont who was gotten vp againe, and Miale who was on foote sore hurt, taking in hand their bore-speares which they had brought thither for that purpose, they killed many of their enemies horses, by meanes whereof the French men beginning to decline, were all made prisoners, some to one, some to another of the Italians: who being receiued of their companies with great ioy, and meeting afterward Gonsaluo, who attended them in the mid way, were welcomed of him with such honours, as appertained to their merites: and being congratulated of all, as men whose valours had restored Italy to her former glory and honour, they entred Barletto in triumph, their prisoners being led afore them, the aire resounding with the sound of Drummes and Trumpets, with the noise of the artillery, and with the clapping of hands and military cries, deseruing that euery Italian should do his best endeuour to perpetuate their memory, by publishing the same in writing. These were their names, Hector Fieramosque of Capua, Iohn Cappocio, Iohn Bracalone and Hector Iuuenal Romanes, Marke Carellario of Naples, Marian of Sarni, Romanello of Furly, Lodowike Aminale of Terni, Franciscque Salamone and William Albemont Sicilians, Miale of Troy, and the Captaine Riccio and Fanfulle of Parme, all brought vp in armes, either vnder the King of Aragon or vnder the Colonnois. And it is incredible, how much this victory diminished the courage of the French armie, and caused boldnesse in the Spaniards, euery one construing this experience of a few, to a prophesie of the absolute issue of the whole warre.

About

Deſcending of the Swiſſers into the Dutchy of Millan.

About this time the French King was moleſted in Lombardie by the Swiſſers, the matter being begun not by the whole nation, but by thoſe three Cantons which had occupied Bellinzone, who ſeeking to induce him to conſent that that place might remaine to them in proper, aſſailed Locarne and the Wall. This wall is of great length vpon the lake Maior neare to Locarne, and giues impediment to deſcend from the mountaines to the plaine, by any other way then through a gate which onely is in that wall. And albeit they could not carry it in the beginning for the defence which the French garriſon made, (Monſieur de Chaumont lying at Vareſo and Galero with eight hundred Lances, hoping well alſo of the abilitie and defence of the place,) yet the number of the Swiſſers increaſing afterwards, being ſuccoured by the Griſons, after they had giuen many aſſaults in vaine, diuers regiments of them climing a great mountaine which commanded the wall, they compelled ſuch as kept the place to abandon it: and taking afterwards the borough of Locarne, but not the Caſtle, their ſtrength increaſed dayly, for that the other nine Cantons, notwithſtanding in the beginning they offered men to the King for the alliance they had with him, began afterwards to giue ſuccours to the other three Cantons, alledging that they durſt not faile to ſuccour their companions, being thereunto bound by the ancient leagues that were betweene them, which were to be preferred afore all the obligations they had with any other. And whileſt they had an armie of fifteene thouſand about the Caſtle, the French not being able to reſcue it for the ſtraightneſſe of the paſſages, and for the good guard that was made there, they ſpoiled the countrey thereabout: and being wrath becauſe the caſtle-keeper of Muſocquo (a place appertaining to Iohn Iaques Triuulce) refuſed to lend them artillery to batter the caſtle of Locarne, they ſacked the towne of Muſocquo, forbearing to vexe the caſtle for that it was inexpugnable. On the other ſide, the French men, whom this emotion did not a litle import, aſſembled all the ſtrength which they had in Lombardie, and hauing obtained ſuccours from Bolognia, from Ferrara, and from Mantua, required the Venetians to furniſh that proportion of men, which they were bound vnto for the defence of the ſtate of Millan, which they very readily promiſed, but there was vſed ſo great intermiſſion to ſend them, as they ſerued to no purpoſe. Monſieur de Chaumont who had well furniſhed the Caſtles that were in the mountaines, kept his regiment in the plaine, hoping that the Swiſſers, who hauing neither horſe nor artilleries, durſt not deſcend into places diſcouered, would in the end be annoyed with want of victuals, and for that they were without money, and had ſmall hope to do any thing that was of importance. In which eſtate the Swiſſers hauing remained many dayes, and the want of victuals increaſing, (for the French with their nauie had ſunke many barkes, which brought victuals to the Swiſſers, and reſtrained the courſe of any by the lake,) the ſouldiers began to nouriſh faction among themſelues, for that the enterpriſe appertained not but to the Cantons which poſſeſt Bellinzone, and the Captaines alſo being corrupted by the French moneys, they were content in the end to retire themſelues, reſtoring (except Muſocquo as not appertaining to the King) all the places which they had taken in that expedition, obtaining promiſe of the King not to moleſt them of Bellinzone vntill a certaine time. And the French were ſo farre eſtranged from any euill will to the Swiſſers, that they were not aſhamed, not onely in that time when they had warre with the King of Spaine, and that they feared the Emperour, and held the Venetians for ſuſpected, but alſo in all other ſeaſons, to buy the friendſhip of that nation, enduing them with yearly penſions both publike and priuate, and to make contracts with them vnder vnworthy conditions: being hereunto moued, both by the ſmall aſſurance they had in the footmen of their owne nation, and for that they knew that he makes warre to his great diſaduantage, that vexeth a people that hath nothing to loſe. The King deliuered thus from the warre of the Swiſſers, had no leſſe hope at the ſame ſeaſon to free himſelfe of the warres in the kingdome of Naples; for that after many practiſes of peace without any profite, Philip Archduke of Auſtrich and Prince of Flanders, minding to returne from Spaine into Flanders, determined to paſſe by land, notwithſtanding the contrary deſires of his father and mother in law, of whom he obtained free power and commiſſion to contract a peace with the French King, which he had ſolicited whileſt he was in Spaine: but he was accompanied with two Embaſſadours which they ſent on their part, with whom he was to communicate in all actions, and without whoſe counſell he would not treate or conclude any thing. It is incredible with what magnificence and honour he was receiued by the Kings appointment, through all the Realme of France, not onely for the deſire he had to make him fauourable in the practiſe of peace, but alſo to bring into perpetuall friendſhip that

yong Prince, who was to become mightie & great, being the next ſucceſſor to the Romane Empire, and to the kingdomes of Spaine, with all their dependances. All ſuch likewiſe as had grace or authoritie about him, were honored with the ſame liberalitie, and receiued preſents of great price. To which demonſtrations was anſwerable the magnanimitie and royall behauiour of Philip: for that as the French King, beſides his word and faith giuen for his ſure paſſage through France, had ſent into Flanders many of the Nobles of his Realme for the ſafetie of Philip: ſo Philip, as ſoone as he was entred France, to declare that he repoſed wholly in the Kings faith, gaue order that the hoſtages ſhould be deliuered. And theſe ſo great demonſtrations of amitie, were not accompanied (as much as was in them) with leſſe effects. For aſſembling at Bloys, after they had ſpent certaine daies in diſcourſe and diſputation of things, they concluded a peace in this ſort: That the kingdome of Naples ſhould be poſſeſſed according to the firſt diuiſion; but that there ſhould be left in deputation to Philip, the Prouinces for the which they firſt fell to difference and armes: and that from thenceforth, Charles his ſonne and Madame Claude the Kings daughter (betweene whom the motion of mariage which had bene afore ſolicited, was confirmed) ſhould be intituled Kings of Naples, and Dukes of Pouilla and Calabria: That that part which appertained to the King of Spaine, ſhould from thenceforward be gouerned by the Archduke; and the partition deſcending to the French King, to be ordered by the proper deputies of his Maieſtie: but that the one and the other part ſhould be holden vnder the name of the two children, to whom, at the time of the conſummation of mariage, the King ſhould giue his part for the dowrie of his daughter. This peace was ſolemnly publiſhed in the great Church of Bloys, and ratified by oathes of the King and of Philip, as agent to the King and Queene of Spaine his parents in law: a peace truly of great conſequence, if it had ſorted to effect. For, not onely armes had ſurceaſſed betweene ſo mightie Kings, but alſo peace would haue followed betweene the Emperour and the French King: which would haue bred new proiects againſt the Venetians; and the Pope, being of all men ſuſpected, and of whom the whole world had a very ill opinion, would not haue bene without feare of Councels and other actions which might bring diminution to his authoritie. But the King and the Archduke ſending with expedition to publiſh the peace in the Realme of Naples, with direction to the Captaines to forbeare to moleſt one another, attending the ratification of the Spaniſh King, and in the meane while their poſſeſſion of things to continue; the Generall for the French offered to obey his King, but the Spaniard (either for the hope he had of the victory, or for that he would not be contented with the onely authoritie of Philip) anſwered, that he could not diſcontinue the warre, vnleſſe he had receiued expreſſe commandement from his Kings: for the continuation whereof, he was ſo much the more encouraged, by how much the French King, gouerned by his hopes both in the practiſe and concluſion of peace, eſteeming for certaine that which was yet vncertaine, had not onely dallied in all other prouiſions of warre, but alſo had foreſlowed the leuying of three thouſand footmen which ſhould haue bene embarked at Genes, and three hundred Lances appointed to be led to that enterpriſe vnder Monſieur de Perſie: and of the contrary were arriued at Barletto the two thouſand Almain footmen, which being leuied with the fauor of the Emperour, and embarked at Trieſte, were paſſed in ſuretie by the gulfe of Venice, not without the great complaint of the French King. By reaſon whereof, the Duke of Nemours hauing no aſſurance of the surceaſſing of armes, and being made weake by the harmes he had receiued a litle before, (that he might be of ſufficient ſtrength, if either occaſion or neceſſitie compelled him to fight with his enemies) ſent for all the French bands that had bin diſperſed into diuers places, together with all the aides of the Barons of the Realme, except thoſe Lords and regiments which made warre vnder Monſieur d'Aubigny in Calabria: but in aſſembling them, he found Fortune contrary. For, the Duke of Atry, and Lewis d'Ars one of thoſe French Captaines which had their companies beſtowed vpon the lands of Otranto, determining to march together to ioyne with the Viceroy, for that they were aduertiſed that Peter of Nauarre with many Spaniſh footmen, was in place apt to diſtreſſe them if they went ſeparate: it hapned that Lewis d'Ars ſeeing an oportunitie to paſſe ſurely, departed, without being carefull of the danger of the Duke of Atry, who being left alone, marched alſo with his companies, being aduertiſed that Peter of Nauarre was gone to Matero to ioyne with Gonſaluo. But the counſels of men were not ſufficient to reſiſt Fortune; for that the men of Rutiliano (a towne in the countrey of Bary) who at the ſame time were reuolted againſt the French, calling vpon Peter of Nauarre, and he in that regard altering his way from from Matero towards Rutiliano, encountred the Duke of Atry, who being astonished with this accident, began to doubt what were fit for him to do: but in the end, seeing no suretie in retrait, and reposing much in this, that though he had lesse footmen, yet he was the stronger in horsemen, and supposing the Spanish footmen to be ouer-wearied by the trauell they had made that night, he vndertooke the battell, wherein euery one expressing his valour on both sides, his people at last were broken, his vnkle John Anthony being slaine, and himselfe taken prisoner. And as it seldome hapneth, that one ill fortune goeth without another, so foure French galleys vnder the gouerning of Preian of Prouence a Knight of the Rhodes, arriued in the hauen of Otrante vnder licence of the Venetian magistrate, who promised to defend them from the inuasions of the Spanish nauie, which vnder the Captaine Villemarino wafted in the creekes thereabouts. But after Preian was entred a litle further in the hauen, his forces litle, and his fortune farre inferior to his enemies, he began to feare to be enuironed; and therefore to preuent that his losse should not turne to the profite of his enemies, after he had deliuered the slaues and sunke his galleys, he saued himselfe and his people by land.

The ouerthrow of the Duke of Atry.

The French King gaue commandement to his Captains to stand onely vpon their guard, and not to seeke their enemies, assuring them that with speed they should either receiue the confirmation of the peace, or sufficient succours. But the armies being so mightie and so neare one to another, it was very hard to bridle the furie of the French men, or to bring them to this patience to draw the warre in length: but it was decreed in destinie, that without any more delay, all this businesse should now be decided, the beginning whereof hapned in Calabria. For after the Spaniards were ioyned in one strength at Seminaro, Monsieur d'Aubigny hauing assembled all his companies, & the power of the Barons that held the French part, he bestowed his footmen within the towne of Gioia three miles from Seminare, and sent his horsemen to Losarne three miles from Gioia: and fortifying himselfe with foure peeces of artillery vpon the shore of the riuer whereupon Gioia is seated, he stood prepared to oppose against his enemies if they should enterprise to passe the riuer. But the intention of the Spanish was other then he supposed, for the day they determined to passe, they caused their vantguard to march directly to the riuer, where Manuel de Benauide (who had the leading of them) being vpon the shore, began to parley with Monsieur d'Aubigny, who had led all his army to the opposite banke: and at the same instant, the reareguard of the Spanish being followed with the battell, tooke another way to passe the riuer a mile and an halfe aboue Gioia; which being discerned of Monsieur d'Aubigny, he went in great haste without artillery to affront them afore they had all passed. But afore his coming, they were all passed ouer, and ranged (albeit without artillery) in firme and set battell: and with that aduantage marched forth against the French men; who, by reason of their haste, either keeping no order at all, or at least by their small numbers, not able to resist so great a strength, were there broken before the vantguard of the Spanish could passe the riuer: in which conflict Ambricourt was made prisoner with certaine other French Captaines, and the Duke of Somme with many Barons of the kingdome: and albeit Monsieur d'Aubigny tooke the rocke of Angitole for his safetie, yet hauing no meanes to issue out, he was constrained to yeeld himselfe prisoner, being ouerthrowne and taken euen in the selfe same places where not many yeares before he had with great glory ouercome King Ferdinand and Gonsaluo; so inconstant are the prosperities of fortune. In this conflict nothing was more hurtfull to Monsieur d'Aubigny (who was one of the most excellent Captaines that King Charles had brought into Italy, and of a free and noble spirit) then his owne too forward inclination, which carried him too farre into hope of the victory: a matter which likewise was very hurtfull to the Viceroy in Powilla, who haply was the more transported by the report of the accident hapned in Calabria. For Gonsaluo not hearing of the victory of his people, and not able by the importunitie of hunger and plague to remaine longer in Barletto, marched out of it, leauing there a very weake garrison, and tooke his way to Cirignole, a towne ten miles from thence, and almost in a triangle betweene Canosa (where the Viceroy was) and Barletto. The Viceroy had before debated with his Captaines, whether were better to follow or flie the occasion of battell: and many of his Captaines were of opinion, that (in regard the Spaniards were increased in numbers, and his bands fallen into great weakenesse and disorders, hapned first at Rubos and at Castellanet, and then in the countrey of Otrante, and lastly in Calabria) it was against policie to commit any thing to hazard, but to retire into Melfe or some other strong towne well prouided of things necessary, there to expect either a new succour out of France, or elſe the confirmation of the peace: a maner of temporiſing, which he was alſo bound to vſe by commandement, which he had newly receiued from the King. But there were many of the contrary opinion, to whom it ſeemed a thing dangerous, to tarry till the armie already victorious ouer Calabria, ſhould ioyne with Gonſaluo, or elſe to ſeeke to execute any enterpriſe of importance where there would be found no man to reſiſt him. They ſhewed what profite there came by the armie of Monſieur Montpenſier, chuſing rather to retire into townes then to fight: and that the examples of times paſt, admoniſhed them what hope they might haue of the long and vncertaine ſuccours of France. And (things being doubtfull) if neither Gonſaluo would conſent to giue ouer the war, nor the King of Spaine accept of the peace, it muſt needs be that now they had great hope of the victory: That their army was nothing inferiour either in force or vertue to the army of the enemie: and that the diſorders that had hapned by negligence, ought not to be compared to the experience which would be ſhewed in plaine field, with weapons and valours of men, and not with ſleights or ſubtilties: That it was a more ſure and honorable way, at the leaſt being equall, with hope to make triall of fortune, then eſchuing the battell, and conſuming by degrees, to giue the enemy the victory without blood and without danger: That touching the late meſſage of the King, it was to be conſtrued rather as an aduertiſement, then as a commandement, which if Monſieur d'Aubigny had followed, he had done well: but now the ſtate of the warre being changed by ſuch a diſorder, it was neceſſary likewiſe that the deliberations ſhould alter. This laſt opinion preuailed, and therefore hauing aduertiſement by their eſpials, that the Spaniſh bands either all or part were iſſued out of Barletto, Monſieur de Nemours in like ſort tooke his way towards Cirignole, a way very inconuenient both for the one and other army, for that the countrey was barren of freſh waters, and the ſeaſon more hote then it was wont to be in the beginning of May. It is reported, that in that day there died many ſouldiers of drought by the wayes, both of the one and the other army; and the French knew not whether the whole or part of the Spaniſh army were in the field, for that both Fabritius Colonne with his light horſemen, tooke away the certaine knowledge, and the Lances of the men at armes holden vpright, and the ſtalkes of fennels growing high in that countrey, dimmed their ſight that they could not well diſcerne. The Spaniards were the firſt that arriued at Cirignole which the French men kept, and lodging among certaine vines, they enlarged (by the aduice of Proſper Colonne) a ditch or trench which was at the entry of their campe. Whileſt they were dreſſing their lodgings or campe, the French came vpon them, and night drawing on, they ſtood doubtfull whether they ſhould ſo ſuddenly ioyne battell, or deferre it till the day following. Iues d'Alegre and the Prince of Melfe, perſwaded to put it off till the next day, in which time they hoped the Spaniards would be conſtrained by neceſſitie of victuals to remoue their campe: and they were of this opinion, as well for that the night approched, as in conſideration of the diſaduantage to ſet vpon them in their lodgings, ſpecially being ignorant of the diſpoſition thereof. But Monſieur de Nemours by his raſh inclination deſpiſing the ſafe counſell of others, the Spaniards were charged with great fury, as well by the French as by the Swiſſers: and the fire hauing taken the powder of the Spaniards, either by chance or by other meanes, Gonſaluo making vſe of that accident, cried with a reſolute courage, The victory is ours, God declares it by manifeſt tokens, giuing vs to vnderſtand, that we haue now no more need of the ſeruice of artillery. There be ſundry opinions of this battell: the French publiſh, that in the firſt encounter they brake the Spaniſh footmen, and coming to the artillery, they had won it, and ſet the powder on fire; but the night coming on, their men at armes, by negligence and misknowledge, had charged their owne footmen, by which diſorder the Spaniards tooke heart. But others ſay, that for the difficultie to paſſe the ditch, the French men beginning to intangle themſelues, fell to flying, no leſſe by their proper diſorder, then by the vertue of their enemies, being moſt of all amazed for the death of Monſieur de Nemours, who entring with the firſt into the fury of the fight, as he was encouraging his men to win the trench, was ſtriken dead with a bullet. There be others, who diſcourſing more particularly, ſay, that Monſieur de Nemours deſpairing to be able to paſſe the ditch, and labouring to turne his ſtrength towards the flanke of the campe, to aduenture to enter on that ſide, cried that they ſhould giue backe; which voice, to thoſe that knew not the occaſion, gaue a ſigne to flie, which ioyned to the chance of his death in the firſt ſquadron, hapning alſo at the ſame time, cauſed all the army to turne to manifeſt flight. thers, and do lay the blame vpon Iues d' Alegre, who, although the Viceroy had no intention to fight that day, reprehending him of fearfulneſſe, induced him to do the contrary. The battell was of very ſmall continuance, and albeit the Spaniſh paſſing ouer the ditch followed the chaſe of their enemies, yet by reaſon it was now darke night, there were very few that were either taken or ſlaine, ſpecially of the horſemen, of whom Monſieur Chandieu was one. The reſidue with loſſe of their cariage and artillery, ſaued themſelues by flying: the Captaines and ſouldiers being diſperſed into many ſeparate places. Men ſay, that Gonſaluo when he ſaw not Proſper Colonne after the French were put to flight, enquired diligently for him, doubting leſt he had bene ſlaine in the battell; and that Fabricio to taxe him of cowardize, anſwered him merily, that it was not to be doubted that Proſper ſhould fall into any danger. This victory was gotten the eight day after the ouerthrow of Monſieur d' Aubigny, and both vpon Friday, a day which the Spaniards haue obſerued to be happie vnto them. The French, after the chaſe, being reaſſembled againe, debated of many deuices: Sometimes they thought beſt to ioyne with the reſidue of the armie in ſome place conuenient, to take from the victors all meanes to go to Naples; and eſtſoones they iudged it moſt conuenient for their ſafetie, to ſticke to the defence of Naples: and yet (as to men in aduerſitie feares grow dayly greater, and difficulties to the vanquiſhed) none of theſe deuices were put in execution: for that they had no great meanes to be able to ſtay elſewhere, neither was there poſſibilitie to defend Naples for the ſcarſitie of victuals: for the prouiſion and furniſhing whereof, the French had ſent afore to Rome to buy a great quantitie of corne, which they could not tranſport, either for the impediments of the people ſeeking to haue their towne ſtand in good prouiſion, or rather by the ſecret perſwaſion of the Pope, which was not the leaſt credible. Therefore Monſieur d' Alegre, the Prince of Salerne, and many other Barons, retired between Caietta and Tracetto, where they reaſſembled vnder their names, the moſt part of the reſidue of the armie: but Gonſaluo after he had obtained ſo faire a victory, following his good fortune, tooke his way with the armie towards the towne of Naples, and as he paſſed by Melfe, he made offer to the Prince to leaue him poſſeſſed of his whole eſtate, ſo that he would remaine at the deuotion of the Spaniards: but he rather chuſing to go his way with his wife and children, went to ioyne with Lewis d' Ars lying at Venouſa; by whoſe departure Gonſaluo taking Melfe, followed his way directly to Naples, at whoſe coming thoſe garriſons of the French which were in the towne, retired into the new Caſtle, and the Neapolitans thus abandoned, receiued Gonſaluo the fourteenth day of May, Capua and Auerſa doing the like at the ſame time.

The Argvment.

THe French King maketh his preparation to paſſe into Italy. The death of Pope Alexander the ſixt. Valentinois reconcileth himſelfe with the Colonnois. Francis Piccolomini Cardinall of Sienna is choſen Pope, and named Pius the third: he dieth within ſixe and twentie dayes. Iulius the ſecond is created Pope. The Duke Valentinois is apprehended priſoner. The Frenchmen are ouerthrowne at Garillon. The Florentines faile to take the citie of Piſe: Peace is eſtabliſhed betweene the French King and the King of Spaine.

WHen the French King heard the newes of ſo great a loſſe, in a time wherein he had more expectation of peace then of warre, he was much moued for the loſſe of ſo noble a Realme, for the ruine of his armies, compounded of ſo great Nobility and ſo many valiant perſonages, for the perill wherein ſtood all the reſidue of that which he held in Italy; and no leſſe for that he eſteemed it a great diſhonor to be vanquiſhed by the Kings of Spaine, whoſe power was indeed inferiour to his; and fretting that he was beguiled with an hope and promiſe of peace, he determined with all his forces to ſeeke the meanes to recouer the honor and the kingdome he had loſt, and with armes to reuenge ſo great a wrong. But afore he entred into action, he complained grieuouſly to the Archduke, who was not yet departed from Bloys, requiring him to redreſſe the abuſe, as he ought, if he had any deſire to preſerue his faith and honour. By reaſon whereof, the Archduke (who was altogether innocent) ſolicited inſtantly his parents in law to redreſſe the abuſe, complaining vehemently that things were ſo handled, to his great ſlander, and that in the ſight and knowledge of all the world. But the Kings of Spaine, with many excuſes deferred to ſend the ratification of peace afore the victory, alledging ſometimes, that they were not both together in one place, as was neceſſary, hauing a cuſtome to make their diſpatches ioyntly; and ſometimes that they were much buſied with other affaires: as being diſcontent with the peace, either for that their ſonne in law had exceeded their commiſſions, or for that after he was departed out of Spaine, they were entred into a better hope of the ſucceſſe of the warre, or elſe for that it ſeemed ſtrange to them that he had appropriated to himſelfe their part of the Realme, hauing no aſſurance (in regard of the minoritie of the children) that the mariage of his ſonne ſhould take effect; and yet not refuſing, but alwayes giuing hopes to ratifie it, and deferring, they won as much time as they could, to the end to take aduice according to the euent of things. But when they vnderſtood that their armie remained victorious, albeit they were reſolued to make ſmall reckoning of the peace that was made, yet did they deferre to declare their intention to the Archduke, to the end that keeping by that meanes the French King in ſuſpence, he might be ſo much the longer in making new prouiſions for the reſcuing of Caietta and the other places which yet remained: but at length being conſtrained by the importunities of their ſonne in law (who had determined that otherwiſe he would not depart from Bloys) they ſent thither new Embaſſadours, by whom was declared, after diſputation of certaine dayes, that it was not the intention of their Kings to ratifie that peace, which had bin made in ſuch ſort, as was neither honorable nor ſure for them: and beſides, entring into controuerſie with the Archduke, they told him, that their Kings maruelled much that in the conditions of the peace, he had tranſgreſſed their will; for albeit in regard of his honor, his commiſſion was free and very large, yet he ought to haue had regard to the inſtructions that were giuen him, which were limited. The Archduke anſwered, that his inſtructions were no leſſe free then his commiſſion; and that at his departure, his parents in law aſſured him that they deſired the peace by his endeuour, and that they had ſworne to him vpon the holy Goſpell and image of Ieſus Chriſt crucified, to obſerue whatſoeuer he ſhould determine: and yet for his owne part, he would not vſe ſo ample and large authoritie, but with the counſell and aduice of the two perſonages which they had ſent with him. Then theſe new Embaſſadours working all by art, propounded new meanes of accord, giuing to vnderſtand that their Kings had a deſire to render the Realme to King Federike. But thoſe deuices being diſcerned not onely to be vaine, but alſo full of deceit, for that they tended to eſtrange from the French King the mind of the Archduke, who looked to haue that kingdome for his ſonne; the King in publike audience anſwered them, that he would in no ſort treate with them, if they did not firſt ratifie the peace that was made, & declare that the diſorders hapned ſince did much diſcontent them; adding withall, that it ſeemed to him a matter not onely maruellous, but alſo deteſtable and abhominable, that thoſe Kings who gloried ſo much to haue gotten the title of Catholickes, made ſo litle reckoning of their proper honour, their faith giuen, their oath ſworne, and of religion, bearing no reſpect to the Archduke, a Prince ſo great, ſo noble, ſo vertuous, and their ſonne and heire. With this anſwer, commanding them the ſame day to depart his Court, he turned immediatly all his wits to the preparations of the warre, determining to aduance farre greater prouiſions both by land and ſea, then had bene done in any time afore by any of the Kings of France. In ſo much as he determined to ſend two mightie armies to the Realme of Naples, the one by ſea, and the other by land: and to the end that in the meane while Caietta and the Caſtles of Naples ſhould not be loſt, he prepared to ſuccour them with diligence by ſea, as well with new ſupplies of men of warre, as with all other neceſſary things: and to giue impediment that there went no ſuccours out of Spaine, (which had bin the cauſe of all the diſorders) he reſolued to inuade the kingdome of Spaine with two armies by land, addreſſing one to the countrey of Roſſillion which adioyneth to the Mediterrane ſea, and the other to Fontaraby, and the other places adioyning vpon the Ocean ſea; and at the ſame time to aſſaile with an army by ſea the coaſts of Catelognia and Valentia. But whiles the French were very diligent in preparing theſe expeditions, Gonſaluo deuiſing how he might haue the Caſtles of Naples, planted his artillery againſt New Caſtle at the foote of the hill Saint Martin; and from a place ſomewhat raiſed, he beat the wall of the Citadell, whoſe ſituation being towards the ſaid mountaine, was encloſed with ancient walls, their foundations being almoſt aboue the earth. And at the ſame time Peter of Nauarre caſt a mine to ouerthrow the walls of the Citadell, battering alſo the new Caſtle walls, and the Tower of Saint Vincent which Gonſaluo had won a few dayes before. New Caſtle was then of another faſhion then it is at this day; for that now the Citadell being taken away, there beginneth a new circuite of walls where were the walls of the ſame, which ſtretcheth along the place of the Caſtle vntill the ſea: and this circuite begun by Federike, and by him raiſed euen to the cooping, being built with a ſtrong wall and well founded, is very hard to be vndermined, for that there are countermines on all ſides, and for that the water runneth there almoſt cloſe to the foundation. Gonſaluo had a determination, that as ſoone as he had taken the Citadell, coming neare to the vault of the Caſtle wall, he would deſtroy it with new mines; but either by the raſhneſſe or ill fortune of the French men, a greater occaſion was offered to him. For, after Peter of Nauarre had put fire to the mine which he had perfected, the fury of the powder blew open the wall of the Citadell; and at the ſame inſtant the Spaniſh bands of footmen ſtanding ready ranged in battell expecting the operation of the fire-worke, made entries on many ſides, ſome where the wall was broken, and others by the helpe of ſcaling ladders, in ſundry other places. And on the other ſide, the French iſſuing out of the Caſtle, with intention not to ſuffer them to remaine within the Citadell, charged them, but being quickely ſurmounted by the Spaniſh, as they retired towards the rampier, the Spaniards entred pelmell with them; and running with the ſame fortune euen vp to the way that goeth to the gate, (where was not yet the great new Tower which Gonſaluo built afterward) they ſo increaſed the feare of the French men already appalled, that in leſſe then halfe an houre, being quite diſcouraged, they rendred the Caſtle, with their goods (whereof there was found a great quantitie which men had brought thither) and liues to diſcretion, the Count of Montoire remaining priſoner with many other Lords. This conqueſt was ſo much the more to the purpoſe, for that there arriued from Genes the day following

The fortification of the Caſtle of Naples.

The new caſtle of Naples aſſaulted.

for their ſuccours, an army by ſea of ſixe great ſhips, with many ſmaller veſſels fraughted with victuals, weapons and munitions, and with two thouſand footmen: at whoſe approch the Spaniſh nauie riding then in the port of Naples, retired into Iſchia, whither the French nauie purſued them, vnderſtanding that New Caſtle was loſt: but the Spaniſh nauie hauing ſunke before them certaine barkes, to the end they might not be compelled to fight, after they had beſtowed certaine vollies of ſhot one againſt another, the one went to Caietta, and the other being reaſſured by the departure of the enemy, retired to the Mole of Naples. After the taking of New Caſtle, Gonſaluo fell to deuiſe by what meanes he might haue the reſidue of the Realme, and therefore without tarrying for the army that was in Calabria (which lay there to conquer the vale of Ariana, to take away all impediments to paſſe further) he ſent Proſper Colonne into Abruzze: and leauing Peter of Nauarre afore the Egge Caſtle, he marched with the reſidue of the army towards Caietta, in the taking whereof conſiſted the ſumme of the warre, for that both the hopes and deſpaires of the French men depended wholly vpon the defence or loſſe of that Citie, which was ſtrong by the oportunitie of the ſea, and by the conueniencie and greatneſſe of his port, very fit to receiue the armies that ſhould be ſent from Genes and from Prouence. And the French held not onely Caietta, but alſo, beſides the places thereabouts which were in their power, they commanded in Abruzze, Aquila, the rocke of Euandra, with many other places: and the Lord Lewis d' Ars hauing aſſembled many troupes of horſemen and footmen, and being fortified with the Prince of Melfe within Venouſa, did great harmes to the countrey thereabout: and Roſſano, Matalona, with many other ſtrong peeces appertaining to the Barons of the faction of Anion, held out conſtantly at the deuotion of the French King. In this meane while Peter of Nauarre made certaine cloſe or couered Barks, with the which approching in more ſuretie the walls of the Egge Caſtle, he caſt a mine on that ſide which proſpects Pizifalcona, without the knowledge of them within, and as ſoone as he had put fire thereto, he blew into the aire in great fury one part of the wall, together with the bodies of the men that ſtood vpon it: with which accident the reſt being amazed, the Caſtle was immediatly taken, with ſo great reputation of Peter of Nauarre, and generall wonder of all men, that (as new inuentions to reuerſe a ſtrong place are moſt fearfull, hauing as yet no deuice to encounter them) it was beleeued that neither walls nor fortreſſes could make any reſiſtance againſt his mines. And ſure it was a thing of great horror to relate, that with the force of gun-powder put into a caue, or to ſpeake more properly, in the mine, men ſhould throw downe to the earth the greateſt and ſtrongeſt walls. The firſt that vſed this maner of taking townes in Italy, were the Genowayes, amongſt whom, according to the teſtimonie of ſome, Peter of Nauarre exerciſed the art of warre in the perſon of a meane ſouldier, when in the yeare 1487. they lay incamped afore the rocke of Serezanella, holden then by the Florentines, where, with a mine caſt in this maner, they opened a part of the wall, miſſing notwithſtanding the taking of the rocke, for that the mine had not pierced ſo deepe vnder the rocke as was needfull, the ſame being the cauſe that at that time the example of ſuch an experience was not followed. But Gonſaluo drawing neare to Caietta, Monſieur d' Alegre who had diſtributed foure hundred Lances and foure thouſand footmen, and thoſe which remained of the battell betweene Caietta, Fondi, Itrio, Tracetta, and the rocke Guillaume, retired them all within Caietta, wherein entred with him the Princes of Salerne and Biſignian, the Duke of Traetto, with many other Barons of the Realme ioyned afore with him. After the retraite of theſe companies, Gonſaluo entred vpon all thoſe places, and alſo vpon the rocke of S. Germain, encamping afterwards in the ſuburbes of Caietta: and after he had planted his artillery, he battered with an incredible fury that ſide towards the hauen, and the mountaine commonly called Mont Roland, a hill conioyned, which hath command ouer the Citie, and which the French men had then fortified with rampiers and baſtillions of earth, (being afterwards by him incloſed with a wall) and hauing aſſayed in vaine with two aſſaults not marſhalled, to enter it, he forbare at laſt, to giue the aſſault generall and marſhalled, the day which he had determined to giue it, ſuppoſing it would be hard to get, as well for the number and valour of thoſe within, as alſo that when his army ſhould enter by force into the mountaine, he ſhould be brought into great perill, being expoſed to the ſhot of the artillery planted in the Monaſtery and other high places vpon the mountaine. He forbare not for all this to play with his artillery, and to moleſt the towne, which likewiſe was enuironed and beſieged on that ſide to the ſea, for there lay afore the hauen the eighteene Spaniſh galleys which Don Raimond de Cardona gouerned. But a few dayes

after there arriued a nauie of ſixe great Carricks Geneways, ſixe other ſhips, and ſeuen galleys, with good ſuccours of victuals and footmen, vnder the conduct of the Marquis of Saluzzo, whom becauſe of the death of Monſieur de Nemours, the King had ſent thither for their new Viceroy. For the King deſired greatly to keepe Caietta, and therefore he ſent thither within few dayes one after another, part vpon theſe veſſels and part vpon others, a thouſand footmen of Corſegus, and three thouſand Gaſcoins: in ſo much as by the coming of this new nauie, the Spaniſh Fleete was conſtrained to retire to Naples, and Gonſaluo deſpairing to do any more good there, retired his regiments within the Mole of Caietta, and into Caſtellona, whereby he kept Caietta beſieged with a ſiege (as it were) more large, after he had loſt many of his people, ſome by skirmiſhing, and ſome in retiring; amongſt whom Dom Hugues de Cardona was ſlaine by a ſhot from the towne. But at the ſame time, all his other affaires of the kingdome trained a ſucceſſe more happie, for that Proſper Colonne had newly taken the rocke of Euandro and Aquilea, and reduced all the other peeces of Abruzze to the Spaniſh deuotion, almoſt all Calabria yeelding the like obedience, by the contract which the Count Capaccio had laſtly made with them: and there remained no other place but Roſſano, and S. Seuerin where the Prince of Roſſano was beſieged.

At this time the other regions of Italy were not altogether voide of ſuſpitions and troubles: for that the Florentines afore the fortune of the French began to decline in the kingdome of Naples, fearing the forces and the ambuſcadoes of the Pope and the Duke Valentinois, beſides other prouiſions of warre, had entertained into their pay for the leading of their armie (but without any title) the Bailiffe of Caen with fiftie French Lances (a Captaine well recommended for the ſeruice of warre) for the opinion they had, that for as much as he was the Kings ſubiect, and had brought his charge of fiftie Lances by the Kings conſent, thoſe of whom they earſt doubted, would now be better aduiſed what they did, and that the King would alſo be more ready to aide them in all neceſſities. As ſoone as he was come to their army, hauing aſſembled all their troupes, for the ſecond time they cut the corne of the Piſans, but not through the whole countrey, for that to enter the vale of Sercle was not without danger, hauing his ſituation betweene the mountaines and the waters, and in the midway betweene Lucques and Piſa. Immediatly after they had made this ſpoile, the campe marched to Vicopiſan, which was taken without difficultie, for that the Bailiffe of Caen threatning an hundred French footmen that were within, to puniſh them as enemies to the King, and promiſing them a moneths pay, brought ſo to paſſe that they iſſued out of the towne, by which occaſion the people of Vicopiſan were conſtrained to yeeld to diſcretion. Vicopiſan being taken, Verrucola wherein was but a ſlender guard, was forthwith enuironed, to the end no ſuccours ſhould enter into it: and the artillery being afterwards trailed thither, not without great difficulties, for that the mountaines thereabouts offered many impediments, thoſe that were within, fearing the thunder of the Cannon, yeelded, their goods and liues ſaued. The ſituation of Verrucola, being a litle fortreſſe, raiſed vpon a high mountaine during the warres in the countrey of Piſa, is of great importance: for that being within fiue miles of Piſa, it is not onely very fit to diſtreſſe the countrey thereabout, yea euen to the gates of that citie, but alſo to diſcouer all the bands and troupes that come out of Piſa, whether they be on foote or horſemen. Paul Vitelli and many other Captaines had in vaine made many trials to carry it in that warre: but the confidence that the Piſans had that Vicopiſan would be defended, without taking the which, the Florentines could not encampe before Verrucola, was the cauſe that they had not made ſufficient prouiſion. The loſſe of Verrucola did much amaze the Piſans, and yet notwithſtanding they had receiued ſo great harmes, and had very few forrein ſouldiers, with want of money and ſcarcitie of victuals, they could not be brought to returne to the obedience of the Florentines, being principally moued by deſpaire to obtaine pardon for the memory of the great wrongs they had done them. Which diſpoſition it was needfull, that ſuch as in the gouernment bare greateſt authoritie, ſhould entertaine with ſpeciall diligence, for that thoſe of the plaine countrey (without whom they were not able to continue defence) loſt their harueſt fore againſt their will. And therefore to nouriſh them with diuers hopes, together with the reſt of the common people, that liued by trades more fit for peace then for warre, they ſhewed vnto them fained letters, and beguiling them with diuers inuentions, confounding things falſe with thoſe that were true; and if any accident hapned in Italy, making it ſerue for their purpoſe, and telling the people that ſometimes one Prince, ſometimes another, was ready to come to ſuccour them. And in all theſe extremities they were not without ſome aide and ſuccours of the Genoways and Lucquoys, ancient enemies of the Florentines, and likewiſe of Pandolfe Petrucci, litle remembring the benefites receiued. But (which was of greateſt importance) they were alſo nouriſhed in ſecret with certaine ſuccours, but with farre greater hopes, by the Duke Valentinois, who had long deſired to make himſelfe Lord of that citie, which was offered to him by the Piſans themſelues; but hauing abſtained for feare of the Kings diſpleaſure, now preſuming much by the infelicitie of the French in the Realme of Naples, by the conſent of his father, he treated with the Piſan Embaſſadours, whom they had ſent to Rome for that purpoſe, to accept the iuriſdiction, aſpiring by that meanes to occupie all Tuſcane: a deuice, which though it brought the Florentines and Siennoys into no ſmall ſuſpition of him, yet the vniuerſall benefite being hindered by their particularities, there was no proceeding to that vnitie which the French King propounded betweene the Florentines, the Bolonnois, and the Siennois, for that they of Florence refuſed to accept it if they were not repoſſeſſed of Montpulcian, as had bene ſolicited and promiſed from the beginning: and Pandolfe Petrucci who bare a mind eſtranged from it (albeit he made other ſhew) alledged that to reſtore it, would ſo ſtirre vp the hate of the people of Sienna againſt him, that he ſhould be conſtrained yet once againe to forſake the towne; and therefore he ſaid it was better (for the common benefite) to deferre it a litle, till time brought about a better occaſion, then by reſtoring it preſently to giue the Duke Valentinois meanes to win Sienna. By theſe meanes, denying nothing, but keeping things in longneſſe, he endeuoured to bring the Florentines contented with hopes in ſtead of effects. Theſe excuſes by them reiected, were accepted and beleeued in the Court of France, by the meanes of Francis de Narny, reſident at Siena by the Kings commandement. But it was not the intention of the Pope and Valentinois to put theſe enterpriſes to execution, otherwiſe then the proceeding of the army which the French King prepared, gaue them courage, and as they ſhould determine to ſticke more to the one King then to the other: vpon which matter, at that time they were ſtayed with diuers thoughts, deferring as much as they could the declaration of their intention, which bare no inclination to the French King further then there was feare to conſtraine them; for that the expeperience of things paſſed in Bologna and Tuſcan, tooke away all hope to obtaine greater matters by his fauour: and for that reaſon, as they had begun afore the victory of the Spaniards to become more and more ſeparate from him in will; ſo after the victory, becoming moſt audacious, they reſpected no more as they were wont to do, either his will or his authoritie. And albeit immediatly after the ouerthrowes of the French, they gaue aſſurance to embrace the Kings quarels, making demonſtration to entertaine men to ſend to the Realme of Naples; yet, prouoked by the ambition of new conqueſts, and not being able to withhold their eyes, nor detaine their thoughts from Tuſcan, the King requiring them to declare themſelues openly for him, the Pope anſwered doubtfully, that both he and his ſonne became dayly more and more ſuſpected: of whom their ſimulation and diſſimulation was ſo notable, that it was a prouerbe ordinary in Rome, that the Pope neuer did that which he ſaid, and the Duke neuer ſpake that which he meant. Beſides, the contention wherein they were with John Iordan was not yet determined: for, albeit Valentinois fearing the Kings diſpleaſure, abſtained to moleſt him vpon his Maieſties commandement, yet the Pope declaring how much that grieued him, ceaſſed not to ſolicite the King, either to ſuffer him by armes to reconquer the eſtates of John Iordan, or elſe to compell him to take recompence for them: giuing to vnderſtand, that that which moued him was not ambition, but a iuſt feare of his neighbourhood, proceeding vpon this ſuſpition; that finding amongſt the papers of Cardinall Vrſin a blanke ſigned with the proper hand of John Iordan, it was an argument, that in thoſe things which were negociated at Maiſon, he had one ſelfe will and intelligence againſt him with the other Vrſins. In which thing the King more regarding profite then honeſtie, had proceeded diuerſly, according to the diuerſitie of times, ſometimes expreſſing fauour to John Iordan as before, and ſometimes inclining to ſatiſfie the Pope in ſome degree. And for that cauſe John Iordan refuſing to depoſe Bracciano into the hands of the French Embaſſadour reſident at Rome, the King required that they ſhould referre to him the reſolution of the difference, vnder condition that John Iordan ſhould be conueyed into France within two moneths, and that things ſhould remaine in that eſtate, vntill he had determined: whereunto John Iordan conſented by neceſſitie, for the hope which he had that by the merites of his father and himſelfe, he ſhould be fully deliuered from ſuch vexations: and the Pope, more for feare then otherwiſe, for that the French King required ſuch a matter at the time when the Archduke contracted the peace in the name of the Kings of Spaine. But the condition of things being changed by the victory of the Spaniards, and ſeeing that the French King had need of him, he demanded all the ſtates of Iohn Iordan, offering ſuch recompence as ſhould be declared by the King, who for the ſame occaſion induced Iohn Iordan to conſent thereunto, and to promiſe to deliuer in his ſonne for the aſſurance of that which ſhould be determined: a matter which the King did greatly againſt his will, for that he had no intention to deliuer vp thoſe eſtates to the Pope, if at the ſame inſtant he ioyned not with him openly in the warre of Naples. But the men of Petillano, where the ſonne of Iohn Iordan was, refuſing to deliuer him to the Kings Embaſſadour, who was at Port Hercules to receiue him, Iohn Iordan himſelfe being then returned, went to the Embaſſadour, and to fulfill the promiſe of his faith, offered him his proper perſon, which the Embaſſadour vnwiſely accepted, and beſtowed him in a ſhip: but as ſoone as the King knew it, he cauſed him to be ſet at libertie. In this meane while, there was vſed great diligence to leuie the preparation which the French King meant to employ both on this ſide and beyond the mounts. For the Lord d'Albret and the Marſhall of Gié were gone into Guien with foure hundred Lances, and fiue hundred footmen, as well Swiſſers as Gaſcoins, to make warre on the part of Fontarabie: and to ſtirre vp the Countie of Roſſillon, the Marſhall of Rieux was ſent into Languedoc with eight hundred Lances and eight thouſand footmen, part Swiſſers and part French. And at the ſame time the nauie by ſea hoiſſed ſaile to endommage the coaſts of Catelogna & the realme of Valence. Beſides, the King had diſpatched for Italy with title of Captaine generall ouer his armie, the Lord Trimouille (to whom at that time was transferred by vniuerſall opinion, the chiefe reputation for matters of warre within the realme of France) and ſent the Bailiffe of Dion to diſpatch away eight thouſand Swiſſers: and the men at armes and the footmen made haſte to march, although the armie was not ſo ſtrong as was determined in the beginning. And the King would haue it ſo; not for diſabilitie, or that he meant to ſpare, but for that he deſired (as was thought moſt fit) that they might make the more expedition into the kingdome of Naples; and partly becauſe Monſieur d'Alegre aduertiſing the King of the ſtate of the affaires there, aſſured him that the remainder of the armie was ſtronger then it was indeed, both for that the townes and Barons remained firme in his deuotion, and alſo for that he had demanded ſuccours of all thoſe in Italy which fauoured his faction: by meanes whereof the Florentines had granted him the Bailiffe of Caen with the fiftie Lances payed of their owne money, and an hundred and fiftie other men at armes: and the Duke of Ferrara, the Bolonnois, and the Marquis of Mantua (who for that the King ſent to him, went thither in perſon) did furniſh him euery one in particular with an hundred men at armes, and they of Sienna with another hundred: which bands ioyned to the eight hundred Lances and fiue thouſand Gaſcoins which Trimouille brought into Italy, and to the eight thouſand Swiſſers which were expected, reckoning alſo thoſe that remained within Caietta, made vp the number of eighteene hundred Lances French and Italian, and more then eighteene thouſand footmen. Beſides theſe preparations for the warre by land, the armie by ſea was departed, a Nauie very puiſſant, in ſo much as all men confeſſed, that there was no memory that any French King had euer made ſo huge and mightie preparations (counting the forces prepared both by ſea and by land, and as well on this ſide as beyond the mounts.) But it was not thought ſafe for the Kings ſuretie, to paſſe his armie by Rome, if firſt his Maieſtie were not well aſſured of the Pope and the Duke Valentinois, for that he had iuſt occaſion to doubt of them for many reaſons, but ſpecially by reaſon of certaine letters from Valentinois to Gonſaluo ſurpriſed long before, wherein was declared that they had agreed betweene them, that if Gonſaluo tooke Caietta (in which caſe he ſhould ſtand well aſſured of the kingdome) he ſhould paſſe further with his armie, and Valentinois ſhould take vpon him the iuriſdiction of Piſa, and that Gonſaluo and he ſhould ioyne in one ſtrength to aſſaile Tuſcan: and therefore the King (his armie being already paſſed into Lombardy) was very importunate that they ſhould at laſt declare their vttermoſt intention. But they, albeit they liſtened to both parts, yet iudging that the time was fit to make vſe of the trauels of others, had moſt deſire to ioyne with the Spaniſh: but they were reſtrained with the conſideration of the manifeſt danger, leſt the French armie ſhould begin to inuade their eſtates, in which caſe they ſhould ſuſtaine loſſe and trouble, where they hoped to obtaine remuneration and greatneſſe: and in this eſtate of doubt, they ſuffered both parties openly to leuie bands of footmen within Rome, deferring as much as they could could to declare themſelues. But being at laſt much vrged by the King, they offered that the Duke Valentinois ſhould ioyne to his armie with fiue hundred men at armes and two thouſand footmen, the King conſenting vnto him not onely the enioying of the lands of Iohn Iordan, but alſo the conquering of Sienna: and yet when they were vpon the point of concluſion, they varied, introducing new difficulties, as men, who (according to their cuſtome) to be at libertie to take counſell of the euent of things, had no deſire to declare themſelues according to good meaning. Therefore there was propounded another practiſe, by the which the Pope determining not to declare for any of the parties, but to remaine in the perſon of a common father, conſented to giue paſſage to the French armie through the dominions of the Church, with promiſe to moleſt neither the Florentines, the Siennois, nor the Bolonnoys, during the warres in the realme of Naples. Which conditions were at length accepted by the King, to the end to giue expedition of paſſage to his army to Naples, albeit he knew they were neither honorable for himſelfe, nor ſure for ſuch as depended on him in Italy, ſeeing he had no aſſurance that the Pope and Valentinois would not declare againſt him, if any misfortune hapned to him in the Realme: beſides there was this danger, leſt as ſoone as his armie was out of the territories of Rome, they ſhould riſe, contrary to their faith, to aſſaile Tuſcan, which for the diſagreement of the people, and the numbers of men which he had drained out of it, was become weake and almoſt diſarmed; being a thing not vnlikely, that they would either ſet vpon that enterpriſe or ſome other, ſeeing they had determined by meanes of ſuch occaſions to bring their purpoſes to effect.

But when they were in the height of their hopes, (as the thoughts of men are vaine and deceitfull) the Pope going to ſupper in a vineyard neare the Vatican, to take the pleaſure of the freſh aire, was ſuddenly carried from thence for dead to the Pallace; and preſently after his ſon was alſo carried thence for dead: and the day following, which was the eighteenth day of Auguſt, the dead corps of the Pope (according to the cuſtome) was borne into the Church of S. Peter, blacke, ſwolne, and moſt deformed, moſt manifeſt ſignes of poiſon: but Valentinois, what by the vigor of his youth, and ready helpe of ſtrong medicines and counterpoiſons, had his life ſaued, remaining notwithſtanding oppreſſed with a long and grieuous ſickneſſe. It was aſſuredly beleeued, that the accident proceeded of poiſon, the diſcourſe whereof according to the common report was in this ſort: The Duke Valentinois had determined to poiſon Adrian Cardinall of Cornette in the vine where they ſhould haue ſupped: for it is moſt certaine that his father and he were accuſtomed to vſe poiſon, not onely to be reuenged of their enemies, or to be aſſured of ſuſpitions, but alſo vpon a wicked couetouſneſſe to deſpoile rich men of their goods, whether they were Cardinals or Courtiers, although they had neuer done them any wrong, as hapned to the Cardinall Saint Ange who was very rich. And which more is, they would poiſon their greateſt friends and familiars, and ſuch as had bene their moſt faithfull ſeruants, ſuch as were the Cardinals of Capua, and of Modena. The Duke Valentinois ſent before for this purpoſe certaine flagons of wine infected with poiſon, which he gaue to a ſeruant that knew nothing of the matter, commanding that no perſon ſhould touch them: but the Pope coming by aduenture ſomewhat before ſupper, and ouercome with the drought and immoderate heate of the time, called for drinke; and becauſe his owne prouiſion was not yet brought from the Pallace, he that had the infected wine in charge, thinking it to be recommended to his keeping for a wine moſt excellent, gaue the Pope to drinke of the ſame wine which Valentinois had ſent; who arriuing whileſt his father was drinking, dranke alſo of the ſame wine. All the towne of Rome ranne with great gladneſſe to Saint Peters, about the dead body of the Pope, their eyes not being ſatisfied to ſee dead and deſtroyed a Serpent, who with his immoderate ambition and poiſoned infidelitie, together with all the examples of horrible crueltie, of monſtrous luxurie, and ſtrange couetouſnes, ſelling without diſtinction both holy and prophane things, had infected the whole world: and yet had bene exalted with a moſt rare and almoſt perpetuall proſperitie, euen from his yong age to the end of his life, deſiring alwayes great things, and obtaining more then he deſired: an example of much importance, to confound the arrogancie of thoſe men, who preſuming to know and ſee perfectly with humane eyes the depth of Gods iudgements, do aſſure, that what hapneth either good or ill to mortall men, proceedeth either of their merits or faults: as though we ſaw not dayly many good men vniuſtly tormented, and many wicked perſons (aboue their deſeruings) liue in eaſe and honour: and as though to make any other interpretation, were to derogate from the iuſtice and power of God, whoſe greatneſſe not being to be contained within any ſhort or preſent termes, knoweth how well and largely to diſcerne in another time and place, the iuſt from the vniuſt, and that with rewards and eternall puniſhments. But the Duke Valentinois lying very ſicke in the Pallace, retired all his bands of men about him: and hauing alwayes thought, partly by the feare of his armes, and partly through the fauour of the Spaniſh Cardinals which were elcuen, to create a Pope at his pleaſure after the death of his father, he found now impediments aboue his expectation, as well in this, as in all his other plots and deuices, by reaſon of his ſickneſſe which was very dangerous. In which reſpect he complained grieuouſly, for that hauing formerly often conſidered all the accidents that might happen to him by the death of his father, and found remedies for them all, yet he could neuer imagine, that at the ſame time he ſhould be reſtrained with ſo dangerous a ſickneſſe. Therefore finding it neceſſary for him to frame his counſels, not to the plots he had layd before, but to the neceſſitie preſent, perceiuing that he was not able in one time to ſuſtaine the hatred of the Colonnoys and Vrſins, and fearing leſt they ſhould ioyne together againſt him, he reſolued to repoſe rather in thoſe whom he had offended onely in their goods, then in ſuch as he had grieued both in their goods and in their perſons: and therefore he ſuddenly reconciled himſelfe with the Colonnois, and ſuch of the Vale as followed that faction, and inuiting them to returne to their eſtates, he made reſtitution of the Caſtles which Alexander with great expences had fortified and enlarged, the alteration and feare of the time compelling him to do more then any regard to honor, equitie, conſcience, or religion. But this ſufficed not, neither for his ſuretie, nor to keepe the citie of Rome in peace, wherein all things were full of ſuſpitions and tumults, for that both Proſper Colonne was entred, and all that faction had taken armes: and Fabio Vrſin coming from the houſes of his kindred to Mont-Iordan, had with a great multitude of the Vrſins his partakers, ſet on fire certaine merchants ſhops, and the houſes of many Spaniſh Courtiers, a nation generally enuied for the memory of the inſolencies which they had done during the Popedome of Alexander. Beſides, Fabio thirſting after the bloud of Valentinois, made great leuies of forrein ſouldiers, and ſolicited Bartlemew Aluiano being then in the pay of the Venetians, to ioyne with him and his houſe in the reuenge of ſo many wrongs as he had done them. The ſuburbes and medowes were full of the men of warre of Valentinois; and the Cardinals iudging that they could not with ſafetie aſſemble at the Popes Pallace, drew together at the Couent of the Church of Minerua; at which place, contrary to the ancient cuſtome, they began, but farre later then they were wont, to performe the funerall rites of Alexander. It was much feared leſt Gonſaluo would come to Rome, ſpecially for that Proſper Colonne had left at Marina a certain number of Spaniſh ſouldiers, and becauſe for the reconciliatiō of Valentinois with the Colonnois, it was beleeued that he had agreed to follow the Spaniſh factiō. But it was much more feared leſt the French army ſhould come thither, which had marched ſlowly till that day, for that in the publike councels of the Swiſſers (being not a litle amazed for the ill fortune of the French in the realme of Naples) it had bene much diſputed, afore they agreed that the Kings officers might make leauie of their men; and almoſt all the Captaines and footemen, for the ſame cauſe refuſing to go, were too late leauied, and made too long abode by the wayes. But in reſpect of the Popes death, the armie (which was gouerned by the Marquis of Mantua with title of the Kings Lieutenant, and by the Bailiffe of Caen, and Monſieur de Sandricourt, in whom except the name, remained as much power as in the Generall, for that Monſieur Trimouille remained ſicke at Parma,) was come without tarrying for the Swiſſers, to the territories of Sienna, with intention to go to Rome, according to the direction of the King, who alſo had commanded the Nauie which was at Caietta to make ſaile to Oſtia, to giue impediment to Gonſaluo for going to Rome with his armie to compell the Cardinals to chuſe a Pope at his deuotion. Notwithſtanding the French armie remained certaine dayes betweene Bancouent and Viterbe, for that the merchants making difficultie, for the troubles then at Rome, to accept the bils of exchange that were ſent out of France, the Swiſſers being now come into the countrey of Sienna, refuſed to march any further vntill they were paid. At which time the tumults were no leſſe in the territory of Rome, and in many other places of the eſtate of the Church, and in the lands of Valentinois, for that the Vrſins and all the Romiſh Barons reſtored themſelues to their eſtates. The family of Vitelli were returned to Citta de Caſtello; and Iohn Paul Baillon vnder hope of a certaine intelligence, had aſſailed Perouſa, and albeit being put to the chaſe, he was conſtrained to go his way, yet returning with new bands and open ſuccours of the Florentines, after he had giuen a furious aſſault, he entred the towne,

not without the ſlaughter of his enemies, and ſome loſſe of his owne companie. The towne of Plombin alſo tooke armes, which albeit they of Sienna laboured to vſurpe, yet the ancient Lord returned thither by the fauour of the Florentines. The Duke of Vrbin, the Lords of Peſere, of Camerin, and Sinigalle, did the like in their eſtates: onely Romagna (notwithſtanding they were not without ſuſpition of the Venetians, who leuied great bands of men at Rauenna) remained quiet, and inclined to the deuotion of Valentinois, knowing by experience how much it was more tollerable and better for the weale of the countrey, to ſerue one onely and mightie Lord, then to haue in euery towne Lords particular, who neither for their weakneſſe could defend them, nor for their pouertie were able to do them good, but rather finding their reuenues inſufficient to entertaine them, they were conſtrained to oppreſſe them. They conſidered alſo, that for the authoritie and greatneſſe of the Duke Valentinois, and for the good iuſtice he miniſtred amongſt them, their countrey was not vexed with ſo many mutinies and tumults of factions as it was wont continually to be, bringing ordinary ſlaughters of men: by meanes whereof he had gotten the loue of the people: and likewiſe by his benefites, by entertaining ſuch as had bene trained in armes, by diſtributing the offices to learned men, as well of his owne townes, as of thoſe that belonged to the Church, and alſo by ſoliciting his father on the behalfe of Churchmen, touching the collation of benefices and ſpirituall dignities: which was the cauſe that neither the examples of others that reuolted, nor the memory of their ancient Lords, could eſtrange them from Valentinois: who albeit he ſtood oppreſſed with ſo many difficulties, yet was he laboured vnto both by the French and Spaniſh, and with many offers and promiſes importunately ſolicited to be on their ſide: for that beſides the oportunitie of his forces and men of warre, they hoped by this meanes to winne the voices of the Spaniſh Cardinals in the election to be made. But, although for the reconcilement that was made with the Colonnois, it was rather beleeued that he wold declare himſelf for the Spaniſh, yet nothing elſe inducing him but only feare, leſt they wold ioyne with the Vrſins, he declared that he would do nothing contrary to his fidelitie to the French, whom he determined to follow, for that, both within the towne of Rome which the Kings armie did now approch, and alſo in his other eſtates, they might do him more good and harme then the Spaniſh. Therefore the firſt day of September he made a conuention with the Cardinall S. Seuerin and Monſieur de Trans the Kings Embaſſadour, by the which he promiſed to aide him with his ſouldiers in the enterpriſe of Naples, and in all other expeditions againſt all perſons except the Church. And on the other part, the Kings agents bound the King to the protection as well of his perſon, as of all the eſtates he poſſeſſed, and to concurre alſo in the recouery of thoſe which he had loſt. Alſo the Duke gaue hopes to draw the moſt part of the Spaniſh Cardinals to giue their voices to the Cardinall of Amboiſe, who puffed vp with a proud hope to obtaine the Popedome, with the authoritie, the money, and the armes of his King, went immediatly out of France after the Popes death, to Rome, carrying with him beſides the Cardinall of Aragon, the Cardinall Aſcanius; who being deliuered two yeares before out of the Tower of Bourges, had bene ſince honorably entertained in the Court, and by him much cheriſhed, hoping that if the Pope ſhould die, his ancient reputation might do much to further his ambition, together with the many friends and fauourers which he had in the Court of Rome: which were but weake foundations: for that neither Valentinois could wholly diſpoſe the Spaniſh Cardinals, more inclined (according to the cuſtome of men) to their proper profit, then to acknowledge the good turnes that his father and he had done them, and for that many amongſt them, hauing regard not to offend the mind of their King, would not be ſo farre ouer-ſeene, as to chuſe for Pope a French Cardinall: and Aſcanius, if he had had any power, would not haue conſented that the Cardinall of Amboiſe ſhould obtaine the Popedome, for that it was to the perpetuall embaſing and cutting off of all the hopes that yet remained, as well to him as to thoſe of his houſe. They deferred yet the election of the new Pope, not onely for that it was later then was wont ere they began to celebrate the obſequies of the dead; till the ending of which (enduring for the moſt part nine dayes) the Cardinals haue no cuſtome to enter into the Conclaue or houſe of election: but alſo, the better to cut off occaſions and dangers of a ſchiſme in ſo great a confuſion of affaires, and important diuiſion of Princes, the Cardinals that were preſent had agreed to giue aduertiſement to thoſe that were abſent, to make their repaire: and when they were come, the Colledge neuertheleſſe was holden in ſuſpence, ſuſpecting that the election would not be free, as well for the bands of Valentinois, as for that the French armie which at laſt was drawne betweene

Duke Valentinois for the French king.

Nepi

Nepi and the Iſle, with intention to come to Rome, refuſed to paſſe the riuer of Tiber, if aforehand there were not choſen a new Pope: or for feare that either the contrary part would ouerrule the Colledge in the election; or elſe for that the Cardinall of Amboiſe would haue it ſo, for his owne ſuretie, and for the hope he had to be the better fauoured. Theſe things, after many contentions (the Colledge refuſing otherwiſe to enter into the Conclaue) were at laſt reſolued and tooke forme, for that the Cardinall of Amboiſe gaue his faith to the whole Court of Cardinals, that the French armie ſhould not paſſe Nepi and the Iſle, and Valentinois conſented to go to Nepi, and afterwards to Ciuita Caſtellano, hauing ſent to the French campe two hundred men at armes and three hundred light horſemen vnder the leading of Lodowike de la Mirandola and Alexander Triuulce: but the Colledge erected many bands of footmen for the guard of Rome, and gaue power to three Prelates whom they had appointed for the guard of the Conclaue, to open it if they diſcerned ſedition or tumult, to the end that all the Cardinals being at libertie to go whither they would, euery one might be out of hope to force them. At laſt the Cardinals entred the Conclaue, being eight and thirtie in number, where the diſagreement which in other times was wont to keepe things in delay, was the cauſe now that they entred roundly into the action, and created in few dayes a new Pope. And albeit in the election they had much adoe to agree vpon the perſon, as well for their generall couetouſneſſe, as for the contention between the Cardinals depending of the French King, and the Spaniſh Cardinals embracing the faction of the King of Spaine. And albeit they were no leſſe amazed with the preſent danger wherein they ſtood, all things in Rome being full of ſuſpition and tumult, then with the conſideration of the accidents which in a time ſo troubled might happen by the vacation of the Sea: yet at laſt, euen by the conſent of the Cardinal of Amboiſe, in whom failed euery day all hope to be elected, they created for Pope Francis Piccolomini Cardinall of Sienna, in whom was no expectation of long life, both for his extreme age and preſent ſickneſſe: a Cardinall ſure of vnſpotted report, and for his other conditions, not vnworthy that degree, who, to renew the memory of Pius the ſecond his vncle, tooke vpon him the name of Pius the third.

Francis Piccolomini made Pope.

As ſoone as the Pope was created, the French armie had no further occaſion to ſtay there, and therefore taking the way that had bene agreed vpon before, they paſſed ſuddenly the riuer of Tiber: but neither for the creation of the Pope, nor for the diſcamping of the armie, the tumults at Rome were not appeaſed, for that becauſe there was expectation for the coming of Aluiano and Iohn Paul Baillon, who conſpiring together, made leuies of men in Perouſa, Valentinois continuing as yet ſicke, and fearing their coming, was returned to Rome with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, the like numbers of light horſemen, and eight hundred footmen, hauing obtained ſafeconduct of the Pope, who hoped that he might the eaſilier put end to thoſe things by ſome compoſition. But the Duke Valentinois being now within one towne and walls with the Vrſins, enflamed with a moſt iuſt thirſt after his bloud, and hauing new bands continually arriuing, notwithſtanding they demanded of the Pope and Colledge of Cardinals a ſhort and readie iuſtice againſt him, they determined to be reuenged vpon him with armes, as ſoone as Iohn Paul Baillon and Aluiano were arriued: by reaſon whereof, there was alwayes ſome contention betweene the towne and them of the ſuburbes where Valentinois was lodged. The which contention troubled not onely the people of Rome, and the Court, but alſo was ſuppoſed to bring great preiudice to the affaires of the French, for that the Vrſins as ſoone as they were once diſpatched of the quarrell againſt Valentinois, preparing to go to the pay either of the French or Spaniſh King, and iudging that their ſtrength was of no litle importance to the victory, they were ſought to by both parts with ample conditions. But being naturally more enclined to the part of the French, the Cardinall of Amboiſe entertained in the Kings name Iulio Vrſin, who contracted for all thoſe of his family, except Aluiano, for whom was reſerued place, with honorable conditions; but by his coming all was reuerſed. For, albeit in the beginning he was almoſt agreed with the Cardinall of Amboiſe, yet being almoſt in one moment reſtrained with the Spaniſh Embaſſadour, he entred pay with the King of Spaine with fiue hundred men at armes, and with prouiſion of threeſcore thouſand duckats yearely, aſſuring himſelfe of all thoſe of his family, except Iohn Iordan: to which deliberation he was chiefly induced (as he frankly confeſſed) by deſpite, that the Cardinall of Amboiſe, burning more and more in ambition to be Pope, fauoured Valentinois, hoping by his meanes to obtaine the moſt part of the voices of the Spaniſh Cardinals; although the Cardinall clearing himſelfe of the fault, by transferring it to another, gaue out that he was perſwaded that the Venetians had bene the authors of it, who for the deſire they had that the French King ſhould not obtaine the Realme of Naples, had not onely conſented that he ſhould leaue their pay, promiſing him (as the report was) to reſerue for him the ſame place; but alſo to the end the firſt paiments ſhould be more ready, they had lent to the Spaniſh Embaſſadours fifteene thouſand duckats; a matter, which though it be not in euery part certain, yet it cannot be denied, but that the Venetian Embaſſadour did manifeſtly intrude himſelfe into that practiſe. Others were of opinion, that the conditions and large offers of the Spaniards were the cauſe, for that they bound themſelues to giue eſtates in the kingdome, as well to him as to all thoſe of his family, and to indue his brother with Eccleſiaſticall reuenues: and laſtly (which he eſteemed much) to aide him when the warre was finiſhed with two thouſand Spaniſh footmen, in the enterpriſe which he determined againſt the Florentines in the fauour of Peter de Medicis. It was beleeued that Iohn Paul Baillon come now to Rome with Aluiano, and who following his example, treated at one time with the French and with the Spaniſh, would alſo accompanie him in the ſame deliberation: but the Cardinall of Amboiſe, not a litle amazed that the Vrſins had left the King, which made doubtfull the hopes which before were almoſt certaine, entertained him immediatly into the Kings ſeruice with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, granting whatſoeuer the other demanded, but all vnder the name of the Florentines, for that Iohn Paul would haue it ſo, to the end to be more aſſured of his payes, which were to be abated of the ſummes they ought to the King by vertue of their conuentions. And yet Iohn Paul being returned to Perouſa to put his people in order, and hauing receiued fourteene thouſand duckats, he was contented to gouerne himſelfe more according to the ſucceſſe of the time and common euent of things, and by his paſſions and particular intereſts, then according to that which beſeemes the reputation and faith of ſouldiers, and deferring with many excuſes to go to the French armie, he would not depart from Perouſa: a matter which the Cardinall of Amboiſe ſuppoſed to proceed vpon this, that Iohn Paul imitating the ſlender faith of the Captaines of Italy of that time, had from the houre he was entertained, made promiſe to Bartholomew Aluiano and the Spaniards to do ſo. After the Vrſins were entred into the pay of the Spaniſh, peace proceeded betweene them and the Colonnois, reſolued and ſet downe at the ſame inſtant in the lodging of the Spaniſh Embaſſadour; to whom, and to the Venetian Agent, they referred the reſolution of all their differences. The agreement of theſe houſes brought no litle feare to Valentinois, who determined to leaue Rome, and preparing to go to Bracciana, Iohn Iordan hauing giuen his faith to the Cardinall of Amboiſe to leade him thither in ſuretie, it chanced that Iohn Paul and the Vrſins determining to aſſaile him, when they could not enter into the ſuburbes by the gate of the caſtle S. Ange, they iſſued out of Rome, and fetching a long circuite to come to the gate Torrono, they found it ſhut, and burnt it; and being entred in, they began to skirmiſh with certaine horſmen of Valentinois, to whoſe ſuccours albeit many of the French ſouldiers did runne, who were not yet departed out of Rome, yet the number of his enemies being the greater, and their rage redoubling, and his owne people (whoſe ſtrength was much diminiſhed afore) making ſignes to abandon him, he was conſtrained together with the Prince of Squillace and certaine Spaniſh Cardinals, to ſeeke his ſafetie in the Pallace of Vatican, from whence he retired with all ſpeed into the caſtle of S. Ange, hauing by the Popes conſent receiued faith of the Captain of the caſtle (who was the ſame that had that charge in the dayes of the dead Pope) to ſuffer him to go out when he would: and all his people fled whither their feare or fortune led them. In this garboile the Bailiffe of Caen was lightly hurt, and the Cardinall of Amboiſe had no litle feare. The matter of quarrell being taken away by this accident, the tumults alſo were immediatly appeaſed within the citie of Rome; in ſo much as they began all in peace to prepare for the election of a new Pope, for that Pius, not beguiling the hopes which the Cardinals conceiued of him at the time of his creation, was dead the ſixe and twentieth day after his election. After the death of Pius, the Cardinals deferring for certaine dayes to enter the Conclaue, (for they thought good that the Vrſins ſhould firſt iſſue out of Rome, where they yet remained to furniſh the numbers which they ſhould leade to the Spaniſh armie,) reſolued vpon the election out of the Conclaue: for that the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula, mightie in friends, reputation, and riches, had drawne to him the voices of ſo many Cardinals, that (thoſe that were of the contrary opinion not daring to oppoſe againſt him) entring the Conclaue, he was with an example all new, and without ſhutting the Conclaue, elected Pope the ſame night, which was the night of the laſt day of October: who either hauing regard to his firſt name of Iulio, or (as coniectures were made) to ſignifie the greatneſſe of his conceptions, or elſe becauſe he would not giue place to Alexander, no not in the excellencie of name, tooke vpon him the name of Iulio, the ſecond of that name amongſt all the Popes that had paſſed. Certainly it was wondred at of all men, that by ſo great conſent, they had created for Pope, a Cardinall, who was knowne to be of a diſpoſition rigorous and terrible, and who being impatient of reſt and tranquillitie, had conſumed his youth in continuall trauels, offended many by neceſſitie, and exerciſed hatred and hoſtilitie againſt many great perſonages. But on the other ſide, the cauſes appeared clearly, for which, ſurmounting all other difficulties, he was raiſed to ſo great eſtate. For he had bene of long time a Cardinall of great power and might, and with his magnificence, wherein he had alwayes exceeded the reſidue, and with the greatneſſe of his ſpirit, by the which he did great things, he had not onely made himſelfe mightie in opinion and friends, but by times and degrees had gotten great authoritie in the Court of Rome, bearing the name to be the principall defender of the Eccleſiaſticke dignitie and libertie. But that which ſerued moſt for his aduancement, was the promiſes immoderate and infinite which he made to the Cardinals, Princes and Barons, and to all others who might be profitable to him in that action. Beſides, he had the meanes to diſtribute money, benefices and ſpirituall dignities, as well ſuch as were his owne, as thoſe that were the rights of others, for that by reaſon of the bruite of his liberalitie, many made willing offers to him to diſpoſe as he beſt liked, of their treaſures, their names, their offices, and benefices: and no man conſidered that his promiſes were ſo great, that being Pope, he was neither able nor ought to obſerue them, for that he had of ſo long continuance enioyed the name of iuſt and vpright; that Pope Alexander himſelfe, his greateſt enemie, ſpeaking ill of him in all other things, could not but confeſſe him to be true of his word: which praiſe he made no care to defile and ſtaine, to the end to become Pope, knowing that no man more eaſily beguileth another, then he that hath the cuſtome and name neuer to deceiue any. The Cardinall of Amboiſe conſented to this election, for that deſpairing to obtaine the Popedome for himſelfe, he hoped that in reſpect of former dependances he would be friend to the King his maſter, as alwayes heretofore he was ſuppoſed to be. The Cardinall Aſcanius gaue alſo his franke conſent, being reconciled to him before, and treading vnder foote the memory of all ancient contentions that had bene betweene them, at ſuch time as afore the Popedome of Alexander, they followed the Court of Rome in the perſons of Cardinals. For, knowing his diſpoſition better then the Cardinall of Amboiſe, he hoped that being aſcended to the Popedome, he ſhould haue the ſame vnquietneſſe, or rather greater, then he had had in a meaner fortune, together with ſuch conceptions as might be able to open to him a way to recouer the Duchie of Millan. In like ſort the Spaniſh Cardinals yeelded their conſent, notwithſtanding in the beginning they had no inclination: for that ſeeing there was ſuch a concurrence of others, and fearing not to be ſufficient enough to let his election, they iudged it more conuenient for their ſuretie, to hold him appeaſed in conſenting, then to ſtirre him to anger in refuſing, ſomewhat affying themſelues in the great promiſes he made to them, and induced by the perſwaſions and requeſts of Valentinois, whoſe condition ſtood ſo enuironed with calamities, that he was conſtrained to follow euery dangerous counſell, being no leſſe abuſed then the others with the hopes that he gaue him: for that he promiſed him to make a mariage betweene his daughter and his nephew Francis Maria de la Rouere Prefect of Rome, to confirme him Captaine of the armies of the Church: and which was of greateſt importance, to ioyne to his aide in the recouery of the townes of Romagna, all which, except the Caſtles, were almoſt withdrawne from his obedience: the affaires of which prouince, full of innouations and changes, troubled with diuers thoughts the ſpirit of the Pope, both for that he knew he was not able at that time to bring it to his deuotion, and alſo for that he endured vnwillingly that the greatneſſe of the Venetians ſhould ſo increaſe. For when it was vnderſtood in Romagna, that Valentinois was fled into the Caſtle of S. Ange, and the regiments of men that were about him diſperſed, the Cities which had expected him before in great conſtancie, being now out of hope, began to take new parties: Ceſena returned to the ancient deuotion of the Church: Imola, the Captaine of the Caſtle being killed by meanes of certaine of the principall citizens, ſtood in doubt, ſome deſiring to reuert to the Church, and others to be reconciled to the Riares their firſt Lords. The Citie of Furly poſſeſſed by the Ordelaſſy long time before it came to the Riares by the permiſſion of Pope Sixtus, had repealed Anthonie a remainder of the ſame family; who

hauing formerly aſſayed to enter by the fauour of the Venetians, but afterwards fearing that vnder his name they would retaine the iuriſdiction to themſelues, he had recourſe to the Florentines, and by their meanes was reinueſted in his patrimonie. Iohn Sforce returned to Peſero, and Pandolfe Malateſte to Rimini, the one and other being called by the people. But Denis of Nalda, an ancient ſouldier to Valentinois, at the requeſt of the caſtle-keeper of Rimini, went thither to his ſuccours: by whoſe helpe, Pandolfe being put to the chaſe, the Citie returned eſtſoones to the obedience of Valentinois. Faenza onely perſeuered longeſt in his deuotion; but in the end being depriued of all hope of his returne, they had recourſe to the remainders of the family of the Manfredi their ancient Lords, and called home Aſtor a yong gentleman of the ſame houſe, but a baſtard, none remaining of the race legitimate. But the Venetians aſpiring to the iuriſdiction of all Romagna, immediatly after the death of Pope Alexander, ſent to Rauenna many bands of ſouldiers, with whom they aſſailed one night vpon the ſudden, and with great fury, the Citie of Ceſena, but the people of the place ſtanding valiantly to their defence, the Venetians which went thither without artillery, hoping more to ſurpriſe it then to force it, retired to the countrey of Rauenna, where they conſidered diligently all things that might giue them any occaſion to aduance themſelues in that Prouince; which immediatly was preſented to them by the diſcords that were betweene Denis of Nalda and the Fauentines. For, it being ſomewhat intollerable to Denis that the Fauentines ſhould returne vnder the gouernment of the Manfredi, againſt whom he had rebelled at ſuch time as Valentinois aſſailed that Citie, he called in the Venetians, and put into their hands the Caſtles of the vale of Lamona which he had in keeping: and the Venetians a litle after put a band of three hundred footmen within the Caſtle of Faenza, being brought in by the caſtle-keeper, whom they had ſeduced by their corruptions. They occupied in like ſort, and in the ſame time, the borough of Forlimpople, with many other boroughs of Romagna, and ſent part of their men of warre to take the Citie of Fana, but the people held out conſtantly for the Church. They were alſo brought into Rimini by the conſent of the people; couenanting aforehand with Pandolfe Malateſte to giue him in recompence the towne of Citadella in the territorie of Padua, and a yearely penſion, with a perpetuall eſtate of a companie of men at armes: and then they returned with great diligence to beſiege Faenza, for that the townesmen, nothing amazed with the loſſe of the Caſtle, for that being ſeated in a low place, and ſeparate from the Citie by a deepe trench, it could not much offend them, they made valiant reſiſtance, both for the affection they bare to the family of Manfredi, and alſo for a grudge they had that the inhabitants of the vale of Lamona had promiſed to others the imperie of Faenza. But of themſelues being vnable to make defence ſufficient, for that Chriſtopher More commander of the Venetians, had approched his artillery to their towne, and occupied all the places of importance in the country, they demanded ſuccours of the new Pope Iulio, to whom ſuch boldneſſe was not a litle diſagreeable: but being newly aſcended to the Popedome, without force, without money, and without hope to be aided by either of the Kings of France or Spaine, as well for that they were both troubled with thoughts of farre greater importance, as for that he had denied to be confederate with either of them: he had no other meanes to prouide for them, but through the authoritie of the name Pontificall: therefore to proue what reuerence the Venetians bare to it, together with what regard they remembred the amities which long time before he had borne to that Commonweale, he ſent to Venice the Biſhop of Tiuoli, to complaine, for that Faenza being a Citie immediatly appertaining to the Church, they did not forbeare to do ſo great a diſhonour to a Pope, who afore he was raiſed to that dignitie, had alwayes bene a very great friend to their Commonweale, and of whom ſtanding now in a greater fortune, they might hope for right ample fruites by reaſon of his ancient friendſhip and good will. It may be there were in the Senate ſome of thoſe men which aforetime had diſſwaded not to entangle their eſtate with the matters of Piſa, and that they ſhould not receiue in pawne the ports of the realme of Naples, nor make partition with the French King of the Duchie of Millan; who conſidered what might happen, by making themſelues dayly more and more ſuſpected and hated of others, and to adde to other hatreds, the ill will of the Pope: but ambitious counſels hauing bene fauoured with ſo happie ſucceſſe, and therefore all their ſailes being hoiſſed in ſo happie a wind of fortune, the opinions of thoſe that perſwaded the contrary were not heard: and therefore (almoſt with a generall conſent) it was anſwered to the Popes Embaſſadour, That the ſtate of Venice had alwayes greatly deſired that the Cardinall S. Peter de Vincula ſhould come to be Pope, for the

the long amitie, confirmed by very many good offices and fauours giuen and receiued by both parts, and that he ſhould not doubt, but they would now reſpect him more being Pope, then they had alwayes done whileſt he was a Cardinall: but as touching the point of imputation, they knew not wherein they had offended his dignitie, embracing the occaſion which was offered to them to haue Faenza; for that that Citie was not onely not poſſeſſed by the Church, but the Church had made a willing depriuation of all her rights, in transferring ſo amply and in full Conſiſtory the iuriſdiction to the Duke Valentinois: That he would remember, that afore that grant, the Popes (within no memory of man) had euer poſſeſſed Faenza, but from time to time had giuen it to new Vicars, without acknowledging other ſuperioritie then the tribute, which they offered to pay readily when it ſhould be required: That the Fauentines had no deſire to be the ſubiects of the Church, but abhorring ſuch nomination, they had reuerenced the name of the Duke Valentinois, with all the obſeruances that were in them: and that now hauing no more hope in him, they ranne headlong to call in the baſtards of the houſe of Manfredi: Laſtly, they beſought him, that being Pope, he would hold toward that State the ſame friendſhip which he had alwayes ſhewed towards them when he was a Cardinall. After the Pope was certified of the wil of the Venetians, he wold haue ſent into Romagna the Duke Valentinois, whom he had entertained with many demonſtrations of honor as ſoone as he was Pope, and in token of amitie lodged him in the Pallace Pontificall, had he not feared leſt his going, which in the beginning had bene agreeable enough to the people, ſhould be then very hatefull, ſeeing they were already all drawne into rebellion againſt him. But touching the Fauentines, there was no more remaining to them, but to haue recourſe to the Florentines, who, diſcontented that a Citie of ſo neare neighborhood ſhould fall into the power of the Venetians, had ſent thither to their ſuccours in the beginning two hundred footmen, entertaining them with hopes ſtill to refurniſh them, to the end to keepe them in courage to hold out till the Pope were at leiſure to ſuccour them. But perceiuing that the Pope had no diſpoſition to take armes, and that the authoritie of the French King (warning the Venetians in the beginning not to moleſt the eſtates of the Duke Valentinois) was not ſufficient to withdraw them; not minding to enter alone into a warre with ſo mightie enemies, they forbare to relieue them with any further ſupply: by reaſon whereof, the Fauentines being cut off from all hopes, and the Venetian armie (incamping at the Church of the Obſeruants) hauing begun to play with their artillery againſt the walls of their Citie, being vnhappie alſo in this, that their intelligences were diſcouered, and certaine of them taken who had conſpired to put the Venetians into the towne, they yeelded vp their Citie when the Venetians had agreed to giue to Aſtor a certaine penſion (albeit but litle) for the maintenance of his life. After the taking of Faenza, the Venetians might with the ſame facilitie and fortune haue commanded Imola and Furly; but not to aggrauate the indignation of the Pope, who murmured not a litle, they ſent their men into garriſon, determining for that time to paſſe no further, hauing occupied in Romagna, beſides Faenza and Rimini, with their countries, Monteſiora, Saint Archangeo, Verrucque, Gattere, Sauignano, and Meldole the hauen of the countrey of Ceſena; and in the territorie of Imola, Toſſignana, Solaruola, and Monthattaile. Valentinois held in Romagna onely the Caſtles of Furly, of Ceſena, of Forlimpople, and of Bertinoire: all which (albeit he had great deſire to go into Romagna, to the end they might not be vſurped by the Venetians) he had eaſily conſented to put into the Popes keeping, with bond to receiue them of him againe at ſuch time as they ſhould be aſſured, had it not bene that the Pope, his ancient integritie being not yet ouercome with deſire to beare rule, refuſed the offer, ſaying, he would not willingly accept occaſions that might any way allure him to corrupt his faith. At laſt, to oppoſe in ſome ſort againſt the proceedings of the Venetians, with whom he was not a litle diſcontented for the danger of the ſtate Eccleſiaſtike, hauing alſo a deſire that Valentinois ſhould depart from Rome, he accorded with Valentinois, that he ſhould go to Spetia by ſea, and from thence by land to Ferrara, and ſo to Imola, where ſhould be reſtored to him an hundred men at armes and fiftie light horſemen, which yet followed his Enſignes (interpoſing in this conuention not onely the name of the Pope, but alſo the name of the Colledge of Cardinals.) With this reſolution Valentinois being gone to Oſtia to be embarked, the Pope ſuddenly repented that he had not accepted the Caſtles; and hauing now a ſpeciall deſire to haue them (not reſpecting the meanes) and to keepe them to himſelfe, he ſent after him the Cardinals of Volterre and Surrente, to perſwade him, that to preuent that thoſe places ſhould not fall into the hands of the Venetians, he would

would be content to deliuer them vp into the Popes keeping, vnder the ſame promiſe that had bene treated vpon at Rome. But Valentinois refuſing ſo to do, the Pope riſing into choler, cauſed him to be arreſted in the galleys wherein he was embarked, and in decent ſort to be led to Magliana, from whence (all the Court and communaltie of Rome reioycing for the apprehenſion of his perſon) he was led to the Vatican, where he was kindly vſed, and honored, but not without ſpeciall guard: the reaſon was, that the Pope fearing leſt the caſtle-keepers deſpairing of his ſafetie, would ſell the Caſtles to the Venetians, he ſought to make him tractable by eaſie meanes, and ſo to haue them by his conſent and will. Thus the power of Duke Valentinois riſing as it were ſuddenly, no leſſe by meanes of his crueltie and deceits, then by the armes and power of the Church, tooke end with a ruine more ſudden, hauing experience in himſelfe of part of thoſe deceits wherewith his father and he had vexed many ſeuerall perſonages. And his ſouldiers had no better fortune, who being gone into the countrey of Perouſa, with hope to obtaine ſafeconduct of the Florentines and others, (the companies of the Vitelli, the Baillons, and the Siennoys falling vpon them) they were conſtrained for their ſafetie to retire vpon the lands of the Florentines: where, being diſperſed between Caſtillon and Cortona, and reduced to foure hundred horſemen, with a very ſlender ſtrength of footmen, they were ſtripped by the appointment of the Florentines, and Dom Michael their Leader taken priſoner, whom they deliuered afterwards to the Pope, who demanded him with great inſtance, for the hate he bare to all the old ſeruants of the late Pope Alexander, and for that he had bene a faithfull miniſter and executer of all the wickedneſſe of Valentinois; though ſhortly after he ſet him at libertie, following his naturall inclination, which was to be eaſie to pardon thoſe vpon whom he had power to execute his anger. About this time the Cardinall of Amboiſe departed from Rome to returne into France, hauing obtained of the Pope, more for feare then for good will, a confirmation of the legation of that Realme: but the Cardinall Aſcanius followed him not, notwithſtanding at his coming out of France, he promiſed the King by oath, that he would returne; of which oath he had procured ſecret abſolution of the Pope afore. And yet the example of the Cardinall Aſcanius, ſcorning at the credulitie of the Cardinal of Amboiſe, could not make the French Cardinal better aduiſed in the action with Pandolfe Petrucci, who receiuing the Cardinall at Sienna with many honours, and making inſinuation into his good fauours with deepe ſubtilties, and counſels full of art, promiſing to cauſe Montpulcian to be rendred to the Florentines, ouercame him ſo much, that at his returne into France, he aſſured the King that he had not found in Italy a man of better ſpirit, and wrought ſo that his Maieſtie gaue ſufferance to his ſonne to returne to Sienna, remaining at that time in the Court of France for the aſſurance of his fathers promiſes. Theſe were the mutations that hapned in Italy by the death of the Pope.

Duke Valentinois arreſted by the Pope.

But in theſe times, the enterpriſes begun with ſo great hopes on the other ſide the Mounts by the French King, were brought into many difficulties: for the army ſent vpon the frontier of Gaſcoine, for want of money, and by the ill gouernment of thoſe that had the charge, was quickly broken: and the galleys which to ſmall purpoſe had runne along the Spaniſh ſeas, were retired to the port of Marſeilles: and the armie leuied for Parpignian, of the which the King promiſed himſelfe much, being well furniſhed of all things neceſſary, was incamped before Saulſes, which is a ſtrong place neare to Narbona, ſtanding at the foote of the hils Pirenei in the countrey of Roſſillion, which being well defended, made a wonderfull reſiſtance: and albeit it was furiouſly aſſaulted by the French men, vſing both the ſeruice of artilleries and the art of vnderminings, yet the valour of the defendants kept it from ſpoile and ruine: but an armie of all the Spaniſh Realmes being aſſembled at Parpignian, where the King was preſent in perſon, to the end to ſuccour it; and being ioyned to this armie (by reaſon the French were diſcamped) the regiments that had bene ſent to defend the frontiers of Fontarabie, and all theſe forces being drawne into one ſtrength, and marching to giue battell to the French armie, the Captaines ſeeing no reaſon to contend againſt fortune, retired with the campe towards Narbona, after they had lien afore Saulſes about fortie dayes: and the Spaniards entred vpon the territories of the French King, where hauing taken certaine places of ſmall importance (for that the French were withdrawne into Narbona) they returned vpon their owne frontiers by the commandement of their King; who hauing obtained the true end of him that is aſſailed, entertained but with an il wil the war on the other ſide the Mounts, ſeeing that though his realms were mighty enough to defend him from the French king, yet were they too weake to offend him. Exploits of the French armies beyond the Mounts.

terposing) they made a truce for fiue moneths, comprehending onely those things that concerned the affaires of France: for that the Spanish King assuring Federike that he would consent that the Realme of Naples should be restored to him, and Federike expecting no lesse of the French King, the rather at the intreatie of the Queene inclined to compassion, he had introduced betweene them the practises of peace. In which negociation the Spanish Embassadours (the warre continuing still in Italy) went into France, where they gouerned their doings with such art, that Federike perswaded himselfe that the difficultie of his restitution, which the Barons of the faction of Aniow impugned vehemently, proceeded principally on the French Kings side. Thus all the warres betweene both the Kings being reduced onely into the kingdome of Naples, the eyes and thoughts of all men were turned thither: for that the French men hauing passed from Rome by the lands of Valmontona and the Colonnoys, who consented willingly to refresh them with victuals, they marched by the fields of the Church towards S. Germein, where Gonsaluo hauing put garrison in the Castle of Seeque and in Montcassin, was encamped, not with intention to hazard fortune, but to be an impediment that they passed no further, which by the strength of the place he hoped to do easily. The French men being arriued at Pontcorue, and at Cepperano, the Marquis of Saluusse with such as were within Caietta, ioyned to them, hauing afore by occasion of the discamping of Gonsaluo, recouered the Duchie of Tracetta, and the countrey of Fondi, euen to the floud Garillan. The first thing that the French armie did, was to assay to get the Castle of Secqua, from the which, after they had in vaine giuen one assault, they raised their siege. But for that action they fell into such contempt, that it was publikly affirmed in the Spanish armie, that that day the Realme of Naples was assured against the French men, who distrusting for that respect to chase their enemie from the way of S. Germein, determined to returne by the way toward the sea. And therefore when they had reposed two dayes within Aquin, which they had taken, and left seuen hundred footmen within the Castle Guillaume, returning by Pontcorue, they marched by the way of Fondy, to lodge at a town seated vpon the way of the riuer Garillan, where men say the Citie of Minturna was anciently builded; a place not onely conuenient to cast a bridge, and passe the riuer, as was their intention, but also very commodious to encampe there if they should haue bene constrained: for they had Caietta and their nauie at sea at their backes, and Tracetta, Itry, Fondy, with all the circuite of the countrey to the riuer Garillan, stood firme in their deuotion. It was thought that the passing of the French army ouer the riuer, was a thing of great consequence for the victory: for that Gonsaluo being so far inferior in forces, that he durst not appeare in plaine field, the French might march without impediment euen to the walls of Naples, whither also their nauie at sea might haue approched, hauing nothing at sea to let them. And for that cause Gonsaluo issuing out of S. Germein, was come on the other part of Garillan, to let with all his strength the passing of the French, affying much in the disaduantage and difficulties which armies find to passe riuers that haue no foords, specially when the enemie is opposed against them. But as it often hapneth, that which at first was esteemed hard, succeeded most easily; and on the contrary, most hardnesse is often found in that which all men esteemed most easie. For, the French, notwithstanding the furious resistance and impediments of the Spanish, after they had cast the bridge, won the way of the riuer by force of artillery, planted partly vpon the banke where they encamped, which was somewhat higher then the banke on the other side, and partly vpon the barks which they had caused to be brought from the nauie at sea, and drawne vp against the streame of the riuer. But the day after, as they began to passe, the Spaniards opposed against them, and charging with an incredible resolution vpon such as were already passed, they repulsed them euen to the midst of the bridge, and had followed them further, if the fury of the artillery had not compelled them to retire. In this encounter died on the French side the Lieutenant of the Bailiffe of Dion; and of the Spaniards was slaine Fabio sonne to Paul Vrsin, a yong man amongst the Italian souldiers of great expectation. It is said, that if the French men when they began to passe, had boldly aduanced forward, they had that day remained superiors: but whilest they proceeded slowly, and with demonstration of timorousnesse, they did not onely lose the occasion of the victory of that day, but they diminished greatly all hope in time to come: for from that day all things tooke with them very ill successe, and there was already among the Captaines rather confusion then concord; and (according to the custome of the French souldiers with the Italian Captaines) very litle obedience to the Marquis of Mantua the Kings Lieutenant. In so much as either for that occasion, or in respect

ſpect of his diſeaſe (being ſicke indeed) or elſe for that (as well by the experience of that which had bene formerly done at the Caſtle of Seeque, as ſince when they aſſayed to paſſe the bridge) he had loſt all hope of the victory, he went from the army, leauing an opinion to the French King, that he was more loyall then couragious or fit to gouerne an armie. After the Marquis of Mantua was gone, the French Captaines, of whom the Marquis of Salaſſe, the Bailiffe of Caen, and Monſieur Sandricourt were the chiefe, hauing firſt raiſed at the head of the bridge beyond the riuer, a Rampier with wagons, they erected a baſtion capable of many men, by meanes whereof their enemies could not aſſaile them when they paſſed the bridge. But they were kept from paſſing further by other difficulties, hapning vnto them partly by their owne fault, partly by the vertue and patience of their enemies, and partly alſo by ill fortune. For Gonſaluo, who ſtudied more to hinder them with the occaſion of the Winter and ſituation of the countrey, then with force, was encamped at Ceintura, which is a ſmall village, eminently ſeated, and ſomewhat more then a mile diſtant from the Riuer, about which the bands of footmen and horſmen were very incommodiouſly lodged, for that the place being but ſolitary, and where there were very few houſes and cabbins of heardſmen, they had almoſt no other couert then the skie, the ground alſo for the lowneſſe of the plaine, as for that the ſeaſon was rainie, being full of water and mire; and therefore the ſouldiers that had no meanes to lodge themſelues more high, laboured to couer and planke the ground where they were, with great ſtore of fagots and ſticks. In regard of theſe difficulties, and for that the armie was ill payed, and the French hauing wholly wonne the paſſage of the Riuer, certaine Captaines were of opinion to retire the armie to Capua, both to the end to relieue the intollerable ſufferance of the ſouldiers, and to withdraw themſelues from the danger, wherein they eſteemed themſelues to be continually, their numbers being farre inferiour to their enemies. But this counſell was reſolutely reiected of Gonſaluo, with theſe memorable words: That he deſired rather to be preſently buried a foote extraordinary deepe in the ground, then by retiring many fadomes to prolong his life for an hundred yeares: and ſo reſiſting all difficulties with an incredible conſtancie, and fortifying himſelfe with a deepe trench, and with two baſtions which he cauſed to be made in the front of the campe, he prepared to defend himſelfe againſt the French; who, though they had made a baſtion, remoued not at all, for that the countrey being all ouerflowne with the raine, and by the waters of the Riuer, (this place is called by Liuie, for the neighbourhood of Seſſa, Aque Sinueſſane, and perhaps they are the lakes of Minturna, wherein Caius Marius hid himſelfe flying from Sylla) they could not paſſe further, but by a ſtrait way, which was very foule, and full of dirt and mud; and alſo there was danger to be charged in flanke by the footbands of the Spaniſh, being lightly armed, and lying very neare this way; and perhaps that Winter was very cold and ſharp, raining and ſnowing almoſt continually, much more then had bene accuſtomed in that country: whereby it ſeemed that fortune and the heauens had conſpired againſt the French, who ſtaying there, did not onely ſpend the time vnprofitably, but receiued by that abode (by reaſon of their naturall diſpoſition) almoſt the like harmes which mens bodies receiue by a poiſon that worketh ſlowly. For though they were lodged with leſſe diſcommodities then were the Spaniſh, and that by the meanes of the reliques of an ancient Theater, whereunto they had ioyned many other ſhrowds and couers, and of certaine houſes and Innes neare adioyning, where part of them were ſhrowded, and by reaſon that the places about the Tower were ſomewhat higher then the plaine of Seſſa, they were leſſe offended with waters: and laſtly, that the moſt part of their horſemen were lodged in Tracetta and other places adioyning: yet the bodies of the French men and Swiſſers, naturally being not ſo able to make reſiſtance againſt long trauels & perplexities, as are the bodies of the Spainiards, their heate and furie decreaſed daily, and the couetouſneſſe of the officers & treaſurers, to whom it belonged to pay the ſoldiers, increaſed much thoſe difficulties: for that they looking onely to their owne profite, and forgetting no kind of deceit, ſuffered the ſouldiers to diminiſh in number, and were negligent to furniſh the campe with victuals as appertained; by reaſon whereof many diſeaſes fell vpon the armie, and the number of ſouldiers, although in reſpect of paiments it was almoſt the ſame, was much leſſe in effect; and alſo, ſome of the Italian companies went away of their owne accord. Theſe diſorders were made greater by the diſcord of the Captaines, through whoſe fault the armie was gouerned neither with ſuch order nor obedience as was fit. Thus the French men being peſtered with the ſharpneſſe of the Winter, remained idle vpon the ſhores of Garillan, no other thing being done either by the enemie or by them,

but certaine light skirmiſhings which were of no importance, wherein the Spaniards ſeemed alwayes to be ſuperiours. About the ſame time alſo the footbands which the French left in garriſon within the Caſtle Guillaume, not being able to endure the vexations and brauadoes of the garriſons of Secque and other peeces thereabouts commanded by the Spaniſh, abandoned their charge, and pretending to come to the armie, were charged by the way and broken. Now things hauing continued many dayes in this eſtate, Bartholomew Aluiano and other of the Vrſins with their companies arriued in the Spaniſh armie, by whoſe coming Gonſaluo found himſelfe ſo ſtrengthened, hauing in his armie nine hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and nine thouſand Spaniſh footmen, that he began to thinke that now he was no more to ſtudie to defend himſelfe, but to offend his enemie; wherein he was ſo much the more encouraged, by how much he was well aduertiſed that the French (ſtronger in horſemen, but not in footmen) were ſo diſperſed in the bordering places, that their lodgings held litle leſſe then ten miles of the countrey; in ſo much as neare the Tower of Garillan there were onely the Marquis of Saluſſe Viceroy, and other principall Captaines, with the leſſer part of the armie, which diminiſhed dayly, although they had ſtore of victuals ſent them, by reaſon of the continuall increaſe of diſeaſes, whereof many died, and amongſt others the Bailiffe of Caen. For this cauſe hauing determined to aſſay ſecretly to paſſe the Riuer, (which being done, he had no doubt of the victorie) he recommended to Aluiano (the author as ſome thinke of that counſell) the charge to make ſecretly a bridge: by whoſe direction there being made, without the knowledge of the French, a bridge of barkes within a creeke neare to Seſſa, he cauſed it to be brought by night to Garillan, and to be caſt at the paſſage of Suya, foure miles aboue the bridge of the French men, where they kept no guard. As ſoone as the bridge was caſt (being the ſeuen and twentieth day of December in the night) all the armie paſſed ouer together, with the perſon of Gonſaluo, who lodged the ſame night in the towne of Suya neare the Riuer, which was taken by thoſe that paſſed the firſt. The morning following which was on a Friday, (a day happie for the Spaniards) Gonſaluo hauing ordered that the reareguard, lodged betweene the Caſtle of Mondragon and Carinola, foure miles below the bridge of the French, ſhould go and charge their bridge, he prepared himſelfe with the vantguard led by Aluiano, and with the battell which paſſed with himſelfe, to follow the French men: who receiuing aduertiſement the ſame night that the Spaniards had caſt a bridge and began to paſſe, entred into a generall feare, which ſo much the more drew them into aſtoniſhment, by how much this accident and boldneſſe of the enemie was beyond their expectation, hauing themſelues determined to attempt nothing till the time were more fauourable, and perſwading themſelues that their enemies would be detained by the ſame negligence. And therefore albeit the Viceroy (to whom were reſorted many bands from Tracetto and the places thereabout) puſhed forward more with feare then with counſell and good deliberation, (as often happeneth in ſudden aduentures) had ſent towards Suya to ſtop their paſſage, Monſieur d'Alegre with certaine regiments of footmen and horſemen, yet finding it now too late, and feare ouer-ruling all diſcourſe and conſideration, they raiſed their campe ſuddenly, and in great haſte about midnight they departed from the Tower of Garillan, leauing abandoned the moſt part of their munitions and nine great peeces of artillery, together with great numbers of their ſouldiers with bodies wounded and full of ſickneſſe, and tooke their way towards Caietta, whither they purpoſed to retire. But Gonſaluo knowing that they were diſcamped, followed them with his armie, ſending afore Proſper Colonne with his light horſemen, to the end that being troubled by them, they might be conſtrained to march more ſlowly; and as they ouertooke them neare Scandi they began to skirmiſh, the French men for all that not forbearing to march: yet they were compelled oftentimes to ſtay, for feare of falling into diſorder, at bridges and hard paſſages: from whence, after they had ſupported the skirmiſh a certaine ſpace, they retired ſtill, receiuing alwayes ſome hurt: and the order they kept was this, the artillery marched afore, the footbands followed after, and then the horſemen, of whom ſuch as were moſt behind continued the fight with the enemies. The French men being in this ſort aduanced after certaine pauſes and light skirmiſhes, as farre as the bridge which is before Mola of Caietta, neceſſitie compelled the Viceroy to ſtay there part of his men at armes, to giue leiſure to the artilleries to paſſe before, who being not able to march ſo faſt as the companies, began already to be mingled among them. Therefore a great skirmiſh being begun in that place, the reareguard of the Spaniſh came immediatly after, who hauing paſſed the riuer without reſiſtance, euen with the ſame barkes of the bridge which had bene broken by the French men, went towards Caietta by the right way, Gonſaluo marching alwayes on the wing with the reſidue of the armie. The fight was violent at the bridge of Mola for a certaine time, the French men maintaining themſelues principally by the aduantage of the place (although with great feare:) and the Spaniards, eſteeming themſelues already in poſſeſſion of the victory, aſſailed them furiouſly. At laſt the French men, when they could no longer make reſiſtance, and fearing leſt part of the regiments which Gonſaluo had ſent by the coaſt to that end, would cut off their way, began to retire in diſorder, and being continually followed by their enemies, when they came to the head of two wayes, the one leading to Itry, and the other to Caietta, they fell into manifeſt flying, many remaining ſlaine, amongſt whom was Bernardin Adorno Lieutenant of fiftie Lances: many were taken priſoners, and the artilleries abandoned, with all the horſes appointed for the ſeruice of the ſame: and touching the reſidue which fled towards Caietta, they were victoriouſly chaſed euen to the gates of the Citie. At the ſame time Fabricio Colonne ſent by Gonſaluo (after he had paſſed the riuer with fiue hundred horſe and a thouſand footmen, neare to Pontecorue and Fraces) and being fauoured of the moſt part of the villages and countrey people, ſtripped the regiments of Lodowike de la Mirandola and Alexander Triuulce. Beſides this, there were many of them, who being lodged at Fondy, Itry, and other places thereabouts, who hearing that the Spaniards had caſt the bridge, went not to the armie at the tower of Garillan, but for their ſafetie diſperſing themſelues into diuers places, were taken and ſtripped. But Peter de Medicis who alſo followed the French campe, with certaine other Gentlemen, had a great misfortune: for when the armie brake vp from before Garillan, being mounted vpon a barke with foure peeces of artillery, to go to Caietta, their barke ſunke, as well for that they had ouer-charged her, as that the winds were contrary to the mouth of the riuer: ſo that they were all drowned. The night following, Gonſaluo with the army lodged at Caſtellona and at Mola, and approching the next day before Caietta, whither were retired the French Captaines, together with the Princes of Salerne and Biſignian, he wonne immediatly the ſuburbes and the mount, which the French had abandoned: and although Caietta was ſufficiently manned with ſouldiers, and well prouided of victuals, beſides the conueniencie of the place to be ſuccoured by the armies at ſea; yet hauing loſt courage, and not minding to endure the perplexitie of expectation of vncertaine ſuccours, they fell preſently to parley: and therefore they ſent the Bailiffe of Dion, S. Colombo, and Theodore Triuulce, to treate with Gonſaluo in the name of all ſ reſidue, who accorded the firſt day of the yeare 1504. to giue vp to Gonſaluo, Caietta with the Caſtle, vnder condition of free power to go out of the Realme of Naples with their goods either by land or ſea, and that Monſieur d'Aubigny and the other priſoners ſhould be deliuered both of the one and other partie. But this was not ſo clearly capitulated, that Gonſaluo tooke not occaſion to diſpute, that by vertue of the couenants, the Barons of the kingdom of Naples could chalenge no freedome. This was the chaſe that was giuen to the French armie neare to the riuer Garillan, vpon the bankes or ſhores whereof they had bene encamped about fiftie dayes; which happened vnto them no leſſe by their owne diſorders, then by the valour of their enemies; and which is the more worthy of memory, for that thereupon followed the abſolute loſſe of ſo puiſſant and noble a Realme, together with the confirmation of the dominion of the Spaniſh: and alſo for that the French being entred with a far greater ſtrength then the enemie, and with better ſtore of all ſorts of prouiſions neceſſary for the warre both by land and ſea, they were vanquiſhed with ſuch facilitie, and without bloud or any danger of the conquerours: and for that although there died very few of them by the ſword of the enemie, the number was but ſmall that was reſerued of ſo great an armie; for as much as of thoſe regiments of footmen which eſcaped by flying, and of thoſe that came from Caietta after the accord, there died many by the way, as well by reaſon of the cold, as by ſickneſſe; and ſuch among them as could get to Rome, came thither for the moſt part poore and naked, whereof many died in the hoſpitals and in the ſtreets and high wayes, as well by the coldneſſe of the nights, as of hunger. And whether we referre the cauſes of theſe calamities to Deſtinie enuying the French, and no leſſe contrary to the Nobilitie then to bodies of inferiour condition, or to the diſeaſes which fell vpon them by the diſcommodities they ſuffered about Garillan: many of thoſe who after the accord departing from Caietta (where they left the moſt part of their horſes) embarked themſelues to paſſe by ſea, died either by the way, or as ſoone as they were arriued in France; amongſt whom were the Marquis of Saluſſe, Sandricourt, the Bailiffe of the Mountaines, with many other gentlemen of marke. But beſides that which might be imputed to the diſcord and ill gouernment of the French Captaines, and to the ſharpneſſe of the time, and to the diſabilitie of the French and Swiſſers in compariſon of the Spaniſh to endure the tediouſneſſe of delay, and hard trauels; it was thought there were two impediments to the French Kings victory: the one was, the long abode that the armie made vpon the territories of Rome after the Popes death, the ſame being the cauſe that Winter came vpon them, and that the Vrſins were practiſed withall by Gonſaluo afore they could enter into the kingdome; where, if they had entred while the time was yet mild, Gonſaluo being farre inferior to them in forces, and not fauoured with the hardneſſe of the time, would haue bene conſtrained to abandon the greateſt part of the kingdome, and to withdraw himſelfe into places of ſtrength. The other was the couetouſneſſe of the officers and treaſurers, who beguiling the King in the pay of the ſouldiers, and not taking ſuch order for victuals as they ought for the performance of their charge, were the principall cauſes of the diminution of that armie, the King hauing made ſuch prouiſion of all things neceſſary, as it is certaine, that when the French men were ouerthrowne, there was within Rome by his direction, a great quantitie of money, and great prouiſion for victuals: and although at the laſt, after many complaints of the Captaines and of the whole armie, there was leuied an abundant prouiſion of victuals, yet they had ſuffered ſuch ſcarſitie in the beginning, that that diſorder ioyned to other diſcommodities, was the breeder of infinite diſeaſes, of the departing of many, and of the abſenting of many into places thereabout; matters which in the end brought forth the abſolute ruine of ſo braue an armie. For, as for the nouriſhing of the bodie, it is not enough that the head be well diſpoſed, but it is alſo neceſſary that the other members do their office: euen ſo it ſufficeth not that the Prince do his dutie, if withall, the diligence and vertue which ought to be in his miniſters haue not equall action. The ſelfe ſame yeare, wherein ſo great mutations hapned in Italy, was made a peace betweene Baiazet Ottoman and the Venetians, which both parties embraced with great affection: for that the Turke, who was of a meeke ſpirit (therein very vnlike his father) and diſpoſed to learning and to the ſtudie of the bookes of his religion, had of his owne nature a mind farre eſtranged from armes: by reaſon whereof, notwithſtanding he had begun the warre with great preparations both by ſea and land, and occupied in Morea, the two former yeares, Naupacto now called Lepanto, Modono, Corono and Iunquo, yet he followed not the warres with ſo great affection, being haply incited thereto beſides the deſire he had to tranquillitie, by a ſuſpition he had, that either their proper dangers, or the loue of religion, would ſtirre vp the Princes of Chriſtendome againſt him: for that Pope Alexander had ſent certaine Galliots to the ſuccours of the Venetians, and with money had alſo ſtirred vp Ladiſlaus King of Bohemia and Hungaria to make warre vpon the Turks frontiers, and the French and Spaniſh Kings had ſent (but not at one time) their ſeuerall armies to ioyne with the power of the Venetians. But this peace was embraced by the State of Venice with a greater deſire, for that by reaſon of the wars (to the great detrimēt of their city) the traffik of merchandize which they made in diuers regions of the Leuant was diſcontinued: and alſo for that the Citie of Venice being wont to haue from certain prouinces of the Turks, certaine quantities of corne euery yeare, did ſuffer many neceſſities by the depriuation of that reliefe: but much more for that being accuſtomed to amplifie their iuriſdiction by the warres which they had with other Princes, they feared nothing ſo much as the power of the Turks, of whom they had bene alwayes beaten as often as they had had warres together. For, Amurathes, grandfather to Baiazet, had taken the towne of Theſſalonica, now called Salonica, which was a parcell of the dominions of Venice: and after him Mahomet his father, maintaining continuall warre againſt them for 16 yeares, tooke from them the Ile of Negrepont, a great part of Peloponneſus, now named Morea, Scutari, with many other townes in Macedonia and Albania: ſo that as well for that they ſupported the warre againſt the Turks with great difficulties and expences, hauing no hope to breed any profite by them; as for that they doubted ſo much the more to be aſſailed by other Chriſtian Princes, they deſired greatly to be at tranquillitie with the Turkiſh regions. It was ſuffered to Baiazet by the conditions of the peace, to retaine ſtill all he had gotten, and the Venetians reſeruing onely the Ile of Cefalonia, anciently called Leucade, were compelled to yeeld to him Nerita, now named S. Mawra. But the warre of the Turks brought not ſo many diſpleaſures to the Venetians, as they receiued harmes by the King of Portugal, who had taken from them, and appropriated to himſelfe the trafficke of Spices, which their Merchants and ſhips bringing out of Alexandria (a noble Citie in Egypt) to Venice, they diſperſed diſperſed with a wonder profite through all the prouinces of Chriſtendome. The which being one of the moſt memorable things that haue hapned in the world ſince many ages, and for the harmes which the Citie of Venice receiued by it, hauing ſome affinitie with the matters of Italy, it cannot much alter the eſtate of our hiſtorie to ſpeake of it at large.

Such men as by deepe ſpeculation and contemplation haue conſidered the wonderfull motions and diſpoſitions of the heauen, and haue left the knowledge thereof recommended to ſucceſſion and poſteritie, haue figured a line running through the round circle of the heauen, from the Weſt to the Eaſt, and bearing an equall diſtance in all parts from the Pole Septentrionall and Pole Meridionall, called by them the line Equinoctiall: for that when the Sunne is vnder it, the day and the night are equall. They haue deuided with imagination the longneſſe of this line into three hundred and threeſcore parts, which they call degrees, as the other circuite of the heauen, by the Poles is likewiſe of three hundred and threeſcore degrees. After theſe men had giuen this rule, the Coſmographers meaſuring and deuiding the earth, haue figured in the earth a line Equinoctiall, which falls perpendicularly vnder the Celeſtiall line figured by the Aſtrologians, deuiding likewiſe the ſame and the circuite of the earth with a line falling perpendicularly vnder the Poles, in largeneſſe of three hundred and threeſcore degrees: ſo as from our Pole to the Pole Meridionall, they put a diſtance of an hundred and foureſcore degrees, and from euery one of the Poles to the line Equinoctiall, foureſcore and ten degrees. Theſe haue bene the generall opinions of the Coſmographers. But touching the particular deſcription of the earth habitable, after they had made knowne that part of the earth which is vnder our Hemiſphere, they had a perſwaſion that that part of the earth lying vnder the Zona torrida, figured in the heauen of the Aſtrologians, and wherein is contained the line Equinoctiall, was (as being neareſt the Sunne) vnhabitable by reaſon of his heate: and that from our Hemiſphere there was no paſſage to the lands which are vnder the Zona torrida, nor to thoſe regions which beyond it are towards the Pole Meridionall, called by the confeſſion of Ptolomie, lands and ſeas vnknowne. By reaſon whereof, both he and the others preſuppoſed, that whoſoeuer would paſſe from our Hemiſphere to the Sino Arabico and Sino Perſico, or to the other parts of India, which firſt came to the knowledge of men by the victories of Alexander the Great, ſhould be conſtrained to go thither by land, or elſe coming as neare to it as he could by the Mediterrane ſea, ſhould performe the reſidue of the way by land. But the nauigations of the Portugals haue made knowne in our time, that thoſe opinions and ſuppoſitions were falſe, for that the Kings of Portugall, puſhed on with deſire to enrich themſelues by merchandize, had begun many yeares ſince to coaſt Africa, and being guided by litle and litle euen to the Iles of Cape Verde, which (according to the opinion of many) the ancients named the Heſperides, diſtant fourteen degrees from the Equinoctial, drawing towards the Pole Arctike, they went on daily more boldly, ſo that making a long circuite towards the South, they came at laſt to the Cape de bonne Eſperance, which is a promontory of Africke, further diſtant then any other from the line Equinoctiall, for that his diſtance containeth eight and thirtie degrees: and drawing from thence towards the Eaſt, they haue ſailed by the Ocean, euen to the Sino Arabico and Sino Perſico, in which places the merchants of Alexandria were wont to buy ſpices which grew there in part, but for the moſt part were brought thither from the Iles Molucques and other parts of India, and are afterward conueyed by land by a way long and full of incommodities, and with no leſſe charges, into Alexandria, where they were ſold to the Venetian Merchants; and they bringing them to Venice, furniſhed all Chriſtendome, whereby there accrued vnto them very great profite; for that they onely hauing the traffike of ſpices in their hands, layd on them what price they wold, and caried into Alexandria many ſorts of merchandize in the ſhips wherein they brought the ſpices; thoſe veſſels likewiſe wherein they conueyed their ſpices into France, Flanders, England, and other places, returning fraughted with other merchandize; the which traffike alſo increaſed much the reuenue of that Cõmonweale, by reaſon of the cuſtomes and fraughts. But the Portugals going by ſea frõ Liſbon the capitall Citie of their Realme, into theſe regions ſo farre remoued, and hauing confederation in the Indian ſea with the Kings of Calicut and other regions neare, and paſſing by degrees further, they built with fine fortreſſes in places conuenient, by whoſe oportunitie making friendſhip with certain cities of thoſe countries, and reducing others to obedience by their armes, they haue appropriated to themſelues the traffike of the Spices, which the merchants of Alexandria were wont to haue afore: and bringing them by ſea into Portugal, they diſtributed them alſo by ſea into the

ſelfe ſame realmes and countries, where the Venetians at the firſt were accuſtomed to vent them. And certainly this nauigation is right wonderfull, for that it containes a courſe of eight thouſand French leagues, through ſeas altogether vnknowne, vnder other ſtarres, vnder other firmament, and with other inſtruments: for that the line Equinoctiall being paſſed, they are no more guided by the North ſtarre, and ſtand altogether depriued of the ſeruice and vſe of the Adamant ſtone, and for that they cannot take harbour in ſo long a way, but in regions vnknowne, differing in language, in religion, in cuſtomes, and altogether barbarous, and enemies to ſtrangers. And yet notwithſtanding ſo many difficulties, they haue in time made this nauigation ſo familiar, that where afore they had wont to conſume ten moneths in the voyage, they finiſh it now commonly in leſſe then ſixe, and with farre leſſe danger. But far more maruellous is the nauigation of the Spaniards, which was begun by Chriſtopher Colombo a Genoway, in the yeare 1490, who hauing ſailed many times by the Ocean ſea, and made coniectures by the obſeruation of certaine winds, of that which afterwards ſucceeded to him indeed, he obtained certaine veſſels of the King and Queene of Spaine, with the which ſetting his courſe towards the Weſt, he diſcouered at thirtie dayes end in the vttermoſt extremities of our Hemiſphere, certaine Ilands altogether vnknowne to men before: regions happie for the ſweetneſſe of the aire, for the fertilitie of the land, and for that (except certaine people that liued vpon mans fleſh) almoſt all the inhabitants being moſt ſimple in their manners, and contented with that which the liberalitie of nature brought forth for them, were not troubled with paſſions of couetouſneſſe and ambition; but moſt vnhappie, in that the people hauing no certaine religion, no knowledge in learning, no ſcience in negociations or handy crafts, and without armes, without the art of warre, and without knowledge or experience in any thing, be as it were no other then tractable and meeke creatures, and a prey moſt eaſie to whomſoeuer would aſſaile them. By meanes whereof, the Spaniards being drawne with the facilitie of commanding thoſe Ilands, and with the profite that might come to them; for that they found there plentifull veines of gold, many of them began to inhabite there, as in their proper countrey: and Chriſtopher Colombo paſſing further, and after him Americo Veſpuccio Florentine, and ſucceſſiuely many others, haue diſcloſed other Ilands and great countries of firme land, finding in certaine of them (albeit in the moſt part the contrary) as well in their buildings both publicke and priuate, as in the forme of their habites and conuerſation, a conformitie of manners and ciuill comelineſſe; but ſo farre ignorant in the knowledge of armes, that they were a ready prey to the firſt inuader: and the limites of theſe new countries are ſo farre ſtretched out, that they farre ſurmount that part of the habitable world formerly knowne. The Spaniards then extending into theſe countries with new ſupplies of people, and with new nauigations, and ſometimes drawing gold and ſiluer out of the mines that are in many places, and alſo in the ſands of the riuers, ſometimes buying it at eaſie prices of the inhabitants, or at leaſt taking it from them by violence, they haue brought infinite quantities into Spaine, many ſailing thither at their proper charges and venture, but vnder licence of the King, to whom they retribute the fifth part of all that they bring from thence, or that by any other meanes cometh into their poſſeſſion: yea, the Spaniards haue taken ſuch courage, that certaine ſhips aduancing three and fiftie degrees towards the Pole Antarctike, alwayes along the coaſts of the firme land, and afterwards falling into a ſtraight ſea, from thence ſailing towards the Eaſt by a very large ſea, and returning afterwards by the nauigation which the Portugals make, they haue (as appeareth clearely) ſailed round about the earth. Which makes me ſay, that both the Portugals and the Spaniards, but ſpecially Colombo, the firſt finder out of this wonderfull and perillous nauigation, are worthy to haue their knowledge, their induſtrie, their reſoluteneſſe, their vigilancie, and their paines celebrated with eternal memory, for that by their vertues, men of our age are made capable of the knowledge of great things, which afore lay hid from the ſenſe and vnderſtanding of men. But farre greater had bene their merites, if they had bene induced to fall into theſe paines and dangers, not by an inſatiable thirſting after gold and riches, but with a deſire to get for themſelues and others this knowledge, or elſe to augment the Chriſtian faith: a matter neuertheleſſe hapned conſequently, for that the inhabitants in many places haue ſuffered conuerſion to the Catholike Religion. By theſe nauigations it is knowne that the antients were beguiled in many things touching the knowledge of the earth: that there was paſſage beyond the line Equinoctiall: that there was habitation vnder the Zona torrida: as alſo (contrary to their opinion) it is knowne by the nauigation of others, that the Zones next to the Poles were inhabited, inhabited, vnder the which they assured (hauing regard to the situation of the heauen, so farre remoued from the course of the Sunne) that there was no abilitie of dwelling for the ouermuch cold. Besides, it is knowne (which some of the ancients beleeued, and some rebuked) that vnder our feete be other inhabitants, whom they named Antipodes.

But returning to the drift of our narration, and to the things which hapned in the yeare 1504, after Caietta was rendred to the Spanish, the newes of the chase of the French neare Garillan, and of so many disorders as followed, filled with teares and complaints almost the whole Realme of France, no lesse for the generall multitude of bodies that were slaine, then for the losse of so great a Nobilitie: so that all the Court accompanying their teares and weepings with habites of sorrow and mourning, shewed themselues full of heauinesse and affliction; and throughout the whole Realme was heard the complainings of men and women, accursing the day wherein the wretched humor of couetousnes to conquer estates in Italy first entred into the heart of their Kings, not contenting themselues with so large a countrey as they possessed. But aboue all other, the King was tormented in his mind, to see himselfe depriued of all hope euer to be able to recouer so noble a Realme, and for so great a diminution of his authority & reputatiõ. He called tõ remembrance the braue words which he had so often obiected against the King of Spaine, and how vainly he had promised to himselfe a successe of those huge preparations which he made to inuade him on all sides: but that which made him rise more into fury and complaint, was the consideration that hauing made so great preparations, vsing all diligence, and sparing no expences, and making warre with enemies most poore, and needy of all things, by the couetousnesse and robberies of his owne people he had bene so shamefully ouerthrowne. In so much as crying out against heauen and earth, he protested with many oathes, that since he was serued with so great negligence and infidelitie of his owne seruants, he would from henceforth neuer leaue to his Captaines the charge of any expedition of warre, nor repose himselfe vpon them, but that he would be present in his owne person at all enterprises. But that which vexed him most of all, was the consideration how much his forces were weakned for the losse of such an armie, for the death of so many Captaines, and of so great a Nobilitie: so that if Maximilian had made any stirre in the Duchie of Millan, or the Spanish army had past further then their victory of Naples, he doubted much to be able to defend that estate, specially Ascanius Sforce ioyning to the one of them, whom the people desired with no litle affection. But touching the Emperour, no man maruelled that he was not awakened in so great oportunitie, for that it was his custome to delay, and to let passe, for the most part, times and occasions: but euery one held a contrary perswasion of Gonsaluo, by reason whereof all the French faction in Italy had a wonderfull feare, lest he, hoping that neither money nor occasions would faile his victorious armie, would follow his victory, to subuert the state of Millan, and in his way to alter the affaires of Tuscan: which if he had done, it was assuredly beleeued, that the French King, drained of money, and abated in courage, had yeelded to the storme without any resistance, specially his people hauing no desire to passe into Italy, and such as returned to Caietta, hauing passed the Mounts, without hauing any respect to the commandements of their King declared to them at Genes. Besides, it was clearly discerned, that the King, hauing no inclination to armes, was wholly prepared to make peace with Maximilian, and no lesse disposed to continue the negociations and practises with the King of Spaine, for the solicitation whereof (vsing no intermission in the extreme heate of the warre) the Spanish Embassadours had still bene and then were at the Court. But Gonsaluo, whom hereafter we will call for the most part the Great Captaine, hauing confirmed with so many glorious victories the surname, that before had bene giuen him by a Spanish brag, refused to embrace the benefite of so great an occasion, either for that being altogether without money, and indebted to his armie for many payes, he saw it impossible to make his people march either vnder hope of profite, or promise of payes, which would be long in coming, seeing they made great instance either to be satisfied of their pays, or to be bestowed in garrison: or else he was tied to proceed according to the will of his King, whose direction it was not lawfull for him to transgresse: or at the least it seemed not to agree with his securitie, to draw his armie out of the kingdome of Naples, till first he had purged it of all his enemies; for that Lewis d'Ars, one of the French Captaines, who since the iourney of Cirignola had put himselfe within Venousa with such remainders of French men as were not to be despised; and who, whilest the armies were vpon the shores of Garillan, had occupied Troya and S. Seuero, kept in armes all Puwilla: and certaine Barons alſo of the faction of Anion, which were retired vpon their eſtates, ſtood vpon their defence, embracing openly the part of the French King: and hereunto was added, that a litle after the victory the Great Captaine fell into a dangerous ſickneſſe, by reaſon whereof, not being able to go in perſon to any expedition, he ſent Aluiano with part of his armie to make warre vpon Lewis d'Ars. By which his neceſſitie, not able for the preſent to follow his victorie out of the kingdome of Naples, the reſidue of Italy remained rather in ſuſpition then in trauell. For the Venetians, according to their cuſtome, ſtood doubtfull, expecting what would be the iſſue of thoſe things: and the Florentines thought they had wonne much, if at a time when they wholly deſpaired to be ſuccored by the French King, they were not inuaded by the Great Captaine: and the Pope, referring to another time his ambitious thoughts, ſtudied to bring to paſſe that the Duke Valentinois, who held no more in Romagna but the Caſtles of Furly, of Ceſena, and of Bertinoire, (for Anthonie d'Ordelaffi had a few dayes afore gotten the Caſtle of Forlimpople by corrupting of the keeper) might accord to leaue them to him. Valentinois condeſcended to giue to the Pope the aſſignement of the Caſtle of Ceſena, and Dom Petro d'Ouiedo a Spaniard, being gone thither to receiue it in the Popes name, was hanged by the caſtle-keeper, obiecting that it was diſhonor to him to obey his Lord whileſt he was a priſoner, & that he that preſumed to impoſe that requeſt vpon him deſerued to be puniſhed. By reaſon whereof the Pope deſpairing to obtaine his deſire without the deliuery of Valentinois, he accorded with him (and of this conuention there was a Bull diſpatched in the Conſiſtory for greater ſuretie,) that he ſhould be placed in the rocke of Oſtia, vnder the abſolute power of Bernardin Caruagial a Spaniard, Cardinal of Santa Croce, and he to let him go whenſoeuer he had rendred the caſtles of Ceſena and Bertinoire, and transferred to the Pope the aſſignation of the rock of Furly, and appointed in the city of Rome, bankers to anſwer fifteen thouſand duckats in recompence of the charges which the caſtle-keeper ſaid he had expended, who had promiſed to render it when he ſhould haue receiued the aſſignation and the ſaid ſumme of money.

But the Pope had another intention, who though he would not apparently breake the faith he had giuen, yet his meaning was to keepe his deliuery in delay, either for feare leſt he being at libertie, the caſtle-keeper of Furly would refuſe to render the Rocke, or elſe for the memory of the iniuries he had receiued of his father and him, or at leaſt for the hate which all men indifferently bare him. And Valentinois growing into ſuſpition, that the Pope would not hold faith with him, required ſecretly the Great Captaine to giue him ſafeconduct to come to Naples, and withall to ſend two galleys to conuey him from Oſtia: which requeſt being condeſcended vnto by Gonſaluo, the Cardinal of Santa Croce holding the ſame ſuſpition with Valentinois, ſuffered him to depart without the Popes priuitie, being firſt aduertiſed, that pledge was put in for the fifteen thouſand duckats, with the redeliuery vp of the Caſtles of Ceſena and Bertinoire: and Valentinois without tarrying for the galleys which the Great Captaine ſhould ſend him, went ſecretly by land to Nettuna, from whence he ſailed in a litle barke to Mondragon, and from thence he went by land to Naples, where Gonſaluo receiued him with a chearfull countenance and great honor. At Naples, communing many times in ſecret with Gonſaluo, he ſolicited him to giue him power to paſſe to Piſa, aſſuring him, that if he might but once put foote into that Citie, it would be much to the profite and furtherance of his King. Gonſaluo making ſemblance to fauour the deuice, and offering him galleys to conuey him thither, and ſuffering him to leuie in the kingdome ſuch regiments of footmen as he would carry with him, entertained him in this hope till he had receiued anſwer from his King conformable to that he had determined to do, alwaies conſulting with him of the affaires of Piſa and of Tuſcan; and Aluiano at the ſame time offering to inuade the Florentines, for the deſire he had to ſee the family of the Medices reſtored. But the galleys being now prepared, and his bands of footmen in readineſſe to march the day following, Valentinois after he had conferred long & ſame night with Gonſaluo, who gaue him a kind farewell, with demonſtration of great affection, embracing one another at parting (according to the faire ſhewes that the old Ferdinand of Aragon was ſaid to haue vſed to Iaques Piccinin) was by his commandement, as ſoone as he was out of the chamber, retained in the Caſtle, ſending forthwith into his lodging to take away the ſafeconduct that had bene ſent him before he departed from Oſtia. Gonſaluo excuſed himſelfe vpon the authoritie of his King, who ſending warrant to apprehend him priſoner, his Maieſties commandement (he ſaid) was of more force then his ſafe conduct; for that the aſſurance that was giuen by the proper authoritie of a ſeruant, was not auaileable againſt the will of his Lord; adding beſides, that it was neceſſary to hold him reſtrained, ned, for that, not ſatisfied with ſo many leud practiſes done in times paſt, he ſtudied ſtill to trouble the eſtates of others, he deuiſed to innouate things, he ſowed vniuſt ſlanders, and ſought to kindle a fire through all Italy: and ſhortly after he ſent him in a light galley priſoner into Spaine, leauing him of all his traine but one Page to ſerue him: and there he was impriſoned within the Caſtle of Medino del Campo. About this time truce was made both by ſea and land, as well for Italy as the nations beyond the Mounts, betweene the French King and the King of Spaine: whereunto (the French deſiring it greatly) the King of Spaine conſented willingly, for that he thought it better to confirme by that meanes with greater ſuretie and reſt, that which he had conquered, then to referre all to hazard by new warres, which being full of perill and expences, bring forth oftentimes other iſſues then are hoped for. The conditions were, That euery one ſhould retaine that which he poſſeſſed: That it ſhould be ſuffered to the ſubiects of both parties to traffike through all their realmes and eſtates, except in the kingdom of Naples, with the which exception the Great Captaine obtained indirectly that which was forbidden to him directly. For, in the frontiers of thoſe places which the French held (which were onely Roſſano in Calabria, Oiro in the land of Otranto, and in Powilla, Venouſa, Conuerſan, and the Mount Caſtle) Gonſaluo beſtowed men to giue impediment, that not one of the ſouldiers or men of thoſe townes ſhould vſe conuerſation with any peece poſſeſſed by the Spaniſh; which brought them ſuddenly into ſuch neceſſitie, that Lewis d'Ars with the other Barons and ſouldiers of thoſe places went their way, knowing that the inhabitants, not able to endure ſo many diſcommodities, were determined to yeeld themſelues to the Spaniards. And yet the kingdome of Naples, notwithſtanding the enemies were all expulſed, enioyed not the fruites of the peace: for that the Spaniſh ſouldiers, to whom were due their payes for more then one yeare, not contented that the Great Captaine (the better to containe them till he had leuied prouiſions for money) had beſtowed them in ſundry places where they liued vpon the people (which men of warre call, to liue by diſcretion,) breaking all bonds of diſcipline and obedience, had entred Capua and the ſea Caſtle, from whence they would not depart till they were ſatisfied of their payes for the time paſt: and becauſe the money could not well by leuied (the ſumme being great) without laying an exceſſiue taxation on the realme, being already drained and conſumed by the long warres, the conditions of men were very miſerable, ſeeing the medicine was no leſſe grieuous then the diſeaſe they went about to cure: matters ſo much the more grieuous, by how much they were new, and without former examples. For, notwithſtanding that ſince the ancient times, wherein the diſcipline of warre was exerciſed with ſeueritie, the ſouldiers had alwayes bene full of libertie, and troubleſome to the peoples; yet things being as yet not wholly diſordered, they liued for the moſt part of their payes, and their libertie was not altogether intollerable. But the Spaniards were the firſt that began in Italy to liue wholly vpon the ſubſtance of the people, the diſabilitie of their Kings giuing them the occaſion, or haply the neceſſitie ſo to do, by reaſon they were ill payed: of which beginning, diſorders alwayes increaſing (for the imitation of an ill is alwayes greater then the example; as on the contrary, the imitation of good is alwayes leſſe) both the Spaniards themſelues and the Italians alſo, whether they were payd or not payd, haue euer ſince continued that cuſtome, and haue gone ſo farre, that to the great diſhonour of the diſcipline of warre at this day, the goods of friends are no more aſſured from the inſolencie of ſouldiers, then thoſe of the enemie. What by the taking of Valentinois, and this truce betweene the two Kings, with opinion that the peace would ſucceed immediatly, Romagna was put wholly in reſt: for Imola was diuolued afore by the wils of the chiefe of the Citie into the power of the Pope, and not without the conſent of the Cardinall S. George, whom the Pope entertained with a vaine hope that he would render it eſtſoones to his nephewes. And about theſe ſeaſons Lewis his baſtard brother being entred into Furly by the death of Anthony d'Ordelaffi, that Citie had fallen into the hands of the Venetians, to whom Lewis offered it (knowing he was not able enough to hold it) had not the conditions of the preſent time made them feare to accept it, leſt they ſhould further incenſe the Pope, who without any reſiſtance obtained the towne abandoned by Lewis; and had likewiſe, paying fifteene thouſand duckats, the Citadell: a place which the keeper being faithfull to Valentinois, would neuer giue vp, till he was aſſured of his impriſonment by men which he ſent expreſly to Naples.

Truce betweene the kings of Spaine and France.

Thus armes being layd downe in all the other parts of Italy, the Florentines notwithſtanding forbare not in the beginning of Sommer to continue the warre vpon the Piſans, according to their cuſtome: for, hauing newly taken into their pay Iohn Paul Baillon, with other Captaines and men at armes of the Colonnois and Sauelleis, and raiſing farre greater forces then they were wont, they ſent them to ſpoile the corne of the Piſans, wherein they proceeded with the greater courage, for that they doubted no impediment by the Spaniard: not ſo much for that the King of Spaine had not named the Piſans in the truce (wherein both the Kings had libertie to comprehend their friends and adherents) as for that the Great Captaine, after his victory againſt the French men, although from the beginning he had giuen great hopes to the Piſans, had exerciſed gracious and ſweete ſpeeches with the Florentines, hoping at the leaſt by his cunning to ſeparate them from the French King: and albeit afterwards he found himſelfe diſappointed of this hope, yet wiſely forbearing to incenſe them, as not to giue them occaſion to be the more for the French King, he was, by the meanes of Proſper Colonne, almoſt entred (but no otherwiſe then with words onely) into ſecret intelligence with them, that if it hapned the French King eſtſoones to renew the warres of Naples, that they ſhould not miniſter to him any aide, as alſo for his part he would not giue ſuccours to the Piſans, except the Florentines ſhould ſend an armie with artilleries to take the ſame Citie, which he wiſhed they ſhould not recouer ſo long as they followed the amitie of the French King. The Florentine army prepared to ſpoile not onely thoſe parts of the countrey of Piſa which they had waſted in times paſt, but alſo to ouerrun S. Roſſoro and Barbaricino, and ſo to the vales of Serclo and Oſolo, places ioyning to Piſa, whereunto they could not go without danger when their armie was leſſe. This being done, they incamped before Librafatta, which being manned with a very ſlender garriſon, was within few dayes conſtrained to yeeld to diſcretion. And it is not to be doubted but that the Piſans that yeare had bene compelled by famine to receiue the yoke of the Florentines, if they had not bene ſuccored by their neighbours, but principally by the Genoways and Lucquoys (for Pandolfe Petrucci very apt to ſtirre vp others, and very large in his promiſes to contribute to expences, was very long in effects,) with whoſe moneys Reniero of Saſſetto, a ſouldier of the Great Captain, with certaine other leaders (with his leaue) led to Piſa by ſea two hundred horſemen, and the Genoways ſent thither a Prouoſt with a thouſand footmen: ouer and beſides which prouiſions, Bardello de Porto Venere a famous rouer in the ſea Tyrrheneum, being paid by the ſaid helpers, was called the Captaine of the Piſans, and reuictualled Piſa continually with a Gallion and other Brigandines: by reaſon whereof the Florentines holding it neceſſary, that beſides the trauels they gaue them by land, they ſhould alſo take from them the vſe of the ſea, entertained three light galleys of King Federike which were in Prouence; with the which, as their Captaine Dom Dimas Ricaenſe approched Liuorne, Bardello retired; and yet ſometimes taking the occaſion of the winds, he brought ſome barks laden with victuals to the mouth of Arne, from whence they fel eaſily into the towne of Piſa, which at the ſame time ſuffered many perplexities by land. For, after the army of Florence had taken Librafatta, deuiding themſelues into many parts, they looked how to giue impediment to the tilling of the lands for the yeare following, and to reſtraine the paſſage of victuals both by the way of Lucques and the ſea: and beſides this, in the end of ſommer they ſpoiled the Millet, & all other ſuch kinds of graines, whereof that country brings forth a great quantitie. Furthermore, the Florentines vnwearied with ſo great expences, & holding nothing impoſſible that gaue them hope to accõpliſh their purpoſe, they deuiſed to trouble the Piſans in a new faſhion, by aſſaying to turne the riuer of Arne, which runneth by the town of Piſa frõ the tower of Fagiana fiue miles frõ Piſa, into the poole which is betweene Piſa and Liuorne: which if they had brought to paſſe, there could haue bene no more portage of things to Piſa by ſea through the riuer of Arne; and the raine waters, for that the countrey is low, not able to be conueyed into the ſea, the Citie had remained as it were in the midſt of a marriſh; as alſo for the difficultie to paſſe Arne, the Piſans could not haue runne from thence forward along the hils to hinder the traffike from Liuorne to Florence; and laſtly, they ſhould haue bene conſtrained to fortifie that part of Piſa, by the which the riuer entred and iſſued, leſt it ſhould be open to the incurſions of their enemies. But this enterpriſe, which was begun with a very great hope, and followed with farre greater expences, was in the end made vaine: for that, as it often hapneth, that like enterpriſes, notwithſtanding they be laid out by meaſure and line, are yet found fallible by experience, which is the certaine proofe of the difference that is betweene the deuiſing of things and the doing of them: beſides many difficulties, not conſidered before, cauſed by the courſe of the riuer, which when they thought to reſtraine, abated of it ſelfe, fretting his channell; the bottome of the poole where they would haue

haue it enter, contrary to the reaſons and opinions of many enginiſts and water-workers, was found to be higher then the channell of Arne. Beſides, in ſo great a deſire to obtaine Piſa, fortune alſo ſhewed her ſelfe contrary to the Florentines, for that the galleys which they had entertained, going to Villefranche to take a ſhippe of the Piſans loaden with graine, in their returne were ſo weatherbeaten neare to Rapalle, that they ſuffered ſhipwracke, the Captaine with the reſidue ſauing themſelues with great difficultie. But the Florentines minding to make triall of all ſort of meanes, after they had proued to bring the Piſans to reaſon by armes and threatnings, they ſought to reclaime them by gentleneſſe and courteſie, making a new law, by the which it was granted, That euery citizen or ſubiect of the countrey of Piſa, that within a certaine time would withdraw himſelfe to his liuing or dwelling place, ſhould obtaine pardon of all faults committed, with full reſtitution of goods. But notwithſtanding this law, there were very few of reſolute heart and faith, which would depart out of Piſa, but they ſuffered all ſuch as were vnprofitable for the warre to go their way: the ſame being the cauſe that both the dearth of victuals which raged afore, was not now ſo great, and alſo that they receiued afterwards certaine commoditie of reuenues from others that ſecretly aided them. The neceſſitie of the Piſans was by theſe meanes ſomewhat diminiſhed, yet not ſo much, but that they found themſelues much vexed with their great pouerty & wants: neuertheles hauing all things in leſſe horror then the name of the Florentines, notwithſtanding the minds of the Peaſants did oftentimes wauer, they determined to endure all extremities rather then to yeeld themſelues. Therefore they offered to giue themſelues vp to the Genoways, with whom they had ſo often fought for the iuriſdiction, and for their ſafetie, and by whom their power had bene in time paſt afflicted and embaſed: of which offer, the Lucquoys and Pandolfe Petrucci were the cauſe, for the deſire they had (to auoide in themſelues the continuall expences and troubles) to bind the Genoways to the defence of Piſa, offering (the more eaſily to induce them to accord) to defray part of the expences for three yeares. Whereupon the Genoways, hauing a deliberation to embrace the offer, notwithſtanding Iohn Lewis de Fieſque with many others were againſt it, made an inſtance to the French King to ſuffer them, without whoſe conſent they had no power to execute any deliberation; ſhewing vnto him how dangerous it would be, that the Piſans, excluded from this their laſt and almoſt onely hope, ſhould come to offer themſelues to the King of Spaine; from whence would ſucceed, to his great preiudice, that both Genes ſhould be in continuall trauell and danger, and almoſt all Tuſcan ſhould be conſtrained to follow the Spaniſh faction. Theſe reaſons, albeit at the beginning they ſo much moued the King that he was almoſt at a point to grant their demands, yet his Councell conſidering, that if the Genoways ſhould begin to vndertake warres of themſelues, and for a deſire of impery, to haue confederation with other Potentates, it would be cauſe, that coming afterwards to raiſe their thoughts to greater things, they would put themthemſelues into abſolute libertie: he forbad them expreſly to accept the iuriſdiction of Piſa, and yet he permitted them to perſiſt in aiding and ſuccouring of them, notwithſtanding the Florentines had made great complaints vnto him.

About this time the peace was earneſtly laboured betweene the King of France and the King and Queene of Spaine, who offered diſſemblingly to render the Realme of Naples to King Federike, or to the Duke of Calabria his ſonne, to whom the French King ſhould reſigne and giue vp all his claime, ſo farre forth as the mariage were accompliſhed betweene the Duke and the Queene widow, Neece to the ſame King, hauing afore bene wife to yong Ferdinand of Aragon King of Naples. And it was without doubt, that the French King had a mind ſo farre eſtranged from the affaires of the kingdome of Naples, that for his owne regard, he had accepted all ſorts of peace, if it had not bene for theſe two difficulties that reſtrained him: the one, and the leaſt, was the ſhame that would redound to him, to leaue abandoned the Barons, who, for that they followed his faction, had ſuffered priuation of their eſtates, and to whom were offered conditions hard and intollerable: the other, which moued him ſomewhat more, was the doubt wherein he was, leſt the King and Queene of Spaine hauing other intentions, offered, according to their accuſtomed ſubtilties, this reſtitution for ſome end, the which, though his Maieſtie conſented, the effect ſhould not follow: and leſt in the meane while the Archduke ſhould be eſtranged from him, who deſiring to haue the kingdome of Naples for his ſonne, made inſtance that there ſhould be continuation of the peace which he had formerly made. Therefore he anſwered generally, that he deſired the peace, but that he could not with honour giue vp to an Aragon

the rights which he had in the ſame Realme: and on the other part, he continued the ancient practiſes with the Emperour and the Archduke; and when he was almoſt certaine of the concluſion and effect, to the end they ſhould not be interrupted by the incertaine promiſes of the king of Spaine, he let call before him the Spaniſh Embaſſadors, (giuing to vnderſtand for his greater honour, that the reſpects and intereſts of the Barons did chiefly moue him,) and being ſet in the chaire royall, in the aſpect and preſence of all the Court, with ſolemne ceremonies farre aboue the vſage of former times, he complained that their King expreſſed in words a deſire and diſpoſition to the peace, hauing his intentions diſſembled, in which regard, and alſo for that it was not a thing worthy the vertue and honour of a King, to conſume the time in vaine practiſes, he told them it were their beſt to depart out of the Realme of France. And when they were gone, the Embaſſadours of Maximilian and the Archduke came to giue perfection to that which had bene negociated: in which action (becauſe there were plots layed to greater purpoſes) was aſſiſtant the Biſhop of Ciſteron the Popes ordinary Nuncio in that Court, and the Marquis of Finale, whom the Pope ſent expreſly about this buſineſſe; which hauing bene many times afore throughly debated, for the profite which appeared very great to all thoſe Princes, was finally ſet downe, without much difficultie, vnder theſe conditions: That the mariage of the Lady Claude the French Kings daughter, communed vpon long time before, ſhould now grow to effect with Charles the eldeſt ſonne to the Archduke: and for more firme confirmation of the ſame, there ſhould be ioyned to the oath and ſubſcription of the French King, the ratification of Frances Earle of Angouleſme, who, the King dying without iſſue male, was next heire to the Crowne, together with many of the principals of that kingdome: That all the inueſtitures of the ſtate of Millan, allowed till that day, being razed and cancelled for iuſt and honeſt occaſions, Maximilian ſhould transferre the inueſtiture thereof to the French King, for himſelfe and his heires males, and for want of ſuch iſſue, it ſhould be (in fauor of the mariage) conueyed to Madame Claude and to Charles, and if Charles ſhould die before the conſummation of the mariage, then it ſhould deſcend to the Lady Claude, and to the ſecond ſonne of the Archduke if ſhe married with him: That betweene the Pope, the Emperour, the French King, and the Archduke, ſhould be made a confederation for their common defence, and to offend the Venetians, from whom they all determined to withdraw thoſe places which they occupied of theirs: That the Emperour ſhould paſſe in perſon into Italy againſt the Venetians, and afterwards go to Rome to take the Crowne Imperiall: That the French King, as ſoone as the Charters ſhould be diſpatched, ſhould pay for the inueſtiture threeſcore thouſand florins of Rhein, and threeſcore thouſand others within ſixe moneths, and euery yeare a paire of ſpurres of gold, vpon the day of the Natiuitie of our Lord: That there ſhould be place left for the King of Spaine to enter into this confederation within foure moneths: but it was not expreſſed, that in caſe he did not enter, it ſhould be lawfull for the French King to inuade the kingdome of Naples: That the French King ſhould giue no more aide nor ſuccours to the Count Palatine, who ſtirred vp by him, and entertained with hope of his ſuccours, was in great warre with the Emperour. The Venetians were excluded out of this league, notwithſtanding that the King had always giuen willing eare to their Embaſſadours, and that the Cardinall of Amboiſe (to put them out of ſuſpition) had nouriſhed them with aſſured promiſes and oathes, that the King would neuer go againſt that confederation which he had with them. Theſe matters were contained in letters which were ſolemnly paſſed: beſides the which it was moued that the King and Maximilian ſhould ſpeake together at another time in ſome place conuenient: and the King promiſed at that time, that he would deliuer Lodowike Sforce out of priſon, and endue him with conuenient meanes to liue in the Realme of France; the ſafetie of whom Maximilian had ſhame not to procure, for that he knew well, that the promiſes he had made him, and the hopes he had vainly repoſed in him, had bene cauſes to haſten his ruine: for which cauſe, when the Cardinall of Amboiſe went to him at Trent, he wrought ſo, that he ſhould no more be ſo ſtraitly kept as he had bene, making now importunate inſtance that he might remaine at libertie in the Court of France, or in ſuch place of the Realme as it pleaſed the King. The King promiſed alſo, at his requeſt, that the exiles of the Duchie of Millan ſhould returne, whereupon there aroſe many difficulties in the negociation of Trent. This capitulation being ſo greatly to the aduantage of the Archduke and Maximilian, it was beleeued that notwithſtanding his ordinary variations, he would keepe it, the Pope being comprehended, and being no leſſe agreeable to the French King, not ſo much for the deſire he had had at that time to make new enterprises, as for an ambitious respect to obtaine the inuestiture of the Duchie of Millan, and to be assured not to be molested neither by Cæsar nor his sonne. King Federike died much about this time, being wholly depriued of all hope to recouer by accord the kingdome of Naples, although he was perswaded afore (as euery one naturally suffereth himselfe to be beguiled by desire) that the King of Spaine had a better deuotion to it then the French King: not considering that in that time it was a thing vaine to hope for the restitution of so noble a Realme, such examples being rare euen in ancient times, wherein men were much more disposed to acts of vertue and nobilitie, then in the times succeeding: nor thinking that it was a thing out of all likelihood, that he which had vsed so many deceits to occupie the moitie of a kingdome, would now that he had won all, depriue himselfe of the fruite and glorie of his victory. But in the managing of the businesse he might haue perceiued, that the one made no lesse difficultie then the other; yea that he had more reason rather to despaire, that he that was already possessed would not restore, then that he which held nothing in the kingdome, would not consent.

In the end of this yeare died Elizabeth Queene of Spaine, a Lady of most honest and honourable conditions, who wonne in the opinion of her subiects a right worthy name of magnanimitie and prudence: to her did properly appertaine the kingdome of Castile, which is the greatest and most puissant part of Spaine, to the which she succeeded after the death of Henry her brother, but not without bloud and warre. For albeit it was beleeued for a long time, that Henry by nature was vnable to procreation, and for that reason Beltramise could not be his daughter, which was brought forth by his wife, and by him nourished many yeares as the fruite of his bodie, and that for that occasion Elizabeth sister of Henry was acknowledged for Princesse of Castile, a title neerest to the succession: yet many Barons of the Realme rising after his death in fauour of Beltramise, and the King of Portugal her allie ministring succours by armes; the parties coming at last to battell, the cause of Elizabeth was approued the most iust by the issue of the field, Ferdinand of Aragon her husband leading the armie, who likewise was descended of the house of the Kings of Castile, and conioyned to Elizabeth in the third degree of consanguinitie, and who succeeding afterward by the death of John his father to the Realme of Aragon, they both tooke vpon them the title of King and Queene of Spaine: for that the kingdome of Valence being vnited to the Crown of Aragon, together with the country of Catalogna, they were Lords ouer all the Prouince of Spaine, which is contained betweene the Mounts Pirenei, the Ocean sea, and the Mediterrane sea: vnder which title, for that that region had bin occupied by many Kings of the Mores, the title of many kingdomes is comprehended, as euery one of them had a title separate by it selfe; except notwithstanding the kingdome of Granado, which being at that time possessed by the Mores, was afterwards by the vertue of this King and Queene, gloriously subdued to the Empire of Castile, together with the litle kingdome of Portugal, and that of Nauarre which is much lesse, all which had Kings particular. But the kingdome of Aragon, with Sicilia, Sardignia, and other Ilands appertaining by inheritance to Ferdinand, were gouerned by him onely, without interposing the name or authoritie of the Queene, contrary to the policie and course of gouernment in Castile. The reason was, for that that kingdome belonging by law of succession to Elizabeth, and standing in a state endowed to Ferdinand, things were administred vnder their common name, as well in demonstrations as in effects, nothing being executed which was not debated, ordained and subscribed by them both. The title of the King of Spaine was common, their Embassadours dispatched in common, their armies leuied in common, their warres administred in common, and neither of them in particular appropriating more then the other in authoritie and gouernment of the kingdome. But by the death of Elizabeth without issue male, the succession of Castile, by the lawes of that kingdome (which regarding more the proximitie then the sexe, exclude not the woman) belonged to Iane the daughter of Ferdinand and her, and wife to the Archduke, for that their eldest daughter, which had bene married to Emanuel King of Portugal, together with her litle son, were dead long time before: by reason whereof, the administration of the Realme appertaining no more to Ferdinand, he was to returne into his litle kingdome of Aragon; litle in comparison of the Realme of Castile, for the straitnesse of the country, and smalnesse of the reuenues, and for that the Kings of Aragon, not hauing absolute regall authoritie in all things, be in many points subiect to the constitutions and customes of the same prouinces, which limite much the power of their Kings. But Elizabeth drawing ing towards her death, ordained by her teſtament, that Ferdinand ſo long as he liued ſhould be gouernour of Caſtile, as well for that ſhe deſired he might be kept in his firſt greatneſſe, for the amitie that had bene mutually betweene them, as alſo for that ſhe knew it concerned the profite of her ſubiects to be continued vnder the moderate gouernment of Ferdinand, and imported no leſſe the commoditie of her ſonne in law and daughter, who, ſeeing in the end they ſhould likewiſe ſucceed Ferdinand, had reaſon to eſteeme it much to their behoofe, that vntill Philip, borne and nouriſhed in Flanders where things were gouerned diuerſly, had attained a riper age, & taken better knowledge of the laws, cuſtomes, nature, and manners of Spaine, all their realmes might be preſerued for them vnder one peaceable and well ordered gouernment, the countries of Caſtile and Aragon being maintained in the meane while as one body. The death of the Queene cauſed new troubles in Spaine: but the affaires of Italy, as we meane to expreſſe hereafter, were better diſpoſed to a new peace.

1505. The yeare 1505 things continued in the ſame eſtate of tranquillitie wherein they had bene the yeare before, which was ſuch, that had not the quarell betweene the Florentines and Piſans brought ſome alteration, the actions of armes for that yeare had wholly ſurceaſſed, one part of the Potentates being deſirous of peace, and thoſe that were moſt inclined to warre, reſtrained for many reaſons. For it ſufficed the King of Spaine (who continued ſtill in the ſame title) being poſſeſſed with the thoughts of his dead wife, to keepe the kingdome of Naples by meanes of the truce that had bene made: and the French King was entred into a great ſuſpition, for that Caſar, following in this as in all other things, his wandring nature, had not ratified the peace: and the Pope, albeit he was deſirous of innouation, yet he neither durſt nor could ſtirre, vnleſſe he were accompanied with the armes of ſome mightie Prince: and the Venetians eſteemed it to no ſmall thing, if in ſo great matters as had bene debated againſt them, and in ſo ill a diſpoſition of the Pope, they were not moleſted by others: and to appeaſe the Pope, they had offered many moneths before to leaue him Rimini, and all that they had poſſeſſed in Romagna ſince the death of Pope Alexander, ſo that he would conſent that they might retaine Faenza with the territories: which offer they made for the feare they had of the French King, and for that Caſar at the ſolicitation of the Pope, had ſent his Embaſſadours to Venice to ſummon them to make reſtitution of the lands of the Church. But the Pope hauing giuen them anſwer according to the conſtancie of his mind, and free nature to expreſſe his conceptions, that he would not conſent to the retaining onely of a litle tower, but did hope to recouer before his death both Rauenna and Cerua, Cities which they poſſeſſed no leſſe vniuſtly then they did Faenza, they paſſed no further. But in the beginning of this yeare, their feares being become greater, they offered by the means of the Duke of Vrbin (a friend common to them both) to reſtore all that they had occupied, which was not of the appertenances of Faenza and Rimini, ſo that the Pope, who afore would not admit their Embaſſadours to tender their obedience, would now conſent to receiue them. To which demand albeit the Pope made ſome ſhew of difficultie, ſuppoſing that thereby he ſhould do wrong to his dignitie, and that it ſeemed to him inconuenient to allow it, conſidering the great quarels and threatnings he had vſed againſt them; yet hauing regard to the perplexities that were endured by them of Furly, Imola, and Ceſena, (who being depriued of the greateſt part of their countries, ſuffered many incommodities) and ſeeing withall no other meanes to redreſſe things with ſpeed, for that the affaires betweene Caſar and the French King proceeded with ſo great a longneſſe, at laſt he conſented to that, which in effect was a gaine without loſſe, ſince neither by words nor writings he was bound to any thing. So the townes being reſtored, eight Embaſſadours of the principals of the Senate, choſen ſince he was created Pope, were ſent to him (which was the greateſt companie of Embaſſadours which that Commonweale had euer ſent to any Pope, if he were not a Venetian:) who after they had tendred their obedience with the ceremonies accuſtomed, they brought not backe to Venice any ſigne, whereby it might be iudged that the Pope was become more milde or more tractable. About this time the French King deſiring to put end to that which had bene debated, ſent the Cardinal of Amboiſe to Haguenau a towne of baſe Almaine, where Caſar and the Archduke attended him, hauing newly taken that towne from the Count Palatine. The Cardinall being arriued, there were publiſhed and ſolemnly ſworne the conuentions that had bene made, and the Cardinall payed the moitie of the money promiſed for the inueſtiture, with promiſe that Caſar ſhould receiue the other moitie as ſoone as he ſhould paſſe into Italy: although both at the preſent

ſent he gaue to vnderſtand, and a litle after he declared, that he could not paſſe that yeare for the impediments which were in Germanie; by reaſon whereof the ſuſpition of warre was ſo much the leſſe, the French King being determined to enter into no new attempt without him. Onely the warre, almoſt continuall betweene the Florentines and Piſans, remained kindled in Italy; the which proceeding ſlowly, and no otherwiſe purſued but when occaſions were offered to the one or the other partie, who otherwiſe had not any ſetled enterpriſe, it hapned that Luke Sauelle iſſued out of Caſcina, where the Florentines made the ſeate of the warre, and with him certaine Captaines and chieftaines of the Florentines, with foure hundred horſe and many bands of footmen, to reuictuall Librafatta, and by the ſame meanes to take certaine heards of cattell of the Piſans which were on the other ſide the riuer of Sercle, vpon the grounds of the Lucquoys, not ſo much for the benefite of the prey, as for a deſire they had to draw the Piſans to fight, hauing a confidence to ouerthrow them, as being the ſtronger in the field: and when they had conueyed victuals into Librafatta, and poſſeſſed the prey they pretended, they returned with leiſure by the ſame way, to the end to giue time enough to the Piſans to come and charge them. Tarlatin chiefe commander ouer their men of warre, iſſued out of Piſa as ſoone as he vnderſtood the enemie droue away their cattell; and becauſe the chiefe point of the reſcue reſted in expedition, he tooke no more with him then fifteene men at armes, fortie light horſemen, and threeſcore footmen, leauing order that a greater ſtrength ſhould follow him: and vnderſtanding that certaine of the Florentine horſemen were run vp euen to S. Iaques neare Piſa, he made towards them, who retiring to their ſtrength which ſtayed at the bridge Capella vpon the riuer of Oſolo, and three miles from Piſa, where they tarried for the droues of cattell that were taken, and the Mulets with the which they had reuictualled Librafatta coming behind, and as yet beyond the bridge, which the firſt bands of footmen had gained, and manned the loopeholes and trenches, Tarlatin followed them euen to the bridge, not perceiuing that all the armie of the Florentines was in that place, till he was ſo neare that he could not returne without manifeſt danger; and therefore he determined to aſſault the bridge, declaring to his companie, that that whereunto their perill conſtrained them, was not without great hope and poſſibilitie to be ouercome; for that in a place ſo ſtraite, where few men could fight, the great number of their enemies could not endomage them; ſo that if they could not paſſe the bridge, yet they might eaſily maintaine defence till the regiments of Piſa which he had ſent for, were come to their ſuccours: but if they could winne the bridge, the victory would be eaſie to them, for that the way beyond the bridge, which lieth betweene the bridge and the mountaine, being ſtraite and narrow, the multitude of their enemies, encombred with the mulets and beaſts they had ſtolen, would of themſelues fall eaſily into diſorder, being drawne into a place ſo inconuenient either to fight or to flie. His words were iuſtified with deeds, for he being the foremoſt, giuing with great valour the ſpurres to his horſe, charged the bridge, but being compelled to retire, another did the like, and after him a third, whoſe horſe being hurt, the Captaine returned with great furie to ſuccour him, and what with the force of his weapon and fury of his horſe, he paſſed ouer the bridge, the footmen that defended giuing him way, and foure others of his companie did the like. Then whileſt they entertained the skirmiſh on the other ſide the bridge with the footmen of the enemie in a ſtraite medow, certaine footmen of the Piſans paſſed ouer the riuer, in water vp to the chin, the horſemen likewiſe paſſing without impediment ouer the bridge which was now abandoned, and thoſe that came from Piſa diſperſed and without order, beginning to arriue, the Florentine ſouldiers ſeeing themſelues reduced into a place ſtraite and narrow, fell into confuſion amongſt themſelues, and being quite diſcouraged, and the men at armes yet more then the footmen, hauing no Captaine of authoritie to retaine them in order, they turned their backes, and fell to flying: in ſo much as they which were farre mightier in forces, and marched in warlike order, left the victory to thoſe whoſe numbers were farre inferiour, and came altogether disbanded, with intention rather to make ſhew onely, then to fight indeed, many Captains of the footmen and other men of mark, remaining either dead, priſoners, or hurt, and ſuch as fled, being for the moſt part ſtripped by the people of the plaine country of Lucques. This defeate of the Florentines, brought a great diſorder to their affaires in the country of Piſa, for that a ſmall number of horſemen being left within Caſcina, they were not able for many dayes to let the Piſans (whom their late victory had made inſolent) to ouer-run and pill the whole countrey. And that which was of greater importance, Pandolfe Petrucci by this accident being entred into hope, that that they might eaſily giue impediment that Sommer to the Florentines for ſpoiling the corne of the Piſans, who maintaining defence with their accuſtomed difficulties, were (but in cold maner) aided by the Genowais and Lucquois, (for the Siennois aided them rather with counſell, then with money or victuals,) he wrought ſo, that Iohn Paul Baillon, in whom the Florentines repoſed much, for that they had bene the principall cauſe of his returne into Perouſa, refuſed during the time of his ſeruice, to continue in their pay; alledging that Marke Anthonie and Mucio Colonne, with Luke and Iaques Sauelles, who al together had a greater number of men then he, being in the ſame pay, he could not remaine there without danger, for the diuerſitie of factions. And to the end they ſhould haue leſſe time to prouide themſelues, he temporiſed and taried as long as he could, to diſcloſe wholly that which he had in his thought; and to induce them to giue more credite to his excuſe, he promiſed the Florentines not to take armes againſt them. Wherein to keepe them the more aſſured, he left as a gage, his ſon Malateſte, a very yong man, in their pay with fifteene men at armes: and becauſe himſelfe would not remaine altogether without appointment, he tooke pay of the Siennois with threeſcore and ten men at armes. But becauſe they of Sienna were not able to ſupport ſo great expences, the Lucquoys who did communicate in that counſell, tooke into their pay with threeſcore and ten men at armes, Troilus Sauellus, who afore was mercenary to the Siennois.

For the ſudden and vnlooked for departing of Iohn Paul, and the harmes receiued at the bridge of Capello, the Florentines looking into their owne weakneſſe, would not that yeare giue the ſpoile to the lands of the Piſans; yea they ſaw how farre they were conſtrained to deuiſe how they might put remedie to greater dangers. For the ancient humor of affection being reuiued in Iohn Paul and in Pandolfe, they debated ſecretly with the Cardinall of Medicis to trouble the eſtate of the Florentines, making their principall foundation of Bartlemew Aluiano, who being in ſome diſagreement with the Great Captaine, was newly come to Rome, where he drew to him many ſouldiers with diuers hopes and promiſes: to which counſell the Cardinall Aſcanius was thought to be priuie, hauing a purpoſe (things ſucceeding happily in Tuſcan) to aſſaile the Duchie of Millan, with the ioynt forces of the Florentines and others conſenting to this conſpiracie: for the hope they had, that aſſailing it, there would eaſily riſe ſome mutation, ſeeing there was but a ſlender ſtrength of men at armes of France, many of the Nobilitie in exile, the peoples much inclined to the name of Sforce, and the French King (on whom was fallen a great maladie) languiſhing in ſo dangerous extremitie, that for many houres there was a generall deſpaire of his life, and though afterward he reuiued ſomewhat, yet he was ſo ill diſpoſed, that there was ſmall hope of life. And ſuch as looked into things with a deeper counſell, doubted leſt Aſcanius (with whom at that time the Venetian Embaſſadour had familiar conuerſation at Rome) entertained ſecret intelligence not onely with the Great Captain, but alſo with the Venetians, who had bene of late more ready and more bold to offend the French then in times paſt; for that the French King, who newly was entred into ſuſpition and diſtruſt of the Emperour and his ſonne, conſidering what would be the greatneſſe of the Archduke after the death of the Queene of Spaine, and leauing apparently their amitie, aided againſt the Archduke the Duke of Gueldres his ſharp enemy, and inclined to practiſe particular intelligence with the King of Spaine. But as the thoughts of men are deceitfull, and their hopes full of frailtie, ſo, whileſt theſe things were in ſolicitation, the French King, whoſe recouery was holden deſperate, dayly recouered ſtrength, and Cardinall Aſcanius died ſuddenly at Rome of the plague. By whoſe death albeit the danger of the eſtate of Millan was cut off, yet the plots layed to moleſt the Florentines were not altogether remoued: and therefore Pandolfe Petrucci, Iohn Paul Baillon, and Bartlemew Aluiano aſſembled together in the borough of Pregai, which is vpon the confines of the Perufins and Siennois, not with hope to be ſtrong enough to reſtore the Medices into Florence, but to the end that Aluiano entring into Piſa, with the wils of the Piſans, might inuade (for the ſuretie of that Citie) the frontiers of the Florentines, with intent to paſſe further as occaſion ſhould be offered. Theſe preparations beginning now to be manifeſt, the Florentines were very doubtfull of the diſpoſition of the Great Captaine, for that they knew well that the time for the which Aluiano was entertained in the Spaniſh pay, remained yet till the next Nouember, and alſo for that they could not beleeue that Pandolfe Petrucci would enter into new enterpriſes without his conſent; ſeeing that the ſaid Petrucci, neuer minding to pay the French King the ſummes of money which he promiſed, and hauing oftentimes abuſed him, he depended altogether on the King of Spaine. And the ſuſpi-tion of the Florentines was further augmented in this, for that (the Lord of Plombin, which was vnder the protection of the Spaniſh King, fearing to be aſſailed by the Genoways) Gonſaluo had ſent to Plombin for his ſuretie a thouſand footmen vnder the charge of Nugno de Campo, and to the riuer of Plombin three ſhips, two galleys, with certaine other veſſels: which forces brought into a place ſo neare the Florentines, gaue them great occaſion to feare that they were come to ioyne with Aluiano, as he ſaid they had bene promiſed him. But the truth was, that the King of Spaine, after the truce made with the French King, gaue direction (for diminution of the expences) that as well the regiment of Aluiano, as the bands of others which had bene limited, ſhould be reduced to an hundred Lances. Whereupon he taking occaſion to be grieued, did not onely refuſe to bind himſelfe eftſoones with a new oath, but alſo maintained that he was acquitted of the firſt, both for that he was not ſatisfied of his payes paſt, and alſo that the Great Captaine would not hold his promiſe to giue him after the conqueſt of Naples, two thouſand footmen to ſerue his turne againſt the Florentines in fauour of the Medices. And the mind of Aluiano was naturally deſirous of new things, and altogether impatient of reſt. The Florentines, for their defence againſt ſo violent ſtormes, had recourſe to the French King, who was bound by the capitulations of protection to defend them with foure hundred Lances, and required him to ſend them two hundred. But he, being more caried with couetouſneſſe of money, then moued with the prayers or compaſſion of his ancient confederates, anſwered, that he would giue them no ſuccours, if firſt they ſatisfied him not of the thirtie thouſand duckats which were due to him by the obligation of protection. And albeit the Florentines intreated him to expect a litle, alledging that they were much grieued and ouercharged with neceſſary expences for their defence; yet he perſeuered obſtinately in his firſt deliberation, in ſo much as he whom they ſuſpected, and had offended, miniſtred more helpe to their ſafetie, then he in whom they had moſt confidence, and to whom they had done great pleaſures. For the Great Captaine deſiring that the tranquillity of Italy ſhould not be troubled, either becauſe he wold not that the practiſes of peace begun of new betweene the two Kings ſhould be broken, or for that he nouriſhed ſome deuice to appropriate to himſelfe the kingdome of Naples, vſing the occaſion of the death of the Queene, and the ſeeds of future diſcord betweene the father in law and the ſonne: he vſed all diligence to induce Aluiano to reenter into the pay, who was gone to Petillano, the Pope hauing commanded him either to diſmiſſe his armie, or elſe to depart out of the Church dominions: and commanded him as a vaſſall and ſouldier of his King, to make no further proceeding, vpon paine of depriuation of the eſtates which he had in the kingdome of Naples, bearing a value in yearely reuenue of ſeuen thouſand duckats: and ſignified to the Piſans, whom a litle before he had ſecretly receiued into the protection of his King, and alſo to the Lord of Plombin, that they ſhould not receiue him: and he cauſed to be told and offered to the Florentines, that he was content they ſhould haue the ſeruice of his footmen that were within Plombin, whom he appointed to be commanded by Marke Anthonie Colonne their Captaine. He ſent alſo to Pandolfe Petrucci, that he ſhould in no wiſe ſupport Aluiano, forbidding to follow him, Lewis ſonne of the Count Petillano, Francis Vrſin, and Iohn de Cery, who were in his pay. But notwithſtanding all theſe inhibitions, Aluiano, with whom were Iohn Lewis Vitelli, Iohn Conrad Vrſin, three hundred men at armes, and fiue hundred footmen of good reſolution, paſſing alwayes further (though ſlowly,) and the Siennois furniſhing him with victuals, he came at laſt to the coaſts of Sienna into the plaine of Scarlina, a towne ſubiect to Plombin, and a litle dayes iourney from the frontiers of the Florentines, where came to him a meſſenger expreſly ſent from the Great Captaine, to forbid him againe not to go to Piſa, nor to offend the Florentines: to whom he anſwered, that he was at libertie to do what he liſt, for that the Great Captaine had not holden promiſe with him; and went to lodge neare to Campilla a towne of the Florentines, where there was a light skirmiſh betweene him and the Florentine bands that were aſſembled at Bibona. He came afterwards to the territory of Cornia betweene the confines of the Florentines and Sugeret, but with plots and hopes very vncertaine, finding dayly greater difficulties, both for that there came no victuals to him frō Plombin, and alſo Iohn Paul Baillon and the Vitellies, whoſe reſolutions for the moſt part depēded of the euent of things, failed to ſend him ſuch bands of footmen as they had promiſed: alſo Pandolfe Petrucci was in his fauors more doubtful thē before: neither was he aſſured that the Piſans, for feare to diſobey the Great Captaine, would receiue him. For which reaſons, ioyned to the continuall ſolicitation that was vſed to hire him again, wherein the hope was ſo much the greater, greater, by how much he refuſed no more to reſt contented with an hundred Lances, he retired to Vignalo, a towne appertaining to the Lord of Plombin, giuing out a bruit, that he taried there to expect the laſt reſolution from Naples. But the Piſans hauing in the meane while condeſcended to receiue him into their towne, he iſſued out of Vignalo where he had remained ten dayes, and early in the morning on the ſeuenteenth day of Auguſt he appeared with his army in battel array a mile beneath Campilla, with intention to fight in that place with the Florentine armie, which was gone to incampe there the day before. But they hauing aduertiſement by eſpials coming from the campe of Aluiano, retired themſelues the ſame night neare the walls of Campilla, where Aluiano ſeeing no poſſibilitie to aſſaile them but to his great diſaduantage, he returned toward Piſa by the way called the Tower of S. Vincent which is fiue miles from Campilla: and on the other part, the bands of the Florentines led by Hercules Bentiuole, (who for the experience he had of the countrey, deſired nothing more then to fight in that place, by reaſon of the opportunitie of his ſeate) tooke the way that goeth from Campilla to the ſaid Tower of S. Vincent. Here Hercules ſeuered the light horſemen into two bands, the one followed the armie of Aluiano, charging alwayes vpon his reareguard, and the other went before to affront the enemie, holding the ſame way by the which the Florentine armie came after: and being come to the Tower before the bands of Aluiano, and vndertaken the skirmiſh with thoſe that came firſt, by whom they were eaſily repulſed, they retired towards their armie, which was now come within halfe a mile, where bringing tidings that the moſt part of the enemies had already paſſed the Tower, Hercules Bentiuole marching leyſurely, arriued iuſt vpon their taile, hard by the ruines of the Tower of S. Vincent, where their men at armes and footmen had made head: and when he was in full and abſolute paſſage, he charged them reſolutely on the flanke with the moitie of his armie, making them giue backe after he had entertained the fight a good ſpace of time. In this firſt aſſault their footmen were ſo broken and chaſed euen to the ſea, that afterwards they neuer made head: but the horſmen which were withdrawne a bowſhot beyond the ditch of the Tower of S. Vincent towards Bibbona, being reaſſembled, made head againe, and keeping themſelues in a cloſe and ſtrong array, charged with great valour the regiments of the Florentines, and with the ſame vertue repulſed them euen to the ditch: by reaſon whereof Hercules Bentiuole cauſed the reſidue of his people to march on, and drawing thither from all parts the whole ſtrength of the armie, the fight became furious there for a good ſpace of time, the victory as yet inclining to no part. Aluiano did in that action both the office of a ſouldier and a Captaine, bearing two eſtockados in his face, and laboured painfully to driue his enemies from that place, which if he had wonne, he had ſtood in great poſſibilitie of the victory. But Hercules, who many dayes afore had foretold, that if the battell were performed in that place, he ſhould obtaine the victory by induſtrie and without danger, cauſed to be planted vpon the brinke of the Tower ditch ſixe falconets which he brought with him, with the which hauing begun to batter the campe, and perceiuing that being not able to ſuſtaine the fury of the artillery, they began now to ſhake and fall into diſorder, practiſing the occaſion with the which he had alwayes promiſed himſelfe the victory, he ſet vpon them furiouſly in many places with the whole forces of his army, to wit, with his light horſmen he ſcoured towards the ſea coaſts, with his men at armes he occupied the high wayes, and with his footmen along the plaine by the wood, ſo that he brake them, and put them eaſily to the chaſe, Aluiano ſauing himſelfe with much ado, being followed with a very few of his lighteſt running horſes, with whom he fled to Montrotondo in the countrey of Sienna, and the reſidue of his people were almoſt all taken and ſtripped betweene the Tower of S. Vincent and the riuer of Cecina, and all their Enſignes loſt; onely a very few horſemen eſcaped. This was the end of the ſtirre of Bartlemew Aluiano, which expreſſed more apparences and greatneſſe by the practiſes that were made of long time, and by his braue behauior full of fury and threatnings, then by his forces or any other ſtable foundation which his enterpriſe had. Hercules Bentiuole and Anthonio Iacomino camp-maiſter, being encouraged by this victory, ſignified to the Florentines both by vehement letters and many meſſengers, that it were good to cauſe the victorious armie to approach the walls of Piſa, being carefull afore to furniſh with diligence all thoſe things that might be neceſſary to take it: and that becauſe they hoped the Piſans being enuironed on al ſides with great difficulties, and now depriued of all hope of the ſuccours of Aluiano; and ioyning withall, that all things giuing place to the reputation of conquerours, they thought they ſhould eaſily carry it; whereof they had the better hope by reaſon of a certaine intelligence which they had had with certaine of the townesmen in Pisa.

But at Florence the Magistrate appointed director of the matters of warre, asking counsell of those Citizens which of custome were to be communicated with in matters of importance, that deliberation was with a generall consent reproued of all: for that they presuppoſed that in the Pisans was still continued their accustomed obstinacie, and that being of so long time experienced and trained in warre, the name and reputation of the victory which they had gotten against others, would not be sufficient to vanquish them, their forces being no whit diminished: but rather it stood them vpon, according to the examples of times past, to set vpon them with a resolute force, which men of warre did onely feare: and for that that course was full of apparent difficulties, the Citie of Pisa being enuironed as well as any towne in Italy with good and strong walls, well fortified, and withall defended by men valiant and resolute, could not be forced but with a great and puissant armie, compounded of souldiers not inferiour to the Pisans in valour, which yet would not be sufficient to carry it by assault or by a short siege: so that it would be necessary to incampe in the places about it for many dayes, to the end to approch it with more suretie, searching out aduantages, and as it were rather tiring and wearying them, then forcing them: That the season of the yeare, was contrary to those things, not being able suddenly to erect an armie of footmen, of other bodies then such as should be leuied in haste, nor to approch it with any intention to make long abode there, both for the inclemencie of the aire corrupted with the winds of the sea, which being become pestiferous through the vapours of the pooles and marrishes, was harmfull to armies, as was well experienced when Paul Vitelli incamped there: And also for that the countrey of Pisa beginneth from the moneth of September to be subiect to raines, which, by reason of the lowneſſe of the place, do so ouerdrowne it, that it takes away all oportunities for an armie to remaine there: That in such an vniuersall obstinacie there could be no assured foundation reposed in practises or priuate intelligences; for that such things being for the most part feigned and dissembled, or at least managed by persons vnable to execute that they promise, cannot succeed well. Besides, notwithstanding there had bin no publike faith giuen to the Great Captaine, yet Prosper Colonne (but of his owne authoritie) almost vnder their secret consent, had signified and promised, that for that yeare there should be made no approch with artillery to the walls of Pisa: and therefore they ought to hold for certaine, that the Great Captaine as well for that disdaine, as for the promises he had many times made to the Pisans, and also for that this successe of the Florentines was not profitable for his affaires, he would oppose himselfe against this enterprise: a matter very easie for him to do, for that he might in few houres put into Pisa the Spanish bands of footmen which were at Plombin, as he had oftentimes assured them to do whensoeuer there was preparation to besiege them: That it were better to vse the occasion of the victory in such place, where, albeit the profite were lesse, things should be found without all comparison farre more easie, and yet not without notable profite: That there was not one that had more opposed, nor did more continually resist their enterprises, not one that had more hindred the recouery of Pisa, nor more procured to change the present gouernment, then Pandolfe Petrucci: That he had stirred vp Duke Valentinois to enter in armes vpon their lands: That he had bene the principall author and guide of the enterprise of Vitellozze, and of the rebellion of Aretze: That by his counsell and solicitation, the Genoways and Lucquoys were ioyned with the estate of Sienna to support the Pisans: That it was he that had induced Gonsaluo to take the protection of Plombin, to intermeddle with the affaires of Pisa, and to intrude himselfe into the matters of Tuscan: That he had bene the prouoker and supporter of this bursting out of Aluiano: That it was against him that they ought to turne their armie, and to pill and ouerrunne all the countrey of Sienna, where there would be found no resistance: That by the reputation of their armies, there might happen against him some commotion in the Citie, wherein he had already many enemies; and at least that they should want no occasion to occupie any place of importance in that countrey, which they might hold in counterchange, or as a pawne to haue againe Montpulcian: hauing hope by this reuenge to do that which hitherto could not be accomplished with benefites and pleasures, and that Pandolfe hereafter would not be so ready to offend them: That afterwards in the same maner they should make incursions in the countreys of ỹ Lucquoys, being very harmfull to respect them so much: Lastly, that by these meanes there was hope to draw some honour and profite of the victory gotten; whereas if they went about to besiege Pisa, there was to be reaped no other thing then expen-

ces and diſhonour. Theſe reaſons, albeit they were alledged with common accord, yet did they nothing abate the deſire of the people (which for the moſt part is more guided by will then by reaſon) to haue the campe planted afore Piſa, being blinded with a iealous opinion they had taken of long time, that the recouering of Piſa was no whit pleaſing to many of the principall citizens for many ambitious reſpects. In this ſentence Peter Soderin Gonfalonnier hauing no leſſe deſire then the reſidue of the ſiege of Piſa, calling the great councell of the people, with whom they had not bene accuſtomed to communicate in matters of that nature, asked if they were of opinion that the campe ſhould go afore Piſa; whereunto euery one anſwering affirmatiuely, wiſedome was ſurmounted with raſhneſſe, the authoritie of the better ſort giuing place to the will of the greater part. And therefore they applied themſelues to make proniſions with a celeritie incredible, euery one hauing deſire to preuent no leſſe the expected ſuccours of the Great Captaine, then the danger of the rainie ſeaſon; in ſo much as the ſixt day of September the armie approched the walls of Piſa with ſixe hundred men at armes, ſeuen thouſand footmen, ſixteene Cannons, and many other peeces of artillerie, the Campe being pitched betweene Santa Croce and San Michel, in the ſelfe ſame place wherein the French men had incamped before. And as the artilleries were ſuddenly planted in the night, ſo they battered the day following with great fury, all that was between the gate of Calci and the turret of S. Francis, where the walls make within an angle: and hauing from the Sunne riſing (when the artillery began to play) in one and twentie houres brought to the earth more then thirtie fadomes of the wall, there was entertained where the ruine was moſt, a hote skirmiſh, but to very litle profite, for that there was not throwne downe ſo great a quantitie and ſpace of wall as had bene neceſſary in a towne where the men preſented themſelues to the defence with their ancient valour and hardineſſe. Therefore the morning following, to the end to make a greater opening of the wall, they began another battery in a place a litle remoued, (that place of the wall which aforetimes had bene battered by the French, remaining betweene the one and other battery) and after they had caſt downe ſo much of the wall as was thought ſufficient, Hercules ſought to aduance the footbands which were in battell to giue a rough aſſault both to the one and other breach; where the Piſans trauelling according to their accuſtomed maner, the women no leſſe venturous then the men reſolute, had during the battery drawne a rampier with a ditch afore; but there was not in the Italian footbands which had bene leuied in haſte, neither that action nor that ſpirit that was ſufficient to force ſuch a reſiſtance. Then that Enſigne of footmen to whom by lot appertained the firſt aſſault, beginning to refuſe through cowardiſe to go to the walls, neither the authoritie of the Captain, nor the preſence of the Superintendent of Florence, neither the regard of their proper honour, nor the honor common to the men of ſeruice of Italy, were ſufficient to cauſe them to go forward: the example of whom being followed of thoſe that ſhould haue ſeconded them, all the regiments retited to their lodgings, hauing done no other thing then rendred the infantery of Italy infamous through all Europe, blemiſhing the glorie of the victory obtained againſt Aluiano, and defacing the reputation of the Captaine and Campemaiſter, which was great on the behalfe of the Florentines, if, content with the glory they had gotten, they could haue moderated their proper fortune. When the ſouldiers were once retired to their lodgings, there was made no more doubt to leuie the Campe, chiefly for that the ſame day ſixe hundred Spaniſh footmen of thoſe that were at Plombin were entred Piſa, by direction from the Great Captaine: ſo that the day following the Florentine armie retired to Caſcina, with great diſhonour. And a few dayes after there entred into Piſa fifteene hundred Spaniſh footmen; who, becauſe the ſeruice had no neceſſitie of them, after they had in vaine giuen an aſſault to the towne of Bientina at the incitation of the Piſans, they continued their nauigation toward Spain, whither they were ſent by the Great Captaine, for that the peace was already eſtabliſhed betweene the French King and Ferdinand King of Spaine, to the which (all difficulties that earſt hindred it, being now remoued, as both the regard of the honour of the French King, and the feare to make the Archduke his enemie) the death of the Queen of Spaine had giuen perfection: for that the French King, to whom ſuch a greatneſſe of the Archduke was much diſpleaſing, deſired to diſappoint his purpoſes: and the King of Spaine, being aduertiſed that the Archduke diſdaining the laſt will of his mother in law, had determined to take from him the gouernment of the kingdome of Caſtile, was conſtrained to make his ſtay vpon new alliances. For this cauſe the mariage was agreed vpon betweene him and the Ladie Germaine de Foix, ſiſters daughter to the

the French King, with condition that the King ſhould giue her in dowrie that part of the kingdome of Naples that appertained to him, the King of Spaine binding himſelfe to pay him within ten yeares ſeuen hundred thouſand duckats in recompence of expences, and to endow the new maried Ladie with three hundred thouſand duckats. This mariage being ratified and accompanied with the peace, it was agreed that the Barons of the faction of Anjow, and all ſuch as had followed the French part, ſhould be reſtored without any paiment, into their libertie, countrey, eſtates, dignities, and goods, and reeſtabliſhed in the ſame condition and degree that they were in the day that the warres began betweene the French and Spaniſh, which they account to be the day that the French men ran to Tripaldo: That all confiſcations made by the King of Spaine and by King Federike, ſhould be holden for cancelled and voide: That the Prince of Roſſana, the Marquis of Bitonto and of Geſualdo, Alphonſo and Honorio of S. Seuerin, with all the other Barons which were priſoners to the Spaniſh in the kingdome of Naples, ſhould be deliuered: That the French King ſhould no more intitle himſelfe King of Ieruſalem and Naples: That the homages and fealties of the Barons ſhould be made according to the conuentions aforeſaid, and that in the ſame maner the inueſtiture ſhould be demanded of the Pope: That in caſe the Queene Germaine ſhould die in mariage without iſſue, her part of dowry ſhould be transferred to Ferdinand; but if he died firſt, it ſhould reuert to the Crowne of France: That King Ferdinand ſhould be bound to aide Gaſton Earle of Foix and brother to his new wife, to conquer the kingdome of Nauarre, which he pretended to appertaine to him, and which was poſſeſſed with a title royall by Katherne de Foix, and by Iohn her husband, ſonne to Monſieur d'Albret: That the French King ſhould conſtraine the widow of King Federike, with her two children that were with him, to go into Spaine, where ſhould be aſſigned to her a competent portion to liue: and if ſhe refuſed to depart, then the King ſhould command her to go out of his Realme, without making any further allowance to her or to her children by way of penſion, or other meanes to relieue them: That neither of the parties ſhould enterpriſe any thing againſt thoſe whom any of them ſhould name: and they named ioyntly in Italy the Pope; and the French King apart named the Florentines: That for ſtrengthening of this peace, there was meant to be made betweene the two Kings perpetuall confederation for the defence of their eſtates, whereunto the King ſhould be bound with a thouſand Lances and ſixe thouſand footmen; and Ferdinand with three hundred Lances, two thouſand Gennitairs, and ſixe thouſand footmen. After the peace was made and publiſhed, wherein the King of England promiſed obſeruation for both the parties, the Barons of Anjow who were in France, hauing taken their leaue of the King, went almoſt all with the Queen Germaine into Spaine, the King vſing towards them at their departure a very ſmall gratulation for their ſeruices paſt. And Iſabel the widow of Federike hauing leaue alſo, went to Ferrara, refuſing to put her children into the power of the Catholike King. In this towne of Ferrara (Hercules d'Eſte being dead a litle before, and Alphonſo his ſonne ſucceeding in the Dukedome) there hapned vpon the end of the yeare, a ſtrange and tragicall accident, ſuch as had ſome ſimilitude with the barbarous actions of the ancient Thebans, but vpon a more light occaſion; if the vnbridled fury of loue be leſſe, then the burning deſire to reigne. The Cardinall Hippolito d'Eſte, louing feruently a yong maide his kinſwoman, who for her part was no leſſe amorous of Don Iulio the baſtard brother of the Cardinall, and confeſſing her ſelfe to the Cardinall, that that which aboue all other things made her affection ſo vehement to his brother, was, the ſweete aſpect and beautie of his eyes: the Cardinall being full of wrath, hauing ſpied a time when he ſhould go out of the towne on hunting, ſet vpon him in the field, and plucking him from his horſe, cauſed ſome of his pages to plucke his eyes out of his head, for that they were the companions of his loue; and he had the heart to behold the doing of ſo wicked an act: which afterwards was the cauſe of very great ſcandals among many of the brethren. Such was the end of the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and fiue.

The Argvment.

Many treaties are made. Pope Iulio the ſecond takes the gouernment of Bolognia. The Genoways rebell againſt the French King, by reaſon of the quarels betwixt the Nobles and the communaltie: which the King ſeeketh to redreſſe by mildneſſe. The King of Aragon meeteth with the French King, and communicateth with him. The Diet is holden at Conſtance. The Emperour demands paſſage of the Venetians to go take the Crowne at Rome. The Venetians offer him paſſage if he came without an armie, otherwiſe not. He inuadeth their lands, and afterwards maketh truce with them. The French King complaineth of the Florentines, who do pertinently excuſe themſelues. An offer to bring the Piſans vnder the obedience of the Florentines, but without effect, by reaſon of the contrary minds in them that dealt in that buſineſſe.

THeſe were the accidents of the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and fiue, in which albeit there remained hope that the tranquillitie of Italy would continue (the warres for the quarrell of Naples being now at an end,) yet there began to appeare in other places, no ſmall ſeeds of approching troubles. For Philip, which now tooke vpon him the title of King of Caſtile, & was not content that ſuch a kingdom ſhould be gouerned by his father in law, being incited by many Barons, prepared himſelfe to paſſe into Spaine againſt his will, pretending, as the truth was, that the late Queene had no power to preſcribe lawes for the gouernment of the kingdome after her death. The Emperour alſo taking courage by the greatneſſe of his ſonne, intended to paſſe into Italy. And laſtly the French King, albeit the yeare before he was much diſcontented with the Pope, for that he had diſpoſed of the benefices which were voide by the death of Cardinall Aſcanius and others, in the Duchie of Millan, without his participation; and for that alſo hauing created many Cardinals, he had refuſed to call the Biſhop of Achx nephew to the Cardinall of Amboiſe, and the Biſhop of Bayeux nephew to Monſieur Trimouille, being earneſtly ſolicited by the King, who in thoſe regards had cauſed to ſequeſter the fruites of the benefices which the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula and others of the Popes fauourites poſſeſſed in the eſtate of Millan; neuertheleſſe on the other ſide, beginning to feare the greatneſſe of Cæſar and his ſonne, he iudged it neceſſary not to nouriſh occaſions of reuenge, but to reenter into reconcilement with the Pope, to whom after he had releaſed all the ſequeſtrations, he ſent in the beginning of this yeare the Biſhop of Ciſteron the Apoſtolical Nuncio, to negociate with him many plots and offers againſt the Venetians, to whom he knew well that the Pope continued to beare ill will, and very great hatred, for the deſire he had to recouer the townes of Romagna, although vntill that day he had proceeded in all things ſo mildly and peaceably, that he gaue to all men great occaſion to maruell, that he, who when he was Cardinall had bene alway full of immoderate and aſpiring thoughts, and who in the time of the Popes Siſtus, Innocent, and Alexander, had bene many times the inſtrument to trouble Italy, expreſſed now that he was become Pope (an eſtate for the moſt part adminiſtred with ambition and troubleſome imaginations) to be more eaſie and abated in courage, then did well agree with the ambitious profeſſion which he had always made to the contrary, not making any ſhew or demonſtration to remember old iniuries, or to ſeeme to be like to himſelfe. But the intention of Iulius was farre otherwiſe, who purpoſing to ſurmount the opinion that was formerly had of him, and to do more then was expected, bent all his wits (contrary to the cuſtome of his ancient magnanimitie) to heape vp a wonderfull maſſe of treaſure, to the end that to the will he had had to kindle the warre, might be ioyned alſo the meanes and power to ſuſtaine it. And finding at that time, that he was already furniſhed with ſufficient ſtore of money, he began to diſcouer his thoughts, aſpiring to right great things. Therefore the Biſhop of Ciſteron being receiued and heard with great gladneſſe, was diſpatched and ſent backe againe with diligence, to ſolicite betweene them a new reunion and amitie: wherein the better to diſpoſe the mind of the King and the Cardinall of Amboiſe, he promiſed by writ which the ſaid Nuncio caried with him, the dignitie of Cardinall to the Biſhops of Achx and Bayeux. And yet in ſo great a forwardneſſe, he entred oftentimes into many doubts and difficulties, for that, either for a certaine ſecret hatred which he had conceiued againſt the French King, at ſuch time as he fled into France, to eſchue the ambuſhes of Pope Alexander, or for that it much diſcontented him to be drawne as it were by compulſion, by the power and importunitie of the French King, to tranſferre to the Cardinall of Amboiſe, the legation of the kingdome of France: or laſtly, for that he ſuſpected leſt the ſaid Cardinall, whoſe behauiours tended directly to the Popedome, not hauing the patience to tarrie for his death, would ſeeke to aſpire to that place by wayes ſiniſter and extraordinary, he was not fully reſolued to ioyne with the French King; without which coniunction, he knew it was impoſſible that at that time any thing of conſequence ſhould ſucceed with him. For which reaſons, he had ſent (on the other ſide) to Piſa, Baltaſar Blaſquo a Genoway, Captaine of his galleys, with commiſſion to arme two light galleys which Pope Alexander had cauſed to be built there: and it was thought that it was to the end to be more ready to deliuer Genes from the gouernment of the French, in caſe the King, who yet remained vexed with reliques of his diſeaſe, ſhould happen to die. Thus matters hanging in ſuch an eſtate of ſuſpence, the firſt action of this yeare 1506 began by the embarking of King Philip to ſaile out of Flanders into Spaine with a great armie by ſea. And to reduce his going to more facilitie (for he feared leſt his father in law by the aide of the French, would hinder his paſſage) he practiſed the Spaniſh ſubtilties, and agreed with him to leaue vnto him the managing and policie of the moſt part of affaires, and that they ſhould take in common the title of King of Spaine, according to the example in the Queenes time: and laſtly, that the reuenues and tributes ſhould be deuided in an order certaine and indifferent. By reaſon of which accord, his father in law, notwithſtanding he was not aſſured of the obſeruation, ſent him into Flanders many ſhip to furniſh his voyage: with the which, hauing embarked his wife and Ferdinand his ſecond ſonne, he tooke his courſe into Spaine with forward winds, which, within two dayes turning cleane contrary, after his ſhips had run a dangerous fortune, and made long reſiſtance againſt the fury of the ſea, they were caſt vpon ſundry coaſts of England and Brittaine, his owne perſon with two or three ſhips being driuen with manifeſt perill vpon England into the hauen of Southhampton: whereof Henrie the ſeuenth King of that Nation being aduertiſed, ſent to him with ſpeed many Barons to receiue him with honour, and to deſire him to come to his Court, then at London: a requeſt which Philip, who found himſelfe almoſt deſolate and without ſhips, could not well denie. He remained in the Court of England, vntill all his Nauie was reaſſembled and eſtſoones rigged, making in the meane while betweene them new capitulations: and albeit Philip in all other things held himſelfe vſed as a King, yet in this one thing he complained, that he was conſtrained as a priſoner, to conſent to redeliuer into King Henries hands the Duke of Suffolke, whom he held priſoner within the Caſtle of Namur, and whom the King of England deſired much to haue in his power, for that he quarelled the title of the Crowne, pretending the right of the kingdome to appertaine to him: onely the King of England aſſured Philip by the faith and word of a King, that he would not put him to death, by meanes whereof he was kept in priſon ſo long as King Henrie liued, and afterwards beheaded by the commandement of his ſonne. King Philip ſailed afterwards with a more happie nauigation into Spaine; where, almoſt all the Barons flocking vnto him, his father in law, who was not ſtrong enough of himſelfe to reſiſt him, and who iudged that in the French promiſes was no ſure foundation, had neuer thought of other thing then of the accord, finding himſelfe abandoned almoſt of euery one, and finding hard acceſſe vnto his ſonne in law, was conſtrained to agree to ſuch conditions as were offered to him, without any reſpect to the former accord betweene them: and yet they proceeded not rigorouſly, for the good nature of Philip, but much more for the perſwaſions of thoſe which had ſhewed themſelues great enemies to Ferdinand; who being in continuall doubt, leſt by his wiſedome and authoritie he would get better fauour with his ſonne in law, they ſolicited as much as they could his departure out of the kingdome of Caſtile. It was accorded, that Ferdinand ſhould giue ouer the gouernment which his wife had left to him by teſtament, together with all that he could pretend in that regard; and that he ſhould ſpeedily depart out of Caſtile, with promiſe to returne no more: That Ferdinand ſhould poſſeſſe the kingdome of Naples as his owne, notwithſtanding there were that alledged, that it appertained to Philip, for that it was conquered with the armes and power of the kingdome of Caſtile: which was the ſame reaſon (and haply more iuſt) by the which Ferdinand was wont to pretend the ſaid Realme to appertaine to him, as being won by the treaſures and forces of the ſtate of Aragon. The tributes of the Iles of India were reſerued to him during his life, together with the three great Maiſterſhips of S. Iames, of Alcantara, & of Calatraua: and it was alſo agreed, that he ſhould take euery yeare fiue and twentie thouſand duckats of the reuenue of the realme of Caſtile. As ſoone as this contract was reſolued, Ferdinand, whō hereafter we will call either the Catholik King, or King of Aragon, went forthwith into Aragon, with intention to paſſe by ſea to Naples with all the diligence he might, not ſo much for the deſire he had to ſee that kingdome, and to reeſtabliſh it, as to remoue the Great Captaine, againſt whom, ſince the death of the Queene, he had conceiued many ſuſpitions, either that he aſpired to transferre to himſelfe that kingdome, or at leaſt that he was inclined to giue it rather to Philip then to him.

And for as much as he had often ſummoned him in vaine to returne into Spaine, which he excuſed by the many impediments which retained him, referring his departure to another time, he feared that if he went not thither in perſon, he ſhould not eaſily remoue him from the gouernment, notwithſtanding that ſince the laſt contract, King Philip had giuen him to vnderſtand that hereafter he was to yeeld all his obedience to the King of Aragon. In this time the French King beginning to be in good health, was trauelled with many, diuers and contrary thoughts: for he was diſcontented with the Venetians, for the diſdaine he conceiued againſt them ſince the time of the warre of Naples, for the deſire he had to recouer that which was of the ancient appertenances of the Duchie of Millan, and for an opinion that through diuers accidents, their power and greatneſſe might ſometimes hurt him; the which, among other reſpects, had induced him to make confederation with the Emperour and Philip his ſonne: and on the other ſide, the deſcending of the Emperour into Italy, was nothing agreeable to him, knowing that he prepared to furniſh his iourney with very ſtrong forces: a thing which he feared more then euer, for the power of Philip, ſucceſſor to ſuch a greatneſſe; ſpecially being in doubt that whileſt he was in England, he had contracted with the King there certaine new and ſtraite alliances: and for that alſo one of the principall occaſions for which he had entred confederation with them, was ceaſſed and cut off by the peace made with the Catholike King, by reaſon whereof he had left off all thoughts touching the kingdome of Naples. But whileſt he was in this perplexitie of mind, the Embaſſadours of the Emperour Maximilian came to ſignifie to him their maiſters deliberation to paſſe into Italy, and to ſummon him to giue order for the fiue hundred lances which he had promiſed to furniſh in his fauour, and to performe his word touching the reſtoring of the baniſhed men of the eſtate of Millan; and withall to intreate him to aduance the paiment of the money which ſhould be due to him within few moneths. To theſe demands albeit the French King had no great will to condeſcend, yet he made ſhew of the contrary, neuertheles onely for the regard of ſuch as for that time required but words: for he expreſſed how much he deſired that the articles of accord ſhould be executed, offering for his part in due ſeaſon a ready accompliſhment of all things he was bound vnto; onely he refuſed with many excuſes to aduance the money. On the other part, the Emperour repoſing as litle in the will of the French King, as the French King did in his, and deſiring vehemently to paſſe to Rome, chiefly to take the Crowne Imperiall, to the end afterwards to cauſe his ſon to be choſen King of Romanes, he ſtudied in the ſame time by what other meanes he might atchieue the effect of his expectations. Therfore he ſolicited the Swiſſers to ioyne with him, who, after many counſels and diſputes among themſelues, determined to obſerue the alliance which yet remained for two yeares with the French King: and he demanded paſſage of the Venetians through their lands, who being loth for their owne particular to grant him paſſage with an armie ſo mightie, the offers of the French King inciting them to ioyne with him to let his paſſage, gaue them the courage to anſwer him in generall termes. And now the French King ſhewing himſelfe openly eſtranged from the confederation made with him and with Philip, gaue in mariage the Lady Claude his daughter, to Francis Lord of Angouleſme, to whom belonged the ſucceſſion of the Crowne after his death without without iſſue male: yet making ſhew as though he had bene drawne to that action, by the importunities of his ſubiects, hauing aforehand ordained for that effect, that all the Courts of Parliament and principall townes of his kingdome, ſhould ſend Embaſſadours to beſeech him, as in a matter moſt profitable to the Realme, ſince the hope to haue iſſue male diminiſhed in him daily more and more. This he ſignified with ſpeed to King Philip by expreſſe Embaſſadours, excuſing himſelfe, that he had no power to reſiſt ſo great a deſire of his whole Realme and communitie of his ſubiects. Beſides this, he had ſent bands of men to the ſuccours of the Duke of Gueldres againſt Philip, to turne Maximilian from paſſing into Italy, who of himſelfe had already left off thoſe cogitations: for that vnderſtanding that Ladiſlaus King of Hungary was very ſicke, he drew neare the confines of that kingdome, according to an ancient deſire of his father and himſelfe, to make himſelfe King, for the right which he pretended thereto. For Ladiſlaus King of Hungaria and Bohemia, ſonne of Albert, which was brother to the Emperour Federike, dying many yeares before without iſſue, the people of Hungaria, who pretended that their King dying without iſſue, the ſucceſſion of the next of bloud could haue no place, but that the election of the new King belonged to them, had choſen for their King (hauing regard to the vertues of his father) Matthias, he who afterwards to the great reputation and glory of ſo litle a kingdom, vexed ſo often the Empire of the Turks: who, to auoide in the beginning of his reigne, warre with Federike, agreed with him to take no wife, to the end that after his death the kingdome might diuolue to Federike or to his children; the which albeit he did not obſerue, yet he died without iſſue: but for all that Federike had not the accompliſhment of his deſire, for that the Hungarians choſe againe for their King, Ladiſlaus King of Polonia; for which cauſe new warres being eftſoones raiſed againſt them by Federike and Maximilian, they agreed at laſt (the Barons of the kingdome taking a ſolemne oath) that if Ladiſlaus ſhould die without iſſue, they would receiue Maximilian for their King. He then aſpiring to this ſucceſſion, after he was aduertiſed of the infirmitie of Ladiſlaus, drew neare to the borders of Hungaria, giuing ouer for that time all thoughts for Italy.

The eſtate of Hungaria after the death of Matthias.

But whileſt theſe things were debated betweene the Princes of beyond the Mounts with ſo great diuerſitie, the Pope knowing that without the aide of the French King he could not moleſt the Venetians, and hauing no patience to ſuffer the yeares of his Pontificacie to paſſe away and conſume without profite or honor, he prayed the French King to help him to recouer to the obedience of the Church, the Cities of Bologna and Perouſa, which belonging of antiquitie to the Sea Apoſtolike, were now tyrannized, the one by Iohn Paul Baillon, and the other by Iohn Bentiuole, whoſe predeceſſors in the times of ciuill warres, riſing from priuate citizens to be chiefe of a faction, after they had chaſed or ſlaine all their aduerſaries, were become abſolute Lords, and nothing elſe reſtrained them from taking the title of lawfull Princes, but onely the regard which they bare to the Popes, who in the one and the other Citie retained ſomewhat more then the ſimple name of Lordſhip, for that they tooke a certaine part of the reuenues, albeit very litle, and ordained gouernours there in the name of the Church, who ſerued rather as ſhadowes and apparences, then to rule or command, the power and deliberation of all matters of importance reſting in the authoritie of others. But the towne of Perouſa, either for her more nearneſſe to the Citie of Rome, or for other occaſions, was longer time entertained in the obedience of the Church then Bologna: for that Citie did oftentimes change in the aduerſities of the Popes, ſometimes being gouerned in libertie, ſometimes oppreſſed by the citizens, ſometimes made ſubiect to ſtrange Princes, and then againe reduced to the abſolute ſubiection of the Popes; and laſtly returning in the time of Pope Nicholas the fifth, vnder the obedience of the Church, but with certaine limitations, and ſuch communion of authoritie betweene the Pope and them, that with tract of time the name and demonſtration of things remaining onely to the Popes, the effect and ſubſtance of the policie and gouernment reſted wholly in the power of the Bentiuoles: of whom, Iohn Bentiuole who commanded for the preſent, hauing by litle and litle drawne all things to him, & embaſed thoſe mightie families which had bene contrary to his elders and him in the firſt founding and eſtabliſhing of his tyrannie, and being alſo much grieued for the inſolencies and intollerable expences which his foure ſonnes made, and for this cauſe becomming hatefull almoſt to euery one, he ruled now more by crueltie and armes, then with clemencie and affabilitie, leauing very litle place to equitie and innocencie. That which incited the Pope to this enterpriſe, was principally the deſire of glorie, for which cauſe he had determined (albeit vnder the ſhadow of pietie and zeale to religion) to reconquer to the ſea Apoſtolike, all thoſe places, of what nature ſoeuer, that had bene vſurped vpon the Church. And he was more particularly incited to recouer Bologna, by a hatred newly conceiued againſt Iohn Bentiuole; for that in the time when he durſt not remaine at Rome, and ſtayed at Cento a towne of his Biſhopricke of Bologna, he was driuen to ſteale away by night, hearing a bruite publiſhed at randon, that Bentiuole had a reſolution to apprehend him priſoner, at the inſtance of Pope Alexander. Now this requeſt of the Pope was to the good liking of the King, who tooke it for an apt occaſion to keepe him in his amitie: for knowing how much it did preiudice his affaires, that the Pope had alliance with the Venetians, he began to grow into feares that he would ſuddenly reuolt, holding him alſo in ſuſpition to haue communitie in a certaine practiſe which Octauian Fregoſo had made to depriue him of the iuriſdiction of Genes: and further, he eſteemed Bentiuole (albeit he was vnder his protection) more inclined to Caſar then to him. Whereunto was added his diſdaine againſt Iohn Paul Baillon, for that he had refuſed (notwithſtanding he was poſſeſſed of the fourteene thouſand duckats) to go and ioyne with his army being vpon the riuer of Garillan; together with his deſire to offend Pandolfe Petrucci, vnder an occaſion to ſend men into Tuſcan, for that he had both failed to pay him the money he had promiſed, and alſo had wholly followed the fortune of the Spaniards. For theſe cauſes he willingly agreed to aide the Pope; and the Pope for his part, gaue him the writs of Cardinalſhip for the Biſhops of Achx and Bayeux, with power to diſpoſe of the benefices in the Duchie of Millan, in the ſame fulneſſe that Francis Sforce had vſed before. Theſe practiſes being reſolued and concluded by the ſolicitation of the Biſhop of Ciſteron, newly endued with the Archbiſhopricke of Achx, the onely and immediate interpoſer betweene them, yet the execution was not ſo ready; for that the Pope hauing deferred for certaine moneths to put the enterpriſe to action, it hapned that Maximilian, who hauing begun the warre againſt the King of Hungary, had eſtranged his thoughts from Italy, made now a new peace with him, renewing the accord touching the ſucceſſion; and returned into Auſtria, making preparations whereby he made knowne that he meant to paſſe into Italy: and deſiring that the Venetians ſhould not oppoſe againſt his intention, he diſpatched foure Embaſſadours, to aduertiſe that State, that he was determined to go to Rome to take the Imperial Crowne, deſiring them to giue him libertie of paſſage for him and his armie; and offering to aſſure them to march through their lands without grieuing them or theirs in any ſort; and deſired, by proteſtation, to be vnited with that Commonweale, whereof the meanes might eaſily be found, not onely with ſuretie, but alſo with the augmentation and exaltation of both the parties, couertly inferring vnder this perſwaſion, that it would make for their common profite to conſpire together againſt the French King. The Venetians, after they had long debated in counſell, returned a very gracious anſwer, expreſſing how much their Commonweale deſired to be conformable to his will, and to ſatisfie his requeſts in all things which they might without their great preiudice, which in that caſe could be neither greater nor more euident; for that the regions of Italy being made deſperate by ſo many calamities which they had ſuffered, were drawne into an vniuerſall mutinie at the onely bruite of his deſcending with ſo mightie an armie, ſtanding generally reſolued to take armes to cut off all occaſions of new troubles, and that the French king was to do the like for the ſuretie of the eſtate of Millan: That by that meanes, his coming into Italy with an armie, was no other thing then to giue occaſion to the Italians to take armes to make mightie reſiſtance againſt him: an action of no litle importance and danger againſt them, for that if they ſhould conſent to his paſſing, all the Potentates of Italy, together with the French King, would iudge of them no otherwiſe, then of ſuch as had not eſteemed of the common benefite in reſpect of their proper intereſts: That it would be more aſſured for all, and in the end more honorable for him, coming to an act peaceable & pleaſing to euery one, to paſſe diſarmed into Italy, where the Imperiall Maieſtie, ſhewing himſelfe no leſſe gracious and affable, then mightie and terrible, ſhould find a great and vniuerſall fauour: And that he ſhould (to his perpetuall glorie) beare the honorable reputation to be the protector of the tranquillitie of Italy, proceeding to his coronation in the ſame forme which his father and many of his renowmed predeceſſors had obſerued afore him; in which caſe that Senate wold vſe towards him, all the obſeruances and offices which he could deſire. Theſe preparations for armes, and things practiſed by Caſar, were the cauſes that the Pope who was fully reſolued to execute the enterpriſe of Bologna, and had ſent to ſummon the French King to his promiſe, was friendly aduiſed by

by the King (to whom it ſeemed not fit at that time to make ſuch an enterpriſe) to deferre it till another ſeaſon, leſt by this accident all Italy ſhould fall into commotion: for that he feared leſt he ſhould hereby ſtir vp the minds of the Venetians, who had already ſignified to him that they were reſolued to take armes for the defence of Bologna, if the Pope would not firſt endue them with the grant of thoſe patronages and rights of Faenza which appertained to the Church. But the Pope, who by nature was impatient and ſodaine, ſought out ſtill all the meanes he could, whereby (notwithſtanding all difficulties and impediments) he might come to the end of his deſire, and that in a furious and violent maner. For hauing called together into the Conſiſtory all the Cardinals, and ſhewed that he was touched with a iuſt deſire to deliuer from the hands of tyrants the Cities of Bologna and Perouſa, members ſo noble and ſo much importing the Sea Apoſtolike; his concluſion was, that he would go thither in perſon: aſſuring them, that beſides his owne forces, he ſhould be aided by the French King, by the Florentines, and many other Potentates of Italy, and that God who is iuſt, would not leaue abandoned ſuch as ſought to helpe his Church. This deliberation being publiſhed in France, ſeemed ſo ridiculous to the King, that the Pope ſhould promiſe himſelfe a ſuccour of his people without being otherwiſe certified, that making it a ieſting talke at his table, and minding to taxe his notorious drunkenneſſe, he ſaid, it could not be but the Pope was well drunke the night before; not diſcerning that that ſodaine deliberation did conſtraine him, either to come to manifeſt controuerſie with him, or elſe to giue him of his men againſt his will. But the Pope without expecting any other reſolution, iſſued out of Rome with fiue hundred men at armes, and ſending afore Anthonie dal Monte to ſignifie his coming to the Bolognois, with direction to command them to make prouiſion to receiue him, and to beſtow in the country fiue hundred French Lances, he marched ſlowly, hauing determined not to paſſe Perouſa, till he were well aſſured whether the French bands would come to his ſuccours: and Iohn Paul Baillon fearing his coming, by the counſell of the Duke of Vrbin and other his friends, and vnder their aſſurance, went to meete the Pope at Oruietto, who receiued him into grace and fauour, after he had wholly ſubmitted himſelfe to his diſcretion, with promiſe to follow him in perſon with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and alſo to render vp into his hands the fortreſſes of Perouſa and Peruſin, and the guard of the Citie, giuing for obſeruation his two ſonnes in hoſtage to the Duke of Vrbin. This compoſition made, the Pope entred without any ſtrength into Perouſa, being in the full power of Iohn Paul Baillon to make him priſoner with all his Court, if he would haue made ſound throughout the world in a matter of ſuch greatneſſe and weight, that diſloyaltie, which had already made his name infamous in things more inferiour and of farre meaner qualitie. At Perouſa the Pope gaue audience to the Cardinall of Narbona, ſent to him from the French King, to perſwade him to deferre the enterpriſe till another time, and to proteſt the Kings excuſes, in that (contrary to his deſire) he could not ſend him men, for that in reſpect of the great ſuſpitions he had of Ceſar, it was not conuenient to leaue the Duchie of Millan diſarmed. With which embaſſage the Pope being much moued, and yet for all that making no ſhew that he had any inclination or will to change aduice, he began to leuie new bands of footmen, and to increaſe all his prouiſions: and yet many beleeued, that what by the difficulties that appeared, and the eaſineſſe of his nature to be appeaſed vpon ſubmiſſion, that if Bentiuole, who offered by his Embaſſadours to ſend in his foure ſonnes, had diſpoſed himſelfe to come in perſon, according to the example of Iohn Paul, he had found ſome tollerable forme for his affaires. But whileſt he could not reſolue with himſelfe, or, as ſome ſay, whileſt he was holden in ſuſpence by the contradiction of his wife, he had aduertiſement that Monſieur de Chaumont had receiued direction from the French King to go to the ſuccours of the Pope in perſon with fiue hundred Lances. For albeit the King (in the abſence of the Cardinall of Amboiſe) had no inclination to ſend him, yet the Cardinall perſwading afterwards the contrary, and conſidering how much the Pope would be offended if he ſhould refuſe that which he had not onely promiſed him at the beginning, but alſo ſince had vrged him to vſe the ſeruice of his men, he changed aduice. Whereunto he was ſo much the more eaſily induced, by how much the demonſtrations of Maximilian began now to waxe cold, according to his cuſtome; and the Pope, ſomewhat to ſatisfie the King, was content to make promiſe (yet not by writing, but with ſimple words) that he would not moleſt the Venetians for the townes of Romagna. And yet notwithſtanding the Pope, not able to abſtaine from diſcloſing what a ſetled deſire he bare that way, going from Perouſa to Ceſena, he tooke the way of the mountaine; for that if he had marched along the plaine, he ſhould haue bene conſtrained to paſſe vpon the lands of Rimini, which the Venetians held. As ſoone as he was come to Ceſena, he admoniſhed Bentiuole to depart from Bolognia vnder moſt grieuous cenſures and paines ſpirituall and temporall, ſtretching them out againſt all ſuch as ſhould hold any conuerſation or confederacie with him: and receiuing intelligence in this place, that Monſieur de Chaumont marched with ſix hundred lances and three thouſand footmen, all paid of the Church treaſures, he tooke courage, and continued on his way without deferring. And turning from the wayes and territories of Faenza for the ſame reſpects he turned from Rimini, he tooke the way of the mountaine, notwithſtanding it was very troubleſome and full of incommodities: and paſſing by the townes which the Florentines poſſeſſed beyond the Appenine, he went to Imola, where his armie aſſembled: wherein, beſides many bands of footmen which he had leuied, were foure hundred men at armes in his pay, an hundred and fiftie led by John Paul Baillon, an hundred lent by the Florentines vnder the guide of Marke Anthonie Colonne, an hundred lent by the Duke of Ferrara, many bands of Eſtradiots leuied in the kingdome of Naples, and two hundred light horſemen brought thither by the Marquis of Mantua, deputie Lieutenant of the armie. At Bolognia on the other ſide, Bentiuole and his faction omitted no preparation that might reſpect their ſuretie, hoping that if they were not defended, at the leaſt they ſhould not be offended by the French: for that the King being called vpon to aide them, according to the contract of protection, had anſwered, that albeit he could not with armes oppoſe againſt the enterpriſe of the Pope, yet he would forbeare to miniſter either men, or other nature of aide againſt them: by reaſon whereof they hoped to be able with eaſe to reſiſt the army Eccleſiaſtike. But all hope failed them by the coming of Monſieur de Chaumont, who, albeit as he marched had made diuers anſwers to their people, yet the ſame day he arriued at Caſtelfranco vpon the territories of Bolognia, (being the ſame day wherein the Marquis of Mantua with the Popes regiments made himſelfe Lord ouer the borough of S. Peter) he ſent to ſignifie to Bentiuole, that the King not minding to faile of that he was bound vnto by the capitulations of protection, had an intention not onely to cauſe ſafetie and preſeruation of his goods, but alſo to procure him ſuch further grace and fauour, that reſigning to the Church the gouernment and policie of the Citie, he ſhould with ſuretie remaine in Bolognia with his ſonnes, ſo that within three dayes he ſubmitted himſelfe wholly to the obedience and commandements of the Pope. By reaſon whereof Bentiuole and his ſonnes, who with great threatnings afore had publiſhed to all the world their diſpoſition to defend themſelues, became now abated in courage, and not remembring with what vpbraidings they had exclaimed againſt Peter de Medicis, for that without effuſion of bloud he had forſaken Florence; made anſwer, that they would referre themſelues to his arbitration, beſeeching him to be a meanes that at the leaſt they might obtaine conditions tollerable. Therefore, being now come to the bridge of Rene, three miles from Bolognia, interpoſing with the Pope, he made an agreement, that it ſhould be lawfull to Iohn Bentiuole and his ſonnes, with Geneura Sforce his wife, ſafely to go out of Bolognia, and remaine in the Duchie of Millan in any place at their beſt liking: That it ſhould be lawfull for them either to ſell or carry away from Bolognia, all their goods moueable, and not to be moleſted for their immoueables which they poſſeſſed with iuſt title. By the benefite of which accord ratified and confirmed, they departed with ſpeed out of Bolognia, hauing obtained of Monſieur de Chaumont, to whom they gaue twelue thouſand duckats, a very large ſafeconduct, with promiſe ſubſcribed, not onely to ſee obſerued all that is contained in the articles of protection, but alſo that he and his family ſhould continue in ſuretie in the Duchie of Millan. The Bentiuoleis being departed, the people of Bolognia addreſſed with diligence their Embaſſadours to the Pope, to put into his hands the abſolute iuriſdiction of their Citie, to demand pardon and abſolution of the Cenſures, and to require order that the French ſhould not enter into Bolognia; who being vnwilling to be ruled, made their approch to the walls, and ſtroue to enter: but the people hauing repulſed them, they lodged neare the walls, betweene the gates of S. Felix and Sarageſſe, vpon the channell which drawing from the riuer of Rene, paſſeth through Bolognia, and from thence is nauigable to Ferrara; being ignorant, that it was in the power of the inhabitants of Bolognia by plucking vp a ſluce of the channell that entreth the Citie, to drowne all the countrey about: the which being done, the channell that afore was ſwelled with water, brake forth and ouerflowed the low places where the French bands were incamped; who leauing their artillerie in the mire, and much of their baggage, retired in great tumult and diſorder to the bridge of

Rene,

Rene, where they remained till the Pope entred into Bologna, which was on Saint Martins day, performing his entrie with all pompe and ceremonies Pontificall. Thus fell into the power of the Church, to the great felicitie of the inhabitants the Citie of Bologna, which with good right beareth the name and reputation amongst the most noble and flourishing Cities of Italy, as well for the infinitie of the dwellers, as for the fertilitie of soile and oportunitie of situation: in which Citie, albeit the Pope did institute new Magistrates by the example of antiquitie, leauing in many things great signes and apparences of libertie, yet, touching the effect, he brought it wholly to the obedience of the Church, shewing himselfe very liberall in this, that releasing diuers exemptions, (doing the like in all other Cities) he laboured to allure the multitude to a liking of the gouernment of the Church. He gaue to Monsieur de Chaumont, who returned immediatly to the Duchie of Millan, eight thousand duckats, and ten thousand to be distributed amongst his regiment, and he confirmed with Bull subsigned, the promise he had made before to create Cardinall, his brother the Bishop of Alby; and yet (bending all his wits how he might annoy the Venetians) to leaue quicker motions in the French King and Cardinall of Amboise to aide him, he would not at that time publish Cardinals the Bishops of Achx and Bayeux, according to the solicitations that were made, and writs which were already subscribed.

About this time the King of Aragon passed by sea into Italy, and before he embarked at Barcelona, there came to him a Gentleman from the Great Captaine, to declare his readinesse to receiue the King, and to yeeld him obedience: to whom in recompence of his fidelitie and merites, the King ratified not onely the donation of the Duchie of Saint Ange, which King Federike had giuen him, but also all his other goods which he possessed in the kingdome of Naples, amounting to more then twentie thousand duckats in the yearely reuenue, and confirmed to him the office of great Constable of the same kingdome, with promise to be great Maister of Saint Iames, both subsigned vnder the Kings owne hand. Thus the King of Aragon embarking at Barcelona with no lesse contentment of the present, then better hope hereafter, was honourably receiued together with his wife, in all the ports of Prouence, according to the French Kings commandements, and with the same honour was welcomed into the hauen of Genes, where he was expected by the Great Captaine, who was gone thither to meete him, not without the admiration of many, for that not onely the popular sort, but euen the Pope himselfe was of opinion, that as wel for his disobedience past, as for the present suspition which the King had in him, (possibly not without cause) he would passe into Spaine, fearing to stand in the presence of the King. The King of Aragon departing from Genes, remained many dayes at Portofino, both for that the wind was contrary, and also he held it not conuenient to be far from the shore with his light galleys. Whilest he soiourned at Portofino, he was aduertised that King Philip his sonne in law, yong in yeares, and well disposed in bodie, had changed this life for a better within the towne of Burgos, of a feauer, which held him but very few dayes, happning in the very floure of his age, and in a time wherein he was lifted to his greatest felicitie, as Fortune doth oftentimes shew her selfe verie variable: neuertheless the King (of whom it was beleeued, that for the desire he had to recontinue in the gouernment of Castile, he would eftsoones turne saile to Barcelona) kept on his first way, and entred the port of Caietta the same day that the Pope marching to Bologna, made his entrie into Imola: from whence he was conueyed to Naples, and receiued into that Citie (which was wont to reioyce in the Kings of Aragon) with great magnificence, and with so much the more desire of all men, for an opinion they had, that vnder a King so glorious for the many victories he had obtained as well against the Infidels as the Christians, and so reuerenced for his wisedome, and of whom the generall report of his singular iustice, by the which he had guided his Realmes in tranquillitie, was famous: he would also restore and relieue the kingdome of Naples of so many afflictions and oppressions, and reduce it into an estate peaceable and happie, with restitution of the ports which the Venetians held there, to the great displeasure of the whole kingdome. There came to him to Naples from all parts of Italy many Embassadours, not onely to congratulate and honour so great a Prince, but also for many practises and occasions, euery one being perswaded that with his authoritie and wisedome, he would bring things into a better form, and be the euen ballance & counterpoise for many matters: for that both the Pope, who although he were discontented with him, for that he had not sent to him Embassadors to acknowledge obedience, according to the custome, studied to kindle him against the Venetians, thinking that for the desire he had to recouer the ports of Pouilla, he wished their declination and embasing: and the Venetians on the contrary solicited to be continued in his amitie: and also the Florentines, with the other people of Tuscan, negociated with him diuersly for the regard of Pisa, which this yeare was lesse molested then others with the incursions of the Florentines (not hindering their harueſt) either for that they were wearie of the charges, or else that the experience of the yeare passed made them esteeme it a thing vaine and without fruite, knowing that the States of Genes and Lucques had agreed together to support that Citie for one yeare with a determinate and certaine charge, whereunto Pandolfe Petrucci had prepared them before, offering the like portion of contribution on the behalfe of the Siennoys: notwithstanding on the other side (being a man dissembled in all his intentions) he obtained of the Florentines, by disclosing the estate of the negociation, and to the end to separate himselfe from the rest, that the truce which yet continued between the Florentines and Siennois, should haue prolongation for three yeares, with an expresse couenant, that it should not be lawfull to the Siennois, nor to Pandolfe, to minister any aide to the Pisans: with which excuse forbearing to be at any expences for them, he refused not to fauour them with all the counsels and actions he could in any other sort. This yeare there hapned a new and strange accident of the tragedie which had bene begun before at Ferrara: for Ferdinand brother to Duke Alphonso and Iulio, whose eyes the Cardinall had violently caused to be pluckt out, (but by the readie helpe of Physitions were restored without losse of his sight,) conspired together with the said Iulio, the death of the Duke; Ferdinand, who was next in succession after the Duke, being moued to this conspiracie by an aspiring desire to occupie that State; and Iulio by an opinion he had that Alphonso was not sensible of the wrong that had bene done him, and for that he was out of hope to be able otherwise to be reuenged vpon the Cardinall; in which counsels and practise did participate the Count Albertin Boschet a gentleman of Modena; and hauing wonne and corrupted certaine fellowes of base condition, which were alwayes about the person of Alphonso to make him sport, they had many times faire oportunities to haue slaine him: but being withholden by a certaine fatall timorousnesse, they alwayes let passe the oportunitie: so that (as it happeneth for the most part when the execution of conspiracies is deferred) the treason being detected, Ferdinand with the other conspirators were imprisoned, and Iulio, who was fled to his sister at Mantua, was by the direction of the Marquis, sent prisoner to Alphonso, hauing receiued promise of him that he should not be put to death: but a litle after the Count Albertin being condemned iudicially, was quartered with the others that were found guiltie, and the two brethren passed ouer to perpetuall prison in the New castle of Ferrara. And in this place I must say somewhat of the audacitie and industrie of Valentinois, who being subtilly slided downe by a cord out of the Rocke of Medina del Campo, fled into the kingdome of Nauarre to King Iohn brother to his wife, where (to the end that henceforth we may speake no more of him) after he had remained certaine yeares in base condition, (for the French King, who had confisked both the Duchie of Valence, and taken away the pension of twentie thousand franks which he gaue him in supply of reuenue, would not suffer him to go into France, because he would do nothing that might discontent the King of Aragon) he was at last slaine, commanding ouer the men of warre of the King of Nauarre in the campe at Viano, a litle place in the said Realme, fighting against the enemies, which came out of an ambush.

The death of Valentinois.

Vpon the end of this yeare, to the end that the next should not begin without matter of new warres, the Genoways rebelled against the French King, hauing no other incitation then of themselues, the matter taking his foundation not of any desire they had to rebell, but rather of ciuill discords, which carrie men beyond their former deliberations. The Citie of Genes, a Citie seated in a place most apt to command the sea, if so great an oportunitie were not hindred by the pestiferous poison of ciuill dissentions, is not, as many other great townes in Italy, subiect to one particular diuision, but is deuided into many parties and factions: for that the relikes of the ancient quarels betweene the Guelfes and Gibelins are yet remaining there, and also the dissention betweene the gentlemen and populars, by the which heretofore in Italy, but specially in Tuscan many cities haue bene brought to extreme ruine. For the communaltie vnwilling to beare the pride of the Nobles, bridled much their authoritie and power by many rigorous laws: and amongst others, suffering them to communicate with all other offices and honours, they excluded them particularly from the dignitie of Dukedome: a supreme estate which was giuen for life to any other that was chosen, notwithstanding by the inconstancie of that Citie, very few or none were suffered to continue in that place till they died. But no lesse great is the diuiſion betweene the families of the Adorni and Fregoſi, who from baſe condition and popular houſes, being riſen to the dignitie of Cappellaci (ſo do the Genowayes call ſuch as are aſpired to any great power) contend together for the dignitie of Duke, which for many yeares hath continued for the moſt part in one of thoſe two families. For the Gentlemen of the Guelfes and Gibelins, not able to aſcend to that place for the impediment of the lawes, ſought to make it fall to ſuch of the populars as were of their faction: and the Gibelins fauouring the Adornes, and the Guelfes the houſe of Fregoſa, time hath made thoſe two families more noble and mightie, then thoſe whoſe name & authority they formerly followed: and all thoſe diuiſions are ſo confounded, that oftentimes they that be of one part againſt the partie oppoſite, are in themſelues deuided into diuers parts, and of the contrary conioyned in one with thoſe that follow another faction. This yeare began to kindle betweene the Gentlemen and Commons, a debate, which breeding at the firſt vpon the inſolencies of certaine of the Nobles, and working by litle and litle the moſt part of the minds of both the one and other ſide ill diſpoſed, it quickly turned from priuate contentions into publike diſcords, eaſie enough to kindle in cities ſo abounding in riches as did Genes at that time. Theſe quarels increaſed ſo farre, that the people poſſeſſed with furie, drew into tumult, and made violent ſlaughter of one of the family of Oria, and hurt certaine other gentlemen: wherein offering all things to ſpoile and ruine, they obtained in that mutinie, more by force then free will of the Citie, that the day after it might be ordained in the publike Councels (wherein were aſſiſtant very few of the Nobles) that of thoſe offices which afore were deuided equally between the Nobles and Commons, there might be hereafter diſtribution made of two parts to the people, and one onely reſerued to the Nobles: to which deliberation Roccabertin guiding the Citie in the abſence of Philip Rauaſtin then gouernour for the King, conſented for feare of greater perils. Neuertheleſſe the populars not being quieted for all this, ſtirred vp within few dayes after a new tumult, and put the Noblemens houſes to ſacke: by reaſon whereof, the moſt part of the Nobilitie finding no ſuretie in their naturall regions, abandoned the Citie. The gouernour being aduertiſed of theſe mutations, returned with ſpeed out of France to Genes with an hundred and fiftie horſe, and ſeuen hundred footmen: but neither with his authoritie, his perſwaſions, his preſence, nor with his forces, could he reduce things to a better eſtate; but oftentimes being compelled to apply himſelfe to the will of the people, he commanded certaine other troupes that were appointed to come after him out of France, to retire. By theſe beginnings, the Commons becoming dayly more inſolent, and (as it hapneth often in Cities ſeditious) the gouernment, contrary to the will of many of the beſt ſort of the Commons, fell almoſt abſolutely into the power of the dregs of the people, who in their furie created to themſelues a new magiſtracie or office of eight men of the populars with a great authoritie; and they, the rather to keepe the whole, incenſed by the dignitie of their name, were called Tribunes of the people. Theſe occupied with armes the towne of Spetia, with certaine other townes of the riuer of Leuant, whereof Iohn Lewis de Fieſquo was gouernour for the King. But Iohn Lewis complained to the King of theſe inſolencies, both in the name of the whole Nobilitie, and for his particular intereſt, declaring to his Maieſtie the manifeſt danger to loſe the iuriſdiction of Genes, ſeeing the inſolent libertie of the Commons had caried them ſo farre, that beſides other oppreſſions and harmes, they aſpired (proceeding directly againſt the authoritie of the King) to manage the townes of the riuer: That vſing expedition, there might be raiſed remedies conuenient to repreſſe ſo great a furie, ſeeing they were as yet protected and fauoured by none: whereas if he became ſlow in prouiding remedie, the euill would with tract of time take more firme roote, for that the importance of Genes was ſuch both by ſea and land, that it would eaſily allure ſome forreine Prince to nouriſh ſuch a diuiſion, ſo hurtfull for his eſtate: and the Commons coming to know that that which at the beginning was perhaps but a ſedition, was now turned into rebellion, would ioyne with any that would giue hope to defend it. But on the other part, the Embaſſadours ſent to the King from the people of Genes, laboured to iuſtifie the action, and to make their cauſe good: declaring, that no other thing had moued the people, but the pride of the Gentlemen, who, not contented with the honors fit for Nobilitie, ſought to be redoubted as Lords and Princes: That the people had long borne ỹ yoke of their inſolencies, but at laſt hauing receiued many wrongs, not onely in their goods, but alſo in their proper perſons, it was not poſſible to containe themſelues any longer: and that for all that they had not proceeded to any other actions, then ſuch as without the which their libertie could not be aſſured: for that the Gentlemen communicating by equall part in the offices, there was no possibilitie by the meanes of magistrates and iudgements, to resist their tyrannie: and John Lewis commanding ouer the townes of the riuers, without the traffike whereof Genes stood as it were besieged, there was no safetie for the Commons to entertain traffike and conuersation there: That the people had bene alwayes most deuout and faithfull to the Kings Maiestie, and that the mutations of Genes had in all times more proceeded of the ambition of the Gentlemen, then of the infidelity of the people: That they besought the King to pardon those offences, which during the heate of the contentions, certaine particulars had committed against the vniuersall consent, and that he would confirme the law made for the distribution of offices, and suffer the townes of the riuers to be gouerned vnder the name publike: Lastly, that by that meanes the Gentlemen enioying honorably their degrees and dignities, and the populars also possessing their libertie with suretie, and all things being reduced by his Maiesties authoritie into such an estate of tranquillitie, they should be bound to honour perpetually the clemencie, goodnesse and iustice of the King. The King was much troubled with these tumults, either for that the licentious behauiour of the Commons was suspected to him, or perhaps for the honorable inclination which the French do commonly beare to the name of Gentlemen: in so much that he could haue bene disposed to haue punished the authors of these insolencies, and reduce all things to their first degree, sauing that he feared lest if he should vse sharpe remedies, the Genoways would haue recourse to Cæsar, whose sonne was not yet dead. For this cause then, hauing determined to proceed with clemencie, he pardoned all their offences, and ratified their new law for disposing of offices, so far forth as they would put into his hands the townes of the riuers which they occupied: and the better to incline and dispose the people, he sent to Genes Doctor Michael Riccio, a banished man of Naples, to perswade the Commons, that they were better to embrace the occasion of the Kings clemencie, then (adding to their faults, contumacie) to compell him to proceed against them with seueritie. But being blind with immoderate couetousnesse, prudence (suffocated with rashnes) hauing no place in their minds, the people and Tribunes (notwithstanding the lawfull Magistrates were of the contrary opinion) would not onely not render the places they occupied, but going on from ill to worse, determined to assaile the borough of Monaco, which Lucian Grimault possessed: which they did either in regard of a common hatred they bore against all the Gentlemen of Genes, or else for that it is of great importance for the Citie of Genes, hauing his situation vpon the sea in a place of great conueniencie: or at least for certaine particular hatreds, since he who hath that place in his power, abstaineth very hardly from piracies and robbing by sea, being allured thereto by the situation thereof, very fit for such actions: or lastly, because (as they suggested) that borough appertained rightfully to the Commonweale. And therefore the Gouernor in vaine contradicting them, they sent thither many bands both by sea and land to besiege it: by reason whereof Philip de Rauastin perceiuing that he tarried there vnprofitably, and, by the accidents that might happen, not without danger of his person, went his way, and left Roccabertin in his place: and the King despairing that things could not be ranged into a better forme, and iudging that if he should consent that they should continue in that estate, it might be preiudiciall to his dignitie and suretie, and that if he suffered things to go on in that sort, the danger would be somewhat the greater, he began openly to make preparations both by sea and land, to reduce the Genoways to his obedience.

This deliberation was the cause, that matters which were negociated betweene the Pope and him against the Venetians, were dissolued and broken: enterprises much desired by the King, who for the death of King Philip, found himselfe well deliuered of the suspitions which he had taken against Maximilian: but much more wished for by the Pope, by reason of the townes which the Venetians occupied in Romagna, and for that without any respect to the Sea Apostolike, they disposed of the Bishopricks vacant in their iurisdiction, and intruded themselues into many things appertaining to the iurisdiction of the Church. By reason whereof, bearing a setled inclination to entertaine amitie with the King, he solicited him to passe into Italy, and to haue conference together; whereunto the King consented, the Pope hauing afore in gratification of his requests, consecrated Cardinals the Bishops of Bayeux and Achx. But the Pope vnderstanding afterwards that the King had determined to take armes against the Commons of Genes in fauour of the Gentlemen, he tooke it very grieuously, for that hauing of long time frowned vpon the Gentlemen, he had alwayes borne fauour to the people: wherein he made great inſtance to the King to hold himſelfe contented, without changing the eſtate popular, to haue that Citie in his obedience; and perſwaded him as much as he could to abſtaine from armes, alledging many reaſons, but chiefly the danger, leſt by that meanes ſome great alteration kindling in Italy, the warres which they had determined againſt the Venetians, might be hindered. The King bearing no inclination to theſe demands, the Pope, either ouerruled with anger or ſorow, or elſe for that the old ſuſpition of the aſpiring mind of the Cardinall of Amboiſe did eftſoones ſtir in him, either of his owne accord, or by the ſubtill ſuggeſtion of others, (which made him feare to be retained by the King when they ſhould meete together) and perhaps as well for the one as the other occaſion; he publiſhed on the ſudden, in the beginning of the yeare 1507, againſt the expectation of euery one, that he would returne to Rome, and for no other reaſon, then that the aire of Bologna was contrary to his health, and that his reuenues were much diminiſhed by his abſence from Rome. This deliberation brought no litle maruell to euery one, but ſpecially to the King, for that without occaſion he would leaue vnperfect the practiſes he had ſo much deſired to aduance, and breake of himſelfe the enterview and conference which he had ſo much required: and therefore calling into conſideration the eſtate and intricate diſpoſition of things, he laboured what he could to draw him from that new counſell, and make him change his opinion: wherein his paines were more hurtfull to him then vaine, for that the Pope entring into a greater ſuſpition for the requeſt that the King made vnto him, ſtood more reſolute in his firſt counſell, and departing from Bologna vpon the end of Februarie, he expreſſed how litle he could diſſemble the contempt he had conceiued againſt the King. Afore he iſſued out of the Citie, he ſet with vnfortunate ſignes the firſt ſtone of the Caſtle, which was made there by his commandement, neare the gate which leads to Ferrara, in the ſelfe ſame place where Philip Maria Viſcount Duke of Millan had aforetime erected another with no leſſe ill fortune. And his new anger againſt the French King hauing in ſome ſort qualified his ancient hatred againſt the Venetians, and not minding to turne out of his right way, he determined to paſſe by the Citie of Faenza, new controuerſies happening from time to time betweene the French king and him, both for that he required that the family of the Bentiuoleis might be expulſed the Duchie of Millan, notwithſtanding they were permitted to dwell there by his conſent; and alſo for that he would not render to the Pronotarie the ſonne of Iohn, the poſſeſſion of thoſe benefices which he had promiſed of his owne accord and conſent: ſo often preuailed more in him the contention of his ſpirit, then either reaſon or equitie. Which diſpoſition the King laboured not to appeaſe with any art or diligence, but being angrie for ſo great a variation, and entring withall into ſuſpition, leſt (as the truth was) he gaue ſecret encouragement to the people of Genes, he forbare not to threaten him openly, and to obiect with iniurious words, his infamous birth: for all knew well enough that the Pope was very baſely deſcended, and that he had bene trained vp for many yeares in very vile eſtate. And the King being yet more and more confirmed in his firſt deliberation touching the affaires of Genes, prepared his armie with great diligence to go thither in perſon, hauing well experienced by his former ſucceſſes in the kingdome of Naples, what difference there is to adminiſter a warre in proper perſon, and to recommend it ouer to the managing of his captains. Theſe preparations amazed nothing the Genowayes, being buſie to take Monaco, about the which they kept employed many veſſels, and ſixe thouſand men leuied of the cõmunaltie & cõuntreys of Genes, cõmanded by Tarlatin a Captain of the Piſans, who, together with Peter Shortlegge and certaine other ſouldiers, had bene ſent by them in fauour of the Genowayes. And at Genes, as they perſeuered in their firſt offences, adding alwayes ſome new tranſgreſſion, the Captaine of the Caſtle, who till then had expreſſed no action, nor had bene moleſted by the people, vpon the ſudden made many of the Commons priſoners, and began to vexe the hauen and citie with his artilleries. This was either by the Kings commandement, or vpon his owne authoritie, with a deſire to make pillage: by reaſon whereof, Rocabertin fearing the danger of his owne perſon, went his way, and the footbands of the French which were ſet to guard the publike Pallace, retired into the Caſtle. A litle after, the ſiege which had remained afore Monaco many moneths, tooke end; the reaſon was, for that ſuch as were encamped afore it, vnderſtanding that Iues d'Alegre and many gentlemen were at hand to ſuccour it with a ſtrength of three thouſand footmen of their owne pay, and certaine other bands which the Duke of Sauoy had ſent, hauing not the courage to abide their coming, had leuied the ſiege: and alſo the bruite ranne, that the armie appointed by the King, paſſed continually into Lombardie: by rea-

ſon whereof, the fury of thoſe men increaſing, who ought to haue bene the authors of better counſels, the Commons that till that day had diſſembled with words, the rebellion which they had exerciſed in deeds, and which called vpon the name of the French King, and had not remoued his armes out of the publike places, created Duke of Genes one Paul de Noue a ſilke dier, a man of very baſe condition: declaring themſelues in this, manifeſt rebels; for that to the creation of the Duke was ioyned a declaration, that the Citie of Genes ſhould not be in ſubiection to any Prince. Theſe things ſtirring the King to greater anger, and the Gentlemen informing him, that in the place of his armes they had put thoſe of Caſar, he redoubled the preparations which he had prouided afore; being ſo much the more kindled in wrath, by how much Caſar, at the perſwaſions of the Genoways, and haply by the Popes ſecret ſetting on, had written to him that he ought not to moleſt Genes as a towne of the Empire, offering ſo to labour, that the people ſhould be ranged and reduced to all things iuſt and reaſonable. The Duke and Tribunes were ſomewhat nouriſhed in their raſh boldneſſe, by the proſperous ſucceſſes they had on the coaſt of Leuant. For Ierome the ſonne of John Lewis de Fieſque, hauing reconquered Rapalle with two thouſand footmen and certaine horſe, as he went by night to ſurpriſe Recqua, he encountred the bands that were ſent from Genes to ſuccour it; and without coming to blowes he fell diſorderly to flying: whereupon Orlandin nephew to John Lewis, which was marched as farre as Recqua with another regiment, hearing the noiſe of the chaſe, did the like: and by this fortune the Duke and the Tribunes became more inſolent, and proceeded to beſiege Caſtellaccio, an ancient Caſtle which the ancient Lords of Millan builded in the mountaines aboue Genes, at ſuch time as they were commanders ouer that Citie, to ſerue as a helpe that thoſe companies which they ſhould ſend out of Lombardie, might haue oportunitie to approch neare Genes, and ſuccor the Caſtle; which containing a very ſmall garriſon, they tooke eaſily: for that thoſe few French bands that were there, yeelded vnder promiſe to haue their goods and liues preſerued, which was not obſerued, thoſe that were the executors of ſuch outrages returning to Genes with bloudie hands and great reioycing. At the ſame time alſo they began to batter with their artilleries the Caſtle, and the Church of Saint Francis ioyning to it. But the King was now paſſed into Italy, and reenforced his armie continually to aſſaile Genes without delay: and yet the Genoways abandoned of all ſuccours (for the Catholicke King, notwithſtanding he wiſhed their conſeruation, would not ſhew himſelfe deuided from the French King, but furniſhed him with foure light galleys: and the Pope durſt not otherwiſe diſcloſe his intentions, then in giuing them ſecret hopes; they hauing onely three hundred footmen forreiners, not one Captaine experienced in warre, and great lacke of munitions) perſiſted in their obſtinacie, hoping by reaſon of the ſtraightneſſe of the paſſages, and the difficultie and hardneſſe of the countrey, they might eaſily let the enemie for coming neare Genes; and in regard of theſe vaine hopes they deſpiſed the admonitions of many, and ſpecially of the Cardinall of Finale, who accompanying the French armie, perſwaded them by many meſſengers and letters, to offer vp themſelues to the Kings will, giuing them hope eaſily to obtaine pardon and conditions tollerable. But the armie marching already by the way of the borough of Fornaro and Seruallo, the vanitie of the plots of the Genoways began to appeare, being not meaſured nor directed by men trained in warre, but followed with clamours and vaine braggings of the baſe and ignorant multitude. Therefore the courages of men nothing anſwering in this preſent perill to that which they had promiſed themſelues when they were without feare, ſixe hundred of their footmen ſet to guard their firſt ſtraights, being charged by the French men, fled cowardly; by whoſe example, the reſidue that kept the other paſſages, abandoned their places and retired to Genes, leauing all the ſtraights open to the French, whoſe armie hauing paſſed without impediment ouer the top of the mountaines, was now deſcended into the vale of Pozzeuero, within ſeuen miles of Genes: which did not a litle amaze the Genoways, for that contrary to their vndiſcreete expectations, they ſaw the armie ſo hardie, as to incampe in that valley which was frontired with troubleſome mountaines, and in the midſt of the enemies countrey. At the ſame alſo the Kings nauie which contained eight light galleys, eight gallions, with many Foiſts and Brigantines, preſented themſelues before Genes, and from thence ſailed towards Portouenere and Spetia, purſuing the Genoway nauie, being ſeuen galleys and ſixe barkes, which not daring to keepe the hauen of Genes, were withdrawne into thoſe places. From the valley of Pozzeuero the armie drew to the borough of Riuarola, within two miles of Genes, and neare to the Church of S. Peter d'Arena, which is ioyning to the ſea: and albeit as they

they marched, they met in many places with diuers footbands of the Genowayes, yet they being all poſſeſſed with one puſillanimitie of mind, fled afore them; and the ſame day arriued in the armie the perſon of the King, and was lodged in the Abbey of Boſchet, right ouer againſt the borough of Riuarola, being accõpanied with the moſt part of the Nobles of France, with very many Gentlemen of the Duchie of Millan, and with the Marquis of Mantua, whom not many dayes before, the King had declared Captaine of the Order of Saint Michael, and had giuen vnto him the ſtanderd, which had not bene giuen to any ſince the death of King Lewis the eleuenth. In the French army were eight hundred Lances, (the King conſidering the difficulties of the countrey, had left the reſidue in Lombardie) eighteene hundred light horſemen, fixe thouſand Swiſſers, and fixe thouſand footmen of other nations. It is to be vnderſtood, that the Genowayes (becauſe they would not leaue free that way which leades by the mountaines to Caſtellaccio, and ſo to Genes, a ſhorter way then by Saint Peter d'Arene, and ioyning to the ſea) had builded a baſtillion on the top of the mountaine called the Promontorie hill, betweene the borough of Riuarola and Saint Peter d'Arene, from which Baſtillion the way lay from Caſtellaccio by the backſide of the litle hil. The armie then that lay encamped at Riuarola, marched the ſame day to the ſaid baſtillion: and on the other part, there iſſued out of Genes eight thouſand footmen, guided by Iaques Corſe Lieutenant to Tarlatin: for Tarlatin and the ſouldiers of the Piſans which were encloſed in Vintemille when the campe was raiſed from before Monaco, albeit they were reuoked by the Genowayes, who for their conduction ſent them the ſhip of Demetrius Iuſtinian, could not returne to Genes by land for the impediment of the French, nor by ſea, for that the winds were contrary. But the French beginning now to iſſue and aſcend, diſcouered the foot-troopes of the Genowayes, who being aſcended to the mountain by that ſide of the litle hill that leades to the baſtillion; and afterwards the moſt part of them being deſcended, had made head aboue a rocke which is in the mid way of the mountaine; againſt whom Monſieur de Chaumont ſent many gentlemen with a good ſtrength of footmen. The Genowayes, as well for their oddes in numbers, as the aduantage of the place, made a valiant defence, and that to the great domage of the French, who deſpiſing their enemies, for that they were for the moſt part artificers and other people gathered together, went gallantly to charge them, without conſidering the ſtrength and ſituation of the place: and as Monſieur de Paliſſa was hurt in the throate, but with no perill of life, Monſieur de Chaumont ſeeking to driue them from thence, cauſed to be mounted on high two Cannons, which beating them in flanke, conſtrained them to retire to the mountaine, where the reſidue of their ſtrength remained: whither the French following them in good order of warre, thoſe that guarded the baſtillion (albeit for his ſeate and fortification, they might with ſuretie abide the Cannon) fearing leſt vpon them and ſuch as were vpon the mountaine, might fall ſome of the French bands, they left it abandoned, to their great infamie; by meanes whereof, ſuch as from the litle hill had begun to retire towards the baſtillion, ſeeing their way was cut off, returned eſtſoones to Genes by ditches and cawſeys, leauing the ordinary paths, and loſing in the retraite about three hundred bodies.

By reaſon of this ſucceſſe, the Citie was filled with incredible feare, and depending wholly vpon the wils of the inferiour multitude, was neither directed by counſell of warre, nor ruled by ciuill wiſedome. They ſent then two Embaſſadors to the armie, to ſolicite to render themſelues vnder couenants conuenient: who when they could not haue acceſſe to the King, were referred to be heard by the Cardinall of Amboiſe, who made them anſwer, that the King had determined not to accept them, if without any other contract they did not ſubmit both their liues and goods wholly to his mercie. But during the parley with the Cardinall, part of the Commons which could not endure to heare of reconcilement, going out of Genes by heapes, ſhewed themſelues with many footbands, vpon the hills and ſides of the valley which leadeth from Caſtellaccio, and approched within a quarter of a mile of the baſtillion, hoping to recouer it; and entertaining the skirmiſh for three houres with certaine of the French bands that came againſt them, they retired at laſt to Caſtellaccio, neither reioycing in their fortune, nor leauing to their enemies any aduantage. In the meane while, the King more fearfull of a greater ſtirre, then well aſſured of the conqueſt, remained alwayes armed on horſebacke, in a plaine betweene the riuer of Pozzeuero and the place where the armie was encamped: but the night following, the Genowayes beginning to deſpaire, and the bruite running, that the chiefe of the people had ſecretly compounded with the King, euen from the time he entred Aſt; and the Commons complaining that they were abuſed, the Duke, with many of thoſe that hoped for no pardon for the faults committed, together with all the regiments of Piſans, departed to go to Piſa: and the morning following by the breake of day, the Embaſſadours returned eftſoones to the campe, and conſented to giue vp the towne to the Kings diſcretion, the Genoways hauing ſuſtained the warre not aboue eight dayes, with a notable example of the ignorance and confuſion of multitudes, who grounding their doings vpon fallible hopes and vaine expectations, and being furious when the danger is farre off, and very irreſolute when perill approcheth, are altogether irregulate and immoderate. The accord being made, the King with his armie approched neare Genes, the footmen being beſtowed in the ſuburbes, who became almoſt intractable, ſpecially the Swiſſers, whom there was much ado to reſtraine from entring the towne, to ſacke and make pillage of the goods. After this, Monſieur de Chaumont entred into Genes with the moſt part of the other regiments, hauing firſt furniſhed Caſtellaccio with garriſon: and the Genoways deliuered vnto him all their armour as well publike as priuate, which was immediatly beſtowed in the Caſtle, with three peeces of artillery which were brought thither by the Piſans, and afterwards reconueyed to Millan. The next day being the nine and twentieth of Aprill, the perſon of the King made his entrie into Genes, with all the companies of men at armes and archers of his guard: and as he was alighted and ſtanding vnder a ſtately arch, holding in his hand a naked ſword, and himſelfe all attired in white garments, there came afore him the ancient men of the citie, accompanied with many of the moſt honorable citizens, who falling at his feete, with teares in their eyes, one of them, in the name of the whole, after ſilence was granted, ſpake in this ſort: We may well affirme (moſt Chriſtian King) that although ſince the beginning of our commotions againſt our Gentlemen, the moſt part of the commons were actors therein, yet touching things that haue bene inſolently done, but chiefly the contempt and diſobedience to your commandements, they haue proceeded onely from the dregs of the moſt baſe and inferiour ſort of people, whoſe raſhneſſe, neither we, nor the other citizens, merchants, and honeſt artizans, were euer able to reſtraine: and therefore the puniſhment that ſhall be impoſed either vpon this towne, or vpon vs, will afflict the innocents, without hurting the authors of ſo hainous tranſgreſſions, who being vagabonds and men cleane without all meanes, are not eſteemed with vs in the ſocietie of men, and much leſſe for citizens; neither do they hold this wretched Citie for their countrey. But our intention is, ſetting aſide all excuſes, to haue recourſe to the magnanimitie and mercy of ſo great a King, repoſing ſimply therein, moſt humbly beſeeching your Maieſty, that as not long ſince the offenders of Millan found fauor in your eyes for faults far greater, you would be pleaſed to vſe the ſame propertie of grace and forgiueneſſe vpon that Citie, which within few moneths paſt was one of the moſt happie regions in the world, and now is an example of all deſolation and miſerie. Call to mind, Sir, with what glorie to your name, your clemencie was then celebrated through the world; & how much more honorable it will be to confirme it now, vſing the like compaſſion, then to obſcure it by exerciſing crueltie. Remember that your title of moſt Chriſtian, took his beginning of Chriſt who redeemed mankind, & that therfore by his example you ought aboue all things to vſe clemencie & mercie, which properly do belong vnto him. Let the faults committed be neuer ſo great, yea let them be ineſtimable, yet ſhall they not be able to ſurmount your pietie and goodneſſe. You are our King, by your dignitie and power repreſenting the image of the great God, (for what other thing are Kings in reſpect of their ſubiects, but gods?) and therefore you are bound ſo much the more to repreſent him with the ſemblance and ſimilitude of will and of worker, whereof there is not one more glorious, none more agreeable, nor any that makes his name more wonderfull, then the action of mercie. Theſe ſpeeches were ſeconded with the loud voices of euery one, crying, Mercie, mercie. But the King paſſed on without giuing any anſwer, bidding them neuertheleſſe to riſe: and deliuering his naked ſword which he held in his hand, he ſhewed ſome tokens of a mind inclined to compaſſion and benignitie. After this he went to the great Church, where infinite flocks of women and children, all clothed in white, fell proſtrate at his feete, crying vpon his clemencie and mercie, with weeping and wringing of hands. With this aſpect (as the report goeth) the King was much moued, ſo that albeit he had determined to depriue the Citie of all gouernment and authoritie, and to confiske the reuenues which vnder the name of S. George belonged to many priuate perſons, and taking from them all ſhew of libertie, to reduce them to the ſame ſtate of ſubiection which he had done the townes of Millan; yet conſidering afterwards, that by this maner of proceeding, not onely many innocents ſhould be puniſhed, but alſo the minds of the whole Nobilitie eſtranged from him, and that it would be more eaſie for him to keepe them in obedience by vſing ſome mildneſſe, then altogether with rigour; he reconfirmed the ancient gouernment, and left it in the ſame ſtate wherein it was before theſe laſt ſeditions: and yet to temper his mercie with ſome iuſtice, he condemned the communaltie in an hundred thouſand duckats for the penaltie of the offence, and a litle after in a penaltie of two hundred thouſand duckats more, payable within a certaine time, both to defray the charges he had ſuſtained, and alſo to edifie a Citadell in the place where is the Tower of Codifa, not farre from Genes, and ſtanding vpon the ſea, aboue that ſuburbe which leadeth to the valley of Pozzeuero and S. Peter in Arena: which Citadell, for that it may command the hauen and whole Citie, is rightfully called the Bridle. He ordained alſo that they ſhould furniſh a greater garriſon then they were wont, and keepe continually armed in the hauen for his ſeruice, three galleys, and fortifie the Citadell and Caſtellaccio. He brake all the capitulations and couenants that had bene made afore betweene the citie and him, granting to them againe almoſt all the ſame things, but in forme of priuiledge, and not in the nature of couenant, to the end it might always ſtand in his power to take them away again. He defaced out of their coines their ancient ſtampes, cauſing them afterwards to vſe his ſtampe, in ſigne of abſolute ſuperioritie. To theſe actions was added the death of Demetrius Iuſtinian, who was beheaded, diſcloſing in his examination all the practiſes which the Pope had vſed, together with the hopes he had giuen them; and within a few moneths after was alſo beheaded Paul de Nouo lately made Duke, who ſailing from Piſa to Rome, was betrayed by a pirat that had bene his ſouldier, and ſold to the French men. After the King had done all theſe things, and ſolemnly receiued of the Genoways an oath of fidelitie, and giuen pardon to all, except to threeſcore whom he committed to the diſpoſition of the law, he went to Millan, diſperſing his armie as ſoone as he had done with the Genoways, with the which if he had followed ỹ courſe of his victorie, he might eaſily haue oppreſſed in Italy whom he had liſted, all the Potentates there ſtanding more in feare of his power, then any way prouided to make reſiſtance. But he diſſolued his army, the better to aſſure the Pope, the Emperour, and the Venetians (who were not without great ſuſpitions) that his deſcending into Italy was for no other end then to recouer the Citie of Genes.

But nothing could appeaſe the Pope, who taking all things in the worſt part, complained againe (not a litle) of the King, as if it had bene by his meanes, that Annibal Bentiuole with ſixe hundred footmen leuied in the Duchie of Millan, had aſſayed in thoſe times to enter Bologna, aſſuring that if he had preuailed in that action, the King would haue declared himſelfe yet more againſt the eſtate Eccleſiaſtike: wherewith the Pope being wroth, notwithſtanding he had before with great difficultie publiſhed Cardinals the Biſhops of Achx and Bayeux, he refuſed to raiſe to that dignitie the Biſhop of Albie, complaining that Monſieur de Chaumont his brother, had ſuffered the Bentiuoleis to dwell in the Duchie of Millan: yea (which was of greater conſequence) the Pope no leſſe ouerruled with hate then by ſuſpition, when the King publiſhed that he would reduce the Genoways to his obedience by armes, ſignified by his Nuncioes and by a Briefe, to the Emperour and Electors of the Empire, that the French King prepared to paſſe into Italy with a moſt mightie armie, vnder colour to reappeaſe the tumults of Genes, which he might redreſſe by his authoritie, but indeed with intention to oppreſſe the ſtate of the Church, and vſurpe the dignitie of the Empire: and the Venetians ſignified vnto him the ſame things, for the feares they had of the coming of the French King into Italy with ſo great an armie. Which aduertiſements being communicated with Maximilian, whoſe inclination naturally embraced new things, and being newly returned from Flanders, where he had practiſed in vaine to take the gouernment of his nephew; he aſſembled in the towne of Conſtance, the Princes of Germanie and the free townes. Thoſe are called the free Cities, which acknowledging by a certaine determinate tribute the authoritie of the Empire, do gouerne themſelues notwithſtanding in all other things by their owne lawes, not ſeeking to amplifie their territories, but to preſerue their libertie. At this aſſembly appeared all the Princes, Barons, and communalties of Germanie, perhaps with more readineſſe and in greater numbers then had bene ſeene a long time before in any Dyot: for thither reſorted in perſon, all the Electors and Princes of Germanie both Eccleſiaſtike and Secular, except ſuch as were reſtrained by lawfull impediments; in whoſe places notwithſtanding were ſent, either their ſonnes, their brethren, or ſome very neare kindred to repreſent their perſons: and alſo all the free townes ſent thither Embaſſadours. In which generall aſſem-

bly, Cæsar caused to be read the Popes writ, with many other letters from diuers places, signifying the same thing: some of them expressing that the French Kings intention was to aduance the Cardinall of Amboise to the Pontificall seate, and to receiue of him the Imperiall Crowne. These aduertisements breeding no small indignation in the minds of all the audience, Cæsar, when the noise was ended, spake to them in this sort: You see now (most noble Electors, Princes and honourable Embassadours) what effects, the long patience we haue hitherunto vsed, hath brought forth, and what fruites are gathered of the small reckning that hath bene made of my former complaints expressed in so many Diots. Now you perceiue, that the French King, who heretofore durst make no attempt against any thing that appertained to the sacred Empire, but vpon great occasions and colours very apparent, doth now prepare openly, not to protect our rebels as he was wont, or to vsurpe any thing which pertaineth to the Empire; but to dispoile Germanie of the Imperiall dignitie, so honorably gotten, and so long time continued, by the vertue and valour of our ancestors. He is not entred into this great boldnesse, by any persuasion either that our forces are diminished, or that his power is increased; neither can he be ignorant by how much the region of Germanie is more mightie then the nation of France; but by the hope that he hath gotten by the experience of things past, that we will still be like our selues, that our dissentions and ciuill factions will preuaile more with vs, then the prouocations of glorie, yea then the consideration of our particular safetie; that for the same respects for which we haue suffered him to our common shame, to vsurpe the Duchie of Millan, to nourish in our owne bosomes our ciuill quarrels, and to defend and protect the rebels of the Empire; we shall likewise endure that the dignitie of the Empire should by him be rauished from vs, and the glory and felicitie of this nation transported into France. How much lesse infamous a thing would it be to our common name? and how much lesse would it be grieuous to me in particular, if it were knowne to the world, that the power of Germanie were inferiour to the forces of France? For, the domage should afflict me lesse then the infamie, since at the least, that should not be imputed to our negligence and indiscretion, which might proceed either of the conditions of times, or of the malice of Fortune. What greater calamitie can happen? what miserie more? then to be reduced to such termes, as either to wish to be lesse mightie, or to make a willing election of a great domage, onely to auoide (since otherwise it cannot be) the perpetuall infamie and dishonour of our name? although the magnanimitie of euery one of you, so many times experienced in matters particular, and the resolute courage proper and peculiar to this nation; with the memory of the ancient vertue and triumphs of our elders (the very terrour heretofore of all other nations) do giue me hope, yea almost assurance, that in an action of so great importance, your warlike and inuincible minds will be awaked. For here is now no question of the alienation of the Duchie of Millan, nor of the reuolting of the Swissers, in which actions of so great consequence there was made no great account of my authoritie, both in regard of the affinitie I had with Lodowike Sforce, and for the particular interests of the house of Austrich. But now my Lords, what excuse may be pretended? what colour or couerture may be giuen to our ignominie? That which is now in question, is, whether the Almaines, who stand possessed of the Romane Empire, not by the hand of Fortune, but by their proper vertue, who haue heretofore with their armes terrified almost all the world, and whose name is yet at this day dreadfull to all the Princes of Christendome, should now cowardly lose so great a dignitie, and remaine the perpetuall example of infamie, and of the chiefe and most glorious nation of the whole world, become the most base, the most contemptible and despised. If these reasons, these interests, and these disdaines will not moue you, what else is there that can euer moue you? What can kindle in you the seeds of the valour and resolution of your elders, if your minds be not inclined to the consideration of these things? In ages and posterities to come, with what sorow shall your children and descendants remember your names, if you leaue not vnto them the name of Almaines in the same degree of greatnesse, authoritie, and reputation, wherein your fathers left it transferred to you? But let vs fall from these sorts of exhortations & persuasions, for that it is an office inconuenient in me, whom you haue lifted to the height of this place, to vse such libertie of words, but rather to recommend to you deeds and examples. I am determined to passe into Italy, vnder pretence to receiue the Imperiall Crowne; a solemnitie, as you know, more full of ceremonie then of substance, for that the authoritie and dignitie Imperiall depends wholly vpon your election. But my principall intention is, to breake

the wicked purpoſes and plots of the French, and to chaſe them out of the Duchie of Millan, » ſeeing we haue no other ſuretie againſt their inſolencies. I hope there reſteth in none of you all » any difficultie, to accompanie me, according to your cuſtome with other Emperours going to » be crowned, neither doubt I, that carrying with me your hearts and affections, ioyning withall » your forces to mine, I ſhall not paſſe a iourney victorious, marching with ſuch felicitie, as the » moſt of the Potentates and Cõmunalties in Italy will meet me as petitioners, ſome to confirme » their priuiledges, ſome to implore our iuſtice againſt the oppreſſions they ſuffer, and ſome to » appeaſe with a deuout ſubmiſſion the ire of the victor. Conſider, I pray you, with that reputa- » tion and magnanimitie, which is proper to the Almaines, how it agreeth with your honour and » renowne, in ſo great and common a perill to be ſo litle moued, as in a caſe ſo extraordinarie, not » to make extraordinarie prouiſions. The glorie and greatneſſe of our name, to the which this hath » bene alwayes proper, to defend the dignitie of the Popes of Rome, and the authoritie of the Sea » Apoſtolike, which are now wickedly defiled by the ambition and impietie of the French King, » calleth vs, I ſay, with the common decree of all Germanie, to take armes powerfully to this in- » tent. This buſineſſe is wholly yours, ſeeing I haue ſufficiently acquited the dutie I owe, in making » ſo ready aſſembly of you, to lay afore you the common danger, vrging you with the example » of mine owne deliberation. For the reſolution of courage ſhall not want in me to expoſe my » ſelfe to all dangers, nor the diſpoſition of my perſon, accuſtomed of long time to endure paine » and trauell; neither is my counſell in conducting a warre, ſo inſufficient, by reaſon of mine age » and long experience, as, in this enterpriſe you may haue want of a leader worthy of all honor. » And by how much you ſhall honour your King with fulneſſe of authoritie, by how much you » ſhall enuiron him with an armie mightie and appointed, with ſo much the more facilitie, to your » perpetuall glorie, ſhall he defend the libertie of the Church of Rome our common mother, and » exalt euen to heauen, together with the reputation of the Almaine name, the Imperiall dignitie » in glorie and greatneſſe, common to you all, and to this moſt puiſſant and valiant nation. »

This ſpeech wrought maruellouſly in the minds of all the aſſiſtants, being aſhamed that in the other Diots his complaints had found no better fauour: and now it was eaſie to ſet on fire their minds already kindled. Then euery one hauing a vehement diſdaine, that by their negligence the maieſtie of the Empire ſhould be tranſlated into other nations, they began with great vnitie to treate vpon articles neceſſary, holding it conuenient to leuie a moſt mightie armie, and of ſuch ſufficient power, as (though the whole regions of Italy would oppoſe againſt them, with the French King) might be able to renew and recouer againe in Italy the ancient rights of the Empire, which had bene vſurped, either by the diſabilitie, or other fault of the former Emperors: for ſo the glorie of the Almaine name required, and the aſſembly of ſo many Princes and of all the free townes: and that once it was neceſſary to ſhew to all the world, that though the wils of the Almaines had remained long in diuiſion, that yet the nation was no leſſe mightie, nor their ſpirits depriued of that magnanimitie which had made their anceſtors terrible to all the world: by meanes whereof, both in generall there was diuolued to the nation of Germaines a liberall glorie, with the dignitie Imperiall, and in particular, many noble perſonages had aſpired to much greatneſſe and dominion, many of the beſt houſes in Italy hauing by long preſcription reigned in eſtates gotten by their valour. Theſe things were begun to be debated with ſo great forwardneſſe and inclination, that it is manifeſt that in no Diot aſſembled of long time, was expectation of ſo great euents, the multitude perſwading themſelues vniuerſally, that beſides all other reaſons, the Electors with the reſidue of the Princes, expreſſed a more quicke readineſſe to the enterpriſe, for a hope they had, that (for the minoritie of the children of King Philip) the Imperial dignitie which had ſucceſſiuely continued in Albert, Federike, and Maximilian, all three of the houſe of Auſtria, would at laſt be paſſed into another family.

Theſe things coming to the knowledge of the French King, had induced him to diſſolue his armie immediatly after the action of Genes, to take away the occaſion of ſo great a ſuſpition, yea his own perſon had as ſpeedily repaſſed ouer the Mounts, had it not bene for a deſire he had to ſpeake with the King of Aragon, who prepared to returne into Spaine, altogether diſpoſed to

reſume the gouernment of Caſtile, for that Iane his daughter was vnable to ſo great an adminiſtration; not ſo much for the imbecillitie of her ſexe, as for that by a ſuperabundance of melancholy, growne ſince the death of her husband, ſhe was become ſomewhat eſtranged from her vnderſtanding; and alſo for the minoritie of the children common between King Philip and her, whereof the eldeſt had not yet attained ten yeares. Beſides, he was puſhed forward by the deſires of many, which called him to that gouernment, by a remembrance that they had bene iuſtly gouerned, and that thoſe kingdomes had flouriſhed vnder him by a long continuance of peace, the diuiſions already begun amongſt the great Barons, together with the manifeſt ſignes of troubles to come, much increaſing this deſire. But his coming was no leſſe deſired of his daughter, who, wandring in mind in all other actions, was alwayes conſtant in this, that ſhe deſired the returne of her father, refuſing obſtinately, againſt the perſwaſions and importunities of many, to ſubſcribe with her owne hand to any expedition, without which ſubſcription, according to the cuſtome of thoſe realmes, the affaires occurrent had not their perfection. For theſe reaſons the King of Aragon departed from Naples, where he had remained but ſeuen moneths, leauing vnſatisfied the great expectatiõ that was had of him; not ſo much for the ſhortneſſe of the time, and for that it is hard to anſwer the conceptions of men, which for the moſt part are inconſiderate and not meaſured with due proportions; as for the many difficulties and impediments that oppoſed againſt him, by reaſon whereof he did nothing worthy of memorie for the vniuerſall benefite of Italy, nor any thing for the particular profite of the kingdome of Naples. For his deſire ſo ſoone to returne againe to the gouernment of Caſtile (the principall pillar of his greatneſſe) gaue him no leiſure to thinke of the affaires of Italy, but conſtrained him to turne all his thoughts to keepe himſelfe in amitie with the Emperour and the French King, leſt that the one by his authoritie, being grandfather to the litle children of the dead King, and the other by his neighbouring power, giuing courage to who would oppoſe againſt him, might giue impediments to his returne. And the obligation wherein he was bound by the treatie of peace made with the French King to reſtore the eſtates that had bene taken from the Barons of Anion, and diſtributed either by couenant or by recompence to ſuch as had followed his faction, hindred him to redreſſe and gratifie the kingdome of Naples. For not minding to eſtrange from him the minds of his good ſeruants, he was conſtrained to recompẽce thoſe of Anion either with eſtates of equal reuenue (which he muſt buy of others) or with ready mony; whereunto when his wealth was not ſufficient, he was compelled not onely to raiſe improuements vpon his reuenues, and to refuſe, according to the cuſtome of new Kings, to diſtribute grace and exemptions, and to exerciſe any ſort of liberalitie; but alſo with the incredible complaint of euery one, to taxe his peoples, who expected to be diſcharged of their intollerable burdens. And the complaints made by the Barons of both the one and other part, were nothing inferiour, for that to ſuch as were poſſeſſed, beſides that they reſigned their eſtates with ill will, neceſſitie made their recompences ſparing and limited: and touching others, there was reſtrained as much as was poſſible, the benefite of reſtitution in all thoſe things wherein there hapned any difference, for that how much the leſſe was reſtored to theſe, ſo much the leſſe was the recompence of others. The Great Captaine departed with him, leauing behind him a good will incredible, and a renowne nothing inferiour; of whom, beſides his praiſes in other times, his liberalities were much magnified, promiſing and diſpoſing gifts of great valour, at his departure; for performance whereof, not being otherwiſe of ſufficient abilitie, he ſold a great part of his owne eſtates, to the end not to faile in ſuch an action of honour. But the King departed from Naples very ill contented with the Pope, for that demanding the inueſtiture of the kingdome, the Pope refuſed to giue it him, but with thoſe taxations and tributes wherewith it had bene giuen afore times to the former Kings: and the King made inſtance that there might be made to him the ſame diminution which had bene made to Ferdinand his couſin, and to his ſonnes and nephewes, demanding the inueſtiture of the whole realme in his owne name, as ſucceſſor to the old Alfonſo; in which forme whileſt he was at Naples, he had receiued oath and homage, notwithſtanding in the capitulations of peace made with the French King, it was agreed that touching the land of Lauoro and Abruzze the name of the Queene ſhould be ioyntly acknowledged. It was thought that the refuſall which the Pope made of the inueſtiture, was the cauſe that Ferdinand would not ſpeake with the Pope, who hauing at the ſame time remained many dayes in the rocke of Oſtia, it was ſaid, he tarried there to expect his paſſage. But how ſoeuer the truth was, the King of Aragon tooke his his course to Sauona, where it was agreed that he should haue enteruiew and speech with the French King, who staying for that cause in Italy, was come thither from Millan as soone as he vnderstood he had taken passage from Naples. In this enteruiew and conference, the demonstrations on all sides were manifest, free, and full of confidence; and such, for the libertie thereof, as in no memorie had bene seen in any such like meeting: for that other Princes, between whom were either priuate enuies or ancient quarels, were wont to meete in such order, that the one was not in the power of the other, but here things were carried in another fashion: for when the ships of the King of Aragon approched the hauen of Sauona, the French King vpon sight of them being descended vpon the wall of the hauen, passed by a bridge of wood, made for the nonce, vpon the poope into the gally of the King of Aragon, with a very small traine of Gentlemen, and without any guard at all: where, being receiued with a ioy incredible by the King, and the Queen his neece, after they had spent some time there in deuices of mirth and curtesie, they went out of the galley by the same bridge, and made their entrie on foote into the Citie, hauing much ado to passe through the presse of so many multitudes of men and women as were come thither from the townes thereabouts. The Queene went accompanied with her husband on the right hand, and her vnkle on the left, being gorgeously attired with precious stones, and other sumptuous array. The Cardinall of Amboise and the Great Captaine marched after the two Kings; and after them followed the yong Ladies and Gentlemen of the Queenes Court, all set forth with glorious shewes: and before and behind were the Courts of the two Kings, appointed in an incredible pompe of rich and stately ornaments. With these companies the King and Queene of Aragon were conueyed by the French King to the Castle, which was appointed for their lodging, hauing prospect vpon the sea, and that part or halfe of the towne which appertaineth to it, was appointed for their traine: and the French King was lodged in the Bishops houses right against the Castle; a spectacle truly worthy of memorie, to see together two of the most mightie Kings in Christendome, not long afore cruell enemies, and now not onely reconciled and conioyned by parentage, but also setting apart all signes of hatred, and memories of offences past, did euery one commit to the arbitrement of the other his proper life, with no lesse assurance and confidence then if they had bene lineall brethren: a maner of behauiour which gaue occasion to such as were present to dispute, whether of the two Kings had shewed the greater confidence. Many referred much to the fidelitie of the French King, who was the first that put himselfe in the power of the other, hauing no other assurance then the bond of faith: and to the other was transferred a greater occasion of shame, for that faith was kept to him first, and it was a suspition more likely that Ferdinand desired to be assured of him, the better to establish himself in the kingdome of Naples. But many others gaue greater reputation to the confidence of Ferdinand, who exceeding the example of the French King, put himselfe in his power, not for a moment or few houres, but for many dayes: for that hauing dispoiled him of so great a kingdome, with so many harmes and domages to his people, and with so great a slander to his name, he had to feare that the French kings hatred was no lesse mortal, then his desire of reuenge great; and therfore there was most cause of doubt, where the profit of the disloyaltie was greatest. For, to make the French King prisoner, Ferdinand could reape no great commoditie by it, since the estate of France is managed vnder such a policie of lawes and customes, that to keepe the King restrained, could not much diminish the forces and authority of the kingdom. But there hanged other perils vpon the person of Ferdinand, for that if he had bene made prisoner, it was not to be doubted, that both for the minoritie of his heires that then were very yong, and the realme of Naples being to him a new kingdome, and also for that his other Realmes, and chiefly that of Castile were through many accidents disordered amongst themselues, the French king should not haue receiued of long time any impediment by the power and armes of Spaine. In this enteruiew, the consideration of the Great Captaine ministred not the least occasions to debate and commune vpon; vpon whom were set the eyes of all men, no lesse for the renowne of his valour, then for the memorie of his many victories: which so enticed the minds and affections of the French men, that notwithstanding they had bene so often vanquished by him, and were wont to hold his name in common hatred, yet they could not be satisfied to behold and honour him, making discourse to such as had not yet bene in the kingdome of Naples, sometimes with what incredible celeritie and shift of warre he inuaded in Calabria the Barons incamped at Laine, sometimes with what patience and resolution of mind he endured so many difficulties and aduersities, uerſities, when in the middeſt of peſtilence and hunger he was beſieged in Barletto: ſometimes with what diligence and efficacie he kept retained the minds of men, and amidſt a penurie and want of money entertained a long time his ſouldiers without pay: with what ſingular valour he managed the battell at Cirignola: and with what greatneſſe of courage, with what induſtrie of a ſouldier, and with what vnexperienced ſtratagemes amidſt ſo many difficulties, with an armie vnpayed, and farre inferiour in forces, he kept his ground, and obtained the victorie vpon the riuer of Garillan: and laſtly, how vigilant he had bene alwayes to embrace oportunities, and make his profite vpon the diſorders of his enemies. But that which drew men into moſt wonder and admiration of him, was the excellent maieſtie of his preſence, the ſtately repreſentation of his words and geſtures, full of grauitie, affabilitie, and mildneſſe, equall to thoſe effects and actions which had alwayes flowed from his right worthy and excellent vertues: but aboue all the reſt, the French King, who deſired that he might ſup at the ſame table with Ferdinand, the Queene, and him, and by commandement was placed neare to Ferdinand, was as it were rauiſhed with contemplation and deuiſing with him: in ſo much that in the iudgement of euery one, that day was no leſſe glorious to the Great Captaine, then when he entred with his victorious armie into the Citie of Naples, honoured with all thoſe ceremonies of triumph which are wont to be exerciſed vpon conquerours. But theſe were the laſt triumphant dayes of the Great Captaine, for that departing no more out of the kingdome of Spaine, he had afterwards no meanes to exerciſe his vertue, neither in warre, nor in things memorable for peace. The two Kings had conuerſation together for the ſpace of three dayes, wherein were holden betweene them many diſcourſes both long and ſecret, whereunto the Cardinall de S. Praſſida the Popes Legat was not admitted, nor otherwiſe honoured but with a generall forme of diſpatch: but by that that might then be conceiued, and by that which was manifeſt afterwards, they promiſed the one to the other, to entertaine perpetuall amitie and intelligence, and that Ferdinand ſhould labour to reconcile Maximilian and the French King, to the end that being all reunited, they might afterwards declare themſelues againſt the Venetians. And to expreſſe that they were no leſſe carefull for things common, then for ſuch as concerned themſelues in particular, they publiſhed an intention to reforme the eſtate of the Church, and to that end to call a Councell: wherein Ferdinand proceeded not very ſincerely, but ſought to nouriſh in that hope the Cardinall of Amboiſe, who thirſted much to be Pope; by which meanes he wonne him in ſuch ſort, that (haply with no litle domage to the affaires of his King) he perceiued too late, and that by many ſignes and demonſtrations, what difference there was betweene the words and works of that Prince, and how many ſubtilties and euaſions he had vſed in his counſels. They communed together alſo touching the cauſe of the Piſans, wherein the Florentines had entertained negociation both with the one and the other of them during that whole yeare. For when the French King prepared his armie againſt the Genoways, being diſcontented that the Piſans bare fauour to the rebellions of that people, and foreſeeing how much it would be for the commoditie of his affaires to haue the Florentines recouer that Citie, he gaue them hope, that as ſoone as he had repreſſed the mutinies of Genes, he would ſend his armie thither, in whom, as alſo in all the Court, the good will which they had aforetime borne to the Piſans, was for this occaſion turned into hate. But hauing performed his enterpriſe vpon the Genoways, he changed his determination, both for the ſame reaſons which made him diſmiſſe his armie, and alſo for that he would not offend the mind of the King of Aragon, who aſſured him, that he would ſo diſpoſe the Piſans, that they ſhould willingly returne to the obedience of the Florentines, from whom the French King hoped by that meanes to draw no ſmall quantitie of money. To this the King of Aragon diſpoſed himſelfe, (although for ſundry reſpects) to whom it had bene more agreeable that the Florentines ſhould not recouer Piſa; but knowing that it could not be long kept without great expences and difficulties, and fearing leſt they ſhould obtaine it by the meanes of the French King, he hoped when he was at Naples, to haue bene able to induce the Piſans by his authoritie, to returne vnder honeſt conditions vnder the obedience of the Florentines, who promiſed him (the action ſucceeding) to confederate with him, and to giue him within a certaine time, an hundred thouſand duckats: but not finding in the Piſans that conformitie and deuotion which he expected, to let that the gratification and recompence ſhould not remaine onely to the French King, he proteſted openly to the Florentine Embaſſadours, that if they ſhould attempt in any ſort to reconquer Piſa without his aide, he would manifeſtly oppoſe againſt them;

and to the French King (to turne him from thoſe thoughts which he had to manage that enterpriſe by armes) ſometimes he made them of the hope he had to draw them in the end to ſome compoſition, and ſometimes he ſaid the Piſans were vnder his protection, although it were nothing ſo. For it is very true that the Piſans had made many ſolicitations to him, with offers to endue him with the abſolute iuriſdiction of their towne; but he alwayes entertaining their requeſts with hopes, and cauſing the Great Captaine in more ample ſort to do the like, did neuer accept them. But this matter being more particularly debated in Sauona, they concluded that it were good that the Piſans ſhould returne vnder the iuriſdiction of the Florentines, ſo far forth as either of them might taſte of the profite: the ſame being the cauſe that the Florentines (fearing to offend the mind of the King of Aragon) forbare to giue the ſpoile that yeare to the harueſt of the Piſans; an action wherein they had repoſed great hope, for that Piſa was in ſuch want of victuals, and ſo weake in forces, that the Florentine ſouldiers ouerranne the whole countrey, euen to their gates; and the people of the plaine countrey, being more in number within the towne then the proper Citizens, grieuing much to loſe the fruite of their trauell for the whole yeare, began to abate much of their accuſtomed obſtinacie: and the Piſans were no more ſuccoured by their neighbours as before; for that the Genoways, beaten with ſo many calamities, had no more the ſame thoughts; Pandolfe Petrucci ſhunning the charges; and the Lucquois, albeit they miniſtred ſecretly to their wants, were not able alone to beare out ſo great a burden. The two Kings departed from Sauona the fourth day, with the ſame demonſtrations of concord and amitie; the one tooke his courſe by ſea to Barcelona, and the other returned by land into France, leauing the other affaires of Italy in the ſame degree, but with a greater diſcontentment of the Pope, who taking occaſion againe vpon the ſtirre made by Annibal Bentiuole, had made inſtance to the King at Sauona by ſ Cardinal de S. Praſſida, to deliuer vp to him as priſoners Iohn Bentiuole and Alexander his ſonne, whom he kept retained in the Duchie of Millan: alledging that ſince they had broken the contract made in Bologna by Monſieur de Chaumont, the King was no further bound to keepe his promiſe with them; offering withall, that if his Maieſtie would ſatisfie his deſire, he would ſend the Cardinals cap to the Biſhop of Alby. The King anſwered, that albeit their fault was not apparent, yet for that he had determined to puniſh it, he had kept retained many dayes in the Caſtle of Millan, Iohn Bentiuole; but not finding any matter wherein they had offended, he would not breake promiſe with them: and yet to gratifie the Pope, he ſaid, he would ſuffer him to proceed againſt them with curſes and paines, as againſt the rebels of the Church, euen as he had endured without complaint, that in Bologna, in the heate of that ſtirre, their Pallace was deſtroyed euen to the foundations.

The Diot of Conſtance continued ſtill with the ſame expectation of men wherewith it was begun, which Ceſar forgat not to nouriſh with diuers ſleights and gallant words, publiſhing that he would paſſe into Italy with ſuch an armie, that farre greater forces then thoſe of France and Italy ioyned together, ſhould not be able to reſiſt him. And to giue the greater credite and authoritie to his cauſe, (proteſting that he had fixed in his intention the protection of the Church) he aduertiſed the Pope and Colledge of Cardinals, that he had declared the French King rebell and enemie to the ſacred Empire, for that he was come into Italy to transferre to the perſon of the Cardinall of Amboiſe the Pontificall dignitie, and to ſet vpon his owne head the Crowne Imperiall, and laſtly to bring the whole region of Italy into a ſeruile ſubiection: That he prepared to come to Rome onely to take the Crowne, and to eſtabliſh the common liberrie: And that in regard of his Imperiall dignitie, being protector of the Church, and for his proper pietie, very deſirous to aduance the Sea Apoſtolike, it was not conuenient he ſhould tarry to be required or prayed, knowing well enough, that the Pope for feare of ſo great dangers was fled from Bologna, and that the ſame feare reſtrained both him and the Colledge from communicating their dangers, or ſending to demand ſuccours. Thus the matters which were treated in Germanie being by many intelligences ſignified into Italy, and the bruite that was ſpread ſurpaſſing the truth, together with the generall preparations which the French King made, being cauſes enforcing the more credite to the publike rumors, for that it was beleeued that he feared not without occaſion, moued much the minds of euery one, ſome for deſire of new things, ſome for hope, and ſome for feare: in ſo much as the Pope ſent as Legat to Maximilian, the Cardinall of Saint Croſſe; and the Venetians, the Florentines, & all the other Potentates of Italy, (except the Marquis of Mintua) that were abſolute and depended vpon themſelues, addreſſed to him ſpe-ciall messengers, either in the name of Embassadours, or vnder some other nature. These things troubled much the mind of the French King, being very doubtfull of the will of the Venetians, and more vncertaine of the disposition of the Pope, as well for many reasons and experiences of things past, as especially for that he had elected to this legation the Cardinall Saint Crosse, in whom had remained an ancient inclination to further the greatnesse of Maximilian. But touching the will of the Pope, it may truly be said, that it was manifest to others that it was not knowne to himselfe: for, hauing his mind full of discontentments and suspitions against the French King, sometimes (to be rid of those wandring humors) he desired the coming of Cæsar, and sometimes the memory of ancient quarrels between the Popes and the Emperors, amazed him, considering that the same occasions remained still. In this incertaintie, he deferred to resolue himselfe, expecting first what would be determined in the Diot: and therefore proceeding in generall termes, he had instructed the Legat to perswade Cæsar in his name, to passe into Italy without an army, offering to him greater honours then euer had bene done by any Pope at the crowning of Emperours. But a litle after, the expectations that were had of the resolutions in the Diot began to diminish: for when it was knowne in Germanie, that the French King had dissolued his army immediatly after the victory of Genes, and that he was returned ouer the mounts with as much speed as he could, the heate of the Princes and people began much to abate, the feare being ceassed, that he came to vsurpe the Popedome and the Empire: and (as it often happeneth) publike respects fell not so strongly into consideration, but that they were ouercarried with priuate interests; for that, besides other reasons, there was an ancient desire in all Germanie, that the greatnesse of Emperours should not be such, as the other Estates should be compelled to obey them. And the French King omitted no diligence that might giue aduancement to his cause, for that vnderhand he sent to Constance men expresse, who forbearing to shew themselues in publike, wrought secretly, striuing by the hidden fauours of the Princes that were his friends, to appease the minds of the residue, purging the infamies that had bene imposed vpon him, by euidence of the effects, seeing that as soone as he had ranged Genes to his obedience, he had so suddenly dispersed his armie; and himselfe, although he might haue stayd in Italy without an armie, returned in person into France with what speed he could: and they affirmed, that he had alwayes not onely abstained from any action that might offend the Empire of Rome, but that in all confederations, contracts or bonds, he did alwayes protest and except, that he would be bound to nothing that was contrary to the rights of the sacred Empire: and yet they reposed not so much in these iustifications, but that they laboured with great diligence and many liberalities to abate the fierce minds of the Almaines with the power of gold, whereof that nation is not a litle couetous. The Diot at last brake vp the twentieth day of August, in the which it was agreed, after many disputations, that there should be deliuered to Cæsar to follow him into Italy, eight thousand horse, and two and twentie thousand footmen, payed for sixe moneths, and to furnish the expences of the artilleries, with other charges extraordinary, sixe thousand Florins of Rhein: and it was ordained that the bands and regiments should assemble in the field neare Constance about the middest of October: and it was published at that time, that they would haply haue furnished him with a greater proportion of men and money, if Maximilian had consented that the enterprise (albeit vnder his gouernment and counsell) had bene managed wholly in the name of the Empire, and that the election of Captaines had passed by order from the Empire, and distribution of the places that should be conquered to be made according to the determination of the Diot. But Maximilian would admit no companion or communitie of name (albeit all went vnder the name of the Empire) and much lesse suffer that the rewards of the victory should appertain to any other then to him & his: insomuch as standing better contented with the aid and succor they deliuered to him in this sort, then with far greater in any other sort, there was made no other resolution: the which albeit it answered not the expectation that men had conceiued afore, yet ceased not for all that the feare that was in Italy of his descending. For it was considered, that the souldiers which his subiects would giue him, with such as he might leuie of himselfe, being ioyned to those bands that were resolued on in the Diot, he would come with a very mightie army, compounded of bodies resolute and trained, and furnished with great store of artilleries; a matter so much the more to be feared, by how much Maximilian, for the disposition of his nature, and long exercise in armes, was very able and sufficient in martiall discipline, and could well beare, with the labour of his bodie and facultie of his mind, any enterprise how difficult whatſoeuer: for which cauſe he carried a farre greater reputation then any Emperour for many ages before him. Hereunto was added his continual endeuor to bring into his pay ten thouſand Swiſſers; whereunto albeit the Bailiffe of Dion, and others ſent by the French King, oppoſed with great inſtance in the Diots of that nation, reducing to memory the alliance continued for ſo many yeares with the Kings of France, and lately confirmed with the King now reigning, together with the great profite which their peoples receiued thereby; and on the other ſide, preferring their old and ſetled quarrels with the houſe of Auſtria, with the grieuous warres they had had with Maximilian, and laſtly what preiudice the greatneſſe of the Empire brought to them: yet they ſhewed a great deſire to ſatisfie the demands of Cæſar, or at the leaſt not to take armes againſt him; for that (as was ſuppoſed) they were careſull not to offend the common name of Germanie, which it ſeemed was ioyned to this action: by reaſon whereof many doubted that the French King, if he were abandoned of the Swiſſers, or that the Venetians failed to ioyne with him, being not furniſhed with a ſufficient ſtrength of footmen to reſiſt the footbands of the enemies, and hoping that the fury of the Almaines entring into Italy as a torrent, would ſuddenly vaniſh and diſſolue for want of money, would retire his army into townes; the likelihood whereof was already manifeſt in this, that with a wonderfull diligence he fortified the ſuburbes of Millan, with many other places in that Duchie which were of greateſt importance. In regard of which alterations and preparations, the Venetians were trauelled with no leſſe perplexitie of mind then the other regions of Italy; and by how much their deliberations were of greateſt conſequence, by ſo much the more buſie and greater were the paines and diligence that euery one tooke to haue them ioyne with him. For Cæſar from the beginning had addreſſed to them three Embaſſadours of great authoritie, not onely to ſolicite that he might haue free paſſage through their dominions, but alſo to induce them to contract with him a ſtraiter alliance, wherein ſhould be agreed that they ſhould participate in the rewards of the victory; proteſting to them on the contrary, that it was in his power to accord (to their preiudice) with the French King, with the ſame conditions that ſo often had bene offered to him at diuers times. On the other ſide the French King both by his Embaſſadours, and the Embaſſadour of Venice that was reſident in his Court, laboured to perſwade them to oppoſe with armes againſt the coming of Cæſar, as a matter of equall preiudice both to the one and ỹ other, offering for that ſeruice all his forces, and to remaine their perpetuall confederate. But in thoſe dayes the Senate was not content that the tranquillitie of Italy ſhould be troubled, neither did the hopes that were offered to enlarge their dominions, incite them to deſire new tumults. For they had proued by experience, that the conqueſt of Cremona, did not counteruaile the ſuſpitions and dangers wherein they had bene continually holden, ſince they had the French King ſo neare a neighbour. They could willingly haue bene content to be newters, but being preſſed with the importunities of the Emperour, they ſtood in a neceſſitie either to refuſe or grant him paſſage. If they refuſed him; they feared to be the firſt that ſhould be vexed: and in gratifying his demands, they ſhould directly offend the French King, being expreſly forbidden in their reciprocall confederation, to grant paſſage to the enemies of the one or ỹ other: and they were not ignorant, that beginning once to offend him, it would be great indiſcretion, after Maximilian were paſt, to be idle beholders of the iſſue of the warre, and expect the actions of thoſe Princes, whereof the one would be a great enemie to the Venetian name, and the other hauing receiued no other pleaſure then libertie of paſſage, would be no great friend vnto them. For theſe reſpects many of the Senate were of opinion, that it was neceſſary to ſticke openly to the one or other partie; but to whether of them it ought to be, their opinions for the importance of the matter, were very different: and therefore, after they had deferred as long as they could to reſolue, being no longer able to endure the inſtance that was continually made vnto them, and being at laſt conſtrained to ſet downe their laſt concluſion in the Councell of the Pregati, Nicholas Foſkarin ſpake in this ſort:

The Oration of Nich. Foskarin

If it were in our power (moſt excellent Senators) to ſet downe a reſolution, whereby the peace and tranquillitie of our Commonweale might be continued, amidſt ſo many tumults and troubles which are now in preparing, I am ſure there would be amongſt vs no varietie of counſell, and much leſſe could any hopes that might be propounded, incline vs to a warre of ſo great expences and perill, as this whereof we now ſpeake is very likely to be. But foraſmuch as for the ſame cauſes which haue bene ſo often debated amongſt vs in our late aſſemblies, there is no hope that we can preſerue the common tranquillitie; the beſt aduice (in my opinon) where« upon we are to ſettle our deliberation, is, to reſolue our ſelues whether we may beleeue that « betweene the French King and the Emperour (deſpairing once of our amitie) may be contra- « cted an vnion, or whether the hatreds betweene them be ſo mightie and reſolute, as to let them « from ioyning together. For if we were ſafe from ſuch a danger, I could in no ſort like that we « ſhould depart from the amitie of the French King, both for that our forces being ioyned in « good faith and meaning with his for a common defence, we ſhould eaſily protect our Eſtate, « and alſo it would be more honorable to continue the confederation we haue with him, then to « relinquiſh it without euident occaſion; and we ſhould enter with more commendation and « good liking of all the world into a warre which ſhould beare the name of the protection of Ita- « ly, then to ioyne with thoſe armies which we know manifeſtly to be leuied to ſtirre vp commotions « and troubles. But if we ſet before our eyes the danger of this vnion, I thinke it will not be denied, « that there is great neceſſitie to preuent it; ſince it would be more profitable, aboue all cõpariſon, « to ioyne with the Emperor againſt the French King, then to tarry till both the one and the other « be vnited againſt vs. Now which of the two will happen, it is hard to iudge certainly: for that it « is a thing that dependeth not onely of the will of others, but alſo of many accidents and occa- « ſions, which ſcarcely wil leaue this reſolution in the power of thoſe that ought to execute it. Yet, « for ought we can perceiue by coniectures, and experience of times paſt being a true inſtru- « ctor of things to come, me thinkes it is a thing very dangerous, and an action whereof we ought « to haue great feare. For, as touching the Emperour, it is not like that he ſhall find any great im- « pediments, conſidering his feruent deſire to paſſe into Italy, which he cannot eaſily do, vnleſſe « he either ioyne with the French King or with vs. And albeit he much deſireth our alliance, yet « if we refuſe him, who doubteth, but neceſſitie will driue him to ioyne with the French King, ha- « uing no other meanes to accompliſh his purpoſes? And on the behalfe of the French King, it ſee- « meth there are far greater difficulties for this vnion; but yet I hold them not ſuch, as vnder them « we may promiſe to our ſelues any ſuretie: for that ſuſpition and ambition, two mightie moti- « ons in the minds of great Princes, and which either of them in his ſingle nature, haue bene accu- « ſtomed to be the cauſe of farre greater emotions, may induce him to ſuch a deliberation. He « marketh well the inſtance that Ceſar maketh to enter vnitie with vs, and meaſuring (albeit with « falſe weights) our intention and deſire, he may doubt, that the ſame ſuſpition that we haue « not to be preuented by him, induceth vs to preuent him; knowing alſo that we haue good intel- « ligence of thoſe things which ſo long time they haue conſulted together againſt vs. Laſtly, he « may feare that we are allured by ambition, looking into the great offers that may be made to vs; « and from this feare there can be no meanes ſufficient to aſſure him, ſeeing there is nothing that « naturally breeds more ſuſpition, then matters of Eſtate. And beſides ſuſpition, he may be driuen « on by ambition, hauing a deſire, as we know, to the Citie of Cremona, whereunto he ſhall be the « more kindled by ỹ perſwaſions of the Millanois, and no leſſe for a thirſt to occupie all the ancient « eſtates of the Viſcounts, which he pretendeth to be his inheritance as well as the Duchie of Mil- « lan: and to theſe he cannot hope to aſpire, if he vnite not himſelfe with the Emperour; for that « our Commonweale being mightie of it ſelfe, if the French King aſſaile vs alone, it will alwayes « ſtand in our power to ioyne with Maximilian: which thoughts, it may, yea haue alwayes, « occupied his mind. And hereby it is very manifeſt, that he neuer durſt aſſay to oppreſſe vs with- « out that vnion; which being the direct line to leade him to the marke he ſhootes at, why ſhould « we not feare that in the end he wil be diſpoſed to it? And we are not ſecure frõ this feare, by con- « ſidering that it would be a reſolution vnprofitable to him, for the conquering of two or three « Cities, to bring into Italy the Emperour, his naturall enemy, by whom in the end he ſhould be « alwayes moleſted, and with whom he ſhould neuer haue friendſhip but vncertaine, and ſuch « as for this reaſon he ſhould be alwayes driuen to buy and entertaine with great ſummes of mo- « ney: for if he feare leſt we will ioyne with the Emperour, he will thinke, that in preuen- « ting vs, he ſhall not onely put himſelfe out of danger, but alſo ſhall ſtand in ſecuritie. And like- « wiſe though he do not feare this vnion, yet he may haply iudge it neceſſary to confederate with « him, to deliuer himſelfe from the troubles and dangers which he may ſuffer by him, either by « reaſon of the aides of Germanie, or by other alliances and occaſions. And albeit greater dangers « may happen to him if the Emperour begin once to ſet foote in Italy, yet it is the common na- « ture of men to feare moſt the dangers that be neareſt at hand, to eſteeme more then is neceſſary « things preſent, and to make leſſe reckoning then they ought of ſuch as are farre off and to come,

ſeeing that to the ſame are referred many hopes of remedies, as well by the fauour of time, as the benefite of accidents. And further, although it were not for the French Kings profite to make this vnion, yet are we not aſſured for all that, that he will not do it. Know we not how much at one time feare, another time couetouſneſſe doth blind the minds of men? Know we not the nature of the French men to be light, and ready to embrace any new enterpriſes, and whoſe hopes are neuer leſſe then their deſires? Know we not with what perſwaſions and offers (ſufficient to kindle any mind) the French King is ſtirred againſt vs by the Millanois, the Pope, the Florentines, the Duke of Ferrara, and by the Marquis of Mantua? All men are not wiſe, but a very few; and he that will prognoſticate what will be the deliberations of another, let him (if he will not deceiue himſelfe) not ſo much conſider what by all likelihood a wiſe man would do, as what is the ſpirit and nature of him that is to make the deliberation. He then that will iudge what the French King will do, muſt not ſo much regard what belongeth to the office of diſcretion, as that the naturall humors of the French be light, wandring, and oftentimes accuſtomed to proceed more with fury and raſhneſſe, then with counſell or foreſight. He muſt conſider the natures of great Princes, which are not like to ours, neither do they ſo eaſily reſiſt their appetites as priuate men do, for that, being accuſtomed to be adored in their kingdomes, and abſolutely obeyed, they are not onely haughtie and inſolent, but are impatient if they obtaine not whatſoeuer they hold for iuſt: and that ſeemes iuſt to them which they deſire, being perſwaded that they haue power to make plaine with a word all impediments, and to ſurmount the nature of things: yea they hold it a ſhame to reſtraine their inclinations for any difficulties, and meaſure commonly great things with the ſame rules wherewith they are wont to proceed in ſmaller actions, taking counſell neither of diſcretion nor reaſon, but of their will and arrogancie: of which vices, common to all Princes, no man can denie but the French do participate: the ſame being confirmed by the late example of the kingdome of Naples, where the French King induced by ambition and indiſcretion, conſented that the one moytie of the kingdome ſhould diuolue to the Spaniard, that he might haue the other; not ſeeing how much he weakned his power (afore abſolute and ſupreme amongſt all the Italians) to bring into Italy another King, equall to himſelfe in authoritie, and nothing inferiour in might. But why proceed we by coniectures, in things whereof we haue certaintie? Is not that well knowne which the Cardinall of Amboiſe treated at Trent with Maximilian himſelfe touching the diuiſion of your Eſtate? And know we not well enough that the ſame practiſe was afterwards alſo concluded betweene them in the towne of Bloys? and that the ſame Cardinall going for this purpoſe into Germany, brought backe the oath and ratification from Caſar? I confeſſe indeed that theſe practiſes brought forth no effects in regard of certaine difficulties that hapned: yet who can aſſure vs, that there will not be found ſome meanes to remoue thoſe difficulties, which haue bene impediments to their common deſire, ſince their principall intention remaineth alwayes one? Therefore conſider diligently (moſt worthy Senators) the imminent perils, the reproch and infamie, which in the ſight of all the world will darken and deface the ancient reputation and wiſedome of this Senate, if meaſuring vnaduiſedly the condition of the preſent affaires, we ſuffer that another put vs in feare, and come to inuade vs with thoſe armes which be offered to vs for our ſuretie and augmentation of Eſtate: and let vs conſider (for the benefite of our countrey) what is the difference betweene mouing warre vpon another, and to expect till another inuade vs; to diſpute how to deuide the Eſtate of another, and to temporiſe till the ſame perill fall vpon vs; and to be accompanied againſt one onely, or to remaine alone againſt many. For, if theſe two Princes ioyne together againſt vs, they will be ſeconded by the Pope, by reaſon of the townes in Romagna, by the King of Aragon, by reaſon of the ports of Naples; and by all Italy, ſome ſeeking to recouer, and ſome to be aſſured. All the world knowes what the French King hath for ſo many yeares conſpired againſt vs with Caſar: if we arme our ſelues againſt him that hath ſought to beguile vs, no man wil account vs truce-breakers, neither will any man maruell; but all men will ſay, we haue done wiſely; and to our great praiſe, he ſhall be brought into danger, who, as euery one knoweth, would haue brought vs into the like perill.

But on the contrary, Andrew Gritti a man of great worth, ſpake in this ſort: If it were conuenient that in one ſelfe matter, the counſels and opinions of men might alwayes be referred to voices doubtfull, I confeſſe (moſt renowmed Senators) that my aduice ſhould haue no other reference, the preſent matter being on all ſides intangled with ſo many difficulties, that the conſide-

" tion, which cannot be made vpon foundations and ſuggeſtions incertaine, it behoueth vs, pon" dering wel the reaſons that are contrary one to another, to embrace thoſe diligently which draw
" neareſt to a likenes of truth, and cary moſt mightie coniectures: which whē I diligently examine,
" I can by no meanes be perſwaded that the French King, either for ſuſpition to be preuented of vs,
" or for a deſire of thoſe townes which earſt appertained to the Duchie of Millan, will agree to " bring the Emperour into Italy againſt vs. For the dangers and harmes that thereby would befall
" him, are farre more manifeſt and great, then the perils that may happen by our vnitie with Ca-
" ſar, or the profites that he may hope for by that reſolution : ſeeing that beſides all other iniuries
" and great hatreds that are betweene them, there is concurrence of dignitie and eſtates, a matter
" able to ſet diuiſion between the beſt eſtabliſhed friends : inſomuch as if the French King call the " Emperor into Italy, he may be thought to do no other thing, then in place of a Commonweale " peaceable, and which hath bin always in amitie with him, without any diſagreement, to deſire ra" ther the neighbourhood of a King ambitious, iniurious, and nouriſhing a thouſand occaſions " to quarrell with him, as well by reaſon of his authoritie and eſtate, as in regard of reuenge. Let
" no man ſay, becauſe the Emperour is poore, diſordered, and vnfortunate, that the French King
" feares not his neighbourhood, ſeeing that for the memory of the ancient factions and inclina" tion of Italy, which remaine yet kindled in many places, and eſpecially in the Duchie of Millan,
" an Emperour of Rome can neuer haue ſo litle a neſt in Italy, which will not be very dangerous to " others, and chiefly he, whoſe eſtate is ioyning to Italy, who is a Prince of high ſtomacke, of great
" conduct and experience in warre, and to whom may be ioyned the intereſt of the children of " Lodowike Sforce, a mightie meanes to ſtirre vp the minds of many: beſides that in any war againſt
" the French King, he may alſo hope to draw to him the powers of the Catholike King, if for " no other reſpect, yet at leaſt for that both their eſtates are to deſcend to one heire. The French
" King is not ignorant of the might of Germany, and how eaſie it is for the Emperour to vnite vn-
" to him either the whole, or part, when way ſhall be made open in Italy, and the hope of " prey and ſpoile layd afore them. And haue we not well ſeene what feare he hath alwayes had of " the deſcending of the Almaines, and the Emperour, how poore and diſordered ſoeuer he be? who
" if he were in Italy, it would ſurely come to paſſe, that he ſhould haue with him no other thing
" then a dangerous warre, or a peace ill aſſured, and yet dearly bought. It may be he thirſteth to re-
" couer Cremona, & haply alſo ſome other townes; but there is no likelihood, that he will embrace
" a great danger, to get a thing whoſe value is leſſe then the aduenture; but it is more credible, that " he will proceed in this caſe rather with diſcretion then raſhneſſe; ſeeing that if we conſider the " errors heretofore imputed to that King, we ſhall find that they proceeded of no other cauſe
" then of his great deſire to make his enterpriſes with ſurety. For what other thing induced him to " make partition of the Realme of Naples? and what moued him to deliuer to vs the Citie of Cre-
" mona, but onely to make more eaſie the victory of thoſe warres? So that it is more credible, that
" euen at this preſent he will rather follow his cuſtome, and wiſe counſels, then be carried with ad-
" uices ſudden and raſh, ſeeing withall he remaineth not altogether depriued of hope to accom-
" pliſh his deſire at another time, with more ſuretie, and better oportunitie; a thing which men are " wont eaſily to promiſe to themſelues; the error being leſſe to promiſe a change of worldly af" faires, then to perſwade that they are firme and ſtable. And the report, that thoſe two Kings
" haue treated ſo often amongſt themſelues, doth nothing amaze me, for that it is a cuſtome
" with the Princes of our time, to entertaine one another artificially with vaine hopes and diſſem-
" bled practiſes : the which, for that in ſo many yeares they haue brought forth no effect, it can" not be that they were other then faire ſhewes, or elſe had in themſelues ſuch difficulties as " could not be reſolued, the very nature of the affaires reſiſting to take away the diſtruſts that are
" betweene them, without which foundation they could not to come to that coniunction.
" So that I feare not that for the deſire of our townes, the French King will throw himſelfe head" long into ſo indiſcreet a deliberation, and much leſſe will he attempt an action ſo caſuall for any " ſuſpition he hath of vs; for that beſides the great knowledge and experience he hath of our in" tentions, who haue had no want of prouocations and occaſions to leaue his alliance, the ſame " reaſons, by the which we are aſſured of him, will interchangeably hold him aſſured of vs. For " nothing can be more preiudiciall to vs then the Emperour to haue any eſtate in Italy, as well for " the authoritie of the Empire, of whoſe amplification we ought alwayes to ſtand fearfull, as in regard of the houſe of Auſtria, pretending intereſt to many of our townes, and for the neighborhood of Germanie, whoſe inundations cannot but be too perillous for our Seignorie; we bearing withall a bruite to haue all our counſels ripe and meaſured, and to erre more in being too ſlow, then by proceeding too haſtily. I denie not but theſe things may fall out contrary to the opinion of men; and therefore that he who could aſſure himſelfe, were praiſeworthy: but ſince that cannot be done without entring into moſt huge dangers and difficulties, we muſt conſider that oftentimes vaine feares are no leſſe hurtfull then too great confidence. For if we enter confederation with the Emperour againſt the French King, the warre muſt neceſſarily be begun and continued with our moneys, which we muſt alſo aduance to furniſh all his prodigalities and diſorders; otherwiſe he will either accord with the enemie, or retire into Germanie, leauing vpon our ſhoulders the whole burden and perill of the quarrell: we muſt maintaine a warre againſt a moſt mightie King of France, Duke of Millan, Lord of Genes, a Prince furniſhed with many regiments of men at armes, and no leſſe mightie in artilleries and prouiſions, and the bruite of whoſe payes and money, will draw to him from all nations infinite bands of footmen. What hope is there then that this enterpriſe can eaſily haue good ſucceſſe, ſeeing it is to be feared, and that not without cauſe, that all thoſe of Italy, which pretend that we hold any thing of theirs, or at leaſt ſtand iealous ouer our greatneſſe, will draw into conſpiracie againſt vs? but eſpecially the Pope, to whom, beſides his diſdaines towards vs, the power of the Emperour in Italy will neuer be acceptable, by reaſon of the naturall hatred that hath alwayes bene betweene the Church and the Empire, the ſame making the Popes to haue no leſſe feare of the Emperors in things temporall, then they haue of the Turkes in matters ſpirituall. And this coniunction haply may be more dangerous to vs, then the vnion which we feare betweene the Emperour and the French King: for that when many Princes, which pretend to be equall, do ioyne together, there commonly do kindle ſuſpitions and debates, by which oftentimes it hapneth, that thoſe enterpriſes which haue bene begun with no ſmall reputation, do eaſily fall into many difficulties, and laſtly into diſſolution. Neither ought this to be a matter of leaſt conſideration, that albeit the French King haue entertained certaine practiſes contrary to the alliance which we haue with him, yet we haue ſeene no effects, by the which we may ſay he hath dealt vniuſtly with vs; and therefore to raiſe warre againſt him, would be no other thing then to incurre the note of infidelitie and faith breaking, whereof this Senate ought to haue ſpeciall regard, as well for the honour as profite of the affaires which we manage continually with other Princes: neither can it be profitable to vs daily to augment this opinion, that we ſeeke alwayes to oppreſſe all our neighbors, and aſpire to the monarchie of all Italy. Would to God we had in times paſt proceeded herein more conſiderately; for almoſt all the ſuſpitions that we haue at this preſent, proceed onely from this, that heretofore we haue too much offended them. And it will not be beleeued, that feare draweth vs to a new warre againſt the French King our confederate, but rather a couetous inclination (ioyning with the Emperour) to win from him ſome part of the Duchie of Millan, as we did from Lodowike Sforce, being ioyned with him: at which time, if we had gouerned our ſelues more moderately, and not feared too much vaine ſuſpitions, the affaires of Italy ſhould not now ſtand in ſuch troubleſome eſtate, and we, who ſhould haue preſerued our ſelues with a renowne of greater modeſtie and grauitie, ſhould not now be conſtrained to enter into warre, either with this or that Prince, more mightie then our ſelues. Into which neceſſitie ſeeing we are fallen, in my opinion, it ſhall be more wiſedome not to depart from the confederation which we haue with the French King, then ouer-ruled with vaine feare, or hope of benefites vncertaine and hurtfull, to embrace a warre, which alone, we ſhall not be mightie enough to ſupport, and thoſe aſſiſtants which we ſhall haue, will in the end be found more burdenſome then profitable.

The opinions of the Senate were diuers in ſo great a varietie of reaſons; but in the end preuailed the memory of the inclination which they knew the Emperour had alwayes had, to recouer when he could get oportunitie, thoſe townes holden by them, which he pretended to appertaine to the Empire, or to the houſe of Auſtria. Their reſolution then was to grant him paſſage if he came without an armie, but coming armed, to denie him that libertie: and in the anſwer they gaue to his Embaſſadours, they endeuoured to perſwade as much as they could, that that concluſion was made more by neceſſitie, hauing regard to the condition of the time preſent, and confederation which they had with the French King, then by any diſpoſition of will to leaue

leaue him diſcontented for any matter; adding withall, that they were conſtrained by the ſame confederation to aide him in the defence of the Duchie of Millan with a certaine proportion of men expreſſed in the ſame: but that in this action they would proceed with great modeſtie, without exceeding in any ſort their limits and bonds; and that except that which they were compelled to do in this action for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, they would not oppoſe againſt any other his aduancement, as thoſe, who (ſo farre as their power would ſtretch) would neuer faile him of that dutie and reuerence which was fit for the Senate of Venice to beare to ſo great a Prince, with whom they neuer had other then perpetuall amitie and alliance. Therefore they entred not into any new confederations and bonds with the French King, but deſired to communicate as litle as they could with the warres that ſhould be betweene them, hoping that Maximilian (not to increaſe his owne difficulties) would at leaſt leaue their frontiers in peace, and embracing their affections according to the ſimplicitie and innocencie thereof, turne all his armies either againſt Burgundie, or the Duchie of Millan. But Cæſar being out of hope to ioyne with him the Venetians, many other difficulties began to fall vpon him, which albeit he laboured to ſurmount with the greatneſſe of his ſpirit and conceptions, apt to promiſe him dayly more hopes then impediments, yet they delayed much the effects of his reſolutions: for that, both of himſelfe he had not ſufficient money to entertaine the Swiſſers, and to furniſh other expences neceſſary for ſo great an enterpriſe; and alſo the treaſures that were promiſed to his aide in the Dyot, were not ſufficient to furniſh the leaſt part of the exceſſiue charge of that warre. And the foundation whereupon from the beginning he had laid his greateſt hopes, that the Eſtates and Potentates of Italy, for terror of his name and armes, would offer compoſition and contributiõ of mony, began euery day to diminiſh: for, albeit in the beginning many ſhewed a certain forwardneſſe, yet the concluſions of the Diot of Conſtance not anſwering the expectation that was conceiued, that the enterpriſe ſhould rather be of the whole Empire, and almoſt of all Germanie, then his owne in peculiar, and ſeeing haply into the mightie preparations of the French King, and the new declaration of the Venetians, euery one remained in doubt, not daring (in miniſtring to him things whereof he had moſt need) to offend ſo greatly the French King. Neither were the demands of Maximilian ſuch, in the time when he was moſt feared, as for their facilitie they might induce men to adminiſter to his helpe: for, according to his cuſtome, he demanded much of euery one, wherein his rates impoſed vpon the Duke of Ferrara (whom he pretended to owe to Blanch, his wife the dowry of his ſiſter Anne, dead many yeares before) were exceſſiue, and his proportions to the Florentines no leſſe intollerable: for the Cardinall of Breſſe who managed his affaires at Rome, and had power to compound with them, demanded fiue hundred thouſand duckats: which demand, for the immoderation thereof, was the cauſe that they reſolued to temporiſe with him, till they diſcerned better what traine his affaires would take; and yet (foreſeeing not to offend him) to excuſe themſelues to the French King, who demanded men of them, giuing him to vnderſtand, that they could not accompliſh his deſire for the impediments of the waſte and ſpoile to be giuen this yeare to the Piſans with a great preparation, and for that the Genoways and other neighbours beginning eſtſoones to adminiſter new ſuccours, they were conſtrained to ſtand continually prepared againſt them. Therefore the Emperour failing (contrary to his hope) to haue his turne ſerued with the money of the Italians (hauing onely ſixe thouſand duckats of them of Sienna) he made requeſt to the Pope, that at the leaſt he would ſuffer him to take the hundred thouſand duckats which had bene afore leuied in Germanie vnder colour to make warre vpon the Turks, and was for that effect preſerued in that prouince, and might not be conuerted to any other vſe, without licence of the Sea Apoſtolike: and he offered him, that though he could not ſatisfie his demand, to paſſe into Italy without an armie, yet neuertheleſſe after he had reſtored to the Duchie of Millan the children of Lodowike Sforce (the protection of whom he pretended, both to make the people of that State more fauorable, and his paſſage more eaſie and leſſe hurtfull) he would go on to Rome without armes, to receiue the Crowne Imperiall, leauing all his bands in the Duchie of Millan. But the Pope, in whom appeared no more affection to the one partie then to the other, refuſed alſo to ſatisfie him in this demand, alledging that in ſuch an eſtate of affaires, he could not without his great danger prouoke the armes of the French King againſt him. And yet Maximilian, amid ſo many difficulties, being carefull, credulous, and quicke to execute all things of himſelfe, with paines incredible, forgat nothing that might entertaine the bruite of his deſcending, cauſing the artilleries

to march in many places towards the frontiers of Italy, ſoliciting the practiſe to haue the twelue thouſand Swiſſers, who demanding many things of him, propounded many exceptions, and yet gaue him no certaine reſolution: and ſollciting the bands that were promiſed him, he trauelled in perſon from one place to another for diuers expeditions; ſo that mens minds being brought into great confuſion, there was more diuerſitie of opinion through all Italy then earſt had bene ſeene in any other action. For in ſome the opinion of this enterpriſe was greater then euer, and other ſuppoſed it to be already rather in an eſtate declining then augmenting: which incertaintie was increaſed by himſelfe, who being of nature very ſecret, did neuer communicate his thoughts with others; and to the end his intentions might be leſſe knowne in Italy, he had ordained that the Popes Legate and the other Italians ſhould not follow his perſon, but keepe euery one apart, in certaine places remoued from the Court. Now was come the day of S. Gal, a day appointed for the muſtering of ſouldiers, of whom notwithſtanding there arriued at Conſtance but a very ſmall number, and ſcarcely any other preparations on his part, then ſuch as ſerued to cauſe the artilleries to march: and he himſelfe was carefull to vſe all meanes whereby he might recouer money. Wherefore it being vncertaine with what forces, at what time, and on which ſide he would enter, ſuch as doubted him, made mightie prouiſions in many places: ſome ſuppoſed he would make his entrie by Friul, and others thought he would march by Trent into the countrey of Verona; others iudged that coming by Sauoy, or by Coma, he would aſſaile the Duchie of Millan, hauing many of the exiles of that State in his campe: others ſtood in doubt leſt he would make ſome ſtirre in Burgondie. In regard of theſe feares, the French King ſent to the Duchie of Millan many bands of horſemen and footmen, and beſides other preparations leuied for the defence of that State, fiue and twentie hundred Spaniſh footmen, by permiſſion of the Catholike King, of whom the Emperour complained grieuouſly for this cauſe. And Monſieur de Chaumont doubting of the faith of the Borromeis, ſurpriſed in the ſame time Arona, a caſtle belonging to that family, ſtanding vpon the lake Maior: and into Burgondie the King had alſo ſent fiue hundred Lances, vnder Monſieur Trimouille Gouernor of that Prouince. And to draw away in many places the thoughts and forces of Ceſar, he ſuccoured continually the Duke of Gueldres, who moleſted the countreys of Charles the nephew of the Emperour. Beſides all this, he had ſent to Verona Iohn Iaques Triualce with foure hundred French Lances, and foure thouſand footmen, to the ſuccours of the Venetians, who had alſo ſent to Rouera the Count Petillane with foure hundred men at armes, and many bands of footmen, to the end to remaine there for the repreſſing of thoſe ſtirres that might ariſe towards Trent: and to Friul were ſent eight hundred men at armes vnder Bartlemew Aluiano, who long time before was entred into their payes. But the firſt danger appeared on that ſide which was leaſt doubted, for that Paul Baptiſta Iuſtinian, and Fregoſin, exiles of Genes, led to Caſuola, a towne belonging to Lodowike Gonſagua feodary of the Empire, a thouſand Almaine footmen, who marched ſecretly and with great diligence ouer the mountaines and difficult places of the Venetian territorie, with intention to go to Genes, after they had paſſed the riuer of Po by the mountaine of Parma. This expedition being doubted of by Monſieur de Chaumont, he diſpatched ſuddenly to Parma many horſmen and footmen, to giue impediment to the enemie, which ſo cut off all hope from the Almaines to be able to execute any thing againſt Genes, that they returned into Germanie by the ſame way, but not with the ſame diligence and danger, for that the Venetians, reſpecting their common benefite, gaue a ſecret conſent to their retiring. There were at the ſame inſtant, many of the exiles of Genes in the towne of Bologna, which draue the King into a great ſuſpition, that this matter had bene wrought by the conſent of the Pope, of whoſe inclination and will, many other things put him in doubt; both for that the Emperour was ſolicited to march by the Cardinall of S. Croſſe, although more by the diſpoſition of his owne will, then for any other occaſion: and alſo the exiles of Furly being by chance iſſued out of Faenza, and aſſaying one night to enter into Furly, the Pope complained that it was a matter compacted betweene the French King and the Venetians. Hereunto this was alſo added, that a certaine Monke being priſoner in Mantua, had confeſſed that he had practiſed with the family of the Bentiuoleis to empoiſon the Pope, and that he was ſolicited from Monſieur de Chaumont to performe his promiſe to the Bentiuoleis: ſo that the Pope proceeding by examination in forme authentike, ſent it to the King by Achilles de Graſſi, Biſhop of Peſera, and afterwards Cardinall, to make requeſt that the truth might be knowne, and that ſuch as ſhould be found guiltie in ſo great a wickedneſſe, might receiue punishment: by reason whereof Alexander Bentiuole being suspected more then the residue, was summoned by the King to appeare and answer in France to such things as he was to be charged withall. With these actions and incertainties, ended the yeare 1507.

1508. But in the beginning of the yeare a thousand, fiue hundred and eight, the troubled minds of them of Bolognia, being no longer disposed to remaine in quiet, drew into conspiracie, and being led by Annibal and Hermes Bentiuole, who had intelligence with certaine yong men of the family of the Peppoli and other yong Gentlemen, they approched Bolognia vpon the sudden: which was an enterprise not without perill, for that the conspirators to the end to let in the residue, had seized vpon the gate of S. Mammola. But the people taking armes in fauour of the estate Ecclesiastike, the yong men being astonished, abandoned the gate, and the Bentiuoleis retired. This inuasion rather appaised then inflamed the mind of the Pope against the French King, for that his Maiestie shewing that it displeased him much, commanded Monsieur de Chaumont to be ready to succour Bolognia with all his companies as often as need should require, and that from thenceforth the Bentiuoleis should not be receiued into any part of the Duchie of Millan: for which cause Iohn died about that time of discontent; for that afore he was expulsed Bolognia, he had not bene accustomed to feele the bitternesse of fortune, and had bene the most happie of all the tyrants of Italy, seruing a long time for an example of happie fortune. For, in the space of fortie yeares, during which time he commanded as he would in Bolognia, he had not bene so much as grieued by the death of any of his friends, and much lesse for any other accident, and had alwayes had both for himselfe and for his children, pensions, appointments, and the greatest honours of all the Princes of Italy, passing very easily through all weightie and dangerous affaires: for all which happinesse he seemed (besides the conuenient situation of that Citie) to be principally beholding to Fortune. For, according to the common iudgement of men, he was not commended either for his wit, or his prudence, and much lesse for any valour that was in his person.

In the beginning of this same yeare, Cæsar minding no more to deferre the mouing of armes, dispatched an Herald to Verona, to publish his resolution to passe into Italy to take the Imperial Crowne, and to require lodging for foure thousand horse. Whereunto the gouernours of Verona, hauing first consulted with the Councell of Venice, answered him, that if he would passe for no other occasion then to receiue the Crowne, they would honour him with all the offices and obseruances they could; but they saw effects contrary to his perswasions, hauing already brought vpon their marches so great proportions of men at armes and artilleries. Maximilian then being come to Trent, to giue beginning to the warre, made a solemne procession the fourth day of Februarie, wherein he went in person, hauing before him the Heralds of the Empire, and the Imperiall sword naked, and in the end of the solemnitie, his Secretary Matthew Lango, afterwards Bishop of Gurcie, being mounted into an high seate, published in the name of Cæsar, his determination to passe in warlike maner into Italy, calling him no more King of Romanes, but Emperour elect, as the Kings of Romanes are wont to be intituled when they come to take the Crown: and the same day forbidding that none should issue out of Trent, after he had caused to be baked a great quantitie of bisket, and made many engines of wood for the vse of warre, and sent by the riuer of Adice sundry boates and lighters loaden with prouisions, he went out of Trent the night following, a litle before day with fifteen hundred horse, & foure thousand footmen, not of those regiments which were agreed to him in the Diet, but of the peoples of his Court and of his owne estates, taking the way that leades by those mountaines to Vincenza: and at the same time the Marquis of Brandenbourg marched towards Rouero with fiue hundred horsmen and two thousand footmen of the same countrey, who returned the day following, hauing done no other action but presented himselfe before Rouero, and demanded in vaine to be lodged in the towne. But the Emperour elect being come to the mountaine of Siague, the foote whereof draweth within twelue miles of Vincenza, after he had taken the lands of the seuen Communalties (a people so named, dwelling in the top of the mountaine, vnder many exemptions and priuiledges of the Venetians,) and after he had filled vp many trenches which they had cast for their defence and to stop the way, he caused to be drawne thither certaine peeces of artillerie: from whence as mens minds entertained a wonderfull expectation of some good successe, the fourth day after his departure from Trent, he returned suddenly to Bolsana, a towne further remoued from the confines of Italy then Trent; all men being much amazed at so great an inconsideration, tion, or rather inconſtancie. This weake beginning reuiued much the minds of the Venetians; in ſo much that as they had already entertained many bands of footmen, ſo they called to Rouero the French companies which were at Verona with Triuulce, and beginning to make greater preparations, they ſtirred vp the French King to do the like; who marching towards Italy, ſent fiue thouſand Swiſſers payed by himſelfe, and three thouſand payed by the Venetians; that nation (for that Maximilian was not able to giue them pay) being without any regard turned to the pay of the French: and yet after they were departed and payed, they would not go vpon the lands of the Venetians, alledging for their reaſons, that they would not ſerue againſt Maximilian in any other action, then for the defence of the eſtate of Millan.

A greater ſtirre, but farre more wretched and vnhappie, as wherein was nouriſhed the beginning of greater things, was kindled in Friul, whither did paſſe by the way of the mountaines, and by Cæſars appointment, foure hundred horſe and fiue thouſand footmen, all leuied in his countrey of Tirol; who as ſoone as they were entred into the valley of Cadora, tooke the borough and Caſtle, wherein was a very ſlender garriſon, together with the Magiſtrate of the Venetians that was therein; which being vnderſtood at Venice, they commanded Aluiano and George Conaro Superintendent, remaining vpon the lands of Vincentin, to make ſpeedily to the ſuccours of that countrey: and to keepe occupied the enemies on that ſide, they ſent towards Trieſta foure light galleys, with certaine veſſels of other nature. And at the ſame time Maximilian, who was marched from Bolſano to Brunech, and turning to the way of Friul for the oportunitie of the paſſages and largeneſſe of the countrey, ran through certaine valleys more then fortie miles within the territories of the Venetians, with a ſtrength of ſixe thouſand footmen leuied in thoſe quarters: and after he had taken the valley of Cadora, which leadeth to Treuiſa, leauing behind him the borough of Boſtauro lately appertaining to the Patriarke of Aquilea, he tooke the borough of S. Martin, the borough of Pieua, and the valley which was kept by the Counts of Sauorgna, with other places adioyning. After he had made theſe incurſions, performing herein rather the part of an inferiour Captaine, then of an Emperour, and had commanded his companies to draw to Treuiſan, he returned vpon the end of Februarie to Inſpruch to lay Iewels in pawne, and make other prouiſions for money, whereof being rather a prodigall waſter, then a temperate diſtributer, he neuer had enough to furniſh the neceſſitie of his affaires. But when he vnderſtood on the way that the Swiſſers had taken the pay of the French, he was not a litle diſcontented with them, and ſo went to Vlma a Citie of Sweuia, to induce that league to aide him as they had done in times paſt in the warre againſt the Swiſſers. He made vehement inſtance likewiſe to the Electors, that the aides promiſed in the Diot of Conſtance, might be yet recontinued for ſixe moneths more: and at the ſame time the regiments of his eſtates which were abiding at Trent, to the number of nine thouſand, as well footmen as horſemen, had battered the Caſtle of Baioque, and brought it to diſcretion within three dayes: it ſtands right ouer againſt Rouero on the right hand, vpon the high way that leades from Trent into Italy, and betweene which and Rouero which is on the left hand, runneth the riuer of Adice. But Aluiano departed in great haſte to ſuccour Friul, and paſſing along the mountaines laden with ſnowes, he came in two dayes neare to Cadora, where expecting his traine of footmen, who could not march with the ſame ſpeed, he gained a paſſage not guarded by the Almaines, which is the entrance into the valley of Cadora. Now by reaſon of the coming of Aluiano, the men of the countrey affected to the iuriſdiction of Venice, taking new courage, ſeized vpon the other paſſages of the valley by the which the Almaines were to retire: who ſeeing themſelues incloſed, without any hope of ſafetie but by the ſword, and iudging that Aluiano would dayly ſtrengthen himſelfe, marched out againſt him in great furie: and he not refuſing the fight, there began betweene both the parties a moſt cruell fight, wherein the Almaines, who fought valiantly, more for a deſire to die glorioully, then with any hope to ſaue their liues, and caſting themſelues in a groſſe ſquadron, their wiues in the middeſt, made a valiant defence for certaine houres: but at the laſt, not being able to make reſiſtance againſt the number and vertue of their enemies, they were vanquiſhed, more then a thouſand of them being dead on the place, and the reſidue remaining priſoners. After this victorie Aluiano tooke the Caſtle of Cadora, which he aſſaulted on two parts; where Charles Malateſte one of the ancient Lords of Rimini was ſlaine with a ſtone caſt out of a tower: and following the occaſion of the victorie, he tooke Portonauone, and afterwards Cremonſa ſituate vpon a high hill, which being taken, he went and incamped afore Goritia, ſtanding at the foote of

of the Iulian Alpes, ſtrong by ſituation, and well fortified, hauing a Caſtle of very hard acceſſe: and taking firſt the bridge of Goritia, and planting afterwards his artilleries before the towne, he carried it the fourth day by compoſition, being in great neceſſitie of weapons, water, and victuals. After the towne was taken, the Caſtle-keeper and companies within the Caſtle, rendered it after they had receiued foure thouſand duckats; and the Venetians erected there forthwith many fortifications to ſerue as a bulwarke and bridle againſt the Turks, and to hold them in feare for paſſing the riuer of Liſonſo, ſince by the oportunitie of that place their retrait might eaſily be hindred. From Goritia Aluiano marched to incampe before Trieſta, a Citie at that time much moleſted by the ſea, which he tooke eaſily, not without the diſcontentment of the French King, who gaue counſell not to prouoke ſo much the Emperour: but for that it ſtood vpon the gulfe of Venice, and by that reaſon very conuenient for their traffikes, they (made proud by the proſperitie of their fortune) determined to follow the courſe of their victorie. Therefore after they had taken Trieſta and the Caſtle, they tooke Portonon, and afterwards Fiume, which is a towne of Eſclauonia towards Ancona, which they burned, for that it was the retrait of the ſhips which would paſſe by the ſea Adriatique without paying the cuſtomes that were impoſed: and afterwards, paſſing the Alpes, they tooke Poſſonia, which is vpon the marches of Hungarie.

Theſe were the enterpriſes that were done in the countrey of Friul. But on that ſide towards Trent, the Almaine armie which was now come to Calliana (a towne famous for the harmes of the Venetians, for that neare vnto it, ſomewhat more then twentie yeares afore, Robert de S. Seuerin a notable Captaine of their army was ouerthrowne and ſlaine) aſſailed three thouſand footmen of the Venetians, who were left for the guard of the mount Bretonica, vnder the leading of Iaques Corſo, Denis of Nalda, and Vitelli de Citta de Caſtello, who notwithſtanding they were ſufficiently fortified, fled ſuddenly into the next mountaine; and the Almaines, ſcorning the cowardiſe of the Italian footmen, burnt many houſes, and after they had beaten downe their defences made in the mountaine, they returned to Calliana: by which ſucceſſe the Biſhop of Trent being allured, and hauing aſſembled two thouſand footmen, with part of the bands that were at Calliana, he went to beſiege Riua Trent, which is a great borough ſtanding vpon the lake of Garde, whither Triuulce had already ſent a ſufficient garriſon. And after he had for two dayes battered the Church of Saint Francis, and in the meane while made certaine incurſions vpon the villages that are about Lodron, two thouſand Griſons that ſerued in the Almaine campe, falling into mutinie for a quarrell of ſmall importance concerning their paiments, made pillage of the victuals of the campe: by reaſon whereof, all things being in diſorder, and moſt part of the Griſons forſaking the campe, the remainder of the armie containing about ſeuen thouſand men, was conſtrained to retire, which gaue courage to the Venetians to ouer-run the next villages; but as three thouſand of them went to burne certaine townes of the Count d'Agreſte, they were put to flight by the Paiſants, and about three hundred ſlaine. For the retraite of the Almaines which were before Riue, almoſt all the bands being ſeparate, and the horſemen (in number about twelue hundred) being retired from their lodgings at Calliana to Trent, the regiments of the Venetians on Eaſter day morning aſſailed Pietra, a place within ſixe miles of Trent: but thoſe within Trent iſſuing out to their ſuccours, they retired. And afterwards they aſſailed the Rocke of Creſte, being a peece of importance, which yeelded before the ſuccours that came from Trent were arriued: the ſame being the cauſe that the Almaines, who had reaſſembled and reordained their footmen, returned with a thouſand horſe and ſixe thouſand footmen to Calliana, diſtant from Pietra the ſhot of a Croſſebow: and two hundred horſemen of the Duke of Wittemberg being gone from them, the Venetians with foure thouſand horſemen and ſixteene thouſand footmen, came and incamped before Pietra, planting there ſixteene peeces of artillerie. Pietra is a Caſtle ſeated at the foote of a mountaine, on whoſe right hand the way leades from Rouera to Trent, and out of the ſame comes a very ſtrong wall containing in length the ſhot of a Crosbow, and ſtretcheth euen to the riuer of Adice, and in the midſt of the ſame is a gate, of the which who is not maiſter, can hardly hurt Pietra. The two armies were within a mile one of another, and both had before them the caſtle and the wall, and on the one ſide the riuer of Adice, and on the other the mountaines, and either armie had at their backes places of ſure retrait. And for that the Almaines had the Caſtle and the wall in their power, they might when they liſted haue compelled the Venetian armie to fight, which the Venetians could not do; but becauſe they were inferior in number, they durſt not commit things to aduenture, but deuiſed onely to hinder the enemies from taking the Caſtle which was continually battered by their artilleries. But the Almaines perceiuing one day that their artillerie was ſlenderly guarded, gaue a furious charge vpon it, and putting to flight the footmen that guarded it, they wonne with great valour two peeces, and drew them to their campe; which accident abated much the courage of the Venetians, who now iudging it but loſt time to entertaine the action of Pietra, which had deuoured many of their peoples, they brake vp and retired to Rouero, and the Almaines returned to Trent, where within few dayes after, the moſt part of them disbanded and diſperſed themſelues: and the regiments appointed at the Diot of Conſtance, which, by reaſon ſome came ſoone and others late, neuer contained aboue foure thouſand together, (for all thoſe in ſubſtance that aſſembled at Trent and Cadora, were of the countreys thereabout) returned to their houſes, their terme of ſix moneths being ended, by whoſe example alſo moſt part of the footmen that were leuied did the like. And Maximilian himſelfe, being much troubled in going from one place to another, to leuie prouiſions, & for other buſineſſes, could neuer be preſent at thoſe actions. But for that the Diot of Vlma was referred to a time more conuenient, being confuſed in himſelfe with the multitude of affaires, and ſhame of his ſucceſſes, he withdrew himſelf to Collein, no man knowing for many days where he was. And being not ſtrong enough to reſiſt ſo great a ſtorme, hauing loſt all that he held in the countrey of Friul, with the other peeces affronting, he found himſelfe abandoned of all ſuccors, and in great perill to be depriued of Trent, if in the French bands had bene any diſpoſition to ioyne with the Venetian armie. But Triualte by the Kings direction (who was reſolued rather to pacifie then to prouoke) would paſſe no further then was neceſſarie for the defence of the Venetians.

Maximilian ſeeing himſelfe thus abandoned of euery one, and deſiring by ſome meanes to put himſelfe out of danger, after the ouerthrow of Cadora, ſent one of his Gentlemen to Venice to demand truce for three moneths; of which the Senate made no account, hauing no diſpoſition to make truce for leſſe then a yeare, nor yet to giue any conſent, if the French King were not comprehended in it. But his dangers increaſing by the loſſe of Trieſta, and all things growing into a worſe condition, the Biſhop of Trent, as of his peculiar motion, perſwaded the Venetians to truce, alledging that by that meanes there was ſome hope of peace: whereto the Venetians anſwered, That ſith the matter was now propounded not to them alone, but ſo as the French King might be comprehended, it ſhould not be hindered by them. After this beginning there drew to conference together the Biſhop of Trent, and Serentane Secretary of Maximilian, and for the French King Triualte and Charles Geffray Preſident of the Parliament of Millan, and for the Venetians Zacharie Contarin Embaſſadour particularly appointed for that action. They agreed eaſily for other conditions, ſeeing, as touching the time, they were reſolued that it ſhould laſt for three yeares, and euery one to retaine that he poſſeſſed at that preſent, with power to build and fortifie ſuch places as they commanded: but this onely was the difficultie, that the French would haue had a generall truce, wherein ſhould be comprehended ſuch confederates as euery one had out of Italy, and eſpecially the Duke of Gueldres; but the Agents of the Emperour ſtood obſtinately againſt it, for that Maximilian had determined the ruine of the ſaid Duke: alledging that the warre being managed wholly in Italy, it was neither iuſt nor neceſſarie to ſpeake of any other things then ſuch as troubled Italy: and herein the Venetians did what they could to ſatisfie the deſire of the French King, but ſeeing litle hope to diſpoſe the Almaines, they were contented to embrace the truce in ſuch ſort as they had conſented, eſpecially for a deſire they had to deliuer themſelues of ſuch a warre which was now brought wholy vpon their Eſtate, and no leſſe to confirme in their obedience by the commoditie of the truce for three yeares, the townes which they had conquered in thoſe ſtirres: and excuſed themſelues to the French with this reaſon, no leſſe true then iuſt; that neither the one nor the other of them being any further bound then for the defence of the matters of Italy, and their confederation being grounded thereupon, they had not to do to think vpon matters beyond the Mounts, which if they were not bound to defend with armes, they were alſo not bound to deuiſe to aſſure them with the truce. Concerning which controuerſie Triualce wrote into France, and the Venetians to Venice, whoſe Senate returned anſwer, that if there could not be admiſſion of other conditions, that they ſhould at leaſt conclude the truce for Italy onely, reſeruing time and place for the French King to enter. Whereunto albeit neither Triualce nor the Preſident would conſent, complaining grieuouſly that they would not ſo much as tarrie for the Kings anſwer, and that the Preſident proteſted, that a ioynt and common enterpriſe ſhould not be determined but by ioynt and common conſent, alledging withall, how litle the Kings amitie and alliance were reſpected; yet for all that the Venetians forbare not to conclude with Maximilian, and the contract running ſimply in their proper names, they agreed, that on the behalfe of Maximilian ſhould be named and holden as comprehended and nominated, the Pope, the King Catholike, the King of England, the King of Hungarie, and all the Princes and ſubiects of the ſacred Empire in what place ſoeuer, together with all the confederates of Maximilian and the ſaid Kings and States of the Empire, which ſhould be named within three moneths. And for the Venetians were named the French King, the King Catholike, with all the confederates and friends of the Venetians, of the French King, and of the King Catholike, in Italy onely, whom they ſhould likewiſe name within three moneths. Thus was the truce accorded the twentieth day of Aprill, and with no leſſe expedition ratified by the Emperour and the Venetians, by which meanes the warre ceaſſed, with the great hope of many that Italy ſhould now for a while enioy concord and peace. After armes were layd aſide by meanes of this truce, the French King ſuppoſing that the Florentines would haue declared themſelues rather for Ceſar then for him, if the Emperours affaires had had a more happie beginning; and knowing withall that that diſpoſition proceeded of no other thing then of a deſire they had to recouer Piſa in what ſort ſoeuer, and of a diſcontentment, that without any reſpect to their fidelitie they had bene alwayes at his deuotion, and that in the ſeruices paſt, he had not onely not fauored them, either with authoritie, counſell nor armes, but alſo had ſuffered the Genoways that were his ſubiects, to ſuccour the Piſans: he determined to deuiſe how by ſome honeſt meanes they might obtaine that they deſired. But for that (following his former purpoſes) he might do it to his proper profit, and being of opinion that feare would be a better meanes then hope to draw from them a great ſumme, he diſpatched Michael Riccio to make complaint, that they had ſent men of purpoſe to accord with Ceſar his enemie, and that vnder colour to giue the ſpoile to the Piſans, they had aſſembled a mightie armie, without hauing regard to the conditions of the time, and to his ſuſpitions and dangers: and that in ſo great a ſtirre and commotion, they would neuer declare fully their intentions, wherein they gaue him iuſt occaſion to doubt to what end tended thoſe preparations: and alſo, that hauing deſired them to aide him with their armies in ſo great perils, they refuſed it, contrary to his expectation: and yet, as well for the perpetuall amitie which he had alwayes borne to their Commonweale, as for the memory of the good offices they had done in times paſt for his ſeruice, he was very ready to pardon them all theſe new iniuries, ſo far forth, as (to cut off all occaſions that might eftſoones trouble the tranquillitie of Italy) they would not hereafter moleſt the Piſans without his conſent. To theſe complaints the Florentines anſwered, That neceſſitie had induced them to ſend men to Cæſar, not with any intention to couenant with him againſt the King, but (if he paſſed into Italy) to aſſure their Eſtate, which the King in the capitulation made with them, would not be bound to defend againſt Ceſar, according to the teſtimonie of an expreſſe clauſe, bearing theſe words, Sauing the rights of the Empire; and alſo, that he could not reaſonably complaine of the armie leuied againſt the Piſans, for that it being no greater then of cuſtome, it miniſtred no iuſt occaſion of new ſuſpitions; and being aſſembled for no other effects, then (as in other times) to giue impediments to the harueſt of the Piſans, there was no reaſonable cauſe of doubt: That for ſuch a matter, and for the ſuccors which the Genoways and other neighbours gaue then to the Piſans, it was not poſſible for them to ſend their ſouldiers to the King, whereunto albeit they were not bound, yet for the deuotion they had alwayes borne to him, they would not haue ſtucke to haue done it; yea though they had not bene required: That they maruelled greatly at the Kings deſire, that the Piſans ſhould not be moleſted, whom he had no reaſon to eſteeme or value with the Florentines, if he did but remember what they had done againſt him in the rebellion of Genes: And that he could not iuſtly forbid them to moleſt the Piſans, for that the confederation which they had made with him, did import ſo much. Vpon theſe beginnings they conſulted afterwards to reduce Piſa vnder the obedience of the Florentines: whereunto it ſeemed this did ſuffice, if order were giuen that neither the Genoways nor Lucquoys ſhould ſuccor it being in ſuch a neceſſitie of victuals and forces, that the Piſans durſt no more iſſue out of their towne: adioyning withall, chiefly for the loſſe of the harueſt, the diſcontent and deſpaire of thoſe of the plaine countrey, being in greater number then the citizens: in ſo much as it was beleeued, that they could not hold out, if they receiued not from Genes and Lucques certaine quantities of money, with part whereof such as gouerned kept within Pisa certaine forreine souldiers, and distributing the residue to the yong men, as well of the towne as of the plaine countrey, they astonished with the armes of those, such as desired to accord with the Florentines, keeping by that meanes the towne in peace. To this practise begun by the French King, was added the authoritie of the King Catholike, iealous belike that without him such a matter could worke no effect: and therefore as soone as he vnderstood that Michael Riccio was gone to Florence, he dispatched also an Embassadour, who going first to Pisa, encouraged them in the name of his King, to hold out: and that for no other respect, then that remaining willfull and obstinate to yeeld to the Florentines, they might be sold for a greater price. And a litle after, by consent of both the Kings, these conferences were carried into the Court of the French King, where, without any regard to the protection so oftentimes promised, the King Catholike solicited that businesse with great importunitie, knowing that if Pisa were not defended, it would necessarily fall into the power of the Florentines, and for that he had no disposition to intangle himselfe with new affaires, and chiefly against the will of the French King. For, although immediatly vpon his returning into Spaine, he had resumed the gouernment of Castile, yet he stood not well confirmed in it, both for the diuers inclinations of the Barons, and for that Maximilian had not giuen his consent in the name of his nephew. But after the cause of the Pisans had bene long debated in the Court of France, at last by reason of many difficulties which hapned, but principally for that both the Kings sought to appropriate to themselues the price of the sale of it, finding no meanes of agreement, the practise was dissolued without any conclusion.

The Argvment.

Moſt of the Princes of Chriſtendome draw into league at Cambray againſt the Venetians, who being ouerthrowne by the French King, render the townes of the Church, and make ſubmiſſion to the Emperour. Piſa returneth to the obedience of the Florentines. The Venetians recouer the towne of Padua, which is ſoone after beſieged by Cæſar. Afterwards they make war to the Duke of Ferrara. Accord between the Emperor and the King of Spaine touching the gouernment of Caſtile. The death of Count Petillane. The Emperour deſpairing to be able to ouercome the Venetians, inducet h the French King to ſet vpon Vincenſa, Padua and Treuiſa, who finding himſelfe in great difficulties and doubts, ſendeth for aduice to the Pope, purpoſing to follow his decree. The Venetians demand pardon of the Pope, and obtaine it.

THe diſeaſes of Italy were not ſuch, nor their forces ſo litle weakned, as that they might be cured with light medicines: but as it often hapneth in bodies repleniſhed with humors corrupt, that the remedie that is applied to purge the maladie of one part, ingendereth more dangerous infections: euen ſo the truce made betweene the Emperour and the Venetians, in place of the vniuerſall expectation of tranquillitie, brought forth among the Italians infinite calamities, and more great and cruell warres then the former. For though there had bene in Italy for the ſpace of fourteene yeares, ſo great warres, and ſo many mutations, yet matters being oftentimes ended without effuſion of bloud, and the ouerthrowes falling for the moſt part vpon the ſtrangers onely, the peoples had ſuffered leſſe then the Princes. But the gap being opened to new diſcords in time to come, there followed throughout all Italy, and againſt the Italians themſelues, moſt cruell accidents, infinite murders, ſackings, and deſtructions of many cities and townes, a libertie of warre no leſſe offenſiue to their friends then to their enemies, religion violated, and holy things troden vnder foote, with leſſe reuerence and reſpect then the prophane. The cauſe of ſo many afflictions, generally conſidered, was, as almoſt alwayes it is, the ambition and couetouſneſſe of Princes; but if they be conſidered in particular, they tooke their beginning of the too raſh and inſolent maner of proceeding of the Venetians, by occaſion whereof were ceaſſed thoſe difficulties which till that time had holden in ſuſpence the French King and Cæſar, and hindred them from agreeing together againſt them: of whom, the one being greatly kindled, they put in deſpaire, and at the ſame time they moued the other to no ſmall indignation, or at leaſt gaue him cauſe to diſcloſe vnder ſome honeſt colour, that which he had long deſired. For Cæſar, being netled by ſo many infamies and harmes receiued, loſing part of his inheritance, in ſtead of conquering the Eſtates of others, would by no meanes omit any oportunitie whereby he might recouer or repaire ſo great ſlanders and loſſes; which diſpoſition the Venetians vndiſcreetly increaſed in him againe after the making of the truce: for not ſparing to aggrauate his indignation, no leſſe with vaine demonſtrations then with effects, they receiued into Venice Aluiano with great pompe, and almoſt in maner triumphant. And the French King, albeit from the beginning he had giuen ſome hope to ratifie the truce that was made, yet expreſſing afterwards the great diſcontentment he tooke, he complained that the Venetians had preſumed to name and comprehend him as adherent, and that prouiding for their proper tranquillitie, they had left him in the cares and trauels of the warre. It was not long before the diſpoſition of mind both of the one and the other, began to appeare. For Cæſar hauing no confidence in his proper forces, and leſſe expectation that the Princes or peoples of Germanie would take to heart the iniuries that had bene done to him, made as though he had a deſire to ioyne with the French King againſt the Venetians, as the onely remedie to recouer the honour and eſtates he had loſt: and the French King, the new diſdaine renewing in him the memorie of the offences which he perſwaded himſelfe to haue receiued of them in the warres of Naples, and being likewiſe incited by a deſire to draw out of their hands Cremona, and other townes of the ancient poſſeſſions of the Dukes of Millan, had the like inclination. Therefore to the end that in remouing the impediments of things inferiour, they might the better proceed to thoſe of higher degree, they began to debate how to reſolue the quarrels betweene the Archduke and the Duke of Gueldres, whoſe ſafetie the French King eſteemed much, for the ancient alliance and commodities he had receiued by him. And at the ſame time the Pope alſo ſtirred vp the French King againſt the Venetians, for that beſides the old cauſes, he was inflamed againſt them with a new hatred, for an opinion he had, that by their meanes the exiles of Furly, who were retired to Faenza, had made a triall to enter that Citie; & for that they had receiued into their dominions the family of the Bentiuoleis, chaſed by the King out of the Duchie of Millan: whereunto was added, that in many things they had leſſe then euer before regarded the authority of the Court of Rome, and lately in this, which troubled not a litle the Popes mind: ỳ when the Pope had tranſlated the Biſhoprick of Vincenſa, vacant by the death of the Cardinall of S. Peter ad Vincula his nephew, to Sixtus likewiſe his nephew, ſubſtituted by him into the dignitie of Cardinall, and to thoſe benefices; the Senate of Venice, making ſmall reckoning of this collation, choſe a Gentleman of Venice, who, the Pope refuſing to confirme him, took the boldneſſe raſhly to name himſelfe Biſhop of Vincenſa, by the election of the moſt excellẽt councel of the Pregati. Now the Pope being not a litle kindled for this matter, diſpatched firſt to the King, Maximus Secretarie to the Cardinall of Narbona, and afterwards the Cardinall himſelfe, who newly ſucceeding the late Cardinall of Achx in his Biſhopricke, was called the Cardinall of Achx: and they being well receiued and willingly heard of the King, brought backe with them many meanes and plots to put in execution that which he deſired, both without the Emperour, and by ioyning with him. But the Pope ſhewed more inclination to complaine, then to determine any thing; for that on the one ſide, the ardent deſire he had to cauſe armes to be leuied againſt the Venetians, troubled his mind; and on the other, he ſeemed fearfull to be conſtrained to depend too much on the greatneſſe of another: but much more was he moued by an ancient iealouſie he had taken againſt the Cardinall of Amboiſe, in which reſpect it ſeemed grieuous to him that the armies of the French King ſhould paſſe into Italy: and the affaires of greateſt importance were ſomewhat troubled, by reaſon the Pope, without the Kings knowledge, had a litle before diſpoſed the Biſhoprickes of Aſt and Plaiſance; and for that the King reſiſted the new Cardinall of S. Peter ad Vincula, to whom by the death of the other, the rich Abbey of Clernault neare to Millan, was transferred, to take poſſeſſion of it.

But albeit the Pope could not be reſolued amidſt ſo many difficulties, yet in the end the French King and Caſar determined to contract ſecretly together againſt the Venetians, and to this end, and to giue perfection to thoſe things that ſhould be debated, there aſſembled in the towne of Cambray for Caſar, the Ladie Margaret his daughter, Regent of Flanders, and of thoſe other Eſtates which were deſcended to King Philip by the mothers right, followed and aſſiſted for the regard of this action by Matthew Lange a Secretarie of great credite with Caſar: and for the French King, was ſent the Cardinall of Amboiſe; who gaue out, that this aſſembly was to ſolicite a peace betweene the Archduke and the Duke of Gueldres, betweene whom they had ſet downe a truce for fortie dayes; keeping alwayes vnknowne to the Venetians the true occaſion; to whoſe Embaſſadour the Cardinall aſſured by great oathes, that his King would continue in the confederation he had with them; wherein alſo the Embaſſadour of the King of Aragon followed the Cardinall, rather not denying then granting; for that albeit that King had bene the firſt mouer of theſe conferences betweene the Emperour and the French King, yet they had bin continued afterwards without him, both the one and the other of them perſwading themſelues that the proſperitie of the French King would be hurtfull to them; and as touching the gouernment of Caſtile, all greatnes of Caſar was held ſuſpected, and therfore his thoughts in that action were not conformable to his words. At Cambray things were reſolued in very few dayes, without communicating with the Embaſſadour of the King Catholike, till after the concluſion, which the tenth day of December was ſolemnly confirmed in the great Church, with the oathes of Ladie Margaret, the Cardinall of Amboiſe, and the Spaniſh Embaſſadour: and nothing elſe was publiſhed, but that there was eſtabliſhed betweene the Pope and either of thoſe Princes a perpetuall peace and confederation. But in Articles more ſecret, were contained matters of right great importance, which being full of ambition, and wholly contrary to the couenants which Cæſar and the French King had with the Venetians, were couered with a preamble full of great pietie and affection to religion, as though the diuerſitie of words were ſufficient to alter and change the effects of things. It was expreſſed in that preamble, That, for a common deſire to begin a warre againſt the enemies of the name of Chriſt, and the impediments which the Venetians had giuen, occupying ambitiouſly the lands of the Church, which now they meant to remoue, to the end to proceed with better conſent and agreement to ſo holy and neceſſary an expedition; and by the perſwaſions and counſels of the Pope, the Cardinall of Amboiſe as his Procurer, and with his authoritie, and as deputed and authoriſed by the French King: and by the perſonall ſolicitation of Ladie Margaret, aſſigned and authoriſed by the Emperour, and as gouerneſſe to the Archduke and the Eſtates of Flanders: and by the conſent of the Embaſſadour of the King of Aragon as fully appointed by his King; they were reſolued to make warre vpon the Venetians, euery one in his owne right, to recouer the things they had vſurped vpon them; which for the Pope were Faenza, Rimini, Rauenna and Ceruia: for the Emperour, Padua, Vincenſa and Verona, appertaining to him in the name of the Empire; and Friul and Treuiſan, being parcell of the inheritance of the houſe of Auſtria: for the French King were Cremona, Guiaradadda, Breſſe, Bergama and Crema: and for the regard of the King of Aragon, were the townes and hauens which had bene morgaged by Ferdinand King of Naples: That the French King ſhould go to the warre in perſon, and begin it the firſt day of the next Aprill, at what time alſo the Pope and the King Catholike ſhould enter into the action: That to the end the Emperour might haue iuſt cauſe not to obſerue the truce that was made, the Pope ſhould demand ſuccours of him as of the protector of the Church; and that after that, the Emperour ſhould ſend to him at the leaſt a Captaine, and ſhould be bound fortie dayes after the French King had begun the warre, to inuade the Eſtates of the Venetians in perſon: That which ſoeuer of them ſhould recouer that which appertained to himſelfe, ſhould be bound to miniſter aide to the others, till they had made a full and ſufficient recouerie: That they ſhould be all bound to defend one another, in caſe the Venetians offered to oppreſſe them for any places that were recouered, and that none of them in particular ſhould compound with the Venetians without a common conſent: That the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantua, and whoſoeuer elſe pretended that the Venetians vſurped any place of theirs, had libertie to be named in the league within three moneths; and being once named, to enioy all the benefites of the confederation in as full maner as the principals of the ſame, communicating the fulneſſe of authoritie for the recouering of thoſe things that they had loſt: That the Pope ſhould ſummon the Venetians vnder great paines and curſes, to make reſtitution of ſuch things as they occupied of the Church: That he ſhould be iudge betweene Blanch Maria the Emperours wife, and the Duke of Ferrara, in a contention touching the inheritance and ſucceſſion of Anna her ſiſter, and ſometimes wife to the ſaid Duke: That Cæſar ſhould inueſt the French King in the Duchie of Millan, for himſelfe, Francis de Angouleſme, and their iſſue males; for which inueſtiture the French King ſhould pay to him an hundred thouſand duckats: That Cæſar and the Archduke ſhould not, during the warre, and ſix moneths after, make any enterpriſe againſt the King Catholike in reſpect of the gouernment and titles of the realmes of Caſtile: That the Pope ſhould exhort the King of Hungarie to enter into this confederation: That euery one ſhould name within foure moneths, his confederates and adherents, excepting expreſly to comprehend the Venetians, nor the ſubiects or freeholders of any of the confederates; and that euery principall partie in the contract, ſhould ratifie all theſe articles within threeſcore dayes next following. To this vniuerſall league was adioyned the particular accord betweene the Archduke and the Duke of Gueldres, wherein was agreed, that reſtitution ſhould be made of thoſe townes that were taken from the Archduke in this warre, but not in like ſort of ſuch as were taken from the Duke.

This new confederation being in this ſort concluded (and all things that concerned the Venetians kept as ſecret as might be,) the Cardinall of Amboiſe departed the day following from Cambray, the Biſhop of Paris and Albert Pio Earle of Carpi being firſt ſent to the Emperour to receiue receiue his ratification in the name of the French King, who without any delay confirmed all the articles by oath, and with the ſame forme of ſolemnitie wherewith it was publiſhed in the Church of Cambray. It is moſt certaine (albeit the words of the publication imported, that the authoritie of the Pope and King of Aragon did communicate in it) that this confederation was made without their commiſſion or conſent: an action which Ceſar and the French King perſwaded themſelues they would conſent vnto, partly in regard of their proper profit, and partly for that in reſpect of the preſent eſtate of things, neither of them both durſt gainſay their authoritie, and particularly the King of Aragon; to whom albeit this capitulation was diſpleaſing, for that fearing leſt the greatneſſe of the French King would increaſe too much, he preferred the ſuretie of the whole kingdome of Naples afore the recouering of one part which was holden by the Venetians: yet, expreſſing cunningly a readineſſe and inclination contrary to the intentions of his mind, he made preſent ratification with the ſame ceremonies. But the Pope was farre more full of doubting, ſtriuing in him (according to his cuſtome) a deſire on the one ſide to recouer the townes of Romagna, ioyned to a diſdaine againſt the Venetians; and on the other ſide a troubleſome feare of the greatneſſe of the French King: beſides that he deemed it would be dangerous for him that the power of Ceſar ſhould begin to ſtretch farre in Italy; and therfore iudging it more for his profite to obtaine by accord part of that he deſired, then to recouer the whole by warre, he laboured to induce the Venetians to render to him Rimini and Faenza; admoniſhing them, that the dangers which threatned them by the vnion of ſo many Princes, would be farre more great, if he were concurrent with them in the confederation; for that he could not refuſe to purſue them with armes ſpirituall and temporall: whereas if they rendered the townes which they had taken from the Church ſince he was Pope, by which meanes he ſhould make a ioynt recouerie both of his honour and eſtates, he ſhould haue iuſt occaſion not to ratifie that which had bene done in his name but without his conſent: and that this confederation, without the Pontificall authoritie, would eaſily vaniſh, hauing in it ſelfe many difficulties: and that they ſhould not doubt but that he would do his endeuour, both by his authoritie and induſtrie, at leaſt to repreſſe in Italy the power of ſtrangers, which brought no leſſe perill to the ſea Apoſtolike, then to their State. Vpon this demand, the Senate aſſembled many times, ſome iudging it a thing of great importance, to ſeparate the Pope from Ceſar and the French King, and others thought it an action vnworthy, and not ſufficient to turne away the warre. At laſt, the opinion of ſuch as gaue the beſt counſell had carried it, had not Dominicke Treuiſan, a Senator of great authoritie, and one of the Procurers of the rich Temple of S. Marke (an honor next to the dignitie of the Duke, of higheſt reſpect and reputation in the Commonweale of Venice) ſtood vp and counſelled the contrary: who with reaſons full of efficacie and authoritie, laboured to perſwade that it was an action contrary to the dignitie and profite of that renowmed and great Commonweale, to reſtore thoſe townes which the Pope required; for the coniunction or ſeparation of whom from the other Confederates, the eſtate of their dangers would neither much increaſe or diminiſh. For, albeit in the negociation of the accord they had vſed the Popes name, perhaps to make their cauſe ſeeme leſſe diſhoneſt, yet in effect they had agreed without him, and therefore in that reſpect they would not become the more ſlow or remiſſe in the execution of the things they had concluded: That on the contrary, the armes of the Pope were not of that valour and importance, as to be bought at ſo great a price; ſeeing that albeit they ſhould be aſſailed at one ſelfe time by the others, yet they might eaſily with a very ſlender garriſon defend thoſe Cities; which the regiments of the Church (according to the common prouerbe, the very diſhonour of ſouldiers) were not ſufficient to take of themſelues, nor import much as touching the ſubſtance of the warre: And that in the ſtirres and heates of temporall armes, men did litle reſpect either the reuerence or threatnings of armes ſpiritual, which they ought neither to feare, nor eſteeme them to be more able to hurt them in that war, then they had done in many others, namely in the expedition againſt Ferrara; in which the armes of the Church could not hinder them from obtaining a peace honourable for them, and infamous for the reſidue of Italy, which with one vniuerſall accord, and in a time wherein it flouriſhed moſt with riches, armes, and valour, was banded wholly againſt them. And iuſtly, for that it was not likely that the omnipotent God would ſuffer that the effects of his ſeueritie and of his mercie, of his anger and of his peace, ſhould be in the power of a man moſt ambitious and proud, ſubiect to wine and many other diſhoneſt pleaſures, who would vſe them as he ſhould be prouoked by his couetouſ-

neſſe, and not by the conſideration of iuſtice, or the benefite of Chriſtendome. Beſides that he ſaw not by what reaſon they might hope for a greater conſtancie of faith in this Pope then in others; nor how they might be aſſured, that the Pope hauing obtained Faenza and Rimini, would not ioyne with the reſidue to recouer Rauenna and Cerua, but that he would haue no more regard to faith giuen, then agreed with the cuſtome of other Popes; who, to giue a colour of iuſtice to thoſe things they did, had decreed amongſt their other lawes, that the Church, notwithſtanding all contract, promiſe and benefites receiued, might retract and directly impugne any bonds or obligations which the ſelfe Prelates had made: That the confederation betweene Maximilian and the French King had bene made with a great vehemencie of diſpoſition, but the wils and intentions of the other Confederates did vary and differ; for the King Catholike was brought in againſt his will; and touching the Pope, the ſignes of his accuſtomed doubts and ſuſpitions do manifeſtly appeare in him: And therefore the league of Cambray was no more to be feared, then the confederacie which the ſame Maximilian and King Lewis had with the ſame importunitie treated afore at Trent, and afterward at Blois: for that many difficulties, which for their nature it was almoſt impoſſible to remoue, did reſiſt the execution of the things determined: That for this reaſon it concerned the Senate principally to deuiſe meanes to ſeparate Caſar from ſuch a coniunction: a matter of eaſie hope and expectation, in reſpect of his nature and neceſſities, and for his ancient hatred againſt the French: And Maximilian being once deuided from it, the whole feare of the warre was taken away, for that the French king ſtanding abandoned of his ſuccours, durſt no more aſſaile them then he had done in times paſt: That in all publike actions, the beginnings ought diligently to be conſidered; ſince afterwards it is not in the power of men, without great diſhonour and danger to depart from their firſt deliberations, wherein they had long perſeuered: That as their elders, ſo they by ſucceſſion, had bene alwayes carefull in all occaſions to augment their dominion, with an open profeſſion to aſpire dayly to greater things: a matter which made them hatefull to all men, partly for feare, and partly for griefe for that they had taken from them: and albeit it was perceiued long time before, that that hatred might ingender ſome great alteration, yet they had not for all that forborne to embrace the occaſions that had bene offered them; and that it was not now a remedie to the dangers preſent, to begin to leaue a part of that they did poſſeſſe, ſince that would rather kindle then quench the humors of thoſe that hated them, who would take courage by their fearfulneſſe: And ſeeing it hath bene an old Maxime throughout all Italy, that the Venetians neuer forſooke things that once were fallen into their hands, who ſees not, that now ſo cowardly to do the contrary, ſhould proceed of a laſt deſpaire to be able to defend themſelues from the perils imminent? That whenſoeuer men began to giue place, and leaue any thing how litle ſoeuer, the reputation and ancient honour of Commonweales began to decline; which being done, that dangers would greatly increaſe: and that it is without compariſon farre more hard to him that hath begun to decline, to conſerue againſt the leaſt perils that be, that which remaines, then vnto him, who ſtriuing to keepe his dignitie and degree, conuerts his force readily (without making any ſhew of yeelding) againſt him that ſeekes to oppreſſe him: That it was neceſſary thē, either to reiect valiantly thoſe firſt demands, or in yeelding to thē, to look to yeeld to many more, by which in ſhort time is to be expected the abſolute ſubuerſion of their Eſtate, and by conſequent the irreparable loſſe of their proper libertie: That their Commonweale, both in the times of their fathers, and in their days, had borne out many great warres againſt the Princes of Chriſtendom, of which they had caried a glorious iſſue, for ỳ they had always ſhewed themſelues conſtant and reſolute: That they ought in the preſent difficulties, notwithſtanding they ſhould ſeeme greater, to expect no worſe ſucceſſe, for that both their power and authoritie were greater; and in warres managed in common by many Princes againſt one alone, the terrors are wont to be more then the effects; for that the firſt furie is ſoone abated, and diuerſitie of opinion ſpringing vp among them, breedeth diſtruſt: That the Senate was to hope, that beſides the preparations and remedies which of their owne power they were able to furniſh, God the moſt ſoueraigne and righteous Iudge, would not leaue abandoned a Commonweale bred and nouriſhed in a perpetuall libertie, and which was the ornament and ſplendor of all Europe; and much leſſe would ſuffer to be oppreſſed by the ambition of Princes (vnder a falſe colour to prepare warre againſt the Infidels) that Citie, which in ſo great pietie and religion, had bene for many yeares the very defence and bulwarke of all Chriſtendome. The words of Dominicke Treuiſan uiſan ſo wrought in the minds of the moſt part, that (as ſome yeares before it was in a maner fatall in that Senate) the worſt counſell preuailed, contrary to the opinions of many Senators of greateſt wiſedome and authoritie. Therefore the Pope, who had deferred the ratification till the laſt day, ratified the league, but vnder this expreſſe declaration, that he would not enter into any action of an enemie againſt the Venetians, vntill the French King had begun the warre. The Pope ratifieth the treaty of Cambray.

Thus the yeare 1508 ended with many ſeeds of great warres, at which time the affaires of the Piſans were brought into hard termes, and did daily diuolue into greater ſtraits. For, beſides that the Florentines the Sommer before, had cut downe their corne, and with their men at armes made continuall incurſions vpon the townes adioyning, euen to the gates of Piſa; the better to cut off all paſſage of victuals by ſea, they entertained into their pay the ſonne of Bardel of Portouenere with certaine ſhips: by which impediment, the Piſans ſtanding as it were beſieged both by ſea and land, and not able by reaſon of their pouertie to refurniſh themſelues either with veſſels or forrein ſouldiers, found themſelues in great deſpaire to hold out any longer, being very weakly ſuccoured by their neighbours: for which things the Genowayes and Lucquoys being moued, determined to conuey into Piſa certaine quantities of corne; the which being fraughted in a great number of barks, and accompanied with two ſhips of Genes, and two gallions, was tranſported into Spetia, and from thence to Vioreggia, to the end it might be conueyed into Piſa with fourteene brigantines, and certaine ſmall barks, according to the direction of the Piſans. But the Florentines ſeeking to oppoſe againſt this enterpriſe, as a matter wherein conſiſted their hope or deſpaire to get Piſa that yeare, they ioyned to the nauie they had alreadie, a ſhip of England, riding by chance in the roade of Liuorne, with certaine other foiſts and brigantines. And to helpe the nauie at ſea as much as they could with the preparations made by land, they ſent all the horſemen, with a great number of footmen which were haſtily leuied in the countrey, along all thoſe paſſages and ſhores by the which the nauie of the enemie might runne the courſe of Piſa, either by the mouth of Arne, or the riuer called the dead floud entring into Arne. The enemies arriued at the mouth of Arne, and the Florentine veſſels lying betweene that mouth and the dead riuer, and the land-men commanding all the apt places, had planted their artilleries as well on this ſide as beyond the brinke of the riuer by the which they ſhould paſſe: in ſo much as they ſeeing no poſſibilitie to paſſe further, retired into the riuer of Genes, with the loſſe of three brigantines laden with wheate. By reaſon of which ſucceſſe, the victory ſeeming almoſt certaine for the want of victuals, the Florentines to take away all oportunities for victuals to enter by the riuer, made a bridge of wood vpon Arne, which they fortified with baſtions on the bankes on both ſides: and at the ſame time, to depriue them of the ſuccour of their neighbours, they compounded with them of Lucques. For, hauing afore time, to repreſſe their inſolencies, ſent part of their footbands that were within Caſcina, to ſacke the hauen of Vioregge and the ſtore-houſes, wherein were many ſorts of ſilkes belonging to the merchants of Lucques, the inhabitants of Lucques being hereby terrified, ſent Embaſſadours to Florence, where at laſt it was accorded, That betweene both thoſe Commonweales, there ſhould be a confederation defenſiue for three yeares, the Lucquois being expreſly excluded from all power any more to ſiccour the Piſans. This confederation to be continued for twelue yeares further, if the Florentines ſhould recouer Piſa within a yeare: and that during the terme of this league, the Florentines (alway referuing the prerogatiue of their rights) ſhould not moleſt the eſtate of Lucques, touching the poſſeſſion of Pietraſancta and Mutron. But that which was of greateſt importance to make eaſie the conqueſt of Piſa, was the capitulation which they made with the Kings of Aragon and France, which being ſolicited many moneths, had ſuffered many difficulties; the Florentines, by the experience of things paſt, fearing leſt it ſhould be a meanes to draw from them a great quantitie of money, and yet the affaires of Piſa to continue in the ſame degree: and on the other part, the French King interpreting that they deferred cunningly, in hope that the Piſans would make a willing reſtitution, their extremities being now well knowne to all men, and being vnwilling that they ſhould recouer it, vnleſſe he did communicate in the price, he commanded Bardel his ſubiect to leaue their pay, and to Monſieur de Chaumont to diſpatch from Millan ſixe hundred Lances for the ſuccours of the Piſans: by which occaſion all doubts and difficulties ceaſſing, they agreed in this maner: That the French King and ſ King of Aragon ſhould giue no aide or ſupport to the Piſans, and ſhould forbid, that from no places of their ſubiection and obedience, nor likewiſe from any their confederates or others vnder their protection, ſhould enter into A continuation of the warres of Piſa. Contract betweene the French King, king of Spaine and the Florentines.

into Piſa any ſuccors of victuals, money, munition or men, or any other nature of reliefe whatſoeuer: That the Florentines if they recouered Piſa within a yeare following, ſhould pay to either of them within a certaine time fiftie thouſand duckats: And that there ſhould continue between them a league for three yeares, from the day that they recouered Piſa: in conſideration of which league the Florentines ſhould be bound to defend with three hundred men at armes the Eſtates that they held in Italy, receiuing in like ſort for their defence, of either of them a proportion of three hundred men at armes at the leaſt. To this capitulation made in common, it was neceſſary for the Florentines to adde (without the priuitie of the King Catholike) new bonds to pay to the French King vnder the ſame conditions and termes, fiftie thouſand duckats more, promiſing withall fiue and twentie thouſand to the officers of both the Kings, of which the greateſt portion was to be diſtributed at the diſcretion of the Cardinall of Amboiſe. Theſe couenants albeit they were very coſtly to the Florentines, yet, in the opinion of men, they brought greater infamy to both the Kings: the one for money abandoning that Citie which many times he had aſſured to be in his protection, and which (as was afterward well knowne) had willingly offered themſelues to him, the Great Captaine accepting them in his name: and the other contrary to the reputation of ſo many promiſes made to the Florentines, either ſelling for a vile price & iuſt libertie of the Piſans, or conſtraining the Florentines to buy of him libertie and ſufferance to recouer that which iuſtly appertained to them: ſo mightie now adayes is the force of gold and ſiluer, aboue the regard to honeſtie. But the affaires of the Piſans, vpon whom all Italy was wont afore to turne their eyes, were now of ſlender conſideration, for that the minds of men depended on the expectation of greater things. For, after the league of Cambray was ratified by all the Confederates, the French King began to make great preparations: and albeit he vſed not as yet any proteſtations or threats of warre, yet matters being no longer able to be diſſembled, the Cardinall of Amboiſe in the preſence of the whole Councell, complained with vehement words to the Embaſſadour of Venice, that that Senate, deſpiſing the alliance and amitie of the King, cauſed to fortifie the Abbey of Cerreta in the territorie of Crema, wherein had bene of old time a Caſtle, which was razed by the capitulations of peace made in the yeare 1454, betweene the Venetians and Francis Sforce then Duke of Millan, with couenant that the Venetians ſhould neuer make any fortreſſe there: to the capitulations of which peace, was referred in this and many other things, the peace made betweene them and the King. But now the King being within few dayes after come to Lions, his regiments marched towards the mounts, and ſixe thouſand Swiſſers entertained by him, prepared to deſcend at the ſame time into Italy: and making vſe as well of the forces of others as of his owne, he obtained of the Genoways foure Carricks, and of the Florentines fiftie thouſand duckats, being his moytie which they ſhould pay vpon the conqueſt of Piſa: and thoſe of the Duchie of Millan (deſirous to repoſſeſſe the townes which the Venetians held) gaue him an hundred thouſand duckats; and many Gentlemen alſo & free-holders of that State, furniſhed themſelues with horſes and armes, to accompanie the King with a braue traine.

On the other ſide, the Venetians prepared with a reſolute courage to receiue and ſuſtaine ſo great a warre, labouring with money, with authoritie, and with the whole might of their Seignorie to leuie prouiſions worthy of ſo great a Commonweale: wherein they were ſo much the more diligent, by how much it ſeemed likely, that if they ſuſtained the firſt brunt or furie, the league of theſe Princes, ſo ill compoſed, would eaſily decline or diſſolue. In which actions (to the great glorie of that Senate) was ſeene as great courage in thoſe that afore had counſelled in vain to gouerne their good fortune modeſtly, as in thoſe which had bene authors of the contrary: for that preferring publike ſafetie afore priuate ambition, they ſought not to increaſe their authoritie, but in reprouing the ill counſels of others, looked after remedies againſt the perils hapned by their indiſcretion. And yet conſidering that almoſt all the regions of Chriſtendome were banded againſt them, they employed all their wits to breake ſo great a league, repenting now that they had ſo lightly reiected the occaſion to deuide the Pope from the reſt, ſpecially for the hope they had that he would not haue ſtirred, if onely they had made reſtitution of Faenza. Therefore they renewed with him the firſt negociation, and withall diſpatched meſſengers to Ceſar and the King Catholike; forbearing to make any practiſe with the French King, either for hatred, or for that they had no hope to preuaile with him. But the Pope had no power now to accept that which he deſired afore: and the King Catholike, though haply he had no want of will, yet was he vnable to diſſwade the reſidue: and Ceſar poſſeſſed with vnmeaſurable hatred

againſt the Venetian name, would not only not agree, but alſo diſdained to heare their offers, refuſing to ſee Iohn Peter Stella their Secretarie, whom they had ſent to him with very large commiſſions. All their thoughts then being diſpoſed to defend themſelues by armes, they entertained from all parts a great number of horſemen and footmen, and armed many veſſels to guard the ſhores of Romagna and the townes of Powilla, and to thruſt into the lake of Guarda, and riuer of Po, with other neighbouring places, by the which they feared to be moleſted by the Duke of Ferrara and Marquis of Mantua. But beſides the threats of men, they were troubled and aſtoniſhed with many aduentures that happened, either fatall or accidentall: for, a ſmall barke which they had ſent to tranſport money to Rauenna, was drowned with ten thouſand duckats: the Caſtle of Breſſe was ſtriken with a thunderbolt: and the houſe where lay the Charters of their Commonweale, called the Archiuio, fell ſuddenly to the ground with a wonderfull ruine. But that which moſt filled them with feare and perplexitie, was, that at the ſame time, and in the very houre that the great Councell aſſembled, a fire kindled, either by chance, or by ſome ſecret treaſon, in their ſtore-houſe called the Arſenall, in the roome where was their ſaltpeter, which burſt out with ſuch furie, that notwithſtanding the concourſe of men labouring with an vniuerſall diligence to quench it, yet, what by the force of the wind, and nature of the matter, proper to nourith and increaſe fire, it conſumed to aſhes twelue bodies of gallies, with a wonderfull quantitie of munitions. This alſo was added to their difficulties, that hauing entertained Iulio and Ranſe Vrſins, and Troilo Sauello with fiue hundred men at armes and three thouſand footmen, the Pope with ſeuere commandements (as being ſubiects of the Church) compelled them not to depart out of the towne of Rome, perſwading them to retaine ſtill the fifteene thouſand duckats which they had receiued in preſt for their payes, with promiſe to abate ſo much of the debts which the Venetians ought to the ſea Apoſtolike, for the fruites which they had receiued of the townes of Romagna. The chiefe care of the Venetians was to prepare and make themſelues ſtrong on that ſide by the which the French King was to make his enterpriſe, but they heard not of him either ſo ſoone as they expected, or ſo mightily as the opinion went: for that from the King of Aragon, notwithſtanding he had made great promiſes to the other Confederates, appeared only bruites and demonſtrations, according to his cuſtome, making no preparation of any conſequence. And Ceſar being gone into Flanders to induce the ſubiects of his ſonne in law to make ſome contribution of money, it was beleeued that he could not begin the warre ſo ſoone as he had promiſed. Beſides, it was ſuppoſed that the Pope hoping more in the victorie of others, then in his owne ſtrength, would be gouerned according to the proceedings of the Confederates. It was not doubted that the French King would make his firſt action vpon Guiaradadda, paſſing the riuer of Adda neare Caſcina, and therefore the Venetian armie aſſembled at Pontuico vpon the riuer of Oglia, the Count Petillane being their Generall, and Bartlemew Aluiano gouernour; and Commiſſioners in the name of the Senate, George Cornaro and Andrew Gritti, renowmed Gentlemen, and very honourable, as well for their ordinary qualities, as for the glorie they had gotten the yeare before, the one returning victorious from Friul, and the other for expulſing the Almaines from Rouera: who debating among themſelues in what ſort the warre ſhould be managed, the opinions were diuers, not onely in generall, but alſo particularly betweene the Generall and the Gouernour: for, Aluiano being of a mind ſtirring, and made proud by his fortunes of the yeare before, apt to embrace occaſions, and of a wonderfull celeritie both to conſult and execute, perſwaded, that to plant rather the bodie of the warre in the countrey of the enemie, then to expect till it were transferred to their territories, it were good to make an inuaſion vpon the Duchie of Millan before the French paſſed into Italy. But the Count Petillane, either for that the reſolution of his mind was abated by age (as Aluiano ſaid,) or by his long experience, conſidering with a deeper diſcretion the dangers that might happen, and not willing to tempt fortune without a manifeſt hope of victorie, gaue this counſell, that deſpiſing the loſſe of the townes of Guiaradadda, which imported not much for the effect of the warre, the armie might incampe neare the towne of Orci, according to the examples of Francis Carmignole and Iames Piccinin, famous Captaines of their time; alledging that the place was ſtrong, hauing his ſituation betweene the riuers of Oglia and Seria, and of ſingular oportunitie to ſuccour all the townes of the iuriſdiction of Venice; for that if the French men charged them in ſuch a place, they need not doubt of an aſſured victorie, the oportunitie of the place miniſtring much to the action: and if they incamped at Cremona, at Crema, at Bergama, or at Breſſe, they might (for the de-defence of thoſe cities) draw neare with the armie into a place of ſuretie, and with ſo great a number of light horſemen and eſtradiots, cut off their victuals and other commodities, which would let them for taking any place of importance; and by this meanes, without putting themſelues in the power of fortune, the ſtate of Venice might be eaſily defended againſt ſo mightie a preparation of the French King. Of theſe counſels, neither the one nor the other was approued of the Senate: that of Aluiano as too aduenturous and raſh, and that of the Generall as too fearfull, and without conſideration of the dangers preſent. For the Senate could haue bene contented, according to the ancient cuſtome of that Commonweale, that they had proceeded ſurely, and aduentured as litle as they could: but they conſidered on the other ſide, that if at the ſame time when almoſt all their forces were occupied to make head againſt the French king, Ceſar ſhould make any mightie inuaſion vpon their Eſtate, with what armies, with what Captaines, or with what bands of ſouldiers they could oppoſe againſt him. In which regard, that way which of it ſelfe ſeemed moſt ſure and moſt certaine, remained the moſt vncertaine and moſt dangerous: and therefore, as it often hapneth in contrary opinions, they made election of the meane, determining to draw the armie neare the riuer of Adda, not to leaue Guiaradadda in prey, to the enemies, but with expreſſe commandement from the Senate, not to come to hand ſtrokes with the enemie without a great hope, or vrgent neceſſitie. But farre otherwiſe was the reſolution of the French King, who deſired to find out the enemie, and giue him battell: and coming accompanied with the Duke of Loraine and all the Nobilitie of France, ſent his Herald Montioy (as ſoone as he was paſſed the Mounts) to denounce warre to the Senate of Venice, charging him to make publication to the Magiſtrates of Venice, as he paſſed by Cremona, to the end the Senate might the rather take ſignification. And albeit, all his armie being not yet aſſembled, he had determined to do nothing till he were arriued in perſon at Caſcina; yet, either to ſatisfie the Pope, who complained that the time ſet downe in the capitulation was paſſed; or elſe to haſten the time for Ceſar, who was bound to enter into the warre fortie dayes after the French King had begun, he changed his firſt reſolution, and commanded Monſieur de Chaumont to begin the warre: at which time the regiments of the Venetians expecting their full aſſemblies, were not yet departed from Pontuico.

The firſt beginning to ſo great a warre was made the fifteenth day of Aprill 1509, vpon which day Monſieur de Chaumont with three thouſand horſemen paſſed the foord of Adda neare Caſcina, conueying by boates ſixe thouſand footmen, and the artilleries: from thence he marched to the towne of Treuie, which is within three miles of Caſcina, wherein were Iuſtinian Moroſin gouernour of the Venetian eſtradiots, and Vitelli de citta de Caſtello, with Vincent de Naldo, who diſpoſed of the footmen which were to be diſtributed amongſt the townes thereabouts, who beleeuing that thoſe French bands which lay diſperſed in many places in the countrey, were not men appointed to aſſaile the towne, but to make incurſions into the countrey, ſent out two hundred footmen with certaine eſtradiots, with whom part of the French footmen entertaining the skirmiſh, followed the chaſe euen to the fortreſſe of the gate; and the reſt following a litle after, and the artillerie being planted, as they had began to batter the defences with certaine Falconets, either the cowardiſe of the Captaines, being aſtoniſhed with ſo ſudden and vnexpected an aſſault, or the mutinie of the multitudes in the towne, conſtrained them to yeeld wholly to the diſcretion of Monſieur de Chaumont, to whom in this firſt fortune were made priſoners Iuſtinian, Vitelli, and Vincent, and many others; with an hundred light horſemen and a thouſand footmen, almoſt all of the vale de Mona; onely two hundred eſtradiots ſaued themſelues by flying. After this good beginning Monſieur de Chaumont, conquering alſo certaine places adioyning, repaſſed with all his people ouer the riuer of Adda. The ſame day the Marquis of Mantua, to whom the King had committed an hundred Lances, ranne vp to Caſalmaior, which without any reſiſtance was rendered to him by the inhabitants, together with Lewis Bonne, magiſtrate for the Venetians. The ſame day in like ſort Roccabertin with an hundred and fiftie Lances and three thouſand footmen, paſſing ouer vpon a bridge made of boates where Adda entreth into Po, made roads vpon the townes of Cremona, as did alſo in another part of the ſame countrey the ſouldiers of the garriſon of Lodi, building a bridge vpon Adda: and all the paiſants of the mountaine of Brianſa made incurſions euen to Bergama, ioyning to ſo common a fauour of fortune, an vniuerſall readineſſe and reſolution of mind. The which aſſault performed in one day in fiue ſeuerall places, the enemies preſenting no reſiſtance, bare more bruite then matter of effect, fect, both for that Monſieur de Chaumont retired immediatly to Millan to abide the Kings comming, & alſo the Marquis of Mantua, who after the enterpriſe of Caſalmaior had executed a vaine attempt vpon Aſola, abandoned Caſalmaior, hearing that Aluiano was paſſed ouer the riuer of Oglio at Pontmolaro. The Pope ſeeing ſuch a beginning giuen to the warre, ſuddenly publiſhed in forme of admonition a horrible Bull, wherein were declared all the vſurpations made by the Venetians vpon the townes appertaining to the ſea Apoſtolike, & the authoritie which they had attributed to themſelues, to the preiudice of the Eccleſiaſtike libertie and iuriſdiction of Popes, both in diſpoſing Biſhopricks and other benefices vacant, in handling ſpirituall cauſes in ſecular Courts, and other matters belonging to the iudgement of the Church, and all other diſobediences paſt. Beſides theſe declarations, it was not forgotten, that not long ſince, to trouble Bologna to the preiudice of the Church, they had called to Faenza the Bentiuoleis, who were rebels to the Church, & ſubiect as well as thoſe that receiued thē, to great cenſures: and he admoniſhed them to make reſtitution within foure and twentie dayes next following, of all thoſe townes of the Church which they occupied, with all the fruites they had receiued ſince the time of their poſſeſſion, vnder paine (in caſe of diſobedience) that not only the Citie of Venice, and all the towns of their obedience, but alſo all ſuch, as being not ſubiects to their iuriſdiction, ſhould receiue any of the Venetians, ſhould incurre the cenſures and interdictions; declaring them attainted of high treaſon, and accounted as perpetuall enemies to all Chriſtians, to whom he gaue power to take their goods where they were found, and to make their perſons ſlaues. Againſt this Bull, not many dayes after, was brought into the towne of Rome, by men vnknowne, a writing in the name of the Duke and Magiſtrates of Venice, wherein, after a long and bitter narration againſt the Pope and the French King, was expreſſed an appeale from the admonition to the next Councell, and for want of humane iuſtice, to the tribunall of Ieſus Chriſt the moſt righteous and ſoueraigne Iudge. At this time temporall threats being ioyned to the ſpirituall admonition, the Herald Montioy arriued at Venice, who being brought afore the preſence of the Duke and Senate, denounced in the name of the French King, the warre already begun, charging them to haue giuen many occaſions more apparent then true or iuſt. To which propoſition the Duke, after ſome conſulting with the Senate, anſwered in few words, That ſince the King his maiſter was determined to make warre vpon them, in a time when they hoped moſt for the obſeruation of the alliance which they had neuer violated, and for not breaking of it, had made Caſar their enemie, they would ſtand vpon their defence, which they hoped to be able to do with their forces, accompanied with the iuſtice of their cauſe. This anſwer ſeemed more to reſemble the dignitie of their Commonweale, then if they had vſed iuſtifications and complaints, to one that had already aſſailed them with armes. But when the Venetian armie was aſſembled at Pontuico, wherein were two thouſand men at armes, three thouſand light horſemen and eſtradiots, fifteene thouſand footmen choſen out of all Italy, and indeed the very flower of the ſouldiers of Italy, no leſſe for the valour of the footmen, then for the experience of the leaders, and fifteene thouſand other footmen of choiſe, of the appointment of their countreys, accompanied with great quantities of artillerie, they marched to Fontenella, a towne within ſixe miles of Lodi, a retraite very commodious to ſuccour Cremona, Crema, Caruage, and Bergama: where iudging that they had a good occaſion, for the retraite of Monſieur de Chaumont beyond Adda, to recouer Treuie, the Kings armie withall being not yet aſſembled, they tooke the fields, following the deliberation of the Senate, but againſt the counſell of Aluiano, (as he himſelfe aſſured afterward) who ſaid, they were counſels almoſt repugnant, to forbid to fight with the enemie, and yet to draw ſo neare them, ſeeing haply it might either not be in their power to retire, or if they did, it would be with ſuch diminution of their reputation as was hurtfull to the ſubſtance of the whole warre: in which regard, and as well for his particular honor, as for the common reſpect of the men of wat of Italy, he had rather chooſe to die, then giue his conſent to ſo great an infamie. The firſt towne the armie tooke was Riuolte, where the French had left no garriſon, and hauing put into it fiftie horſe and three hundred footmen, they drew neare to Treuie, a towne very neare the riuer of Adda, hauing his ſituation ſomewhat eminent, and wherein Monſieur de Chaumont had left fiftie Lances and a thouſand footmen, vnder Captaine Imbault, Frontalle Gaſcon, and the White Knight. The artilleries were planted on that ſide to Caſcina, where the wall was weakeſt, and making great execution, ſuch as were within yeelded the day following, the ſouldiers ſaued, but without armes, the Captaines remaining priſoners, and the towne wholly at the diſcretion of the victors; which was presently put to the sacke, but with greater domage to the victors, then to those that were vanquished: for that the French King vnderstanding that the campe of the enemie was before Treuie, supposing that if that place should be lost almost in his sight, it would bring great diminution to his reputation, he aduanced his armie, and with a speed according to the necessitie of the perill, marched from Millan to rescue it; and arriuing the day after the execution of Treuie (which was the ninth day of May) at the riuer neare Casena, where were made before for the oportunitie of Casena without impediment, three bridges of barkes, he passed with his whole armie, his enemies making no countenance to resist him: all men maruelling that they idly lost so faire an occasion to set vpon the former part of his armie, which was passed: and Triuulce, when he saw the whole armie passe without resistance, crying to the French King, This day, most Christian King, the victorie is ours. Neuertheless it is certaine, that the Venetian Captaines both discerned the benefite of the occasion, and would haue vsed it, sauing it was not in their power, neither by authoritie, nor by petition, nor with threats, to draw out of Treuie the souldiers occupied in pillage and prey: in which disorder, Aluiano, when there was no other meanes, set the towne on fire to compell them to issue; but this remedie was too slow and late, for that the French with great ioy were already passed, scorning the cowardise and wretched counsell of the enemie.

The King encamped within litle more then a mile of the Venetians, who lay in a place somewhat raised, and bearing such strength as well by the oportunitie of his seate, as by the rampiers and trenches they had cast, that there was no possibilitie to set vpon them without manifest perill. But as they drew to deliberation in what maner they should proceed, many that were of the Kings Councell, and perswaded to expect a litle the descending of Cæsar, were of opinion that they should proceed slowly, for that in feates of armes the condition of him that expect to be assailed, being better then he that seekes to set on another, necessitie would compell the Venetian Captaines to offer battell, seeing they had no meanes to be able to defend their iurisdiction in so many places: a perswasion contrary to the opinion of the King, who desired nothing more then to fight in a place, whose situation was not aboue the valour of the champions; being moued hereunto either for feare that Cæsar would aduance too slowly, or else for that being there in person with all the forces of his kingdome, he had not onely great hope of the victorie, but also iudged it much to his dishonour, if he put not an end to the warre of himselfe without the aide of others: and on the contrary he iudged it a matter of great glorie, if by his power and vertue the residue of the confederates might come to communicate no lesse then himselfe in the reward of the victorie. On the other side, the Senate and Captaines of Venice, being not vnaduised in their counsels for any feare they had of Cæsar, determined not to put themselues into places equall both for themselues and their enemie, but shifting alwayes into places of strength, they sought at one time both to eschue the necessitie to fight, and to keepe the French King from doing any thing of importance. With these deliberations, neither of the armies made any mouing, but stood encamped a whole day the one in the face of the other: and although there were many skirmishes among the light horsemen, and that the French by aduancing their artillerie, sought occasion to fight, yet there was nothing else done. The day after, the King remoued towards Riuolta, to trie whether a desire to keepe that place would cause the Italians to moue: who, not stirring, to obtaine at the least a secret confession that they had no stomacke to accept the battell, the King stood foure long houres afore their lodgings with his whole army ranged in battell, the Venetians doing no other thing then moue and shew themselues in the front of the French men in good order, without abandoning their trench. At this time the artillerie being drawne by part of the Kings souldiers to the wals of Riuolta, the place was forced and taken in few houres, where the King lodged that night with all his armie, being not a litle troubled in his mind with the maner of proceeding of the enemies, whose counsels he praised so much the more, by how much they discontented him. But to draw them by necessitie to that whereunto they bare a will estranged, after he had remained a whole day at Riuolta, and set fire on the place afore he departed, he remoued his campe to lodge at Vailo, or at Pandin the night following, hoping by the oportunitie of these places easily to giue impediment to the victuals coming from Cremona and Crema, and by that meanes to put them in necessitie to leaue abandoned their lodgings, wherein they had remained to that houre. The Venetian Captaines saw what were the intentions of the King, and did not doubt that it would be necessarie to take a place ſtrong and neare the enemie, to keepe them in the ſame difficulties and impediments: but the Count Petillane counſelled to deferre the mouing of the campe till the day following; notwithſtanding Aluiano made ſo great an inſtance to the contrary, alledging how neceſſarie it were to preuent them, that in the end it was agreed to remoue ſuddenly. There were two wayes to leade to the ſaid places, the one lower neare to the riuer of Adda, but more long and full of turnings; the other farther from the riuer, but more ſhort, and more ſtraight, the one making the ſtring, and the other the bow, as the ſaying runnes. The lower way was taken by the Kings armie, which contained more then two thouſand Lances, ſixe thouſand Swiſſers, and twelue thouſand Gaſcoines and Italians, well furniſhed with artillerie, and a ſufficient prouiſion of Pioners. The Venetian armie marched by the higher way vpon the right hand towards the enemie; in it were two thouſand men at armes, more then twentie thouſand footmen, with a great number of light horſemen, partly Italians, and partly drawne out of Greece, who ranne before, but forbare to enlarge and ſpread themſelues according to their cuſtome, the buſhes and ſhrubs, whereof the countrey betweene both the armies was full, being their impediments, which ſo ſhadowed both the armies, that they could not ſee one another. Now marching in this order, & the Venetians alwayes aduancing, there drew neare together in one time the French vantguard cõtaining fiue hundred Lances & the Swiſſers, led by Charles d'Amboiſe and Iohn Iaques Triuulce; and the reuregard of the Venetians, gouerned by Bartlemew Aluiano, wherein were eight hundred men at armes, and almoſt all the flower of the footmen of the armie, not marching in any good order, Aluiano not thinking that battell would be offered that day. But when he ſaw himſelfe ſo neare his enemies, what by the renouation of his ancient valor, and that he was brought into ſuch extremitie of place that he was compelled to fight, he gaue preſent aduertiſement to the Count Petillano, leading the other part of the armie before, of his neceſſitie or rather his reſolution, demanding his ſuccours. The Count returned anſwer, that he ſhould continue his marching, and eſchue the fight, the reaſons of warre ſo requiring, and the reſolution of the Senate agreeing. But in the meane while, Aluiano hauing beſtowed his footmen with ſixe peeces of artillerie vpon a litle trench made to ſtop the furie of a land-floud, which at that time being almoſt drie of water, paſſed between both the armies, he charged the enemies with ſuch courage and furie, that he compelled them to giue ground, wherein this miniſtred not a litle helpe to him, that the firſt charge was giuen amongſt certaine vines, by reaſon whereof the French horſemen were of litle vſe. But the battell of the French armie, wherein was the Kings perſon, being aduanced becauſe of this danger, the two firſt ſquadrons ioyned to charge the bands of Aluiano, who being entred into a great hope of the victorie for ſo happie a beginning, running now here, now there, encouraged his ſouldiers with vehement words. The battell was furious on all ſides, the French receiuing courage and comfort by the ſuccours of their companions, and for that the battell was drawne into an open place, where they might freely vſe their horſemen, wherein they were the ſtronger: beſides, the preſence of the King did much to ſtirre them, who bearing no more reſpect to his perſon, then if he had bene a priuate ſouldier, refuſed not to ſtand in the danger of the artillerie, not ceaſſing where he ſaw need, to command, to encourage, and to threaten. And on the other ſide, the Italian footmen, who were full of reſolution for their firſt felicitie, fought with great conſtancie of courage and valour, Aluiano forgetting nothing that belonged to the office of an excellent Captaine. At laſt, when they had fought very valiantly for the ſpace of three houres, the Venetian bands receiuing by the plainneſſe of the place great diſtreſſe by the French horſemen, and not being able withall to keepe firme footing for the raine that fell during the battell, which made the ground ſlipperie, but ſpecially for that they were not ſuccoured by the reſidue of the armie, they began to fight with great diſaduantage, and yet made reſiſtance with great courage; inſomuch as when they ſaw no hope to ouercome, they fought more to winne glorie then to ſaue themſelues, making the victorie bloudy to the French, and for a while doubtfull. But at laſt, being more depriued of ſtrength then of courage, without turning their backes to the enemie, they remained almoſt all dead vpon the place: amongſt whom was much eſteemed and lamented Captaine Peter, one of the Marquiſſes of the Mount S. Maria de Tuſcana, a Captaine of great exerciſe in leading of footmen in the warres of Piſa, when he liued in the pay of the Florentines, and now was one of the Colonels of the Venetian footmen. The honorable reſiſtance which this onely one part of the armie made, bred almoſt a generall opinion, that if the whole Venetian campe had entred the battell, they had carried the victorie. But the Count Petillane, with whom was the greateſt part of the armie, abſtained from armes, either for that (as he alledged) as he returned to enter battell, a ſquadron which was already put to flight, came ruſhing vpon him, or rather (ſuch was the bruite) ſtanding in no hope of the victorie, and no leſſe diſcontent that Aluiano, contrary to his direction, had aduentured to fight, he eſteemed it a counſell better aſſured, to keepe that part of the army reſerued, then to referre the whole to hazard for the raſhneſſe of another. In this battell periſhed very few men at armes, the whole ſlaughter falling vpon the Venetian footmen, whereof died (as ſome ſay) eight thouſand bodies, notwithſtanding others report that the number of the dead men on both parts, was not aboue ſix thouſand men. Bartlemew Aluiano remained priſoner, who being hurt in his eye, and hauing his face all bloudied and bruiſed, was led to the Kings pauillion. The reſidue of the armie not being followed in chaſe, found ſafetie in flying, loſing in all twenty peeces of great artillerie. This was the notable battell of Guiaradadda, or according to the opinion of ſome, the victorie of Vaile, which was fought the fourteenth day of May, in memorie whereof the King cauſed to be built in the very place where the battell was executed, a Chappel, which he honored with the name of S. Maria de la Victoria.

The taking of many townes by the French.

After the King had obtained ſo great a victorie, not willing to loſe by negligence the occaſion that had bene wonne with valour and fortune, he marched the day following to Carauage, where the towne being ſuddenly rendred by compoſition, he battered the Caſtle with artillerie, which alſo within foure and twentie houres yeelded to diſcretion. The Citie of Bergama gaue vp the day after, without abiding the coming of the armie, where after the King had left fiftie Lances and a thouſand footmen to batter the Caſtle, he drew towards Breſſia, but before he arriued there, the Caſtle of Bergama, after the cannon had executed a whole day, was rendered, vpon condition that Martin Georgio with the other Venetian Magiſtrates, ſhould be priſoners; for the King, not ſo much for hatred, as for hope to draw money, had determined not to accept any compoſition when the townes rendred, wherein the Gentlemen of Venice ſhould be compriſed. Now in the inhabitants of Breſſia remained no more that ancient diſpoſition with the which their elders in the warres with Philip Maria Viſcount, had ſuſtained a long and moſt grieuous ſiege to preſerue themſelues vnder the iuriſdiction of Venice, but being diſpoſed to yeeld to the French, partly for feare of their armes, and partly at the perſwaſion of the Count Iohn Franciſco de Cambara, a chiefe man of the Gibelin faction, they ſeiſed vpon the gates of the towne the day after the battell, oppoſing manifeſtly againſt George Cornaro, who being gone thither in great diligence, ſought to ſtrengthen the place with men. And beſides, the Venetian armie being approched the Citie, which was very much diminiſhed in numbers, not onely by the ſlaughter in the battell, but alſo for that many were volunrarily gone away, as it often happeneth in the like caſe; they reſpected nothing the authoritie and petitions of Andrew Gritti, who was entred into Breſſia to perſwade them to receiue a garriſon. Therfore the armie ſuppoſing no ſuretie in that place, marched towards Peſquiero, the Citie of Breſſia yeelding to the French King, and the Caſtle within two dayes after doing the like, vnder this condition, that ſuch as were within ſhould depart in ſafetie, except the Gentlemen of Venice. But when the newes of ſo great a calamitie was vnderſtood at Venice, it cannot be imagined, and much leſſe committed to writing, how much was the griefe and feare of euery one, and how much the minds of all the citizens were confuſed and amazed, who hauing not bene accuſtomed to feele ſuch aduerſities, but of the contrarie, had bene wont alwayes in other warres to carrie the victorie, ſet before their eyes the loſſe of their whole dominion, and the danger of the vtter ruine of their countrey, in ſtead of ſo great a glorie and puiſſance, by meanes whereof a few moneths before they had promiſed to themſelues no leſſe then the Imperie of all Italy. And in theſe dolours and miſerable demonſtrations of mind, they ranne crying and complaining from all parts of the Citie to the publicke Pallace, where the Senators taking counſell what to do in ſo great a calamitie, after they had long debated, the Councell brake vp ouercome with deſpaire: ſo weake and incertaine were the remedies, and ſo ſlender and almoſt none the hopes of their ſafetie; conſidering they had no other Captaines, nor other men to employ in their defence, then ſuch as remained of the ouerthrow, depriued of force and courage: and that the ſubiects of their generall dominion were inclined to rebellion, or at leaſt ſo eſtranged from ſuffering, that there remained no diſpoſition to put themſelues in further perill for their ſafetie: that the French King (no leſſe mightie for the greatneſſe of his armie, then inſolent for his late victorie) had a reſolution to follow the courſe of his happie happie fortune; at whoſe onely name all men were readie to yeeld: and if againſt him alone they were not able to make reſiſtance, what would be their condition when Ceſar ſhould arriue, whom they vnderſtood to be at hand, and to march with ſpeed, being drawne on by ſo great an occaſion? That from all parts they ſaw great dangers and cauſes of deſpaire, and very ſmall apparence of hope. And what aſſurance was there that in their proper Citie full of multitudes of men of warre, there would not ariſe ſome dangerous tumult, partly for a generall hatred againſt the Gentlemen, and partly for deſire of pillage? Now (which was the depth of all their feare) they eſteemed as already hapned, all the aduerſities which they coniectured might befall them; and yet encouraging themſelues as well as they could in ſo great a feare, they determined to vſe all diligence to reconcile themſelues in what ſort ſoeuer with the Pope, with Ceſar, and with the King Catholike, not thinking any way to appeaſe the mind of the French King, for that they diſtruſted him no leſſe for the hate which he bare them, then they feared his armes: and yet in the meane while not forgetting to looke to their defence, they ſtudied to furniſh themſelues with money, and gaue order to entertaine new bands: and for feare of the armie at ſea which was ſaid to be rigged at Genes, they deuiſed to increaſe their nauie to fiftie galleys commanded by Ange Treuiſan. But all their counſels were preuented by the celeritie of the French King, to whom ſince the conqueſt of Breſſia, was rendred the Citie of Cremona, the Caſtle holding good for the Venetians, the which, notwithſtanding it was ſtrong, had followed the example of the others, together with that of Piſqueton yeelding alſo in the ſame time, if the King had conſented that euery one might depart with ſafetie. But, for that there were within it many Gentlemen of Venice, and among others Zacharie Contarin, a man of great wealth and poſſeſſions, he would not receiue them but with condition to haue them in his power, and therefore he ſent an armie to keepe them beſieged. And the Venetian armie which decreaſed dayly, being incamped in the field of Mars neare Verona, for that they of Verona would not receiue them into their towne, the King went before Peſquiero to get the Caſtle, the towne being already rendred: and the artillery had not played any long time, but the Swiſſers and Gaſcoins entred with great furie through the ſmall breaches and ruines of the wall, making ſlaughter of about foure hundred footmen that were within, and tooke priſoner the Captain of the Caſtle, being likewiſe Captain of the towne, a Gentleman of Venice, who by the Kings commandement was hanged vpon the battlements of the ſame Caſtle: a crueltie which the King vſed for example ſake, that ſuch as defended the Caſtle of Cremona, induced by this puniſhment, might not continue in obſtinacie to the extremitie. Thus within fifteene dayes after the battell, the French King had conquered (except the Caſtle of Cremona) all that appertained to him by the deuiſion which was made at Cambray: a conqueſt very commodious for the Duchie of Millan, and which augmented the reuenues of the King more then two hundred thouſand duckats by the yeare. At this time, the armies of the Emperour hauing as yet appeared in no place, the Pope had aſſailed the townes of Romagna with foure hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen, and eight thouſand footmen, with the artillerie of the Duke of Ferrara, whom he had choſen Gonfalonnier of the Church, which is a title (according to the practiſe of our times) rather of dignitie then of authoritie: and had giuen the charge of this armie to Franciſco de Caſtello de Rie Cardinall of Pauie, bearing the name of Legate Apoſtolike, and to Francis Maria de la Rouera, ſonne to John his late brother; who, being adopted for ſonne by Guidobald Duke of Vrbin his vnkle by the mother ſide (the adoption being confirmed in the Conſiſtorie by the Popes authoritie) had ſucceeded the yeare before in that Duchie, the Duke of Vrbin being dead without other children. They ran with this armie from Ceſena towards Ceruia, and comming betweene Imola and Faenza, they tooke the towne of Solarola: and after they had bene certaine dayes at Baſtida, three miles from Faenza, they drew to Breſiquella, which is the capitall towne of the Vale of Lamona, wherein was newly entred John Paul Manfron with eight hundred footmen and certaine horſemen; who iſſuing out to fight, were trained into an ambuſh, and ſo hotly charged by John Paul Baillon and Lodowike de la Mirandola, Captaines of the armie Eccleſiaſtike, that as they would haue ſaued themſelues in the towne, the enemie entred pelmell with them, and that with ſuch furie, that Manfron being felled from his horſe, had ſcarce leiſure to retire to the Caſtle: afore the which the artillery being brought and planted, the munitions that were within were ſet on fire at the firſt blow: an accident that ſo terrified the defendants within, y they rendred the place abſolutely to the diſcretion of the victor. After the whole valley was taken, the armie deſcended into the plaine, and tooke

Barbarola with all the other townes of the countrey of Faenza; then they went and incamped before Russi, which is a borough ſituate betweene Faenza and Rauenna, but not eaſie to be taken, for that beſides it was enuironed with very large and deepe trenches, it was defended with ſixe hundred footmen forreiners: but that which made it more hard to be taken, was, that there was not in the Church armie, neither that counſell, nor that concord that was neceſſarie, notwithſtanding it abounded in ſtrength and forces, three thouſand Swiſſers payed by the Pope being there newly arriued. For this cauſe, albeit the Venetians were not ſtrong in Romagna, yet things had no great aduancement on that ſide: onely Iohn the Greeke Captaine of the eſtradiots iſſuing out of Rauenna with his bands, was broken and taken priſoner by Iohn Vitelli one of the Captaines of the Church: and at laſt, after they had remained ten dayes afore Russi, they tooke it by compoſition. And the victory of the King hapning in the ſame time, the Citie of Faenza, who ſtood now in her owne power, for that the Venetian ſtrength was already diminiſhed, agreed to acknowledge the Pope for their Lord, if they were not reſcued within fifteene dayes: by the benefite of which conuention there iſſued out of Faenza vnder the faith of the Legat, fiue hundred footmen of the Venetians, who were ſtripped by commandement of the Duke of Vrbin. The Citie of Rauenna did the like as ſoone as the armie approched. Thus, more by the reputation of the victorie of the French King, then by his proper forces, the Pope conquered in a litle time, thoſe townes which he had ſo long deſired in Romagna, where the Venetians held no other peece then the Caſtle of Rauenna, againſt whom, euer ſince the ouerthrow of their armie, they diſcouered dayly new enemies. For, the Duke of Ferrara, who till that day had not declared himſelfe, chaſed out of Ferrara the Vicedomino, a magiſtrate which the Venetians kept reſident there, according to the ancient conuentions, to miniſter equitie to the ſubiects: and taking armes, he recouered without impediment Poleſina de Rouigna, and ſunke with artilleries the Venetian Nauies floting vpon the riuer of Adice: and to the Marquis of Mantua were yeelded the townes of Aſola and Lunato, which the Venetians had taken in the warre they had againſt Philip Maria Viſcount, from Iohn Francis de Gonſagua his great grandfather. In Iſtria, Chriſtopher Frangipan occupied Piſinia and Diuinia: and the Duke of Brunſwike, who by Caſars commandement was entred into Friul with two thouſand men trained, tooke Feltro and Bellona; at whoſe comming, together with the bruite of the victorie of the French, Trieſta with the other townes (the conqueſt of which had bene the very welſpring and beginning of all the aduerſities of the Venetians) returned vnder the obedience of Caſar. In like ſort the Counts of Lodron occupied certain Caſtles and hamlets that were neare them; and the Biſhop of Trent vſurped Riua and Agreſta. But there was nothing that ſo much amazed the Venetians ſince the battell of Vaile, as the taking of the Caſtle of Peſquiero, whoſe ſtrength and ſituation, with other oportunities of the place, they ſuppoſed would haue ſtayed the furie of the victor.

Conqueſts of Maximilian vpon the Venetians.

The Venetians then ſtanding amazed amidſt ſo many perils, being fearefull that the King would paſſe further; and their condition being made ſo deſperate, that the feare that poſſeſſed them, left them no libertie of counſell; and their bands which were retired to Meſtre (amongſt whom was neither obedience nor order) being reduced to a very ſmall number; they determined (and haply too ſoone) to abandon the iuriſdiction of the firme land, to the end not to haue ſo many enemies, and no leſſe to take from the French King all occaſions to draw neare to Venice. For they were not without ſuſpition, that in that Citie would riſe ſome tumult, either by the people, or by the innumerable multitude of ſtrangers that dwelt there: theſe, for deſire of prey and pillage; the other, for that they being Citizens borne by long ſucceſſion of time in the ſame Citie, and moſt of them of the ſame bloud and families, would not endure the depriuation of honours, and to be in all things in a maner ſubiect to the Gentlemen. And in ſo great a deſpaire and loſſe of courage, this reaſon was alledged in the Senate, that if willingly they abandoned the gouernment to eſchue the euils preſent, they ſhould eaſily recouer it with the returne of a better fortune: for that the peoples that had bene willingly ſeparate from them, would not make ſo ſtrong reſiſtance to returne eftſoones vnder the obedience of their ancient Lords, as they would do if they had openly rebelled. For theſe reaſons the magnanimity of the Venetians being troden vnder foote, together with the reputation of ſo glorious a Commonweale, they were content to keepe to themſelues the ſalt waters onely, addreſſing to the magiſtrates and officers that were in Padua, Verona, and all the other townes deſtinated to Maximilian, directions to returne with ſpeed, and leaue the townes to the deuotion of the peoples. And beſides this, to the end to obtaine peace with Maximilian vnder what conditions soeuer, they sent to him with diligence their Embassadour Iustinian, who being admitted to his presence in publike audience, spake very pitifully and with great submission, but in vaine, for that Cæsar denied to make any contract without the priuitie of the French King. But the better to make knowne how much the Commonweale of Venice was humbled and abated of courage, not feeling the like aduersities in two hundred yeares before, it cannot be impertinent to expresse here the selfe Oration which their Embassadour vttered afore Cæsar; onely turning the Latine words into our vulgar tongue: the tenor whereof is as followeth.

The Oration of Anth. Iustinian to Cæsar.

It is most certaine and true (most puissant Cæsar) that the ancient Philosophers and wise men of those times, were not deceiued when they affirmed, that the true, firme, eternall and immortall glorie, was for a man to conquer himselfe: an action which they preferred aboue all kingdomes, trophees and triumphs. For this vertue Scipio (so much renowmed for his many victories) carried more reputation, then for subduing Afrike, or vanquishing Carthage. Hath not this same vertue immortalized Alexander the Great, when Darius, being ouerthrowne by him in a mightie battell, besought the immortall Gods to preserue his kingdome, but if they had otherwise decreed, that he might haue no other successor then so gentle an enemie, and so gracious a conquerer? Cæsar the Dictator, of whom you beare the surname, and communicate in his fortunes, as well as in his liberalities, clemencies, and other vertues, was he not worthily numbred among the gods, for that he remitted, released, and pardoned? Lastly, the Senate and people of Rome, the daunter of the whole world, whose imperie in earth is onely in you, and whose maiestie and greatnesse is seene in your person, hath it not brought more peoples and prouinces vnder their subiection by clemencie, equitie and mildnesse, then with armes and warre? And seeing it is thus, it shall not be numbred amongst the least of your praises, if your Maiestie, in whose hands stands the victorie gotten ouer the Venetians, looking into the frailtie of worldly things, shall vse it with moderation, and incline rather to the deuices and studies of peace, then to the doubtfull euents of warre. For touching the inconstancie of humane things, how incertaine, how doubfull, how mutable, how deceitfull, and how full of dangers is the estate of mortall men, I need not proue by examples strange, forreine or ancient, since the Commonweale of Venice stands at this houre the true figure and representation thereof, which not long since was so mightie, resplendent, renowned, as that our name and reputation could not be contained within the limites of Europe onely, but with great pompe and magnificence, ran through all Afrike and Asia, and with great bruite resounded euen to the vttermost bounds of the earth: but now by the onely losse of a battell, both light and easie, is depriued of the praise and merite of armes, and become despoiled of riches, rent in peeces, ouerthrowne, and standing in need of all things, and especially of counsell, and so reuersed and abated, that there remaines no signe of our ancient vertue. But doubtlesse the French men beguile themselues, if they attribute these things to their vertue; since notwithstanding we haue bene heretofore trauelled by so many afflictions, wasted and consumed with so many dangers and ruines, yet we neuer lost courage, & then chiefly when with great danger we managed warre many yeares against the most cruell Tyrant of the Turkes, but alwayes of men vanquished, we became victorious: and we should now also haue hoped to do the like, had not the bruite of the terrible name of your Maiestie, together with the liuely and inuincible vertue of your souldiers, so abated the minds of vs all, that there remaines no hope, I say not, to vanquish, but not to defend: and therefore casting downe our armes, we haue reposed all our hope in the vnspeakable clemencie or rather diuine pietie of your Maiestie, which we doubt not to find euen in the greatest despaire of our affaires. In which respect, as well on the behalfe of the Prince and Senate, as of the people and communaltie of Venice, we pray, beseech, and coniure you, to vouchsafe to cast the eyes of your mercie vpon our afflictions, and to cure our griefes with remedies of comfort and consolation: we are willing to embrace all such conditions of peace as you shall please to offer vs, and hold them reasonable, righteous and iust: but perhaps we are worthy to taxe our selues. To you as true and lawfull Lord, we offer restitution of all those things which our elders haue taken from the sacred Empire, and Duchie of Austria: wherunto (that they may come the more decently) we adde all that we possesse in the firme land, renouncing all rights thereunto, in whatsoeuer sort we haue gotten them. Besides this, we will acknowledge a yearely paiment to your Maiestie and your lawfull successors in the Empire, of fiftie thousand duckats for euer: We will readily obey you in all your cõmandements, lawes, de-

" decrees and appointments. Defend vs, we beſeech you, from the inſolencie of thoſe, who earſt
" were our companions in armes, and now do proue our bitter enemies, deſiring nothing more
" then the ruine of the Venetian name: for being preſerued by your clemencie, we ſhall call you
" the father and founder of our Citie, we ſhall write it in our Annales, and continually report to " our children your great merites and vertues: and it will be no ſmall increaſe of your praiſes, to
" ſay, that you are the firſt Prince afore whoſe feete the Commonweale of Venice falls proſtrate, " before whom we bow our neckes, and whom we honour, reuerence, and reſpect as a God. If
" Almightie God had ſo inſpired the minds of our anceſtors, that they had forborne to meddle
" with that which belonged to others, our flouriſhing Commonweale had far ſurmounted all the " Cities of Europe, which now lies couered with filth, pollution and putrifaction, deformed with " infamie and reproach, full of deriſion and contumely, and hath in a moment loſt the honour " of all the victories formerly gotten. But now to returne to my firſt purpoſe, it is in your power,
" by pardoning and forgiuing the Venetians, to win ſuch reputation and honour, greater or more
" renowmed then which, no man euer obtained by any victorie; which no age, no preſcription or
" antiquitie, no law of time nor courſe of yeares, ſhall be able to wipe out of the minds and me" mories of men; but all ages ſhall call, proclaime and confeſſe you to be the moſt pious, cour" teous, and moſt renowmed Prince of the world: and we your Venetians, ſhall attribute to your
" vertue, to your felicitie, and to your goodneſſe, that we liue, that we breathe, or that we en-
" ioy the companie of men.

The Venetians according to this deliberation ſent into Powilla, to reſtore the ports to the King of Aragon, who knowing how to enioy the fruites of other mens trauels without expences or danger, had diſpatched into Spaine a ſmall Nauie, which had commanded certaine places appertaining to thoſe Cities and hauens of the ſea. They diſpatched alſo into Romagna a publike Secretarie, with commiſſion, to giue vp to the Pope all that they held there, vpon condition that Iohn Paul Manfron and other priſoners might be reſtored, and that they might haue libertie to draw out their artilleries, and that the people that were within the Caſtle of Rauenna might depart in ſafetie. Which conditions whileſt the Pope made difficultie to accept, for that he would not diſpleaſe the Confederates, the Caſtle of Rauenna was rendred, the ſouldiers giuing it vp of themſelues, notwithſtanding the Venetian Secretarie that was entred, ſought to hinder it, for that ſuch as ſolicited for them at Rome, gaue hope that the Pope in the end would conſent to the conditions, vnder the which they had offered reſtitution. But the Pope complained much that they had ſhewed a greater contumacie againſt him then againſt Ceſar or the King of Aragon: and therefore when Grimani and Cornaro the Venetian Cardinals demanded abſolution of the Bull, in the name of the Senate, as being due, for that they had offered reſtitution within the terme of foure and twentie dayes, he made anſwer, that they had not obeyed, becauſe their offer was not ſimple, but ioyned to conditions limited; and for that they were admoniſhed ouer and beſides the reſtitution of the townes, to yeeld account of the fruites they had receiued, together with the Benefices they poſſeſſed appertaining to Churches or to perſons Eccleſiaſticall.

Diuers opinions touching the fall of the Venetians.

In this ſort was ouerwhelmed with a wonderfull furie, the eſtate of the Commonweale of Venice, one calamitie continually growing vpon another, all the hopes they propoſed vnto themſelues failing, and no ſigne remaining, by the which, after the loſſe of ſo great a dominion, they might hope for the preſeruation of their proper libertie. This ſo great a ruine touched diuerſly the minds of the Italians, of whom many receiued great contentment, remẽbring that the Venetians, proceeding in too great ambition, without reſpect to iuſtice or obſeruatiõ of faith, ſeizing vpon all things that occaſion offered them, had manifeſtly aſpired to the monarchie of all Italy: things which made their names hatefull to all men, and the more odious for the generall bruite of the pride and haughtineſſe of that people. On the other ſide, many who conſidered more ſoundly the preſent eſtate of things, and how wretched and foule it were for all Italy to be wholy brought vnder the yoke of ſtrangers, felt no litle griefe, that ſuch a Citie, ſo ancient a ſeate of libertie, and the glorie of the Italian name through all the world, ſhould fall into ſuch extremitie, that ſo worthy a member ſhould be cut off, which more then all the reſidue had bene the protectour of their common glorie and renowne. But aboue all, ſo great a fall and declination began to be grieuous to the Pope, who doubting the powers of Ceſar and the French King, deſired to alter their thoughts from oppreſſing him, by intangling them with affaires. In which regard he determined (but ſecretly) to do all he could, that the aduerſities of the Commonweale

of Venice ſhould haue no further courſe, and he accepted the letters written to him in the name of the Duke of Venice, by the which he beſought him in great ſubmiſſion, to receiue the ſix Embaſſadours ſent to him of the principals of the Senate, humbly to intreate him to pardon and abſolue them. Theſe letters being read, and their petitions publiſhed in the Conſiſtorie, he conſented to admit them, after he had in few words proteſted, that it was not the ancient cuſtome of the Church, to ſhew her ſelfe hard or rigorous to ſuch as with repentance of their faults, ſought for pardon. The Embaſſadours of the Emperour and the French ſtriued what they could againſt it, putting him in memory, that by the confederation of Cambray, he was expreſly bound to perſecute them with armes ſpirituall and temporall, till euery one of the Confederates had recouered that which appertained to him: to whom the Pope made anſwer, that he had conſented to admit them, with intention not to giue them abſolution, if firſt Ceſar (who onely had not recouered all) had not obtained the things that belonged to him. This gaue ſome beginning to the hope and ſuretie of the Venetians; but that which aſſured them moſt in their laſt feare, was the reſolution of the French King, to obſerue ſimply and in good fidelitie the capitulation which he had made with Ceſar: and hauing reconquered all that was his, to paſſe no further with his armie, nor breake his limites. And therefore albeit it was in his power after he had taken Peſquiero, not onely to accept Verona, which had ſent Embaſſadours to yeeld to him, but alſo to occupie Padua without any impediment, together with all the other townes abandoned by the Venetians: yet he would, in any ſort, that the Embaſſadours of Verona ſhould preſent the keyes of their towne to the Embaſſadours of Ceſar which were in his armie, and for that cauſe he ſtayed with all his campe at Peſquiero, which he retained for himſelfe, for the commoditie of the place, notwithſtanding it appertained to the Marquis of Mantua, (the Venetians hauing taken that together with Aſula and Lunato from him) who durſt not refuſe it to the King, leauing to him the reuenues of the towne, with promiſe of recompence. At the ſame time the King had alſo by accord the Caſtle of Cremona, vnder condition that all the ſouldiers ſhould depart with goods and life ſaued, except ſuch as were his ſubiects; and that the Gentlemen of Venice ſhould remaine his priſoners, to whom he gaue his faithful promiſe to ſaue their liues. Vincenſa and Padua followed the example of Verona, as alſo the other townes, except the Citie of Treuiſa, which being abandoned by the magiſtrates and ſouldiers of Venice, had runne the ſame courſe, if Ceſar had ſent thither neuer ſo ſmall a force, or at leaſt any perſonage of authoritie. But Leonard de Dreſſino, one of the exiles of Vincenſa, going thither to receiue it, without ſtrength or armes, and without any maieſtie of imperie, as he had receiued Padua in the like ſort; and being entred and admitted, the exiles of the ſame Citie being newly reſtored by the Venetians (and which for this benefite became louers of their name) began to draw into tumult, by whoſe example the people being affected to the gouernment of Venice, roſe and conſpired with one called Marke a ſhoomaker, who publiſhing himſelfe chiefe, and with great cries and concourſe of the commons, carrying into the principall places the banners of the Venetians, they cried with one voice, S. Marke, aſſuring that they would acknowledge no other Empire nor other Lord. To this action was much helping an Embaſſadour of the King of Hungarie, who in his way to Venice, paſſing by Treuiſa, and being throwne haply into this tumult, perſwaded the inhabitants not to rebell. In ſo much that after they had chaſed out Dreſſino, and put into the Citie ſeuen hundred footmen of the Venetians, the armie alſo enting a litle after, which was now increaſed with bands of footmen coming from Slauonia, with the remainders of the armie returned from Romagna, hauing an intention to incampe in ſome ſtrong place betweene Margueta and Meſtra: they fortified the towne in great diligence, and made their horſemen ſcoure the places of the countrey thereabouts, procuring from all parts great reliefe of victuals, as well for the neceſſitie of that Citie, as for the vſe of the towne of Venice, whereof they gathered great quantities from all ſides. The principall occaſion of this accident, and to confirme in the Venetians a hope to retaine yet ſome part of their dominion, together with many other great aduentures that followed, was the negligence and diſordered gouernment of Ceſar, of whom in ſo great a courſe of victorie there was heard no other thing then the name, notwithſtanding by the means of the French armes, and for feare thereof, ſo many townes had bene rendred to him, which were very eaſie for him to keepe. But after the confederation made at Cambray, he ſtayed ſome time in Flanders, to leuie of the people a loane of money to furniſh his warres, which he had no ſooner got into his poſſeſſion, then, according to his cuſtome, he ſpent it vnprofitably: and albeit at his

his departing from Macklin in armes, and with all the pompe and ceremonies imperiall, and after being come very neare to Italy, he made publication that he would begin the warre before the terme appointed to him in the capitulation: yet being oppreſſed with his accuſtomed difficulties and confuſions, he aduanced no further, notwithſtanding the Pope ſolicited him with great importunities, for the feare he had of the French armes; and though he had ſent him (to giue him a more life to the enterpriſe, by Conſtantine of Macedonia) fiftie thouſand duckats, and conſented withall to the hundred thouſand duckats which had bene leuied certaine yeares afore in Germanie, which were reſerued to make warre vpon the Turkes. Beſides all this, he had receiued of the French King an hundred thouſand duckats for the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, and was aduertiſed of the fortune of the battell of Vailo as he drew neare to Inſpruch: and notwithſtanding he had with great diligẽce diſpatched the Duke of Brunſwike to recouer Friul, yet he moued not (as in ſo great an occaſion had bene conuenient) for want of money (the taxes which he had receiued and drawne from ſo many places not being able to ſuffice his prodigalities.) At laſt he arriued at Trent, from whence writing letters congratulatorie to the King, he gaue many thanks that by his meanes he had recouered his townes: and the better to expreſſe the good will he bare to the King, and withall to wipe out all memories of offences paſt, it is ſaid, that he cauſed a booke to be burned which was kept at Spires, containing an authenticke regiſter of the iniuries which the French Kings in times paſt had done to the Empire and nation of Germanie. The Cardinall of Amboiſe came to him to Trent the thirteenth day of Iune, to communicate of their common affaires, who being receiued with great honour, promiſed him on the behalfe of his King, a ſuccour of 500 Lances: and after they had with great agreement giuen directions for other affaires, it was reſolued that Cæſar and the King ſhould ſpeake together in plaine field neare the towne of Gard, vpon the Marches of both their countreys. For which cauſe the French King prepared to be there at the day appointed, and Cæſar, for the ſame regard, came to Riua de Trent; but after he had bene there onely two houres, he returned immediatly to Trent, ſignifying to the French King, that by occaſion of new accidents hapned at Friul, he was conſtrained to depart ſuddenly, deſiring him to ſtay at Cremona, for he would returne ſpeedily to giue perfection to the enteruiew determined. This varietie (if it be poſſible to find out the truth in ſo great inconſtancie) many attributed to his credulitie and lightneſſe of beliefe, ſome hauing blowne into his eares matter that made him enter into ſuſpition: others made this the occaſion, that hauing ſo ſmall a Court, accompanied with a traine ill appointed, he thought he could not preſent himſelfe with that dignitie and reputation, as might hold compariſon with the pompe and greatneſſe of the French King. But the King deſiring to diſſolue his armie, to be deliuered of ſo great a burden, and no leſſe to returne with ſpeed into France, tooke his way to Millan, not tarrying for the Emperour, notwithſtanding the Biſhop of Gurcie, whom the Emperour had ſent for that effect, followed him euen to Gremona, ſoliciting him much to tarrie, and making promiſe that without all exceptions the Emperour would returne. The diſcamping of the armie and perſon of the French King from the confines of Cæſar, diminiſhed greatly the reputation of his affaires: and yet albeit he was accompanied with ſuch multitudes of men, that he might eaſily furniſh Padua and the other townes, yet he forbare to ſend garriſon thither, either for the inconſtancie of his nature, or that he thought aforehand to vndertake ſome other enterpriſes; or elſe for that he thought it more honorable, deſcending into Italy, to haue with him a very great armie: and which more is, he pretended (as though the former actions had had their due perfection) that together with the ioynt forces of the whole Confederates, they ſhould aſſaile the Citie of Venice: a matter very plauſible to the French King, but grieuous to the Pope, and no leſſe impugned by the King of Aragon.

The laſt action of the Florentines againſt the Piſans.

About this time the Florentines put their laſt hand to the warres againſt the Piſans. For after they had cut off all ſuccours and entries of graines into Piſa, they leuied new bands, to the end to hinder with all their induſtrie and power, all recourſe of victuals both by ſea and land; which could not eaſily be done for the neighbourhood of the countrey of the Lucquois; who, when they could ſecretly do it, obſerued with a very negligent faith their accord newly made with the Florentines. But the want of victuals increaſed dayly within Piſa, which when the people of the plaine countrey would no longer endure, thoſe principals of the Citizens in whoſe hands reſted all publike reſolutions, being followed with the greateſt part of the youth of the Citie, the better to lull the countrey ſouldiers with accuſtomed deuices, introduced by the meane of the

Lord of Plombin, a practiſe of accord with the Florentines; wherein they artificially conſumed many dayes, and for which the Florentines ſent to Plombin, Nicholas Machiauel their Secretary, and many Embaſſadours of the Piſans, choſen as well of the Citizens, as of the people of the plaine countrey. It was very hard to incloſe Piſa, for that it hath large fields, and full of ditches and marriſhes, and the entrie of victuals could not be hindred by any eaſie meanes, ſpecially by night, both for the diligence of the Lucquoys to furniſh them, and the deſperate minds of the Piſans, refuſing no perill wherein was any oportunitie of prouiſion. But to ouercome theſe difficulties, the Florentine Captaines determined to deuide their armie into three parts, beſtowing one part at Meſſana without the gate of Plagei, the ſecond at Saint Peter de Rene and Saint Iames, ouer againſt the gate of Lucques, and the third was aſſigned to be neare the ancient Temple of Saint Peter d'Ingrado, ſtanding betweene Piſa and the mouth of Arne; and in euery campe, being well fortified, they beſtowed a thouſand footmen, with conuenient numbers of horſemen. And to let that none ſhould paſſe ouer the mountaines by the way of the vale of Oſola, which leadeth to the mount Saint Iulian, they built towards the great Hoſpitall a Baſtion capable of two hundred and fiftie footmen. By theſe impediments the Piſans fell more and more into want of victuals, who ſeeking to get by policie that which they deſpaired to obtaine by force, deuiſed that Alphonſo Mutolo a yong man of Piſa, of baſe condition, who being aforetime taken priſoner by the Florentine ſouldiers, and receiuing many pleaſures of his keeper, ſhould offer to be the inſtrument to make them ſurpriſe the gate that goeth to Lucques: their deuice bearing this meaning, that at the ſame time that the campe which was at Saint Iames ſhould go by night to execute the enterpriſe, they would not onely oppreſſe it when one part was entred, but alſo would charge the other campes of the Florentines, which according to the reſolution were to approch more neare the Citie. But for that they made not their approch raſhly nor in diſorder, the Piſans won no other thing by this practiſe, but the liues of certaine particulars, who at the ſigne giuen, were come to the firſt gate, thinking to enter the Citie; amongſt whom was ſlaine Canaio de Pratouecchio (ſo was he called, to whom Alphonſo Mutolo had bene priſoner, and vnder whoſe aſſurance the practiſe had bene managed) and there was alſo ſlaine with a canon ſhot Paul de Parana Captaine to a companie of light horſemen of the Florentines. This hope being thus diſappointed, and very ſmall quantities of corne entring into Piſa, and that to the great danger of ſuch as carried it, the Florentines withall not ſuffering that the vnprofitable mouthes ſhould depart out of Piſa, vexing them with many aduerſities, things neceſſarie for the life of man were bought at deare rates, yea many periſhed by famine, for that there could not enter a proportion to ſuffice the generall numbers. And yet theſe neceſſities were ſurmounted by the obſtinacie of thoſe Citizens which were principals in the gouernment, who being diſpoſed rather to behold the extreme ruine of their countrey, then to yeeld to ſo horrible a neceſſitie, deferred from day to day to come to parley, entertaining as well as they could the Commons, ſometimes with one hope, ſometimes with another, but ſpecially with this, that ſince there was no expectation of the coming of Ceſar into Italy, the Florentines would be conſtrained to retire from their walls. But part of the countreymen, with ſuch as had bene at Plombin where they ſaw into their intentions, drew into conſpiracie, and conſtrained them to introduce new conſultations with the Florentines, which being followed by Alaman Saluiat Commander of that part of the armie which lay at Saint Peter d'Ingrado, after many diſputings (the principals oppoſing many impediments) were at laſt reſolued and concluded. The accord was made with conditions very fauourable for the Piſans, ſeeing that not onely all their faults both publicke and priuate were pardoned, but alſo many exemptions accorded, being alſo abſolued from all reſtitution of moueable goods which they had taken from the Florentines at the time when they rebelled: ſo great was the deſire of the Florentines to repoſſeſſe it, and ſo great their feare leſt from the Emperour (naming the Piſans in the league of Cambray, although the French King had not accepted the nomination) or from ſome other part, there happened no impediment vnlooked for. And albeit they were well aſſured that the Piſans would be conſtrained within foure dayes to giue place to hunger, yet they ſought rather to aſſure the towne with hard conditions, then by obtaining it without conuention, to put any part of the certaintie in the power of fortune. This accord although it were begun to be negociated in the camp, was afterwards debated and concluded at Florence by the Embaſſadours of the Piſans: an action wherein the faith of the Florentines is worthy of memorie, who notwithſtanding their iuſt hatreds prouoked by ſo many iniu-

Piſa rendred to the Florentines.

ries, they were no leſſe conſtant to obſerue things promiſed, then eaſie and tractable to the agreement. The Emperour (no doubt) receiued a great diſpleaſure by the rendring of the Piſans, for that he was perſwaded, that either the demaine of that Citie might ſerue him to many occaſions, or elſe by according it to the Florentines, he ſhould draw from them a great quantitie of money, for want whereof he let ſlip and loſt many faire occaſions that were offered him without his paines and induſtrie. But whileſt he ſtood ſo negligent in oportunities offered, that neither at Vincenſa nor at Padua was almoſt any ſouldiers for him; and whileſt withall, his delayes abated the affection of the inhabitants of townes, himſelfe wandring with a very ſmall companie, ſometimes to one place, ſometimes to another, the Venetians let not ſlip the oportunitie that was offered them to recouer Padua, whereunto they were induced by many reaſons. For the retaining of Treuiſa made them know, how vnprofitable it was to them, with a counſell ſo raſh, to abandon ſo ſoone the dominion of the firme land; and the lingring preparations of the Emperour gaue them cauſe to hold him in leſſe feare dayly: and beſides, they were not a little moued, for that ſeeking to bring to Venice the reuenues of the lands which diuers particulars of the towne of Venice held in the countrey of Padua, thoſe of Padua made manifeſt reſiſtance. In ſo much that the diſdaine of certaine particulars ioyned to a publicke profite, and withall being allured by the knowledge they had that Padua was ill furniſhed of ſouldiers, and that by reaſon of the inſolencies which the Gentlemen of Padua vſed towards the populars, many remembring the eaſie and moderate gouernment of the Venetians, began eſtſoones to deſire their ancient yoke; they determined to make an attempt to recouer it, wherein they were aſſiſted with this ready occaſion, that thoſe of the plaine countrey of Padua ſtood yet at their deuotion. It was then decreed that Andrew Gritti, one of their Commanders, leauing the camp behind, wherein were foure hundred men at armes, more then two thouſand as well eſtradiots as light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen, ſhould go to Noualo vpon the frontiers of Padua, and taking in his way part of thoſe footbands, which, with many troupes of paiſants were ſent to the village of Mirana, he ſhould draw towards Padua to aſſaile the gate of Codalonga: and that at the ſame time, two thouſand of the popular ſouldiers, with three hundred footmen and certaine horſemen, the more to aſtoniſh them within, ſhould aſſault Portello ſtanding in the contrary part of the Citie: and the better to couer this enterpriſe, Chriſtopher Moro the other Commander, was likewiſe appointed to incampe afore Ciuitella. This plot well layed, had alſo a happie iſſue, for the footmen arriuing at full day, found the gate of Codalonga halfe open, certaine paiſants a litle before being entred by chance with carts loden with hay: in ſo much, as commanding the gate without any difficultie, and expecting without any noiſe the coming of their other ſtrength, which was at hand, they not onely entred into the towne, but paſſed almoſt to the market place, afore the Citie, which containes a long circuite, and is not much peopled, was touched with any aduertiſement of the accident. The Knight de la Volpe marched firſt with his light horſemen, together with Zitolo de Perouſa and Lactantius de Bergama, with part of the footmen. But the alarme being come to the Citadel, Dreſſina Gouernour of Padua for Maximilian, prepared himſelfe to ſally out with three hundred Almaine footmen which he had there onely for his guard: the like did Brunalt de Serege with fiftie horſemen, who ſuſtaining the furie of the enemies, expected that the Gentlemen of Padua, fauourers of the Almaines, would take armes in their fauour: but that and all other hope was vaine, for that in the Citie fallen into this ſurpriſe and ſudden oppreſſion of tumult, was found no diſpoſition of reſiſtance, eſpecially many bands of the enemie being entred, and gouerning thoſe parts of the towne, wherein lay their chiefeſt protection: in ſo much as ſtanding thus abandoned of all hope, they were conſtrained, with the loſſe of many of their men, to retire with ſpeed into the Caſtle and Citadell, which being very weakly manned, they were conſtrained to yeeld to diſcretion within a few houres after. By this meanes the Venetians being eſtſoones made Lords of the whole, laboured to appeaſe the tumult, and ſaue the Citie, whereof the greateſt part, by the inſolencies of the others, were ranged to their deuotion, nothing receiuing ſpoile or harme, but certaine houſes of the Iewes, and ſome others of Padua, which had afore declared themſelues enemies to the Venetian name. This accident hapned the day of S. Marina, a day ſolemnly celebrated at Venice by publike decree, as a moſt happie day, and the beginning of the reſtoring of their Commonweale. The bruite of this victorie did much moue the whole countrey thereabouts; and there was great likelihood that Vincenſa had done the like, if Conſtantine of Macedo-

The Venetians determine to recouer Padua

nia,

nia, who by chance was neare at hand, had not entred with a very ſmall ſtrength. As ſoone as the Venetians had recouered Padua, they ſuddenly became maiſters of the whole countrey, the commons of townes and the country people fauoring them. They recouered alſo by this meane the towne and caſtle of Legnaguo, a place of great conueniencie to trouble the countreys of Verona, Padua and Vincenſa. Beſides this they aſſayed to take the tower Marquiſano, within eight miles of Padua, being a paſſage of ſingular oportunitie to enter into Poleſina de Rouigna, and to diſtreſſe the countrey of Mantua; but by the reſcues which the Cardinall of Eſte ſent, their enterpriſe was defeated.

The taking of Padua did nothing ſtay the French king (as many thought) from returning beyond the Mounts, who as he was vpon his diſcamping, made in the towne of Biagraſſa new conuentions with the Popes Legat, by the which the Pope and the King bound each other to a mutuall protection, with libertie that either of them might contract with any other Prince, ſo farre forth as it was not preiudiciall to the preſent confederation. The King promiſed not to hold in his protection, nor to accept into the ſame hereafter, any ſubiect, homager, or dependant, either directly or indirectly of the Church, expreſly diſanulling all articles of protection vntill that day: a promiſe litle beſeeming the honour of ſo great a King; for that, a litle before, when the Duke of Ferrara came vnto him, although at the firſt he was angrie with him for that without his knowledge he had accepted the title of Gonfalonnier of the Church, yet afterwards being reconciled with him, he had taken him into his protection, for a conſideration of thirtie thouſand duckats. Beſides, it was agreed, that the Pope ſhould diſpoſe at his diſcretion the Biſhopricks that then were voide in all the lands of the Kings obedience; but for ſuch as ſhould fall voide within a certaine time, they ſhould be at the nomination of the King; for whoſe better ſatisfaction, the Pope ſent the Buls of Cardinalſhip to the Biſhop of Albie, by the ſaid Cardinall of Pauie, promiſing to indue him with the Hat as ſoone as he came to Rome. This contract being made, the King haſted immediatly out of Italy, carrying with him into France no ſmall glorie for ſo great a victorie, ſo ſuddenly gotten vpon the Venetians: and yet he carried home by this victorie, neither the more tranquillitie of mind, nor greater aſſurance for his affaires: a matter that often hapneth, that in things obtained, after they haue bene long deſired, men find neither that contentment, nor that pleaſure which they imagined before: yea men might diſcerne matter prepared for greater dangers and innouations, together with a more manifeſt incertaintie of his mind touching the deliberations he had to make by reaſon of thoſe accidents that were newly hapned. For, if things ſucceeded well with the Emperour, his feare was farre greater of him then formerly it had bene of the Venetians. And if the greatneſſe of the Venetians began to be reſtored, he muſt be conſtrained to dwell in continuall ſuſpitions and perpetuall expences, to keepe the things he had taken from them: and not that onely, but alſo he muſt contribute to Maximilian both in men and money; for that in abandoning him, he was to feare leſt he would knit with the Venetians againſt him, and withall, leſt the Catholicke King would be of the faction, and haply the Pope. Beſides, meane aides and ſuccours would not ſuffice to entertaine him in amitie with Ceſar, but they muſt be ſuch, as by them he might obtaine the victorie againſt the Venetians. And on the other ſide, if he ſent him ſtrong and able ſuccours, beſides that it would draw with it intollerable expences and harmes, it would bring him into the ſame dangers by the greatneſſe of Ceſar. The King weighing theſe difficulties, ſtood in the beginning in doubt touching the mutation of Padua, to wit, whether he ſhould hold it agreeable or troubleſome: but after, conferring the ſuretie which the depriuation of the firme land from the Venetians might bring to him, with the perplexities and dangers which he feared to ſuffer by the greatneſſe of Ceſar, and with hope to obtaine of him for money, in regard of his neceſſities, the Citie of Verona, which he deſired much, as a place of ſingular oportunitie to ſuppreſſe the mouings on the ſide of Germanie: he iudged it at laſt more to his profit and ſuretie, to haue things remaine in that eſtate, that (there being great apparence of a long warre betweene Ceſar and the Venetians) both the parties made wearie by ſo continuall expences, might become more weake. And he was the mor: confirmed in this opinion when he had contracted with the Pope, with whom he hoped to haue a confederation well aſſured and reſolued: and yet he left vpon the limites of Verona, Monſieur de Paliſſa with ſeuen hundred Lances to be at Ceſars command, as well for the preſeruation of things gotten, as to obtaine that which the Venetians poſſeſſed as yet; and becauſe they were conueyed into Vincenſa by the commandement of Cæſar, the Citie of Verona was aſſured, which was in great danger and ſuſpition for the ſmall numbers of men of warre that were within it: and by that meane the Venetian armie which lay encamped before the Citadell, was retired. There happened alſo another good aduenture to the Venetians afore the Kings departure: for their horſemen which were within Legnaguo, making continuall incurſions ouer the whole countrey, euen to the gates of Verona, and doing them great harmes, againſt whom, the garriſon of Verona being but two hundred horſemen and ſeuen hundred footmen, and vnable to make reſiſtance; the Biſhop of Trent, whom Cæſar had appointed Gouernour ouer it, determined to plant his campe there, and to that end called thither the Marquis of Mantua, who expecting the preparations that were in hand, lay encamped with thoſe bands which the French king had giuen him, in the Ile of Eſcalo, a great village in the countrey of Verona, neither enuironed with walls, nor made ſtrong with other fortifications. But whileſt he lay there without doubt of any thing, he ſerued as a notable example to all Captaines, how much it imports them at all times and in all places, to be vigilant, and ſo to manage their affaires, that they may haue confidence in their proper forces, without repoſing in this vaine imagination, either that their enemies be farre off, or that they are but weake. For, as the Marquis had couenanted with certaine eſtradiots of the Venetian armie to come to him in that place, to take his pay and follow his enſigne, who from the beginning of the conference had communicated the deuice with their Captaines: and as the Captains, vpon this occaſion had ordained to aſſaile him ſuddenly, Luke Maluezzo with two hundred light horſemen, and Zitolo de Perouſa with eight hundred footmen, which were ſecretly come from Padua to Legnaguo, being ioyned to the bands which were within, and fifteene hundred men of the countrey, and ſending before certaine horſemen, who cried Turco, Turco, (that was the ſurname of the Marquis) making as though they were thoſe eſtradiots that were expected, they conueyed themſelues in the peepe of day, without that there was any doubt made, to the Iſle of Eſcalo the ſame morning that was appointed; where, without any reſiſtance, they entred, and finding all the ſouldiers without guard, and ſuch as followed the perſon of the Marquis ſleeping, they put them to the ſpoile, and tooke priſoner amongſt others, Monſieur de Boyſſi Lieutenant to the Marquis, and nephew to the Cardinall of Amboiſe; and the Marquis vnderſtanding the alarme, leaped naked out at a window, and hid himſelfe in a corne field: but he was diſcouered to the enemy by a paiſant of the ſame place, who (following the common affection of the countrey people) reſpected more the eſtate of the Venetians, then his particular profite, and made as though he would ſaue the Marquis for the great offers he made him, but did the contrary: ſo that the Marquis being led from thence to Padua, and after to Venice, was there put priſoner in the litle Tower of the publicke Pallace, to the wonderfull reioycing of euery one.

Cæſar till this day had giuen no impediment to the proceedings of the Venetians, for that he had not yet leuied a force ſufficient to put himſelfe in the field: and hauing bene buſied many dayes in the mountaine of Vincenſa, where the countreymen bearing deuotion to the Venetian name, and repoſing much in the difficulties of the place, were drawne into manifeſt rebellion againſt him: and after deſcending into the plaines (Padua being already taken by the Venetians) he was encountred with multitudes of paiſants in a paſſage of good ſituation & ſtrength, where he was in no litle perill. But after he had put them to the chaſe, he came to Eſcalo vpon the frontier Vincentine, where the Venetian armie had recouered a great part of the countrey of Vincenſa, and taken Serauallo, a paſſage of importance, where they executed many cruelties vpon the Almains; which was recompenced with the like crueltie by Maximilian vpon the Italian footmen and paiſants, winning vpon them the paſſage not many dayes after. But as yet his forces being not very great, he occupied the time in ſmall enterpriſes, ſometimes beſieging this borough, and ſometime that paſſage, with very litle honour and reputation for the name Imperiall. And as alwayes his conceptions were farre greater then his forces or occaſions, ſo he ſolicited at the ſame time with the confederates the vnion of all their forces, to take the Citie of Venice, making vſe, ouer and aboue the preparations by land, of the ſea armies of the French king, the King of Aragon, and the galleys of the Pope, being at that time conioyned and aſſembled into one Nauie. To which demand, notwithſtanding no mention was made in the confederation of Cambray, the French had conſented, if the conditions had bene ſuch, as the benefite of the conqueſt had turned to a common profite: but it was a thing grieuous to the Pope, and which both then and at other times, when it was communed vpon more amply, was alwayes oppoſed by the King of

Aragon,

Aragon, (for that he ſuppoſed it would be profitable to the French) vſing this colour, that it was a thing both vniuſt and very diſhoneſt. But whileſt the countreys of Padua, Vincenſa, and Verona, ſuffered theſe torments by the armies of the Almaines and Italians, the countrey of Friul and thoſe places which were for the Venetians in Iſtria, were more miſerably afflicted: for that the Prince of Henault being entred by Ceſars direction into the countrey of Friul with ten thouſand men trained, after he had attempted in vaine to take Montfalcon, he carried by force the towne and caſtle of Cadora, with a pitifull execution and butcherie of thoſe that defended it. And on the other ſide, certaine light horſemen and footbands of the Venetians followed with many of the countrey men, tooke by force the towne of Valdiſera, and by accord, the towne of Bellona, where was no garriſon for the Almains. And beſides this, the Duke of Brunſwicke, whom the Emperour had likewiſe ſent thither, being repulſed at Vdnia the principall towne of Friul, was marched to Ciuital d'Auſtrich, a towne ſituate in a high place vpon the riuer of Natiſona, where Federike Contarin lay in garriſon with a very ſmall companie, repoſing much in the forces of the people, who had minds well reſolued to defend themſelues: to whoſe ſuccours, as Iohn Paul Gradinic Magiſtrate of Friul was coming with eight hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footmen, he was put to flight by certaine bands of the Almaines: and yet, notwithſtanding they had beaten Ciuital with their artillery, they could not carrie it, neither with the furious aſſault which they gaue, nor with the rumor they ſpread that they had defeated the ſuccours that came to reſcue them. In Iſtria, Chriſtopher Frangipan defeated neare the borough of Vermes, the Commiſſaries of the Venetians, accompanied with the bands and ſouldiers of the countrey: a ſucceſſe that put into his hands the new Caſtle and the towne of Raſpruch, to the great terrifying of the whole countrey, with the damages, ruines, and burnings that he made. For this cauſe the Venetians ſent thither Angeo Treuiſan Captaine of their ſea armie, with ſixteene galleys, who taking vpon his arriuall the towne of Fiumo, addreſt himſelfe to occupie the towne of Trieſto: but the ſucceſſe falling contrary, he turned his ſtrength to Raſpruch, and recouered it by force, and afterwards retired with his galleys to Venice, Friul and Iſtria remaining in a pitifull eſtate, for that ſometimes the Venetians commanding, and ſometimes the Almaines preuailing, thoſe townes which the one part had taken and ſacked, were eftſoones recouered and preyed vpon by the other. Which calamitie falling out often, the liues and goods of men ſtood continually as a prey, and the whole countrey was horribly waſted and ſpoiled. During theſe accidents of temporall armes, there was diſputation at Rome touching ſpirituall armes, ſixe Embaſſadours of Venice (ſince the reobtaining of Padua) being gone thither in habite and ſhew miſerable: for where afore they were wont to come in with great pompe and magnificence, and be receiued with a reuerence of the whole Court; now they were neither followed nor accompanied, but making their entrance by night, for ſuch was the pleaſure of the Pope, when they could not be admitted into his preſence, they went to the houſe of the Cardinall of Naples to negociate with him and the other Cardinals and Prelates appointed; the Embaſſadours of Ceſar, the French and Spaniſh, hindring as much as they could, that they ſhould not obtaine the abſolution of the Church paines: and of the contrary the Archbiſhop of Yorke, whom Henrie the eight (who by reaſon of the death of Henrie the ſeuenth his father, had a few moneths before ſucceeded to the Crowne of England) had ſent thither in their fauour, ſoliciting manifeſtly for them with all his endeuours.

But at this time an expectation of farre greater things occupied the minds of all men: for Ceſar leuying all the power he was able of himſelfe, with ſuch aides as he could gather of all his friends, prepared to beſiege Padua with a puiſſant armie: and on the other ſide, the Venetians iudging their vniuerſall ſafetie to conſiſt in the defence of that Citie, laboured to ſtrengthen it with all prouiſions neceſſarie for the defence thereof. They cauſed to enter, beſides the bands appointed for the guard of Treuiſa, their whole armie with all the forces they could gather from all parts; and conueyed thither infinite numbers of all ſorts of artilleries, with all kind of victuals, ſufficient to nouriſh them for many moneths, and furniſhed the towne with an innumerable multitude of paiſants and carpenters, by whoſe helpe beſides that they made many mounts, and ſluces of wood and iron, to the end they ſhould not be deprined of the water that was brought from Padua by the towne of Limini, they had made & continually did make about the walls of the Citie maruellous fortifications. And albeit the prouiſions and munitions were ſuch as greater could not be deſired, yet in an action of ſo great importance, the care and diligence gence of the Senate was incredible, omitting no oportunitie wherein occaſion was giuen to recouer their loſſes, and defend their libertie that remained. For the Senators ceaſſed not day and night to thinke vpon, to admoniſh, and to propound ſuch things as they iudged to be either neceſſary or profitable: whereof as they diſcourſed dayly in the Senate, Leonard Loredan their Duke, a man much reſpected for his age, and of no leſſe reputation for the dignitie of his place, whereunto he was called many yeares before, ſtanding vp, reaſoned in this manner:

The Oration of Leonard Loredan.

If, as the truth is, (right worthy Senators) not onely all the hope we haue to recouer our dominion, but alſo to preſerue our libertie, conſiſts in the defending of Padua; and if on the contrary, it be moſt certaine, that of the loſſe of Padua will deſcend the laſt deſolation of our country, we muſt neceſſarily grant, that the prouiſions and preparations which hitherunto we haue made, notwithſtanding they were very great, haue not yet bene ſufficient, either for that that appertaineth to the ſuretie of that Citie, or for that which reſpecteth the dignitie of our Commonweale. For in an action of ſuch danger and importance, it ſufficeth not to make ſuch preparations, as that there may be great hope of the defending of Padua, but they muſt be ſo mightie, that ſo farre forth as may be foreſeene by the wit of man, they may ſtand aſſured againſt all the accidents of fortune, who being mightie ouer all the things of the world, hath yet her greateſt power ouer the actions of warre. It is not a reſolution worthy the ancient renowne and glorie of the Venetian name, wholly to commit the publike ſafetie, our vniuerſall honour, and the proper liues of our wiues and children, to the vertue of ſtrangers and mercenarie ſouldiers; but we muſt willingly runne thither on heapes, to defend it with our breaſts and armes. For if we looke not now to the preſeruation of that Citie, there remaines no other place wherein we may trauell for our ſelues, ſhew our vertue, or expend our treaſure for our ſafetie. Seeing then the time to helpe and ſuccour our countrey is not yet paſt, we ought not to ſhunne any paines or trauell whatſoeuer, nor expect till we remaine a prey to thoſe that ſeeke to ſacke our goods, and moſt cruelly to drinke our bloud. The conſeruation of our countrey comprehends not onely the publike good, but together with the ſafetie of the Commonweale, is reſpected the ſecuritie of euery one in particular, hauing ſuch affinitie and coniunction together, that the one cannot conſiſt without the other. For the Commonweale falling into ſeruitude, who knowes not that the ſubſtance, the honours, and liues of priuate men, ſhall become a prey to the couetouſneſſe, to the voluptuouſneſſe, to the cruelties, and to the vile affections of the enemies? But though there were no other reſpect in the defending of a Commonweale, then the preſeruation of the countrey, is it not a thing worthy of noble Citizens full of glorie and reputation in this world, and moſt pleaſing to God? For it is the opinion, euen of the Gentiles, that in heauen is appointed a place particular for the perpetuall fruition and comfort of ſuch, as either ſuccoured, preſerued or augmented their countrey. And what countrey did euer better deſerue to be reſcued and ſupported by her children then this of ours, who for many ages hath retained the principalitie and firſt place of all the Cities of the world, and by whom the Citizens receiue infinite commodities, profites and honours? It is wonderfull, if you conſider the gifts which it hath receiued of [illegible], or the things which declare her perpetuall greatneſſe and happie fortune; or elſe thoſe effects which expreſſe her vertue, together with the nobilitie of the wits of her inhabitants. For her ſituation makes men amazed, being the onely Citie in the world ſeated amongſt the ſalt waters, hauing all her parts ſo conioyned, that at one time men may enioy the commodities of the water, and the pleaſure of the land. It is aſſured againſt the inuaſions of the land, for that it ſtandeth not on the firme land; and from thoſe of the ſea, for that it is not ſeated in the plaine and deepe ſea. I may alledge to the dignitie and reputation of this Citie, the wonderfull maieſtie of publike pallaces and priuate manſions, builded at incredible charges, and poliſhed with ſtrange marbles and ſtones of ſingularitie, brought hither from all parts of the world, together with a ſtately aſpect of excellent pourtraits, imageries, ſculptures, pillars, and other workmanſhips of worthy regard. But what Citie can be found at this day where there is a greater concourſe of all ſtrange nations, coming hither partly to dwell ſafely in this free and almoſt diuine countrey, and partly for the exerciſe of their trafficke and negociations, whereby our Commonweale is repleniſhed with all ſorts of merchandize and trafficke, whereby our citizens are continually enriched, and whereby our Commonweale doth draw ſuch a reuenue of that onely which is contained within the circuite of this Citie, that many abſolute Kings receiue not the like of their whole kingdomes? I omit the great affluence of men skifull in all arts and ſciences, and the qua-

litie of wits, and other vertues of men, from the which, ioyned to other conditions, is deſcended the glorie of thoſe actions which by this Commonweale and her deſcendants, haue bene made more great, then (ſince the imperie of the Romanes) by any other Principalitie or State in the world. I will not ſay alſo how admirable it is to ſee ſo great abundance of all things, in a Citie wherein nothing groweth, and yet repleniſhed with inhabitants. At the beginning our towne was ſtraited vpon theſe litle rocks, barren and naked of all things; and yet the vertue of our elders, ſtretching out firſt into the next ſeas and townes adioyning, and afterwards increaſing by happie ſucceſſe vpon the ſhores and prouinces further off, yea hauing runne euen to the vttermoſt limites of the Leuant, they got both by ſea and land ſo great an Empire, and held it ſo long, and augmented in ſuch ſort their power, that hauing bene of long time redoubted to all the other townes in Italy, it was neceſſary that the policies and forces of all the other Chriſtian Princes ſhould be banded and ioyned together to abate and depreſſe it. Matters aſſuredly hapned by the aide and fauour of the omnipotent God, for that the obſeruation of iuſtice indifferently adminiſtred in this Citie, is highly commended in all the world: for the onely bruite whereof many peoples and nations haue willingly ſubmitted themſelues to our gouernment. And further, is there any Citie, or any Empire, whereunto our countrey ſhall giue place? What Citie, what Empire, or what Principalitie excelleth our countrey, for matter of religion, and pietie towards God? Where may be ſeene more Monaſteries, more Temples full of ſo many rich and precious ornaments and things of admiration dedicated to the ſeruice of God? Where ſo many Hoſpitals and places of pitie, prepared with incredible charge for the perpetuall comfort of the afflicted, and continuall exerciſe of charitie? And certainly for all theſe things our countrey is by good right to be commended before any other; but farre more worthy are her praiſes for the glorie of this onely, that our countrey had at one time both her beginning and her libertie, and there was neuer ſeene any man borne or die in Venice, which was not borne and died a freeman; and likewiſe her libertie was neuer troubled: which felicitie is principally come to paſſe by the ciuill concord, which hath ſtood alwayes ſo rooted and confirmed in the hearts of men, that whenſoeuer they enter into our Senate, and into our counſels, they ſhake off all diſcords and priuate quarels. Of this ſ forme of gouernment is the cauſe, which being tempered and compounded of all the beſt ſorts of publike adminiſtration, and of ſuch a well conſenting harmonie agreeing in it ſelfe, that it hath remained for many ages vndefiled, without ciuill ſedition, without armes, and without effuſion of bloud amongſt the Citizens: a praiſe particular to our Commonweale, and whereof neither Rome, nor Carthage, nor Athens, nor Lacedemon, nor any other of thoſe Commonweales which haue bene moſt renowned and beſt eſteemed of the Ancients can boaſt: yea there is found among vs ſuch a kind of gouernment and policie, that thoſe who haue made the greateſt profeſſion of ciuill wiſedome, could neuer imagine or deſcribe ſuch a one. Shall then the children and citizens of ſo glorious a countrey, which hath always bene the very bulwarke of the faith, and the beautie of the whole Chriſtian commonweale, be ſlow in the execution of their dutie? And ſhall there any be found who will refuſe to commit to danger the life of himſelfe and his children, for the protection thereof? which being comprehended in the defence of Padua, who is he that will refuſe to go thither in perſon to defend it? And albeit we be well aſſured that the forces that be there already, are ſufficient for the defence of it, appertaines it not to our honour, and concernes it not the glorie of the Venetian name, to make knowne to all the world, that we our ſelues did ſpeedily runne thither to defend and preſerue it? Such was the deſtinie of that Citie, that in a few dayes ſo great an eſtate ſhould fall out of our hands, wherein we haue not to complaine ſo much of the malice of fortune, (for that ſuch aduentures are common to all Commonweales and kingdomes) as that failing of our conſtancie, which till this day hath bene inuincible; and without all memory of the glorious examples of our elders, we haue with too ſudden deſpaire, giuen place to the mightie blowes of aduerſitie, and haue not expreſſed to our children that valour and vertue, which our fathers haue left well teſtified to vs. Now occaſion is offered vs to recouer that honour which is not yet loſt, if we will our ſelues ſhew the minds of men, but onely altered without any perill of abſolute ruine. For if we oppoſe againſt all fortune, and willingly offer our ſelues to dangers, we ſhall redeeme the infamies receiued; and when the world ſhall perceiue that our ancient generoſitie is not loſt, men will rather attribute the diſorders paſt to a certaine fatall tempeſt, which neither the counſels nor conſtancie of men could reſiſt, then impoſe vpon vs either blame or « dishonour. And therefore if it were reasonable that we went altogether to the rescue of Padua,

« and if for certaine dayes we might leaue this Citie without preiudice of her defence and other « publike affaires of importance, my selfe, without expecting your resolution, would be the first
« that should open the way, not seeing wherein I might better employ these last dayes of my old « age, then with my presence to participate in so glorious a victorie, or else not to remaine aliue
« after the ruine of my countrey, but to die together with others; a calamitie which my mind hath « horrour to expresse. But for that Venice, neither can, nor ought to be depriued of her publicke « counsels, wherein consisteth no lesse the defence of Padua in counselling, prouiding and ordai« ning, then in the force and armes of such as be there already: and the vnprofitable troupes of « old persons will stand in that Citie rather as a charge and burden, then as a succour and neces-« sarie aide: and seeing withall it is not conuenient, for any thing that may happen, to disfurnish « Venice of all her youth; my aduice is, respecting these reasons with the regard to accidents that « may occurre, that there be made a choise of two hundred Gentlemen of the principals of our « youth, and euery of them to go to Padua, with such proportion of friends and seruants as his a« bilitie will beare, and to continue there so long as shall be necessarie for the defence of that Ci-
« tie. My two sonnes with a great reuenue shall be the first to execute that, which I their father
« and your Prince haue proposed vnto them; whose liues and persons in so great a danger, I do « willingly offer to the succor of their country: so shal Padua be more assured; so shal the mercena-« rie souldiers that be there seeing our youth cheerfully assisting all actions that concerne that ser-
« uice, reioyce exceedingly, and haue the more courage, being well assured that seeing our sons « and kinsmen are ioyned with them, they shall haue no want of victuals and munitions, nor of « any other aide or supply. The youth and the rest that go not, shall be so much the more encou« raged by this example, to vndergo, when need shall so require, all quarrels and dangers. You « Senators, (whose words and doings serue as an example and mirrour to the whole Citie) who« soeuer among you haue sufficient abilitie, striue that your sonnes may be enrolled in the num« ber of those that shall communicate in so great a glorie: for hereby will ensue not onely an assu« red and certaine defence of Padua, but also we shall procure to our selues with all nations, this « reputation, namely, that we our selues are they, who with the danger of our owne liues, do de« fend the libertie and safetie of the most worthy and flourishing countrey that is in the world.

The Gentlemē of Venice go to the succours of Padua.

This counsell of the Prince was heard with great attention and approbation, and with all speed put in execution. And the flower of the noble yong Gentlemen of Venice, drew to them as many of their friends and followers fit for armes, as they could, and went to Padua, being accompanied to their embarquing with all the other Gentlemen, and with an infinite multitude of people, who celebrated with many praises, and with vowes full of pietie and affection, so great a readinesse to succour their countrey. They were receiued at Padua with no lesse ioy and applause of all men, the Captaines and souldiers extolling the valour of those yong Gentlemen, who not trained nor experienced in the trauels and dangers of warre, preferred the loue of their countrey afore their proper life: so that encouraging one another, they expected very ioyfully the coming of Cæsar; who labouring to assemble the bands of souldiers that came to him from many places, was by this time come to the bridge of Brento, three miles from Padua, and hauing taken Limini by force, and cut off the course of the water, he stayed for the artillerie which was coming out of Germanie, which was no lesse terrible for the quantitie then for the qualitie; of which when part was brought to Vincensa, and Philip Rosse and Federike Gonsague de Bassolo with two hundred light horsemen went forth to guard it, they were encountred by fiue hundred light horsemen that issued out of Padua, being led by the paisants, who in all that warre did much seruice for the Venetians; and ouerthrowne fiue miles from Vincensa, where Philip remained prisoner, and Federike by the fauour of the night escaped in his shirt. From the bridge Brenta, Maximilian caused his companies to march about twelue miles, drawing towards Polesina de Rouigna, the better to open to himselfe the commoditie of victuals; and taking the borough of Este by assault, and putting it to sacke, he went to encampe at Monselica, where the towne standing in the plaine being abandoned, the second day he tooke the Castle standing on the top of a high rocke. Afterwards he tooke by composition Montagnana, from whence returning towards Padua, he incamped at the bridge of Bassanello neare Padua, and assayed in vaine to turne the riuer of Brenta which from thence hath his course to Padua: at which place all the artilleries and munitions which he expected being arriued, and all the regiments of men of warre which lay dis-

perſed in diuers places being come together, he approched the towne with all his armie: and hauing beſtowed foure thouſand footmen in the ſuburbes which are called S. Croſſe, his opinion was to aſſaile it on that ſide. But afterwards being aduertiſed that it was the ſtrongeſt part of the towne both by ſituation and by walls, and that it was the beſt fortified, and alſo for that he [illegible] receiued great harmes by the artilleries of Padua, he determined to remoue and tranſport his armie to the gate Portello, bearing his aſpect to Venice; becauſe he was informed that the towne was moſt weake in that place, and withall to giue impediment to the ſuccours which were to come from Venice to Padua either by land or by water. But for that he could not go thither for the diſcommoditie of certaine marriſhes and waters that ouerflowed the countrey, but by fetching a great circuite, he came to the bridge of Bouolento, which is ſeuen miles from Padua, where be paſtures and feeding grounds vpon the banke of Baguillon towards the ſea, betweene Padua and Venice. Into this place, being enuironed with waters, and in the moſt ſure part of the countrey of Padua, were withdrawne three thouſand paiſants with great heards of cattell, who being forced by the footbands of the Spaniſh and Italians that were in the vauward, were almoſt all taken or ſlaine, the victors for the two dayes following doing nothing elſe but ouer-run the whole countrey, euen to the ſea, driuing away infinite heards of cattell feeding in that quarter. There were alſo taken vpon Brenta diuers barks, which laden with victuals were going vp to Padua. And at laſt, the fifteenth day of September, after he had conſumed much time vnprofitably, and giuen leiſure to the enemie both to fortifie and refurniſh the towne with victuals, he approched the walls of Padua on that ſide towards the gate Portello. There hath not bin ſeen in Italy in this age, nor haply a long time before, a ſiege of more great expectation, nor wherein the minds of men were more buſily occupied, then this, as well for the nobilitie of the Citie, as for the importance that was in the loſing or keeping of the ſame. For Padua a moſt noble and ancient Citie, and renowmed for the Vniuerſitie of ſtudies, and by which do paſſe the riuers of Brenta and Baguillon; it is compaſſed with three orders of wals, and which peraduenture hath as great a circuite of ground, as any of the greateſt Cities of Italy; is ſeated in a countrey fertill, and where the aire is temperate and wholeſome: and although the Venetians won it out of the poſſeſſion of the family of Carrate more then two hundred yeares ſince, yet it retaines many great and ſtately buildings, with many memorable markes of antiquitie, well expreſſing her ancient greatneſſe and beautie. And of the conquering or defending of ſo great a Citie, depended, not onely the confirmation or diminution of the Almaine imperie in Italy, but alſo the very eſtate of the Citie of Venice. For Padua being defended, the Commonweale of Venice abounding in wealth, and being at vnitie in her ſelfe, with ſtore of prompt wits, and ſubiect to no ſuch variations as the affaires of Princes are, may eaſily hope to recouer in ſmall time a part of her iuriſdiction: and ſo much the more, by how much the moſt part of thoſe ſubiects which had thirſted after mutations, hauing not found effects anſwerable to their conceptions, and knowing by compariſon what difference there was betweene the moderate gouernment of the Venetians, and that of the Almaines, farre different from the maners and cuſtomes of the Italians, and greatly diſordered by the confuſions and damages of the warre, they began to be better affected to their ancient gouernment: but on the contrary, if Padua were loſt, the Venetians ſhould loſe all hope to be able to reſtore the glorie of their Commonweale, yea there was great danger that the very Citie of Venice diſpoiled of ſo great an eſtate, & depriued of great riches, & many treaſures, both by the diminution of publike reuenues, and by the loſſe of ſo much goods poſſeſſed by priuate perſons in the firme land, would not be able to maintaine defence againſt the armies of the Princes confederate, or at leaſt would in time become a prey as well to the Turkes (to whom they are neighbours in many places, and with whom they haue had alwayes either warre, or peace vnfaithfull and ill aſſured) as to the Chriſtian Princes. But all men were in no leſſe doubt, the mightie preparations that were made on all ſides keeping wonderfully in ſuſpence the common iudgements, which were very vncertaine on whether part the better fortune would fall, either to the aſſailants or to the defendants. For in the armie of Caſar, beſides the ſeuen hundred French Lances, which Monſieur la Palice commanded, there were two hundred men at armes which the Pope had ſent to his aide; two hundred more ſent by the Duke of Ferrara, vnder the charge of the Cardinall of Eſte, notwithſtanding the quarrels that were betweene them were not yet reconciled; and ſixe hundred Italian Lances vnder ſundry Captaines which he had taken into his pay. He was no leſſe ſtrong in footmen then in horſemen: for he had had eighteene thousand Almaine footmen, sixe thousand Spanish, sixe thousand aduenturers of diuers nations, and two thousand Italians, leuied and payed by the Cardinall of Este vnder the same title. There followed him a wonderfull proportion of all sorts of artilleries, with great quantities of munitions, whereof the French King had sent him part. And albeit for the most part his owne ordinarie bands were not payed, yet, what with the consideration of the greatnesse and authoritie of such a Leader, and the hope to spoile and sacke Padua, and to haue at their deuotion all that the Venetians possessed as yet, they abandoned not their seruice for that, but flocked to him dayly in greater numbers, chiefly for that all men knew, that he that of his owne nature was most liberall and full of humanitie to his souldiers, would not faile of their paiment by couetousnesse or will, but by disabilitie or want. This was the strength of Cæsars armie, not wholly compounded of his owne forces, but also of strangers and mercenaries. But as touching the defence of Padua, the armie which the Venetians had in that Citie, was no lesse mightie: for they had there sixe hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horsemen, fifteene hundred estradiots, commanded by these notable Captaines, the Count Petillane Generall of the whole, Bernardino de Montono, Anthonie de Pio, Luke Maluezzo, John Greeke, with other inferiour leaders. There were besides the horsemen, twelue thousand footmen of the best experienced and trained in all Italy, vnder the charge of Denis de Naldo, Zitole de Perousa, Lactantius de Bergamo, Saccocio de Spoleto, with many other officers: ten thousand foormen, as well Slauonians, Greekes, as Albanois, whom they had drawne from their galleys, of whom albeit many were not much profitable to the seruice, yet some of them were well trained and able to do necessary office. Besides these, they had the youth of Venice and their followers, who albeit they were much respected for their nobilitie and pietie to their countrey, yet for that they offered themselues readily to all dangers, and for the example which they gaue to others, they were of great importance. There was also great store of all prouisions necessarie, great quantities of artilleries, wonderfull plentie of all sorts of victuals, the people of the plaine countreys being no lesse carefull to bring in their prouisions for their common suretie, then the magistrates and officers of Venice to giue order for their continuall refurnishing, and a multitude almost innumerable of paisants, who being leuied at a certaine price, laboured incessantly: in so much as that Citie being very strong for the valour and numbers of the defendants, was wonderfully fortified with rampiers in the whole circuite of the walls: for they had almost filled vp all the waterditch which runneth along the walls, and at euery gate of the towne and other places conuenient, builded many forts and close bastillions without, but so as they were annexed to the walls, and had entries and conueyances into the towne, and being wel repleniſhed with artilleries, they beat such as entred into the trench. And yet to the end y taking of those bastillions should bring no danger to the town, they had made vnder each of them a caue filled with barrels of gun-powder, to blow thē vp into the aire when they could be no longer defended. And not altogether reposing in the greatnesse & goodnes of the old wall, notwithstanding they had viewed it diligently, and repaired it where it was needfull, casting downe the battlements; they made round about the Citie within, a Palissado or fortification of stakes, trees, and other peeces of wood, as farre distant from the wall as it was in thicknesse, and with a wonderfull diligence filled vp to the top of the wall with good earth and well rammed, all the voide place that was betweene. This fortification no lesse wonderfull in effect, then for labour and trauell inestimable, wherein were employed an infinite number of men, did not yet satisfie the expectation of those to whom the defence of that Citie was committed, but the wall being in this sort fortified and redoubled, they cast a trench of sixteene fadome in breadth, and as many in depth, which drawing narrower in the bottome, and standing thicke with murdering houses and litle towers full of shot, seemed impossible to be forced: and these fortifications were made with hollow vaults and caues, according to the example of the bastillions, hauing conueyances to be ouerthrowne by fire when they would. And yet to be further prepared for all occasions, they raised behind the trench a rampier of the same or greater largenesse, which stretched out as farre as the circuite of the towne, except in certaine corners and places, wherein they knew it was impossible to plant artillerie: and before the rampier they cast a parapet of seuen fadome, which was a defence to those that fought vpon the rampier, that they could not be stricken with the artilleries of the enemie. And to the end the courage of the souldiers and men of the towne might easily answer those prouisions and fortifications, when the Count Petillane had assembled the whole armie in the place of S. Anthonie,

and had encouraged them with ſpeeches of great grauitie and valour, to conſider vpon what termes ſtood their common ſafetie and honour, he bound himſelfe, and cauſed to be bound by ſolemne oath all the Captaines, all the armie, and thoſe of the towne, to employ themſelues faithfully in the defence of the Citie, euen to death.

Then the armie of Ceſar being drawne neare the walls of Padua, with ſo great a ſtrength, and againſt ſo mightie a preparation, he ſtretched out his campe from the gate Portello vnto the gate of All Saints which leades to Treuiſa, and from thence enlarged it to the gate of Codalonga which goeth to the Citadell, ſo as it contained three miles in length. Maximilian himſelfe was lodged in the Monaſterie of S. Helen, diſtant a quarter of a mile from the Citie walls, being as it were in the midſt of the Almaine footmen: and after he had giuen to euery one his charge, according to the diuerſitie of nations and places of their encamping, he began to plant his artilleries for the batterie, which could not be accompliſhed (albeit in his perſon being inuincible in mind, and of a bodie hardned with paine and trauels, he performed a wonderfull diligence, running through all places day and night, and being preſent in all actions) but with longneſſe of time and great difficultie, as well for the great quantitie and intollerable greatneſſe of ſome of them, as alſo for that the whole campe, and ſpecially thoſe places where they ſought to plant them, were continually beaten and diſtreſſed with the artilleries of the towne. At laſt, the perpetuall induſtrie of Maximilian ioyned to the valour of his ſouldiers, made way to plant his artilleries, and the ſame day the French and the footmen of the Almaines gaue an aſſault to the tower of the gate on that ſide where Monſieur la Paliſſa had the charge, but more to ſound and proue their countenance, then with intention to fight in good earneſt: and therefore finding the reſiſtance valiant and well furniſhed, they retired eftſoones to their tents. The day following, the artilleries ſhot furiouſly without ceaſſing, the greateſt part of them by their incredible hugeneſſe and vnmeaſurable quantitie of powder that was vſed, piercing through the rampiers, beat downe the houſes that were neare the walls: and now in many places a great ſpace of the wall was caſt downe, and the baſtillion built at the gate of All Saints was beaten downe to the ground; but for al that the defendants, afflicting the camp with continual volleys of ſhot, ſhewed no ſigne of feare: and the eſtradiots that in great valour were lodged in the ſuburbes, refuſing to retire into the towne, and the light horſemen making continuall incurſions in all places, skirmiſhed with their enemies ſometimes before, and ſometimes behind, driuing them euen to their tents, ſometimes they diſtreſſed ſuch as were guards to the forragers and victuallers, and ſometimes ouerrunning and ſpoiling the whole countrey, they troubled all the wayes, except that which goeth from Padua to the mount of Aban: and yet there was in the campe a wonderfull abundance of victuals, euery houſe and place being plentifully furniſhed; for that neither the feare of the paiſants, nor the carefull diligence of the Venetians, nor the infinite harmes of the ſouldiers on both ſides, could waſte or draine vp the great plentie of that moſt fruitfull and fertill countrey. At the ſame time alſo Luke Maluezzo iſſued out of Padua with many horſemen for the conuoy of fortie thouſand duckats which were ſent thither from Venice: and albeit in his returne the enemie charged him vpon the taile, yet he brought in the treaſure in ſafetie, without any other loſſe then of ſome of his men at armes. By the ninth day the artillerie had executed ſo well, that it ſeemed there was no further neceſſitie to ſhoote, and therefore the day following, the whole armie prepared in order of battell to approch the wals; but perceiuing that the ſame night they within the towne had made the water of the ditch to ſwell and riſe, which afore was abated, and Ceſar holding it not neceſſarie to commit his ſouldiers to a manifeſt danger, euery one returned to his lodging. The next day (the water eftſoones abated) they gaue an aſſault (but with ſlender ſucceſſe) to the baſtillion which was made vpon the point of the gate of Codalonga, and therefore the Emperour purpoſing to do what he could to force it, cauſed to be turned thither the artilleries that were planted in the quarter of the French, lying betweene the gates of All Saints and Codalonga: wherewith hauing ruined ſome part, two dayes after he commanded the Almain and Spaniſh footmen, accompanied with certaine men at armes on foote to giue the aſſault, who fighting valiantly aſcended the baſtillion, and ſet vp there two enſignes. But the fortreſſe of the ditch was ſuch, and no leſſe the vertue of the defendants, (amongſt whom Zitolo of Perouſa fighting brauely and with great honor, was ſore hurt) and ſo plentifull the inſtruments of defence, not onely of artilleries, but alſo of ſtones and wildfires, that they were conſtrained to deſcend by heapes, many being wounded and many ſlaine: in ſo much as the armie that ſtood

in readineſſe to giue the aſſault to the wall, as ſoone as the baſtillion ſhould be taken (as they thought) retired, and diſarmed, without making any other attempt. Maximilian by this experience loſt all hope of the victorie; and therefore determining to go his way, after he had beſtowed his artilleries in ſure places, he retired with all his armie to the towne of Limini which is towards Treuiſa, the ſeuenteenth day after he was encamped before Padua: and afterwards with many baites and reſting places he went to Vincenſa, from whence when he had taken of that people the oath of fidelitie, and diſmiſſed almoſt all his armie, he tooke his way towards Verona, being not a litle diſcontent that his deliberations had ſucceeded no better, but much more for that they were maruellouſly taxed, both in his armie and throughout all Italy: and no leſſe the execution of the things determined. For no man doubted, that the cauſe why he tooke not Treuiſa, and that he loſt Padua, was any other then his owne fault; and alſo that his too late arriuing afore Padua, made the action more hard, for that thereby the Venetians had time to make prouiſion of ſouldiers, to repleniſh Padua with victuals, and to make ſuch admirable preparations and fortifications. And he himſelfe denied not, but that had bene the cauſe that the Citie was defended; but putting off the faults of his varietie and diſorders, and caſting them vpon others, he complained of the Pope and the French king, for that the one had ſuffered the Embaſſadours of Venice to go to Rome, and the other had bene too ſlow in ſending ſuccours; the ſame giuing occaſion to the world to beleeue that they were eſtranged from him, and had likewiſe encouraged the countrymen of the mountaines of Vincenſa to draw into rebellion; for the ſubduing of whom, after he had conſumed many dayes, he likewiſe found (for the ſame cauſe) the like difficulties in the plaine countrey: Alſo that to open way, and aſſure himſelfe of victuals, and to free himſelfe from many inconueniences, he was conſtrained to take all the townes of the countrey: That herein the ſlow marching of the French had not onely much hurt him, but if they had come in due time, the reuolt of Padua had not happened: And that as well for this, as for that the Kings of France and Aragon had diſmiſſed their armie at ſea, the Venetians being freed from all other feares, had the better oportunitie to furniſh and fortifie Padua. And he complained further, that theſe difficulties were very plauſible to the King of Aragon, as meanes the more eaſily to induce him to conſent that the adminiſtration and gouernment of the kingdome of Caſtile ſhould remaine to him. But theſe complaints did nothing better his conditions, nor recouer his authoritie loſt, not knowing how to vſe ſo faire occaſions: for the French King was well content that ſuch an opinion was generally conceiued of him, and the Pope cared not much, who of his owne inclination being ſuſpitions and diſtruſtfull, and conſidering that the Emperour alwayes wanted money, and was importunate in demanding of it, was vnwilling that his name ſhould increaſe in Italy. At Verona he receiued the oath of fidelitie, and in that Citie the Florentine Embaſſadours, whereof Peter Guicciardin my father was one, couenanted with him in the name of that Commonweale (induced thereunto, beſides other reaſons, by the perſwaſions of the French King) to pay him within a ſhort time fortie thouſand duckats: for which promiſe they obtained of him moſt ample priuiledges, for the confirmation as well of the libertie of Florence, as of the dominion and iuriſdiction of the townes and eſtates which they held, together with acquittance and diſcharge of all duties and demands for the time paſt. Thus Ceſar being reſolued to returne into Germanie, to giue order (as he ſaid) for the warres he intended to make in the Spring of the yeare, ſent for Monſieur de Chaumont to come and commune with him about the preſent affaires: and when he was come vnto him at the village of Ars in the territorie of Verona, he layed afore him what danger there was, that the Venetians would come and recouer Ciuitella and Baſſana, places of great importance, which they prepared to aſſaile, being made proud by the defence of Padua: alſo that there was danger leſt they would do the like afterwards to Monſelica, Montagnana and Eſte. That it was neceſſarie, not onely to looke to the keeping of theſe places, but alſo to be carefull of the meanes to recouer Legnago: and that he himſelfe being ſufficiently able to leuie prouiſions neceſſarie for ſuch effects; it was needfull that the King ſhould aide him, whoſe places would fall into manifeſt danger, if the peeces which he held were not ſupported. To theſe demands, Monſieur de Chaumont, in whom was no power to make any certaine reſolution, gaue anſwer, that he would aduertiſe the King, and that he hoped the anſwer would be conformable to his deſire. After this conference, Ceſar went to Chiuſa, leauing the Marquis of Brandenbourg for the guard of Verona; and a litle after, Monſieur de Paliſſa remaining with fiue hundred Lances vpon the countrey of Verona, alledging the difficulties of lodging lodging and many other incommodities, after he had gotten leaue of him, almoſt by importunitie, he retired to the frontier of the Duchie of Millan: for that the Kings intention was, that if his men of warre ſhould remaine in garriſon and do nothing, they ſhould not abide vpon his eſtate, but ſhould returne to the ſeruice of Maximilian, to expect ſuch enterpriſes as he would embrace, but chiefly that of Legnaguo, the which though it was much deſired and ſolicited by him, yet was it ſo much deferred by his accuſtomed difficulties, that the raines fell ſo faſt by the propertie of the ſeaſon, that it was impoſſible to encamp in that country, which for the lowneſſe thereof is much ſubiect to waters: and therefore the Emperour being brought into theſe ſtraits, deſired a truce with the Venetians for certaine moneths. But they taking courage by theſe diſorders, and ſeeing how ſlowly the Confederates miniſtred to his aide, iudged it not for their profite to conſent to any ſurceaſſing of armes.

At laſt the Emperour returned to Trent, leauing thoſe places that he held in great danger, and all Italy in great doubt: for there was raiſed a new contention betweene the Pope and the French King, the foundation whereof although it ſeemed to proceed from light occaſions, yet it was feared leſt it aroſe of ſome ſecret practiſes and cauſes of greater importance then ſuch as were made knowne; which was this: A Biſhopricke being voide in Prouence by the death of the incumbent, dying in the Court of Rome, the Pope had diſpoſed of it againſt the liking of the French King, who pretended that ſuch an action was contrary to the capitulation which the Cardinall of Pauie had made betweene them; wherein although it were not expreſſed in words, that there ſhould be equall obſeruation touching the Biſhopricks that ſhould fall voide in the Court of Rome, as in thoſe that ſhould fall vacant in other places, yet that the Cardinall had promiſed him ſo by word of mouth: which the Cardinall denying to be true, more perhaps for feare then for any other occaſion, the Pope affirmed, that he tooke no knowledge of any thing that was promiſed in ſecret, but that in the ratification he had regard to that that appeared in the writing, wherein he had ſet downe diſtinctly all the contents of the capitulation, article by article, and the caſe concerning the Biſhops dying in the Court of Rome being not therein comprehended, he was no further bound. And therefore the ſame diſcontentment increaſing, the King (reiecting, contrary to his cuſtome, the counſell of the Cardinall of Amboiſe, who had alwayes aduiſed him to be at accord with the Pope) made ſequeſtration of the fruites of all thoſe benefices which the Churchmen reſident in the Court of Rome held in the Duchie of Millan: and on the other ſide, the Pope refuſed to giue the Cardinals Hat to the Biſhop of Albie, who, according to the promiſe made to the King, was gone to Rome to receiue it. And although the Pope, ouercome by the requeſts of many, diſpoſed in the end of the Biſhopricke of Prouence according to the Kings mind, and made a new agreement with him touching the proceeding in benefices that hereafter ſhould fall in the Court of Rome; and in that regard the ſequeſtrations to ceaſſe on the one ſide, and on the other part the Hat to be transferred to the Biſhop of Albie: yet theſe things ſuffiſed not to moderate the mind of the Pope, who was not a litle kindled for many reaſons, but ſpecially for that hauing from the beginning of his Popedome very vnwillingly transferred the Legation of the Realme of France to the Cardinall of Amboiſe, as hurtfull to the Court of Rome, and preiudiciall to his authoritie; it was moſt grieuous vnto him (to auoide the diſpleaſure of the French King) to continue it to him: and therefore perſwading himſelfe that the ſame Cardinall aſpired with all his thoughts and meanes to the Popedome, he ſtood in feare and doubt of euery progreſſe and moouing of the French. Theſe were the apparent cauſes of his diſcontentment; but by that which was diſcerned afterwards, he propoſed to himſelfe greater ends, deſiring vehemently, either for greedineſſe of glorie, or for ſome ſecret hatred againſt the French King, or at leaſt longing for the libertie of the Genoways, that the King might loſe all that he poſſeſſed in Italy: and he ceaſſed not to complaine openly of him and the Cardinall of Amboiſe; but ſo, that it ſeemed his diſcontentment proceeded chiefly of feare. And yet, as he was of nature obſtinate and inuincible, and for the moſt part accompanied the diſpoſition of his mind with outward demonſtrations: ſo though he aſpired in his thoughts to an end of ſo great conſequence and hard to obtaine, truſting onely to himſelfe, and in the reuerence and authoritie which he knew Chriſtian Princes bare to the Papall ſeate, he woud not enter into alliance nor depend vpon any; but ſhewing both by words and deeds how litle account he made of all, he forbare to ioyne with Maximilian, and refuſed to enter into ſecret intelligence with the King Catholike, but eſtranging himſelfe from all the reſt, he inclined onely to the part of the the Venetians, reſoluing dayly more and more to abſolue them; iudging it a thing very conuenient for the common ſafetie of Italy, and for his particular ſuretie and greatneſſe, not to ſuffer them to periſh. Againſt this the Embaſſadours of Maximilian and the French King, made great reſiſtance, with whom was publikely concurrant in the ſame buſineſſe the Embaſſadour of the King of Aragon, notwithſtanding ſecretly he ſolicited the Pope to the contrary, fearing the greatneſſe of the French King in regard of the kingdome of Naples, and repoſing litle in the diſpoſition of Ceſar, for the ſlender ſtabilitie that was in him. Theſe Embaſſadours alledged, that it was not reaſonable, that the Pope ſhould do ſo great a benefite for thoſe whom he was bound to purſue with armes; ſeeing that by the confederation of Cambray euery Confederate was bound reciprocally to aid one another till there was abſolute recouery of all thoſe places which were named for euery one in particular: Wherefore then ſeeing Ceſar had not yet conquered Treuiſa, none of them was freed of that bond: beſides that, he might iuſtly refuſe abſolution to the Venetians, for that they had not reſtored to the Church the townes of Romagna, either willingly, or in the time ſet downe in the monition: nay, they had not as yet fully obeyed, for that they were admoniſhed beſides the townes, to reſtore the fruites, which they haue not accompliſhed. But hereunto the Pope anſwered, that ſince they were returned to penance, and had ſought for abſolution with great humilitie, it was not the office of Chriſts Vicar to perſecute them any further with ſpirituall weapons to the preiudice of ſo many thouſand ſoules, ſpecially hauing obtained of them the Townes, and by that meanes the occaſion ceaſſing for which they had bene ſubiect to the cenſures of the Church: That touching the reſtitution of the fruites, it was but a matter accidentall, and vrged more to aggrauate their diſobedience, then for any other reaſon; and that it was not meete that that ſhould ſtand againſt them as a matter of importance: That it was an action of another nature to purſue them with temporall armes, wherein (ſeeing he had determined in the league of Cambray to perſeuere) he offered himſelfe readie to be concurrant with the others; although any of the Confederates might iuſtly leaue off, for that if Ceſar had not Treuiſa, it was through his owne fault, in refuſing the firſt offers which the Venetians made to him by their Embaſſador Anthonie Iuſtinia, to leaue him all that they poſſeſſed in the firme land; and alſo the other offer, which they made him many times ſince, to giue him ſufficient recompence in exchange for Treuiſa. And thus not being retained by any contradiction of the Embaſſadours, he was ſlow to this action onely by the haughtineſſe of his mind, whereby it came to paſſe, that albeit he eſteemed the abſolution of the Venetians to be profitable vnto him, and to the plots he had layed, yet he had determined not to giue it them, but with great reſpect to his authoritie, and in ſuch ſort, as whatſoeuer was dependant of the Church, might be wholly freed from their oppreſſions: which was the cauſe that the Venetians being vnwilling to yeeld to two conditions which he propoſed vnto them among many others, he deferred to abſolue them. One of the conditions was, that they ſhould leaue the nauigation of the Adriatique ſea free to the ſubiects of the Church, which they reſtrained to all thoſe that would not pay them a certaine tribute for the merchandize they brought: the other, that they ſhould continue no longer at Ferrara (a Citie depending of the Church) the office of Vicedomino. The Venetians alledged, that they of Ferrara had conſented to it, Pope Clement the ſixt giuing no impediment, who at that time remained with his Court in the Citie of Auignon: and that Pope Alexander the fourth had giuen them the iuriſdiction and guard of the Gulfe with very large priuiledges; being hereunto moued, for that with their armes, by their vertue, and with their expences they had defended it againſt the Saracens and pirats, and made that nauigation ſafe for the Chriſtians. To theſe reaſons it was anſwered on ꝯ Popes behalfe, that they of Ferrara could not in preiudice of the Eccleſiaſtike iuriſdiction, conſent, that any other ſhould hold office or exerciſe dominiō in Ferrara: & that the people of Ferrara had not willingly conſented, but forced by a long & grieuous war, and hauing in vaine craued aid of the Pope, whoſe cenſures the Venetians contemned, were conſtrained to accept peace at the diſcretion of thoſe, who could do more againſt them by arms then by reaſon. And wheras they ſay it was granted to thē by Pope Alexander, there appeareth nothing either in hiſtories or cōtracts, neither is there any othet thing to cauſe vs to beleeue it, ſaue only the teſtimonie of the Venetians, which in their owne cauſe, of ſo great conſequence, is to be ſuſpected: & though there ſhould ſome ſuch thing appeare, yet it is more likely, that he, whom they ſaid had accorded to ſuch things in Venice, had done it by threatnings or for feare, then that a Pope of Rome, to whom afore all others appertained the defence of iuſtice, and the

recourſe of the oppreſſed, would haue conſented to a thing ſo imperious and domageable to all the world.

In this eſtate of affaires, diuerſitie of intentions of Princes, and ſmall power and reputation of the Emperour, the Venetians ſent their armie to Vincenſa vnder the leading of Andrew Gritti, knowing that the people there deſired to returne vnder their obedience; and making their approch in the euening, after they had battered the ſuburbes of Portello with the artilleries, they tooke it. Touching the Citie, although there were very few ſouldiers in it, yet the Venetians had no great aſſurance to carrie it: but the townesmen, ſtirred vp by Fracaſſe (as the bruite went) after they had ſent Embaſſadours to them about midnight, let them in, and the Prince of Henault and Fracaſſe retired into the Caſtle. And it was aſſuredly beleeued, that if the Venetian armie, hauing obtained Vincenſa, had without delay approched Verona, that towne had done the like: but the Captaines thought it not fit to depart out of the towne vntill the Caſtle were taken, which they had the fourth day, for that the Prince of Henault and Fracaſſe finding themſelues too weake, left it abandoned. In the meane time 5 companies of Ceſar entred Verona, and three hundred Lances of the French King, vnder the charge of Monſieur d'Aubigny: in ſo much as containing a ſtrength of fiue hundred Lances and fiue thouſand footmen Spaniſh & Almains, it was now no more eaſie to take it. Not long after the Venetian armie approched Verona, being deuided into two parts, in either of which were three hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſmen, and three thouſand footmen. They hoped, that as ſoone as they were approched, there would be ſome commotion in the Citie, but becauſe they preſented not themſelues afore the walls all at one time, thoſe within the towne going to afront the former part which came beyond the riuer of Adice, and was already entred the ſuburbes, conſtrained them to retire; and Luke MalueZZo coming a litle after on the other ſide of the riuer with the other part, retired alſo: and both theſe ioyning together, incamped in the village of S. Martin within fiue miles of Verona, where vnderſtanding that two thouſand Almain footmen iſſued out of Baſciana, were gone to make pillage about Ciuitella, turning that way, they encloſed them in a valley called Fidato: but the Almaines being ſuccoured by thoſe of Baſciana, made their way by force, though not without ſome hurt by reaſon of the ſtraite paſſages, and leauing Baſciana abandoned, the Venetians tooke it. From Baſciana part of the armie went to Feltre and Ciuital, which places after they had recouered, they preſented themſelues before the Rocke of Eſcalo, which was taken as ſoone as the artilleries were planted. At the ſame time Anthonie and Hierome Sauorgniana, Gentlemen that followed the Venetians in the countrey of Friul, tooke Newcaſtle, which ſtandeth on a rough mountaine in the midſt of the Patrimonie (ſo is that part of Friul called which is beyond the riuer of Taillement:) and all this while there was no other thing heard of Maximilian (who being moued with the action of Vincenſa, was ſuddenly come to Pietra) then vaine rumours, and that he often trauelled from one place to another in great diligence, but without any effect.

After this, the Venetian armie drew towards Monſelice and Montagnana, both to recouer Poleſina de Rouigna, and to enter vpon the places of Ferrara, together with ſome boates, which the Senate, (reiecting the counſell of the moſt wiſe Senators, who iudged it raſhneſſe to intangle themſelues with new enterpriſes) had determined to ſend againſt the Duke of Ferrara, well furniſhed with ſtrength and munition along the riuer of Po. They were moued to this action, not ſo much for the profite of the affaires preſent, as for the incredible hatred they had conceiued againſt him: it ſeeming to them that they could not iuſtly complaine of that he had done, to ſhake off the yoke of Vicedomino, and to recouer Poleſina; but that they ought not to ſuffer, that not being content with that which he pretended to appertaine to him by right, he aſpired to retaine that which did no way appertaine vnto him; for that at ſuch time as Ceſar raiſed his ſiege from before Padua, he receiued of him in fee the borough of Eſte (from whence is ſprong the ſurname of the family of Eſte) and by way of pawne, the borough Montagnana, for aſſurance of the money that he had lent him; to which places he had no right at all. They added hereunto the remembrance that his ſouldiers in the recouerie of Poleſina, puſhed on with an incredible hatred againſt the Venetian name, had executed great harmes vpon the Gentlemen, raging cruelly againſt their houſes, and ſetting them on fire. In theſe reſpects it was agreed, that their nauie commanded by Ange Treuiſan, compounded of ſixteene galleys, with a great number of ſmaller veſſels well furniſhed with men of warre, ſhould ſaile towards Ferrara: the which armie being en-tred into Po by the mouth of Fornacies, and hauing burnt Coruola with certaine other villages neare to Po, went ſpoiling all the countrey vp to the lake of Scuro, from which place the light horſemen who followed them as a ſtrength by land, made incurſions as farre as Ficherolo, which is rather a houſe of pleaſure then a Caſtle, but of great reputation, for that Robert S. Seuerin lay long time before it, being Captaine to the Venetians in the warre which they had againſt Hercules father to Alphonſo. The coming of this nanie, together with the rumor of the armie by land that was to follow, brought no litle amaze to the Duke of Ferrara, who, hauing but a ſlender ſtrength of ſouldiers, and the inhabitants of Ferrara, either for their ſmall numbers, or for their ignorance in warre, not ſufficient enough to oppoſe againſt ſuch a danger, he had no other meane to defend himſelfe vntill the ſuccours which he expected from the Pope and French king were come vnto him, then to let with force of ſhot beſtowed vpon the brinke of Po, that the enemies ſhould paſſe no further: for which cauſe when Treuiſan had in vaine aſſayed to paſſe, and ſeeing he could aduance nothing except he were ſuccoured by land, he came to an anker in the midſt of the riuer of Po behind a litle Ile, right ouer againſt Puliſelle, a place within eleuen miles of Ferrara, and very apt to annoy the towne. His intention was to expect there the army, who had gotten all Poleſina without any difficultie, hauing firſt recouered Montagnana by compoſition, whereby the magiſtrates of Ferrara were deliuered to them as priſoners, together with the Captaines of the footmen that were within. In this time of expectation of the armie, for the more ſafe riding of the galleys in the place where they lay, Treuiſan began to raiſe two baſtillions vpon the banks of Po, the one on that ſide to Ferrara, the other vpon the ſhore right againſt it, caſting withall a bridge vpon the veſſels to haue the more oportunitie to ſuccour that baſtillion that was on Ferrara ſide: the finiſhing whereof, the Duke purpoſing to hinder, but with a counſell haply more couragious then diſcreete, hauing called together as many of the youth of the towne as he could, with ſuch companies of ſouldiers as came to his pay, he ſent them continually to aſſaile the baſtillion on a ſudden: but the defendants receiuing ſuccous of their peoples which iſſued out of the veſſels, began to diſorder the enemie and put them to flight; and albeit the Duke himſelfe came to the medley with a freſh ſuccour of horſemen, and with his preſence brought a new heart to moſt of his people not trained in warre, and reduced them into order, yet ſuch was the furie of the enemie, for whom the ſuretie of the place fought, being manned with many peeces of ſmall ſhot, that in the end he was conſtrained to retire, leauing many of his people either dead or taken, and that not ſo many of the vnexperienced and baſe multitude, as of the moſt braue ſouldiers and nobilitie of Ferrara; amongſt whom was Hercules Cantelmo, a yong man of great hope, whoſe anceſtors aforetime were Dukes of Sore in the kingdome of Naples: for as certaine Slauonian ſouldiers led him priſoner into a galley, and contending amongſt themſelues to which of them he ſhould be priſoner, there was one of them, who, with a rare example of barbarous crueltie, miſerably ſtroke off his head. Wherefore the towne of Ferrara ſeeming to all men to be in great danger, Monſieur de Chaumont ſent to the ſuccours of it the Lord of Chaſtillion with an hundred and fiftie French Lances: and the Pope being kindled againſt the Venetians for entring into that action without any regard to the ſuperioritie which the Church hath there, appointed the two hundred men at armes which he had ſent to Cæſars aide, to be conuerted to the defence of Ferrara. But theſe ſuccours haply had come too late, if the Venetians had not bene compelled to looke to the defence of their owne eſtate. For as the troubles wherein Maximilian was (as hath bene declared before) were nothing grieuous to the French King, partly for the continuall feare he had of his proſperitie, and partly for that burning in deſire to make himſelfe Lord of Verona, he hoped by reaſon of his neceſſities to haue it of him at laſt, either by purchaſe or by engaging: but on the other ſide he was much diſpleaſed that the Venetian greatneſſe was eſtſoones reeſtabliſhed, which would turne him to continuall perill and perplexitie for his Duchie of Millan. And therefore Cæſar not hauing ſufficiently furniſhed Verona for want of money, the French King was conſtrained to enter into care of things, and by ſending thither new companies, beſides thoſe men at armes which were there already, ſo to prouide that that Citie returned not to their obedience. To this Monſieur de Chaumont gaue beginning, who, after the loſſe of Vincenſa, being come vpon the marches of Verona, he retained in the French kings pay two thouſand Spaniſh footmen, which were within Verona, who began to draw into tumult for want of paiment: and he ſent thither for a greater ſuretie, other bands of footmen, according to the aduice of Triuulce; who, for that Monſieur de Chaumont feared leſt

the King would be diſcontented with ſo great expences, made anſwer, that it was better the King ſhould charge him with the expence of his money, then to haue loſt or put in danger his eſtate. Beſides this, he lent to Ceſar eight thouſand duckats to pay the ſouldiers that were within Verona, but receiuing in pawne for the repaiment of that ſumme and others which afterward he ſhould aduance for his affaires, the towne of Vallegge, a place which the King eſteemed much for the ſuretie of Breſſe, for as much as it is within ſixe miles of Breſſe, and is a paſſage ouer Mincia; yea ſuch a one, as he who poſſeſſeth Vallegge and Peſquiero, is maiſter of that riuer. The comming of Monſieur de Chaumont being followed with the moſt part of the Lances in the Duchie of Millan, together with the companies which he had put into Verona, and the rumour that ran of his preparation to beſiege Vincenſa, were the cauſes that the Venetian armie, leauing for the defence of Poleſina and to ſuccour their nauie, foure hundred light horſemen and foure hundred footmen, retired from the country of Ferrara, deuiding themſelues into Legnaguo, Soaue, & Vincenſa: and being carefull to aſſure Vincenſa, and to prouide that the country thereabout were not diſtreſſed by the garriſon of Verona, they fortified it with a wonderfull trench, large and full of water, enuironed with a rampier, whereon were diſperſed many baſtillions. It began from the foote of the mountaine which lieth below Soaue, and reaching about fiue miles along the plaine that leades from Rouigna to Montfort, it ended neare to certaine mariſhes which ioyne to the riuer of Adice. They alſo fortified Soaue and Legnaguo, by which meanes ſtanding vpon their gard, they aſſured all the countrey, chiefly for the winter ſeaſon. By the departure of the Venetian regiments, the danger of Ferrara was ſomewhat diminiſhed, but not altogether taken away; for though they were acquited of all feare to be forced, yet they were troubled with a ſuſpition leſt the people for the great harmes they receiued would diminiſh, or elſe fall into the laſt deſpaire. For the ſouldiers of the nauie and their followers, ranne vp euery day euen to the gates of the towne, and other veſſels of the Venetians which had on another ſide aſſailed the ſtate of the Duke of Ferrara, had taken Comachio. About this time arriued the companies of the Pope and the French king, and therefore the Duke, who (being warned afore by the harmes receiued in the aſſault of the baſtillion) was incamped in a ſtrong place neare to Ferrara, began to make many incurſions, to draw the enemies to battell, who hoping that their armie would returne, refuſed to fight vntil then. And it hapned one day that the Cardinall of Eſte hauing run vp neare to the baſtillion, as he returned backe, a ſhot came out of one of the veſſels of the enemies, which carried away the head of the Count Lodowike de la Mirandola, one of the Captaines of the Church, none other in ſo great a multitude being hurt, either with that or any other ſhot. At laſt the knowledge of the countrey, and of the nature and oportunitie of the riuer, made eaſie that which in the beginning had ſeemed hard and dangerous. For the Duke and the Cardinall, hoping to be able to deſtroy their nauie with the artillerie, if they could by any meanes bring it ſafely vpon the banke of the riuer, the Cardinall returned to charge the baſtillion with part of the bands, and giuing the repulſe to the enemie which were iſſued out to the skirmiſh, and making ſlaughter of ſome of them, he occupied and fortified that part that was next to the riſing, and ſo without all priuitie and knowledge of the enemie, vpon the beginning of the night, he drew the artillerie to the banke ſide right ouer againſt them, and planting it with great ſilence, he began to ſhoote vpon the enemies with a wonderfull furie. The veſſels ſought to ſaue themſelues by flying, but becauſe there was a long traine of great peeces of artillerie, which managed by men experienced, beat afar off, they rather changed the place of peril, then auoided ỹ danger, ſpecially when the Duke himſelf came vnto thẽ, who knew both how to make artilleries, & how to manage them. By reaſon of ſo many ſhots of artillerie, notwithſtanding the enemies for their part ceaſſed not to ſhoot, but in vaine, for that they that played vpon the brinke were couered with the riſing of the hill, their veſſels were conſumed with ſundry miſerable aduentures. Some of them that could no more gouerne themſelues againſt the furie of the ſhot, yeelded; others, being ſet on fire by the ſhot of the artilleries, were miſerably burnt with the men that were in them: others, for that they would not fall into the hands of the enemie, ſunke themſelues: and the Generall, leaping into a litle skiffe almoſt in the beginning of the skirmiſh, found ſafetie by the ſwiftnes of his oares, and his gally being galled through both ſides, was ſunk after it had fled about three miles, vſing continuall defence againſt the aduerſitie of her fortune. To be ſhort, the riuer being full of bloud, of fire, and of dead bodies, fifteene galleys fell into the power of the Duke, with certaine great ſhips, many foiſts, and an infinite number of ſmall veſſels. There died about two thouſand bodies, ſome by ſhot, ſome by fire, and ſome by water: threeſcore enſignes were taken, but not the principall ſtandard, which was ſaued with the Generall: many recouered the ſhore, whereof ſome were gathered vp by the Venetian light horſemen, and ſaued by that meanes; others being purſued by the enemie, were taken priſoners, and others in flying receiued many harmes by the paiſants. The veſſels taken were carried to Ferrara, where, in memorie of ſo great a victorie, they were kept many yeares, vntill Duke Alphonſo hauing a deſire to gratifie the Venetians, made reſtitution. Immediatly after the ouerthrow of this nauie, Duke Alphonſo diſpatched with expedition three hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footmen to do the like to them that had taken Comachio, who recouered Loretto which the Venetians had fortified, and as it was thought, had broken the whole armie, if, ſeeing into their danger, they had not retired to Bebia, finding more ſuretie to auoide the perill, then to hope in fortune. This was the end of the ſiege of Ferrara, which continued about a moneth, the euent and iſſue whereof (which ordinarily is the true touchſtone whereby men may iudge of things) did well declare how much wiſer were the counſels of a few, who perſwaded that leauing all other enterpriſes, and reſeruing their treaſures to be employed in actions more conuenient and profitable, they ſhould onely looke to the preſeruation of Padua, Treuiſa, with other places recouered; then of ſuch, who though more in number, yet inferiour in diſcretion, and pricked forward with paſſions of hate and diſdaine, tooke pleaſure to be intangled with ſo many enterpriſes, which being vndertaken raſhly, were at laſt the cauſe of incredible expences, with ſhame & loſſe to the Commonweale. But about Padua, matters ſucceeded rather to the furtherance of the Venetians then otherwiſe. For, Cæſar keeping vpon the country of Vincenſa with foure thouſand footmen, a part of the regiment of the Venetians (and that neither ſtrong nor great) with the aide of the paiſants of that quarter, tooke almoſt before his eyes, the paſſage of Eſcalo, Cogolo and Baſciana, which is a place of importance, & conuenient to hinder the deſcending of the Almaines into Italy: and he complaining that by the departure of Monſieur la Paliſſa many diſorders had befallen him, went at laſt to Boſſana to aſſiſt the Diot which by his appointment was to be kept at Inſpruch: according to which example, Monſieur de Chaumont left off all his thoughts and deſires to performe the enterpriſe of Vincenſa and Legnaguo, conſidering withall that thoſe places were well manned and fortified, and the ſeaſon of the time very contrary; and retired to Millan, leauing good garriſon within Breſſe, Peſquiero and Valegge; and within Verona (for that Cæſar of himſelfe was not able to defend it) he beſtowed ſixe hundred Lances and foure thouſand footmen, who being ſeparate from the ſouldiers of Cæſar, were lodged in the ſuburbes of S. Zena, hauing yet the Citadell in their power for their greater ſuretie. Verona a noble and ancient Citie, is deuided by the riuer of Adice, a riuer both large and deepe coming from the mountaines of Almaine, and as it falls into the plaine, it goeth crooking on the left hand, touching vpon the foote of the mountaines, and ſo entreth into Verona, and when it iſſueth out, it runneth from the mountaines and ſpreadeth into a pleaſant and fertile plaine. That part of Verona which hath his ſituation vpon the deſcent and ſomewhat into the plaine, is beyond Adice towards Almaine: the other on this ſide Adice, and all in a goodly plaine, hauing Mantua for his proſpect. Vpon the mountaine neare S. Georges gate, ſtandeth the Caſtle of S. Peter, and within two croſ-bowes ſhot from thence drawing againſt the hill, is the Caſtle of S. Felix, ſtanding vpon the very top of the hill, both the one and the other being farre better fenced by the nature of the place then by art; and yet to loſe them, for that by the aduantage of their ſituation they commanded the Citie, were to put Verona in manifeſt danger. Theſe Caſtles were kept by the Lanceknights: but in the other part which is ſeparate from this by the riuer, is the old Caſtle looking towards Peſquiero, and hath his ſituation almoſt in the midſt of the Citie, going croſſe the riuer with a bridge: and three croſ-bowes ſhot from thence towards Vincenſa, ſtands the Citadell, and betweene them both, the walls of the Citie ioyne without, in forme of halfe a circle; but within, is a wall going from the one to the other, which is betweene two great ditches, and the ſpace betweene both the wals is called the ſuburbes of S. Zena, which, with the guard of the Citadell was appointed for the lodging of the French. Now whileſt armes were there as it were in reſt, Maximilian ſolicited continually to make truce with the Venetians, the Pope alſo interpoſing very diligently by the working of Achilles de Graſſi Biſhop of Peſere, and his Nuncio: and to this end his Embaſſadours went to the Hoſpitall which is aboue Eſcalo, to negociate with Iohn Cornaro and Lewis Monſenigno Embaſſadours for the Venetians. But by reaſon of the exceſſiue demands of Deſcription of Verona.

Caſar, this conference tooke no effect, to the great diſcontentment of the Pope, who wiſhed that the Venetians might be deliuered of all trouble, with whom he had wrought ſo much, to the end there ſhould be no matter of queſtion, to render to the Duke of Ferrara the towne of Comacho, which they had burned before: and they had promiſed him to vexe no more the eſtate of the Duke of Ferrara, whom he fauoured and ſupported much, both to make him beholding to him, for that he had obtained, and was to obtaine by his meane; and alſo for the hope he had that hereafter he would depend more vpon him then of the French king; againſt whom, being in continuall ſtudie to lay foundations of right great importance, he had ſecretly diſpatched a meſſenger to the King of England, and begun to work the Swiſſers, who were at that time entred into ſome quarrell with the French King: and when the Biſhop of Sion (whom the Latins call Sedunenſis) enemy to the French King, who by this meanes ſought to be Cardinal, came vnto him, he receiued him with great ioy.

About the end of this yeare, Maximilian and the King Catholike were reconciled, who were at diſcord touching the gouernment of the Realmes of Caſtile. This controuerſie was long debated in the Court of France; and albeit it ſuffered many great difficulties, yet in the end it was brought to perfection by the vndiſcreete counſell of the Cardinall of Amboiſe, who conſidered not how much this vnion was hurtfull to the affaires of his King. But, it may be, he thought that if by his working they might come to agreement, it would be a good meane to raiſe him to the Popedome. He wrought ſo then by his diligence and authoritie, that he induced Maximilian to conſent that the King Catholike, in caſe he had no iſſue males, ſhould be gouernour ouer thoſe Realmes vntill their litle ſonne Charles were come to the age of fiue and twentie yeers, who ſhould not take vpon him the title of King during the life of his mother who had the title of Queene, for that in Caſtile the males exclude not the females: That the King Catholicke ſhould pay to Caſar fiftie thouſand duckats: That he ſhould aide him according to the treatie of Cambray, vntill he had conquered and recouered all that appertained to him: And laſtly, to pay to Charles euery yeare fortie thouſand duckats. By which conuention the King of Aragon was confirmed Gouernor ouer the Realme of Caſtile, and ſtanding now in ſtate to haue credite with Caſar, ſince all controuerſies were determined, and that they both had equall intereſts touching their nephew; he might now more boldly looke into the meanes by which he might hinder the greatneſſe of the French King, which was alwayes ſuſpected vnto him in regard of the kingdome of Naples. About this time, the Pope entred into ſuſpition, that the Pronotarie Bentiuole remaining at Cremona, laboured ſecretly to returne into Bologna, for which cauſe he cauſed Iulian de Medicis to be retained in the Pallace of Bologna for certaine dayes: and attributing all things to the hatred of the French King againſt him, he made knowne the feare he had, leſt he would paſſe into Italy to ſubdue it, and to make Pope by violence the Cardinall of Amboiſe: and yet at the ſame time, he ſpake openly in derogation of the honor of Caſar, as of a perſon incapable of ſuch a dignitie, and who by his incapacitie had brought the name of the Empire into great contempt. About the end of this yeare died the Count Petillane, Generall of the Venetians, a man of great age and long experience in the art militarie, and of that credite and truſt, that the Venetians neuer feared he would by raſhneſſe put their State in danger.

The death of the Count Petillane.

The yeare after, which was the yeare 1510, the ſame doubts and ſuſpitions continuing, warres began to ſtirre on all parts, but coldly, and according to the ſeaſon. For the Venetian armie lying encamped at S. Boniface vpon the countrey of Verona, held Verona as it were beſieged: from whence Charles Baillon, Federike de Boſſolo, and Sacromoro Viſcount, comming to their ſuccours, were charged by the eſtradiots, who ouerthrew them, and tooke priſoners Charles and Sacromoro, for Federike found ſafetie in the reſcue of the French, which iſſued out of Verona to their ſuccours: and a litle after, theſe eſtradiots brake another band of French horſemen, amongſt whom Monſieur de Ceſy was taken priſoner: and on the other ſide, two hundred French Lances iſſuing out of Verona with three thouſand footmen, tooke by aſſault a baſtillion towards Soaue, which was guarded by ſixe hundred footmen, and in their returne they ouerthrew a great multitude of paiſants. But whileſt the warre went on thus coldly, the minds of the Princes were in great paine and care, but ſpecially Caſar, who not knowing how he might carrie the victorie of the warre againſt the Venetians, and poſting ouer (according to his cuſtome) his affaires from one Diot to another, had cauſed to be publiſhed the Diot at Auſburg; and being kindled againſt the Pope, for that the Electors of the Empire, puſhed on by his authoritie, made inſtance to nego-

ciate in the Diet rather for peace with the Venetians, then for prouiſions for the warre, he had cauſed to depart from Auſpurg the Biſhop of Peſere his Nuncio: and conſidering that the deliberations of Diets were vncertaine, tedious, and full of difficulties, the end of one breeding the beginning of another; and that the French King excuſed himſelfe dayly of the demands and enterpriſes that were propoſed to him, ſometimes alledging the ſharpneſſe of the ſeaſon, ſometimes requiring aſſignation certaine of the expences which were to be made, and eftſoones proteſting that by the treatie of Cambray, he was not bound to aide him alone, but ioyntly with the Pope and King of Aragon, with whom it was reaſonable that the proceedings ſhould be mutual & common, as the confederation and bond was ioynt and general. For theſe reaſons, he entred into reſolution, that there was no remedie more readie for his affaires, then to induce the French King to embrace the enterpriſe to take Padua, Vincenſa and Treuiſa with his owne forces, and taking ſufficient recompence: which thing was liked by many of the Kings Councell, who conſidering that till the Venetians were wholly chaſed out of the firme land, the King ſhould dwell in continuall expences and dangers, perſwaded his Maieſtie vpon theſe reaſons, to free himſelfe of that feare with one great expence. And the King ſhewed himſelfe not altogether eſtranged from this counſell, being carried with the ſame reaſon, and therefore inclined to paſſe in perſon into Italy with a mightie armie (which he called mightie and puiſſant as often as he had in the ſame more then ſixteene hundred Lances, with his Gentlemen and Penſioners,) and yet being drawne by other reaſons into another mind, he ſtood very doubtfull in his mind, and more confuſed then he was wont, for that the Cardinall of Amboiſe, a man of great authoritie and ſtomacke, afflicted with a long and grieuous maladie, looked no more to his affaires, which were wont to be diſpatched wholly by his direction. The King, beſides that of his naturall diſpoſition, he loued not great expences, was retained alſo by a deſire he had to Verona; for the accompliſhing whereof, it ſeemed to him a good meanes to haue Ceſar intangled with continuall warres: for which regard he had newly lent to him eighteene thouſand duckats to pay the Lanceknights that lay in garriſon in Verona, and promiſed him to make it vp fiftie thouſand, with condition that he might not onely hold the Citadell for his ſecuritie and pawne, but alſo the old Caſtle ſhould be ſet ouer to him, together with the next gate of the towne, the better to haue free entrie and iſſue: and that if the money were not reſtored to him within one yeare, the towne of Valegge ſhould remaine to him in perpetuall gouernment, with power to fortifie as well the towne as the Citadell at the charges of Ceſar. Theſe conſiderations drew the Kings mind into no ſmall doubts, but much more was he troubled with feare, leſt the Popes intentions would wholly vary and alter, if he ſhould either leade or ſend into Italy a new armie. For, the Pope, full of ſuſpition, and alſo ill contented that he ſhould ſeiſe vpon Verona, beſides that he perſeuered ſtill in a will to abſolue the Venetians, did all that he could to ioyne himſelfe with the Swiſſers: for which intent, he had ſent backe againe into that countrey, the Biſhop of Sion, with money to diſtribute amongſt them, and promiſe to indue himſelfe with the Cardinals Hat: and ſought with all his diligence, by what meanes he might eſtrange the King of England from the amitie of the French King; whom albeit his father at the inſtant of death had aduiſed, for his ſecuritie and benefite, to continue in aſſured league with him, and for that reſpect was yearely payed fiftie thouſand duckats: yet, being carried with the hote humours of youth, and the great quantitie of treaſure that his father had left him, it ſeemed he had no leſſe in conſideration the counſels of thoſe, who for the deſire of new things, and for an ancient hatred which the Engliſh do ordinarily beare to the French nation, perſwaded him for the warre, then the wiſedome and diſcreet example of his father, who refuſing all contentions with the French, had gouerned his kingdome in great obedience and tranquillitie, notwithſtanding he had aſpired to a ſtate new and full of troubles. All theſe things troubling not a litle the minde of the French King, who, the better to prouide for the affaires of Italy, was now gone to Lions, he feared leſt his marching into Italy, which the Pope deteſted openly, would ſtirre vp ſome new innouations by his meanes: and beſides, he ſaw that the King of Aragon diſſwaded him from it, but vnder demonſtrations of a friend, and as a louer of the common tranquillitie: in ſo much as amid theſe doubts which trauelled him on all parts, he had no more certaine nor preſent counſell, then with great labour and diligence, to ſtudie ſo to appeaſe the mind of the Pope, that at the leaſt he might ſtand aſſured that he were not his enemie. And in this thing it ſeemed occaſion fauored him greatly, for that it was beleeued, that by the death of the Cardinall of Amboyſe, who was extremely ſicke, he ſhould be eaſed of thoſe ſuſpitions, from whence it was ſuppoſed his ill contentments did principally proceed. And for that the King was aduertiſed by good intelligence, that the Cardinall of Auchx, nephew to the Cardinall of Amboiſe, with others that managed his affaires in the Court of Rome, had with great raſhneſſe both in deed and with words laboured more to quicken and kindle, then to appeaſe and mollifie the Popes mind, as had bene very neceſſary, he would no more vſe their ſeruice in thoſe actions, but ſent to Rome in poſt the Lord Albert Pio Earle of Carpie, a man of great wit and dexteritie, to whom were giuen very large commiſſions, not onely to offer to the Pope the Kings forces and authoritie to ſerue his turne in all accidents, and vpon all occaſions, accommodating himſelfe as much as he could to his will and nature, but alſo to communicate with him frankly and ſimply the ſtate of all things that were practiſed, together with the requeſts that Ceſar made to him; and finally to referre to his will whether he ſhould paſſe into Italy or not, and whether he ſhould miniſter to the Emperour ſpeedily or ſlowly. He had alſo in charge to diſſwade the abſolution of the Venetians; but before he arriued, it was alreadie reſolued and promiſed by the Pope: becauſe the Venetians after long diſpute of their Embaſſadours with the Popes Delegates, which continued many moneths, conſented at laſt to the conditions whereupon the difficulties ſtood, not finding any other remedie for their ſafetie, then to be ioyned with him. The conditions for the which the abſolution was to be giuen, were openly publiſhed in the Conſiſtorie the foure and twentieth day of February, in preſence of the ſame Venetian Embaſſadors, who confirmed thē by writing, according to the authentike direction from their Commonweale. Theſe were the particulars: That they ſhould not in any ſort diſpoſe of the benefices or dignities of the Church: and that they ſhould make no reſiſtance or difficultie againſt whatſoeuer ſhall be determined in the Court of Rome concerning the ſame: That they ſhould not gainſay that in that Court ſhould be proſecuted the cauſes for benefices with others appertaining to the Eccleſiaſtike iuriſdiction: That they ſhould not charge the goods of the Church, and exempt places of their temporall dominion, with tenths or any other ſorts of impoſition: That they ſhould renounce from the appeale againſt the Popes cenſure, and all rights gotten vpon the Church lands in what ſort ſoeuer, but ſpecially from all thoſe prerogatiues and rights by the which they pretended to hold the office of Vicedomino in Ferrara: That the ſubiects of the Church and their veſſels may freely traffike through their Gulfe, and that with ſuch ample facultie, that the merchandize of other nations brought in their bottomes, ſhould not be troubled nor ſubiect to pay any toll: That it ſhould not be lawfull for them in any ſort to meddle with Ferrara, or any townes of that State which were dependant on the Church: That all couenants and contracts which they had made to the preiudice of the Church, with any the ſubiects or vaſſals of the ſame, ſhould be cancelled and made voide: That they ſhould not receiue any Duke, Baron, or other ſubiect or vaſſall of the Church, that ſhould be an enemie or rebell to the ſea Apoſtolicke: That they ſhould be bound to make reſtitution of all the moneys which they had exacted vpon the reuenues of the Church, and to make amends for all the harmes which the Church had ſuffered thereby. Theſe obligations with the promiſes and ſufficient renouncements, being receiued in the Conſiſtorie, the Venetian Embaſſadours at a day appointed, according to ancient examples, were brought vnder the portall of the great Church of S. Peter, where falling at the Popes feete, being ſet in his Pontificall ſeate neare the brazen gates, aſſiſted with all the Colledge of Cardinals and a great number of Prelates, they asked him pardon in great humilitie, confeſſing their contumacie and faults committed: and after this, according to the cuſtome of the Church, were pronounced certaine prayers, and the vſuall ceremonies being ſolemnely performed, the Pope receiuing them into grace, gaue them abſolution, and enioyned them for penance to go viſite the ſeuen Churches. When they were abſolued, they entred into S. Peters Church, being guided by the great Penitenciarie: and after they had heard Maſſe, which was denied to them before, they were very honorably accompanied to their houſes by many Prelates and Courtiers, and not as perſons excommunicated and interdicted, but as reconciled Chriſtians and deuout children to the ſea Apoſtolike. Soone after they returned to Venice, leauing behind them at Rome Hieronymo Donato, a very learned man, and one of their number, who by his vertues and dexteritie of wit, becoming very agreeable to the Pope, did afterwards great ſeruice to his countrey in things which he negociated with him.

The Argvment.

POpe Iulio the ſecond forſaketh the league of Cambray, and practiſeth againſt the French King and the Emperor: he fauoureth the Venetians, and falleth out with the Duke of Ferrara. The French King and the Emperour enter league againſt the Venetians. Legnago taken by the French. The death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe. The Pope determineth to chaſe the French out of Italy. The Venetians beſiege Verona. The Pope taketh Mirandola, and makes warre vpon the Duke of Ferrara. The families of Bentiuole returne to Bologna. A Councell is publiſhed at Piſa againſt the Pope.

Maximilian was much moued for this abſolution which the Pope gaue to the Venetians with ſo reſolute a will, for as much as it touched him principally; but the French King was not much leſſe vexed, for that he deſired for his priuate profite that the greatneſſe of the Venetians ſhould not be eftſoones reeſtabliſhed: neuertheleſſe he could not find out what were the intentions and laſt ends of the Pope: but feeding himſelfe with vain hopes concerning the difficulties of the affaires that were prepared againſt him, he perſwaded himſelfe that the Pope ſtirred onely for ſuſpition of his vniting with Maximilian; and that temporiſing with him, and giuing him no occaſion of greater feare, he would paſſe no further, but reſt ſatisfied with the abſolution he had giuen. But the Pope, growing more and more confirmed in his deliberation, and notwithſtanding the declarations and impediments of the confederate Embaſſadours, ſuffered the ſubiects and dependants of the Church to enter into the pay of the Venetians, who receiued into entertainment Iohn Paul Baillon as Generall of all their companies, ſtanding without a Gouernour ſince the death of the Count Petillane: and tooke alſo into their wages Iohn Lewis and Iohn Vitelli, ſonnes to the late Iohn and Camilla, and made Ranſo de Cere Colonell of their footmen. And as in this action he made open declaration that he tooke the Venetians into his protection, ſo he laboured alſo to bring them to agreement with Caeſar, hoping by that meanes, not onely to ſeparate him from the French King, but withall to knit him with himſelf and with the Venetians to make warre vpon the King. And for the more eaſie ſucceeding of this deuice, taking his oportunitie vpon the neceſſities of Caeſar, he interpoſed his authoritie with the Electors of the Empire and the free townes, to the end that in the Diot of Auſburg there ſhould be no conſent of contribution. But the more he aduanced this practiſe, the more difficult he found it: for that Caeſar would not hearken to any motion of agreement, vnleſſe Verona might remaine to him: and the Venetians (in whom the Pope had hope of a greater facilitie) perſwading themſelues to be able to defend Padua in all fortunes, and that keeping that Citie, time would fauour them with more occaſions, demanded reſolutely the reſtitution of Verona, offering to pay in recompence a very great ſumme of money. The Pope omitted not alſo to make ſecret ſolicitation to the King of England, to raiſe warre againſt the French King, putting him in mind of the ancient emulations of thoſe two kingdomes, ſhewing him the occaſion which offered him a moſt happie ſucceſſe: for that if he would begin to leuie armes againſt the French King, many others, to whom his puiſſance and greatneſſe was either ſuſpected or hated, would do the like: and he encouraged him to embrace with that deuotion which had bene proper to the Kings of England, the glorie that was offered him, to be protector and preſeruer of the ſea Apoſtolike, which otherwiſe ſtood in manifeſt danger by the ambition of the French King: and in this practiſe the King of Aragon did communicate with the Pope, but very ſecretly. But (which was of greater importance) the Pope continuing ſtill with the Swiſſers the practiſes which were begun by the Biſhop of Sion, whoſe authoritie was great

in that nation, and who ceaſſed not to make orations with great efficacie to this effect in their aſſemblies and councels, and to preach it in their Churches; he obtained at laſt that the Swiſſers, receiuing euery yeare a thouſand Florins of Rhein for euery Canton, ſhould be bound to the protection of him and the eſtate of the Church, with permiſſion to the Pope (for his defence againſt all men that would vexe him) to leuie certain proportions of footmen: and that which moſt helped him to obtaine this matter the more eaſily, was the diſagreement that began to kindle betweene them and the French King. For the Swiſſers becoming proud by the eſtimation that others had of them, and preſuming that all the victories obtained in Italy by the King now reigning, or by King Charles his predeceſſor, proceeded principally by their valour and of the feare of their armes, and that therefore they merited much of the Crowne of France; they demanded (the King ſoliciting them to make renouation of the alliance that now was determined) that he would augment their penſions, being then threeſcore thouſand Frankes by yeare, ouer and aboue the mercenarie contributions which were ſecretly diſperſed amongſt priuate perſons; penſions which had bene begun vnder Lewis the eleuenth, and continued vnto the preſent time. But for that they made their demands with preſumptuous audacitie, the King being offended with their inſolencie, and for that of peaſants and mountaine men (ſuch was his phraſe) they ſought ſo imperiouſly to taxe him, he began to ſhake them off with haughtie words, and in a maner to make ſhew as though he diſdained them, more reſpecting his dignitie royall, then regarding the preſent vtilitie: whereunto he was the more induced, for that at the ſame ſeaſon by the ſolicitation of George Supreſan, the Valeſians ſubiects of Sion, who were gouerned in ſeuen communities, which they call Courts, being corrupted by briberies and promiſes of penſions, were not onely confederate with him, but alſo bound to giue paſſage to his people, and refuſe it to his enemies, and withall to enter into his pay with ſuch numbers of footmen as their forces were able to beare: and in the ſame ſort did enter confederacy with him, the Lords of the three leagues, whom they call Griſons. And albeit part of the Valeſians had not yet approued theſe conditions, the King hoped to induce them to the ratification by the ſame meanes: in ſo much as he began to perſwade himſelfe that the amitie of the Swiſſers was now no more ſo neceſſarie to him, hauing determination to ſupply his warres with Almaine footmen, ouer and beſides the companies of the Valeſians and Griſons, and ſo ſtood in litle feare of their ſtirres, for that he beleeued they were not able to aſſaile the Duchie of Millan but by the ſtraits of Bellinſona, and other paſſages of great difficultie, through the which, if they ſhould march in great troupes, they might be eaſily reduced into neceſſitie of victuals by a ſmall armie: and if they came but in ſmall companies, a ſlender ſtrength would likewiſe ſuffice to make them retire. Thus remaining reſolute not to augment their penſions, he could not obtaine in the councels of the Swiſſers a renouation of the alliance, notwithſtanding many among them did earneſtly perſwade it, to whom in particular were retributed no ſmall rewards: and for that cauſe they conſented more eaſily to the confederation which was demanded of them by the Pope. By which new confederation the Pope ſeeming to haue layed a great foundation for the aduancing of his purpoſes; and beſides, proceeding in all things according to his nature, as ſuperiour to all men, and as though all muſt of neceſſitie receiue lawes of him, he began to ſow ſeeds of new controuerſies with the Duke of Ferrara, either puſhed on by the cauſe that was in queſtion betweene them, or elſe by hatred, for that hauing receiued of him ſo many benefites and honours, he depended more of the French King then of him. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, ſearching a beginning of quarrels, he imperiouſly commanded Alphonſo Duke of Ferrara to ſurceaſſe the working of ſalt at Comachio; for that it was not reaſonable that that which was not lawfull to him when the Venetians held Ceruia, ſhould now haue ſufferance, being poſſeſſed by the ſea Apoſtolike, to whom appertained the abſolute gouernment of Ferrara and Comachio: beſides, it was a matter of great profite, for that the working ceaſſing at Comachio, the ſaltpits of Ceruia miniſtred traffike to all the townes thereabouts. But Duke Alphonſo, who repoſed more in the coniunction which he had with the French King and in his protection, then he feared the Popes forces, gaue ſmall obedience to this commandement: but complained that he ſhould be conſtrained not to reape the fruite which grew to him in his proper houſe with ſmall labour, and to be driuen to buy of another for the vſage of his peoples, the ware whereof he had enough to repleniſh forreine countreys, alledging withall, that that ought not to be enforced for an example, which the Venetians had made him conſent vnto, more by force of armes then by courſe of iuſtice. Wherefore the Pope ſent to command him vnder great paines and accurſings to diſcontinue that worke. Such were the thoughts and actions of the Pope, inclined altogether to raiſe vp and ſupport the Venetians.

The league of Cæſar and the French king againſt the Venetians.

But on the other ſide, Cæſar and the French King, who deſired as much their embaſement, being diſcontented with the demonſtrations which the Pope expreſſed on their behalfe, and for this cauſe being more cloſely knit one to another, they met together, and concluded to inuade the Venetians that Sommer with great forces: and to that end the French King for his part ſhould ſend Monſieur Chaumont with a puiſſant armie, whereunto ſhould be ioyned the Lanceknights that lay at Verona: and on the other ſide, Cæſar ſhould enter into the countrey of Friul with thoſe forces which he hoped to obtaine of the Empire in the Diot of Auſburg: and hauing accompliſhed that action, he was to proceed to other enterpriſes according to the eſtate of occaſions and time. They ſolicited the Pope to ioyne his forces with theirs, according to the bond of the league of Cambray. But he, being much diſcontented with that motion, made anſwer, that he was no more bound to that confederatiō which had alreadie had his perfectiō, ſeeing it had bene in the power of Cæſar firſt to haue Treuiſa, and afterwards a recompence in money. Cæſar likewiſe demanded ſuccours from the King Catholike, both by vertue of the ſame capitulations of Cambray, and alſo vnder couenants made particularly with him, at ſuch time as he conſented to him the gouernment of Caſtile: and this ſolicitation was by way of requeſt, rather to aid him with mony then with men; but the King of Aragon being vnwilling to diſfurniſh himſelfe of the thing whereof he had moſt need, made anſwer, That he would ſend him foure hundred Lances: which was a ſtrength of litle profit for Cæſar, for that as wel in the French army as in his owne camp, there were great plentie of horſemen. At this time the Citie of Verona being much afflicted by the ſoldiers that guarded it, for that they were not payd, certain of the Venetian bands, being ſecretly called thither by ſome of the captains, iſſued out of S. Boniface, & approched the Citie by night to ſcale the Caſtle of S. Peter: and as they were entred S. Georges gate, whileſt they taried to faſten their ladders together (for that being ſingle, they ſufficed not to reach to the height of the wall) either they were heard by the warders of the Caſtle of S. Felix, or elſe they ſeeming to heare ſome noiſe, were fearfull, and retired, leauing their ladders behind them. By reaſon whereof the armie returned to S. Boniface, and at Verona the conſpiracie being diſcouered, many were puniſhed. In this ſeaſon the Pope had ſome inclination to be reconciled to the French King, not of good will, but for feare: for that Maximilian by way of brauado ſummoned him to lend him two hundred thouſand duckats, threatning that otherwiſe he would ioyne with the French King againſt him: and for that a bruite was ſpread, that in the Diot of Auſburg it was agreed to miniſter to him a ſtrong ſuccour, and for that peace had bene newly eſtabliſhed betweene the Kings of England and France, and publiſhed with great ſolemnitie: by reaſon whereof, he began to treate in good earneſt with Albert de Carpi, whom till that day, he had entertained with words and hopes generall. But he continued not long in that reſolution, both for that the Diot of Auſburg (without the forces and aides of which, there was no great reckoning to be made of the threats of Cæſar) not anſwering the expectation, determined for him no other ſuccours, then a ſupply of three hundred thouſand Florins of Rhein, in hope of which money he had alreadie made great expences: and the King of England ſignified vnto him that he had ſet downe an article in the peace, wherein was expreſſed that it ſhould be no peace as often as the French King ſhould offend the ſtate of the Church. In regard of theſe things, the Pope reentring into new ſtomacke, and returning to his former thoughts, began to make new complaints againſt the Duke of Ferrara, for that the ſaid Duke ſince it was ſuffered to the ſubiects of the Church to ſaile and traffike frankly through the Gulfe of Venice, had impoſed new tributes vpon the goods which were brought to Venice by the riuer of Po; which thing the Pope alledged, that the vaſſall could not do (according to the order of law) without licence of the Lord of the ſoyle; and that it was a matter of great preiudice to the people of Bologna, who were his ſubiects: and therefore he made inſtance that they might be diſcharged, threatning that otherwiſe he would make warre vpon him: and to put him in the greater feare, he cauſed his bands of men of warre to march into the countrey of Bologna and into Romagna. Theſe things troubled not a litle the mind of the French King, being loath on the one ſide to fall at oddes with the Pope, and on the other ſide he felt himſelfe touched in honour and conſcience not to leaue abandoned the Duke of Ferrara, to whoſe protection he had bound himſelfe by receiuing thir-

tie thouſand duckats. And he was no leſſe moued with the regard of his proper profite, for that Duke Alphonſo depending wholly vpon him, and becoming ſo much the more at his deuotion, by how much he ſaw him perſecuted by the Pope, and his eſtate being very commodious for the affaires of Lombardie, he eſteemed it his proper intereſt to preſerue him; and therefore he dealt with the Pope to make ſome accord betweene them by ſome meanes. But it ſeemed iuſt to the Pope that the King ſhould withdraw himſelfe from that protection, alledging that he had taken it vpon him againſt the capitulations of Cambray, by the which (made vnder colour to render to the Church that which was vſurped) it was forbidden that none of the confederates ſhould take into protection any that was named by another, and that for his part, he had named the Duke of Ferrara: and further, that it was forbidden that none of them ſhould meddle with the things appertaining to the Church: That the like alſo was confirmed in the confederation made particularly betweene them at Biagraſſo, wherein was expreſly prouided that the King ſhould not keepe in his protection any that depended of the Church, nor ſhould hereafter take any of them into his protection, and ſhould cancel and make void all his former protections. To which things notwithſtanding it was anſwered on the Kings behalfe, that by the ſame conuention it was prouided, that the King ſhould haue power to diſpoſe of the Biſhopricks on this ſide the Mounts as he liſted, which the Pope had violated in the firſt auoidance that fell, as likewiſe in fauour of the Venetians, he had broken the capitulations made at Cambray, and that therefore the King was at libertie not to obſerue the things he had promiſed him: yet becauſe he would not come to armes with the Pope for the quarrell of the Duke of Ferrara, he offered conditions, by the which, not offending directly his honor, the Pope in a great part might reſt ſatisfied touching the intereſts which the Church and he pretended againſt Duke Alphonſo: and beſides this, he was content to bind himſelfe (according to the Popes requeſt) that the French armies ſhould not paſſe the riuer of Po, but for the protection of the Florentines whereunto he was bound; and to moleſt Pandolfe Petrucci and Iohn Paul Baillon, vnder colour of money promiſed by the one, and detained by the other.

Whileſt theſe things were in action, Monſieur Chaumont with an armie of fifteene hundred Lances, and ten thouſand footmen of many nations, amongſt whom were ſome Swiſſers which were priuatly leuied, and not by permiſſion of the Cantons, being followed with great ſtore of artilleries, with three thouſand pioners, and bridges prepared to paſſe riuers; and hauing ioyned with him the Duke of Ferrara with two hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, and two thouſand footmen; tooke Poleſina de Rouigna without any impediment, the Venetians hauing abandoned it; and taking alſo the Tower Marquiſano ſtanding vpon the riuer of Adice towards Padua, he marched on to Caſtelbaldo, and had at the firſt ſummons the townes of Montagnana and Eſte, the one appertaining to Alphonſo d'Eſte, by grant from Maximilian, who had giuen him the other in gage. When Alphonſo had recouered theſe places, he ſent backe the moſt part of his regiments vnder colour to encounter certaine galleys of the Venetians, which floted vpon the riuer of Po. The Prince of Henault Maximilians Lieutenant, marched in like ſort out of Verona with three hundred French Lances, two hundred men at armes, and three thouſand Almaine footmen, and ioyned with Monſieur Chaumont, following him alwayes within one remoue of his campe. They left behind them Monſelica, which was holden by the Venetians, and marched towards the countrey of Vincenſa, where Lonigua and the whole countrey yeelded without reſiſtance; for that the Venetian armie, which was ſaid to containe ſixe hundred men at armes, foure thouſand light horſemen and eſtradiots, and eight thouſand footmen vnder Iohn Paul Baillon Generall, and Andrew Gritti Treaſurer, hauing firſt abandoned Soano, and alwayes retiring into places of ſuretie according as the enemie aduanced, and laſtly hauing beſtowed ſufficient garriſon within Treuiſa, and a thouſand footmen within Meſtro, they were retired to Brentelli, a place within three miles of Padua, and of great ſuretie for their incamping, both for that the countrey is full of hils and riſings, and the place it ſelfe ſtandeth enuironed with the waters of theſe three riuers, Brento, Brentello, and Baquillon.

But the people of Vincenſa, for that the armie was retired, finding themſelues altogether abandoned, and vnable of themſelues to defend their Eſtate, and knowing that they had no other hope then ſuch as they might expect in the mercie of the victors, which they ſuppoſed they might more graciouſly obtaine by the meanes of Monſieur Chaumont; they ſent to him to demand ſafeconduct to addreſſe Embaſſadours to him and the Prince of Henault; which being gran-granted, they preſented themſelues in rufull maner, and full of ſorrow and feare afore them, both being then at the bridge of Barberano ten miles from Vincenſa, where all the Captaines and principals of the armie being preſent, he that was the chiefe of the Embaſſadours, ſpake in this ſort: "If it were well knowne how much this Citie of Vincenſa (heretofore enuied of many her neighboring Cities for her riches and felicitie) hath ſuffered, ſince (more by the error and folly of her inhabitants, and haply more by a certaine fatall diſpoſition, then through any other occaſion) ſhe returned vnder the iuriſdiction of the Venetians, together with the intollerable harmes and domages ſhe hath receiued: we do certainly beleeue (moſt inuincible Captaines) that in your hearts would be greater the pitie and compaſſion of our miſeries, then the diſdaine and hatred for the memorie of our rebellion; if the error of that night may be called rebellion, wherein our people, drawne into aſtoniſhment, for that the armie of our enemie had forced the ſuburbes of Portello; not to rebell, nor to ſhun the eaſie gouernment of Cæſar, but to deliuer our Citie from the ſacke and extreme miſerie, did ſend Embaſſadours to compound with the enemie. Whereunto our peoples, not accuſtomed to armes, nor acquainted with the dangers of warre, were altogether puſhed on by the authoritie of Fracaſſe, a Captaine experienced in many ſeuerall wars: who either by ſubtiltie or feare (a matter not appertaining to vs to examine) gaue vs counſell to prouide by meane of accord, for the ſafetie of our wiues, of our children, and of our afflicted countrey. The ſame making manifeſt, that no ill impreſſion of mind, but onely feare, increaſed through the authoritie of ſuch a Captaine of Cæſars, was the cauſe, not that we determined by long counſel, but rather on a ſudden, in ſo great a tumult, & in ſo fearful a noiſe of armes & thundring of artilleries, which we haue not bin accuſtomed to heare, we ran raſhly vnder the rule of the Venetians, the felicitie and power of whom was not ſuch, as ought of it ſelfe to allure vs thereunto. Now it is well knowne to all men what difference there is between faults committed by feare and errour, and offences proceeding of ſet malice and ill intention. But be it ſo, that it had not bene feare, but a willingneſſe to rebell, and that it had bene begun by an vniuerſall counſell and conſent, and not in ſo great confuſion, but rather by the vnbridled raſhneſſe of a few, not being contradicted by the others, and that the tranſgreſſions of this wretched Citie were altogether inexcuſable; yet our calamities haue bene ſo great ſince that accurſed reuolt, that we may truly ſay, that the puniſhment, without all compariſon, hath bene greater then the fault. For, within our wals we haue bene miſerably ſpoiled of all our goods by the garriſon ſouldiers that were left vs: and who knowes not what we haue ſuffered without, by the continuall warre? And what remaines there entire to vs now in this miſerable countrey? All the houſes of our poſſeſſions are burned, all the trees cut downe, and all our cattell loſt. This is the ſecond yeare that we haue bene driuen to reape our harueſt afore the time, that we haue had no ſecuritie to ſow our ſeeds, that we are without reuenue, and without fruites, and without hope that this countrey ſo generally deſtroyed, can be euer redreſſed. We are brought to ſuch a ſtraight, and into ſo great miſerie, that for the needfull ſupportation of our liues, and to furniſh the intollerables charges which our neceſſities haue brought vpon vs, hauing conſumed all that remaineth euen of our hidden treaſure, we know not how for the time to come to nouriſh our ſelues and our families. Whoſoeuer he be that hateth vs moſt, and is of a moſt cruell mind (hauing but heretofore ſeene our country) let him come & ſee it now: and we are ſure he cannot refraine from weeping, when he ſhal conſider that this Citie, the which was wont to be repleniſhed with inhabitants, moſt ſumptuous in magnificence, famous for ſtately buildings, the ordinarie retraite for all ſtrangers, a Citie reioycing in bankets, iuſting and pleaſures, is now in a manner voide of dwellers, that the men and women therein are poorely apparelled, that there is not therein any one man who can aſſure himſelfe to be able to feed himſelfe and his family for one moneth; and in place of magnificence, feaſts and pleaſures, there is nothing elſe ſeene but penurie, publike ſorowing of all the men, weeping and pitifull crying of all the women in euery ſtreet and quarter of the Citie. And theſe calamities (moſt gracious Prince of Henault) would be yet greater, if we conſidered not that on your will dependeth either the laſt deſolation of our afflicted country, or the hope that we may yet once again vnder the wings of Cæſar, & vnder the gouernment of your wiſedome and clemencie, we ſay not, take breath and raiſe our ſelues againe, for that is impoſſible, but conſuming our liues in all extremitie, auoide at leaſt an extreame and laſt deſtruction: a grace which we do the rather hope for, becauſe your benignitie and humanitie is knowne to vs, wherein we doubt not but you will imitate Cæſar, with whoſe examples of clemencie

mencie all Europe is repleniſhed. All our wealth is conſumed, all our hopes determined, there » remaineth nothing elſe to vs but our liues and perſons, againſt the which if crueltie ſhould be » vſed, what profite would it be for Cæſar, or what praiſe to you? We beſeech you with moſt » humble prayers, the which you may imagine to be mingled with the miſerable complaints of e- » uery ſexe, of euery age, and of euery degree that is within this Citie, that it may pleaſe you to » make the wretched and vnfortunate Vincenſa an example to all others of the clemencie of the » Almaine Empire: that it may pleaſe you to follow the clemencie and magnanimitie of your an- » ceſtors, who being victorious in Italy, preſerued the Cities by them ſubdued, many of them » chuſing thoſe ſeates for their proper dwellings, from whence, to the great glory of the Almaine » race, are deſcended ſo many noble houſes in Italy, as ſome of Gonſague, ſome of Carraro, and o- » thers of Eſcalo, who ſometimes were our Lords. Let Vincenſa now ſerue for an example, that » the Venetians, aided and ſupported by vs in leſſer dangers, haue cowardly & diſhonorably left vs » abandoned in the greateſt perils, wherein they ought to haue defended vs; and that the Almains, » who had ſome reaſon to offend vs, haue frankly and glorioufly preſerued vs. Take vs, moſt in- » uincible Lord Chaumont, into your protection: remember the example of your King, whoſe cle- » mencie to them of Millan and Genes, being drawne into voluntary rebellion, without any cauſe » or neceſſitie, was greater then their fault: who after he had pardoned them, being wonne by ſo » great fauours, haue alwayes bene moſt affectionate and ſeruiceable vnto him. Olt Prince of He- » nault, if the preſeruation of Vincenſa turne not to the profite of Cæſar, yet at leaſt it will bring » him glorie, remaining as a perpetuall example of his benignitie: but if he deſtroy it, it can bring » him no profite; and the ſeueritie which he ſhall vſe to vs, will be grieuous to all Italy. Clemencie » will make the name of Cæſar more acceptable to all men; and as in actions of warre and mana- » ging of an armie, he is knowne much to reſemble the ancient Cæſar, ſo clemencie ſhal alſo be ac- » knowledged in him, whereby the name of Cæſar was exalted to heauen, and his memory made » more perpetuall to all poſterities, then by his armes. Vincenſa a flouriſhing and ancient Citie, » which hath heretofore bene full of ſo great Nobilitie, is now at your deuotion: ſhe expecteth » frō you either her preſeruation or deſtruction, her life or her death. Take pitie of ſo many inno- » cent perſons, and ſo many vnfortunate women and poore litle children, who in that lamentable » night full of folly and errour, medled with nothing, and now with plaints and wailings expect » your deliberation. Send foorth at laſt that ſo much deſired voice of mercie and clemencie, » through the which our moſt wretched Citie coming to receiue new life, ſhall alwayes call you » her preſeruer and patron. »

Neither this ſo pitifull Oration, nor the compaſſion of ſo vnfortunate a Citie, could any whit aſſwage the mind of the Prince of Henault, but being full of pride and crueltie, not hauing ſo much commandouer his paſſions, as to make his words leſſe cruell then his deeds, he made them a moſt churliſh & inhumane anſwer, the which by his commandement was pronounced by his Chancellor in this ſort: Thinke not rebellious Vincentines, that your faire words can ſuf- » fice to wipe out the memory of your faults committed againſt the maieſtie of the name of Cæ- » ſar, without any regard to whoſe dignitie, or reſpect to the benignitie wherewith you were re- » ceiued by him, you haue by common counſell and conſent of the whole Citie, called into your » towne the Venetian armie, who forcing the ſuburbes with great difficultie, diſtruſted to take it, » and began to go away. You haue called them in againſt the will of the Prince that repreſented » the perſon of Cæſar: you conſtrained that Prince to retire into the Caſtle, and being full of rage » and malice, haue ſacked the powder and munitions of Cæſar: you haue torne in peeces his pa- » uillions diſplayed by him in ſo many warres and triumphing in ſo many victories. The Vene- » tian ſouldiers haue not done theſe things, but the people of Vincenſa, diſcouering their violent » thirſt after the bloud of the Almaines: and it was not long of you that the Venetian army tooke » not Verona, which they had done, if knowing the occaſion, they had followed the victorie: nei- » ther did this happen by the counſell or perſwaſion of Fracaſſe, who abuſed by your ſlanders, hath » clearely manifeſted his innocencie. It was by your malice; it was by a hatred, which without » cauſe you beare to the Almaine name. Your offences are inexcuſable, and ſo great, as they deſerue » no pardon. The clemencie that ſhould be vſed to you, would be both hurtfull and infamous; for » that it is well knowne you would vpon euery occaſion do yet worſe: and theſe haue not bene » your errors, but your wickedneſſe: and the harmes you haue receiued, haue not bene for a pu- » niſhment of your faults, but for that you would obſtinately perſeuere in rebellion: and now be- »

« ing abandoned of the Venetians, you haue no other remedy to defend you, then to implore the « pitie and mercie of Cæsar whom you haue betrayed. The Prince was determined, following the « intention and commission of Cæsar, not to heare you, and yet he hath not denied you audience, « satisfying therein the will of the Lord Chaumont: but for all that he will not change the sentence, « which since the first day of your rebellion hath remained fixed in the mind of Cæsar: he will not « receiue you otherwise, then to discretion for your goods, your honors, & your liues. And hope « not that he will do that to shew you the more clemencie, but the better to make you serue for « an example of punishment to such as accursedly breake their faith to their Prince. The people of Vincensa astonished with this cruell answer, seeming for a while to suffer a generall priuation of all sense and feeling, began againe with teares and lamentable speeches, to recommend them to the mercie of the victor. But being repulsed by the same Doctor, who rebuked them with words more bitter and fierce then the first, they knew not what to answer, nor what to thinke, had it not bene that Monsieur Chaumont encouraged them to obey necessitie, and in giuing themselues wholly vp to the will of the Prince, to seeke to appease his wrath: declaring vnto them the singular humanitie and curtesie of Cæsar, and that it was not to be suspected, that a Prince of so noble race, and so excellent a Captaine, would do a thing vnworthy of his name and vertue: and that they should not be amazed with the seuere answer that was made, but rather desire that noble and generous spirits should vtter sharpe and biting words, for that oftentimes by that meanes some part of their indignation is abated. He offered himselfe to do all that he could to mitigate the mind of the Prince, so far forth as they would preuent him by putting themselues wholly to his discretion. By whose counsell, and the consideration of their owne necessitie, the Vincentines falling eftsoones prostrate on the ground, referred absolutely both their honors, liues and Citie to the power of the victor. And then Monsieur Chaumont began to solicite for them, declaring to the Prince, that in chastising them he was to respect more the greatnesse and glory of Cæsar, then the qualitie of their offence: That he should not set downe such an example to others that were fallen, or hereafter should fall into the like faults, lest despairing to obtaine mercie, they should become obstinate to the extremitie: That clemencie had alwayes caused Princes to be loued and respected, but crueltie without necessitie, wrought alwayes a contrary effect, not taking away (as many vndiscreetly beleeue) impediments and difficulties, but rather augmenting them and making them greater. By whose authoritie accompanied with the petitions of many others, together with the miserable wailings of the Vincentines, the Prince at last was content to promise them safetie of life, the disposition of all their goods remaining wholly at his will: a bootie greater in opinion then in effect, for that the Citie was left almost desolate both of men and goods: the which as the Almaines sought after with great furie, vnderstanding that many of the towne and countrey were withdrawne with their goods into two caues in a certaine mountaine neare to Vincensa, called the grot of Masano, where by the strength of the place and difficultie to enter, they supposed to find securitie, the Almaines coming thither, after they had in vaine, and not without some harmes, assailed those that were within the great caue, they went to the lesser, and finding that they could not otherwise force it, they made great fires about it, and at last by the benefite of the smoke carried it, with the losse (as the bruite went) of more then a thousand persons.

Vincensa being taken, greater difficulties appeared in other things then was expected in the beginning: for that not onely Maximilian did not stirre against the Venetians as he had promised, but also the regiments which he had in Italy diminished continually for want of pay: in so much as Monsieur Chaumont was constrained to stay vpon the guarding of Vincensa; neuertheless he determined to go incampe before Legnaguo, a towne of such special regard, that if it were not taken, all that had bene done till that day serued to nothing. The riuer of Adice passeth by the towne of Legnaguo, and the lesser part of the same, which they call Porto, is towards Montagnana, where the Venetians not reposing so much in the strength of the towne and valour of the defendants, as in the impediments of the waters, had cut the riuer in one place: and on the other side, where is the greater part of the towne, they had cut it in two places; so as the riuer falling through those trenches, had spread it selfe by many armes into the lowest places, and so couered the countrey about, that standing drowned for many moneths, it was almost become a marrish. But it hapned that the rashnesse and disorder of the Venetian bands, made these difficulties lesser. For Monsieur Chaumont coming to incamp with his armie at Minerua, three miles from Legnaguo, nagno, and hauing ſent before certaine of his horſemen and footmen, who as they would haue paſſed the laſt arme of the water, which was within halfe a mile of Legnaguo, they encountred the bands of the footmen which had the guard of Porto, who were iſſued out to ſtop their paſſage. But the Gaſcoines and Spaniards ruſhing reſolutely into the water vp to the breaſt, repulſed them, and purſued them with ſuch valour and fury, that they entred with them pelmell into Porto, very few of the footmen of that place being ſaued, for that ſome were ſlaine in flying, and the greater part of thoſe other that ſought to retire into Legnaguo, were drowned as they would haue paſſed the riuer of Adice. By reaſon of this ſucceſſe Monſieur Chaumont altering his intention to encampe at Minerus, went the ſame night to lodge within Porto: and after he had cauſed to traile vnder the water the great artilleries, which the firme bottome of the earth did ſuſtaine, the ſame night he cauſed the trench of the riuer to be filled vp and ſtopt. And knowing that on that ſide to Porto, Legnaguo was inexpugnable by reaſon of the largeneſſe of the riuer, ſo great, that they could hardly fight on that ſide, (notwithſtanding betweene Legnaguo and Porto, for that it is incompaſſed with hils, it is not ſo large as below) he commanded to prepare a bridge to paſſe the artilleries and ỹ greateſt part of the armie to the other ſide. But finding that the barks which he had cauſed to be brought thither, were not anſwerable to the largeneſſe of the riuer, he incamped himſelfe neare the riuer oppoſite to Legnaguo, and cauſed Captaine Molard with foure thouſand Gaſcoins and ſixe peeces of artilleries to paſſe vpon thoſe barkes to the other ſide of Adice, who being paſſed, they began on both ſides the riuer to batter the baſtillion which was vpon the riſing of a hill at the vpper point of the towne: and part of it being beaten downe, notwithſtanding the defendants vſed all diligence to fortifie it, the night following, the Treaſurer of the Venetian camp, hauing more feare of his enemie then hope or confidence in his owne people, withdrew himſelfe ſuddenly into the Caſtle with certain Venetian Gentlemen. As ſoone as it was day, and their retiring being perceiued, the Captaine of the footmen that guarded the baſtillion rendred it to Molard, their liues and goods ſaued, and yet when he was come out, he and his footmen were ſtripped by the ſouldiers of the campe. The baſtillion being taken, the towne was immediatly put to ſacke by Captaine Molard, and the bands of footmen who guarded another baſtillion made on the other corner of the towne, hauing caſt away their armour, ſought ſafetie by flying through the marriſhes. Thus Legnaguo by the cowardiſe of ſuch as were within it, was more ſuddenly and more eaſily conquered, then was either expected or imagined. Legnagno taken by Chaumont. The caſtle made no greater reſiſtance then the towne; for, the bulwarkes being beaten downe the day following by the artillery, as they began to vndermine one ſide of a tower with intention afterwards to giue fire to it, they within yeelded themſelues, with condition that the Gentlemen of Venice remaining in the power of Monſieur Chaumont, the ſouldiers ſhould depart without armour. Fortune in this victory mixed ſome of her gall among the felicities of Monſieur Chaumont, for that in that place he had aduertiſement of the death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe his Vnkle, by whoſe great authoritie with the French King, he who had bene raiſed to high promotions and honours, hoped for greater things. Now becauſe the Almaines had not ſufficient ſouldiers to leaue within Legnaguo, Monſieur Chaumont left there in garriſon an hundred Lances and a thouſand footmen, and ſo diſmiſſing the Griſons and Valeſians, he prepared to returne with the reſidue of his armie to the Duchie of Millan, following the commandement of the King, who would no more be at ſo great expences. Of this armie, for that the prouiſions on Cæſars part anſwered not the promiſes that were made, there came no effect of importance. Neuertheleſſe the King commanded him afterward to ſtay yet for the whole moneth of Iune, for that Cæſar being then come to Inſpruch full of difficulties, according to his cuſtome, but full of plots and hopes, made inſtance that he ſhould not depart, promiſing from time to time that he would paſſe into Italy. About which time the Almaines deſiring to recouer Maroſtico, Ciuitella, Baſciano, and other peeces thereabouts, to make the deſcending of Cæſar more eaſie on that ſide, Monſieur Chaumont with his armie incamped at Lungaro vpon the riuer of Baquillon, to the end to ſtop the Venetian companies for entring into Vincenſa, where there was but a very ſmall garriſon, and that they ſhould not oppoſe againſt the Almaines. But being aduertiſed there that the Venetians were retired to Padua, the Almaines ioyning themſelues againe with him, they went to the Torricelli, vpon the high way that leadeth from Vincenſa to Padua, and from thence leauing Padua on the right hand, they marched to Ciuitella with no litle diſcommoditie of victuals, being troubled by the light horſemen that were within Padua, and much more by ſuch as were M. Chaumont incampeth at Lungaro.

at Monſelica. Ciuitella yeelded without reſiſtance, by whoſe example alſo Maroſtico, Baſciano, with other peeces thereabouts, abandoned by the Venetians, did the like. Therefore things being diſpatched on that ſide, the armies returned to the Torricelli, and leauing Padua on the right hand, and turning on the left towards the mountaine, they encamped aboue Brenta neare to the mountaine, within ten miles of Vincenſa: the chiefe reaſon why they went to that place, was, for that the Almaines deſired to occupie Eſcalo, a paſſage very conuenient for the regiments that were to come out of Germanie, and the onely peece that of all other places from Treuiſa to Vincenſa, remained in the hands of the Venetians. From which place the Prince of Henault being departed with his Almaines and an hundred French Lances, he tooke the way of Eſcalo, which was fiue and twentie miles from thence: but he could paſſe no further, for that the countrey people, (full of incredible affection to the Venetians, and ſuch, as being taken priſoners, they choſe rather to die then to denie them, or to ſpeake ill of them) had taken many paſſages in the mountaine: ſo that after he had obtained by compoſition New-caſtle, which is alſo a paſſage of the mountaine, he returned to the incamping place at Brento, hauing ſent by another way many of his footmen towards Eſcalo; who, according to his direction, forſooke the way of Baſciano, to auoide Couolo, which is a ſtrong paſſage in thoſe mountaines, and compaſſing more low by the way of Feltre, they found very few people within Feltre, which they ſacked and burned, and ſo tooke the way to Eſcalo, which, with Couolo, they found abandoned. About that time alſo the ruines were nothing leſſe in the countrey of Friul, for that being ſometimes aſſailed by the Venetians, and ſometimes inuaded by the Almaines, now defended and eſtſoones pillaged by the Gentlemen of the countrey, and whileſt the one aduanced and the other gaue backe, as occaſion ſerued, there was ſeene in euery place nothing more then dead carkaſſes of men, townes ſacked, and fortreſſes burned: and it hapned oftentimes that the ſame places which had bene firſt ſacked by one partie, were ſhortly after ſacked and burned by the other; and except certaine ſtrong peeces, all the reſidue of the countrey was expoſed to this miſerable deſtruction. But becauſe in thoſe actions there was nothing done worthy of memory, it would be no leſſe ſuperfluous to recount the particulars, then troubleſome to vnderſtand ſo many variable reuolutions, which brought forth no effect importing the ſubſtance of the ware.

Conuention between Cæſar and the French king.

But now the time approching that the French armie ſhould depart, there was made this new conuention between Cæſar and the French King, that his armie ſhould yet continue for the moneth following, with couenant that the extraordinary expences, ſuch as ran ouer and aboue the payes of the bands which the King had defrayed till that time, ſhould be payed hereafter by Cæſar, together with the regiments of the footmen for that moneth. But becauſe Cæſar was not then prouided of money, that the ſumme ſhould be ſet downe of thoſe expences, and the King to make it vp by way of loane to the ſumme of fiftie thouſand duckats: which if Cæſar did not repay within one yeare following, together with the other fiftie thouſand which were lent him before, the King ſhould take into his hands Verona with all the territories, till he were ſatisfied. Monſieur Chaumont hauing receiued the Kings commandement to follow ſtill thoſe warres, turned all his wits and deuices to take Monſelica, and therefore as ſoone as foure hundred Spaniſh Lances led by the Duke of Terminy were arriued, who, being ſent by the King Catholike to the ſuccours of Maximilian, had according to their cuſtome marched very ſlowly; the armies after they had paſſed the riuer of Brento, and afterwards the riuer of Baquillon at the village of Purlo, within fiue miles of Padua, arriued at Monſelica, not without great ſcarcitie of victuals and forrages, by reaſon of the incurſions of the horſemen that were within Padua and Monſelica, who beſides this tooke Sonzin Be...one of Crema, a Captaine for the French King, being gone with a very ſlender ſtrength of horſemen to view the ſcouts: and, for that he was the author of the rebellion of Crema, Andrew Gritti reſpecting more that he was a ſubiect to the Venetians, then a ſouldier of the enemies, cauſed him to be hanged preſently. In the towne of Monſelica which ſtandeth in the plaine, is a riſing as it were a ſtonie hill (by reaſon whereof it is called Monſelica) which is very high, on the top whereof is a Caſtle, and at the back of that hil which goeth always leſſening, there be three circuits of wals, the loweſt whereof comprehended ſo much ſpace, that it well needeth two thouſand men to defend it againſt a whole armie. The enemies abandoned ſuddenly the towne, wherein the French being beſtowed, they planted their artillery againſt the firſt circuite, and after they had well battered it in many places, the footmen of the Gaſcoins and Spaniards began to approch the wall in diſorder, ſtriuing to enter by many breaches. There were

within for the defence of it ſeuen hundred men, who ſuppoſing it had bene an aſſault appointed and ordered, and ſeeing their diſabilitie to make reſiſtance if the aſſault were giuen in ſundry places, after they had made a ſmall defence, began to retire according to an agreement made amongſt themſelues before (as was beleeued:) but they made their retrait in ſuch diſorder, that the enemie who had already begun to enter the firſt circuit, purſuing them with light skirmiſh to the top of the hill, entred pelmell with them the other circuits, and ſo to the caſtle: where the greateſt part of them that were in garriſon being ſlain, the reſidue which were withdrawne to the tower, offering to yeeld vpon ſuretie of life, were not accepted by the Almaines, who at laſt put fire to the tower: ſo as of ſeuen hundred footmen and fiue Centurions, whereof Martin de Bourg of Tuſcane was the principall, there were very few ſaued, euery one hauing leſſe compaſſion of their calamities, for the cowardiſe they had ſhewed. And the Almaines ſhewed no leſſe crueltie againſt the buildings and walls; for not hauing ſufficient companies to guard them, they did not onely diſmantle the fortreſſe of Monſelica, but alſo conſumed the towne with fire: after which day thoſe armies did nothing of importance, ſauing that foure hundred French Lances ran vp euen to the gates of Padua. About this time the Duke of Ferrara departed from the campe, and Monſieur Chaſtillon with him, whom Monſieur Chaumont ſent with two hundred and fiftie Lances for the guard of Ferrara, where the people liued in great ſuſpition, for that the bands of the Pope were not farre from thence: notwithſtanding the Almaines perſwaded much Monſieur Chaumont (according to the agreement formerly made betweene them) to go incampe before Treuiſa, alledging that the actions which had bene done with ſo great expences, were of litle importance, if Treuiſa were not taken: for, touching Padua, there was no hope to be able to haue it. But on the contrary, Monſieur Chaumont replied, that Ceſar was not deſcended againſt the Venetians with ſuch forces as he had promiſed: and that thoſe that were ioyned to his army, were reduced to a very ſmall number: that within Treuiſa, where the Venetians had made very great fortifications, there were ſtore of ſouldiers: that the ſtore of victuals was worne out of the countrey, and that it was very difficult to bring prouiſion to the campe from farre places, for the continuall vexation of the light horſemen and eſtradiots of the Venetians, who being aduertiſed by the diligent eſpiall of the countrymen of euery litle mouing that was made, and being beſides in great number, ſhewed themſelues alwayes in euery place where they might endomage them. Theſe diſputations ceaſſed, by reaſon of a new commandement that came from the French King to Monſieur Chaumont, that leauing in the army of the Almaines foure hundred Lances and fifteene hundred Spaniſh footmen of the Kings pay, beſides thoſe that were in garriſon in Legnaguo, he ſhould ſuddenly returne with his army to the Duchie of Millan: for that many great troubles and dangers began already to appeare, whereof the Pope was the cauſe. By reaſon whereof Monſieur Chaumont leauing the gouernment of thoſe companies to Monſieur Perſi, he followed the Kings commandement; and the Almaines diſtruſting to be able to do any thing more of importance, put themſelues into Loniguo.

The Popes deliberation to chaſe the French out of Italy.

The Pope had of long time ſet downe in his mind an obſtinate reſolution, not onely to repoſſeſſe the Church of many Eſtates, which he pretended to appertaine to him, but alſo to chaſe the French King out of all that he held in Italy: and that which induced him thereunto, was either a ſecret and ancient ill will that he bare him, or a iealouſie which he had nouriſhed a long time, and now was conuerted into extreame hatred: or elſe a deſire of glorie, to be the deliuerer (as he boaſted afterwards) of Italy from forreine nations. To theſe ends he had abſolued the Venetians of the Church cenſures: to theſe ends, he was entred into intelligence and ſtraight alliance with the Swiſſers, making ſemblance to proceed in theſe things, more for his proper ſuretie, then for deſire to offend another: and to theſe ends, not being able to withdraw the Duke of Ferrara from the deuotion of the French King, he was determined to do all that he could to occupie that Duchie, giuing it out that he ſtirred onely for the quarrell of ſalt and tribute. And yet to the end not fully to diſcloſe his thoughts vntill he were better prepared, he dealt continually with Albert Pio, to haue agreement with the French King; who perſwading himſelfe that all his diſcontentment came for that he had taken the Duke of Ferrara into his protection, and being very deſirous to auoide his ill will; he conſented to contract with him new couenants, referring himſelfe to the capitulations of Cambray, wherein was expreſſed, that none of the Confederates ſhould intrude vpon any thing appertaining to the Church, inſerting therein ſuch words and clauſes as might make it lawfull to the Pope to proceed againſt the Duke of Ferrara, ſo far forth as concerned the particularitie of the tribute and ſalt, to which ends the King ſuppoſed the Popes thoughts did chiefly tend: interpreting the protection which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara, as though there was left to him a lawfull libertie to contract with the Pope in that maner. But the nearer the King approched to the demands of the Pope, the further was he eſtranged and ſeparate from him, being nothing moued for the newes he heard of the death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe. For, to ſuch as perſwaded him to the peace, and tooke their argument vpon this, that his ſuſpitions were now finiſhed, he anſwered, that the ſame King liued, and therefore the ſame iealouſies continued; alledging for confirmation of that ſaying, that it was well knowne, that the accord made by the Cardinall of Pauie had bene violated by the Kings owne determination, contrary to the will and counſell of the Cardinall of Amboiſe. Yea ſuch as looked more deeply into the Popes proceedings, found that his ſtomacke and his hopes were ſo much the more increaſed, and not without cauſe; for the qualities of the King being ſuch, as he ſtood in more need to be gouerned, then he was fit to gouerne, doubtleſſe he was much weakned by the death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe, ſince that beſides his long experience, his abilitie of wit was great, and had ſuch grace and authoritie with the King, that he almoſt alwayes followed his counſell, whereby it came to paſſe, that truſting to his greatneſſe, he would oftentimes take vpon him of himſelfe to giue a forme and reſolution of affaires: a matter which was not found in ſuch as ſucceeded him in the gouernment, who durſt not ſpeake to the King of ſuch things as they thought would diſpleaſe him, much leſſe could they determine: beſides, he repoſed not ſuch confidence in their counſels, and being many in number, reſpecting one another, and as yet not greatly truſting in their new authoritie, they proceeded more coldly and more careleſly then either the importance of the preſent affaires required, or was neceſſary againſt the heate and importunitie of the Pope: who not accepting any of the offers made by the King, required him at laſt to renounce, not with condition and limitation, but abſolutely and ſimply, the protection which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara. And the King labouring to perſwade him, that ſuch a renunciation would bring him great infamie, he anſwered in the end, that ſeeing the King refuſed to renounce ſimply, he would neither contract with him, nor be againſt him; and that not binding himſelfe to any perſon, he would ſtudie to maintaine the ſtate of the Church in peace, complaining more then euer of the Duke of Ferrara: who, his friends counſelling him to giue ouer the making of ſalt, had made this anſwer, that he could not follow their aduice without preiudicing the rights of the Empire, whereunto the iuriſdiction of Comachio did directly appertaine. But beſides this, many entred into a certaine doubt and opinion, which tooke increaſing with time, that Albert Pio the French Kings Embaſſadour, not proceeding ſincerely in his legation, ſtirred vp the Pope againſt the Duke of Ferrara, for a burning deſire he had (wherein he continued till his death) that Alphonſo ſhould be depriued of the Dukedome of Ferrara. The reaſon was, for that Hercules, father of Alphonſo, hauing had certaine yeares afore of Gilbert Pio the moitie of the dominion of Carpy, giuing him in recompence the borough of Saſſuola with certaine other lands, Albert feared (as oftentimes it falls out, that the weakeſt is compelled to yeeld to the will of the ſtronger) that in the end the other moitie either by compulſion or corruption would deuolue to him. But whatſoeuer the truth was, the Pope ſhewing ſignes of a perſon vnreconcileable againſt Alphonſo, and hauing alreadie determined to make warre againſt him, he prepared to proceed againſt him with the cenſures of the Church, ſeeking to iuſtifie the grounds of this action; and ſpecially by giuing out ỹ he had found among the Records of the Chamber Apoſtolik, the inueſtiture of the towne of Comachio, giuen by ỹ Popes to the houſe of Eſte. Theſe were the publike behauiours of the Pope, but in ſecret he ſolicited to ſet abroach farre greater troubles, ſuppoſing that he had layed a good foundation to his affaires, in contracting amitie with the Swiſſers, and hauing the Venetians at his deuotion: and withall that he ſaw the King of Aragon had the ſame end with him, or at leaſt was not ſoundly ioyned with the French King: that the forces and authoritie of Cæſar were ſo weake, that he had no need to feare him: and laſtly, that he was not without hope to procure the King of England to ſtirre. But that which ſhould moſt haue appeaſed him, did moſt ſtirre vp his ſpirits, which was the knowledge he had that the French King hauing no diſpoſition to make warre againſt the Church, nouriſhed a ſetled deſire to haue peace: inſomuch as it ſeemed to him that it would alwayes remaine in his power to draw him to peace, yea though he had leuied armes againſt him. For which reaſons growing dayly more inſolent, and redoubling openly

his complaints and threats againſt the French king and the Duke of Ferrara, he refuſed in the feaſt of the celebration of S. Peter (a day wherein, according to ancient cuſtome, are offered the tributes which are due to the ſea Apoſtolike) to accept the tribute of the Duke of Ferrara; ſaying, that the grant of Alexander the ſixt, who in marrying his daughter, had from foure thouſand duckets, reduced that offering to an hundred yearely, was of no force, becauſe it was to the preiudice of his Sea: beſides, he would not afore this time giue licence to the Cardinall of Achx and other French Cardinals to returne into France; and vnderſtanding that the Cardinall of Achx was gone to take the pleaſure of the fields with certain grayhounds, he entred into a vaine ſuſpition that he would ſecretly ſtart away, and therfore ſent ſpeedily after to take him, and held him priſoner in the caſtle S. Ange. Thus diſcloſing himſelfe now openly againſt the French king, and for that cauſe ſeeing himſelfe ſo much the more conſtrained to lay the greater foundations, he granted to the King Catholike the inueſtiture of the kingdome of Naples, vnder condition of the ſame tribute with the which the Kings of Aragon had obtained it, notwithſtanding he had refuſed afore to beſtow it otherwiſe then for fortie thouſand duckats: a rate afore time impoſed vpon the French king when he obtained it. That which moued the Pope hereunto, was not ſo much the bond which in other inueſtitures of the ſame kingdome, was wont to be made to him to entertaine euery yeare for him three hundred men at armes for the defence of the Church, as often as need required, as the deſire he had to make him his friend, and the hope that his aides (vpon occaſion) might do much to leade him into an open contention with the French King: whereof were already diſcerned certaine ſeeds and beginnings, for that the King Catholike ſuſpecting much the greatneſſe of the French King, and no leſſe iealous of his ambition, for that not content with the limits of the league of Cambray, he ſought to draw Verona to his obedience; and beſides all this, being puſhed on by the memory of ancient quarrels, he deſired greatly that there might be found ſome impediment in his affaires; and therefore ceaſſed not to counſell a peace betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, which was not a litle deſired by the Pope: and albeit he proceeded very ſecretly in theſe actiõs, yet he was not able altogether to couer his thoughts; inſomuch as his armie by ſea being fallen vpon Sicile, which he ſent to aſſaile the Ile of Gerbes (an Iland anciently called by the Latines the great Sirta) the King was entred into ſuſpition, and the minds of men that were well acquainted with his ſubtilties, were occupied with many doubts.

But troubles begã to ariſe to the French king frõ thoſe parts which he doubted leaſt, & in a time wherein he had no expectation of any mouing of armes to be prepared againſt him. For the Pope working alwayes vnder hand, ſolicited that at one time Genes might be aſſailed both by ſea and land: that twelue thouſand Swiſſers might deſcend vpon the Duchie of Millan: that the Venetians aſſembling all their forces, ſhould take the field to recouer their townes holden by Ceſar: and that his owne armie ſhould enter vpon the country of Ferrara, with intention to paſſe afterward into the Duchie of Millan, if things began to ſucceed happily to the Swiſſers. And he hoped that Genes being aſſailed vpon the ſudden, there would eaſily ariſe ſome mutation, for that there were many that bare no ſound affection to the gouernment of the French, and for that the faction of Fregoſa would riſe into mutinie, going thither vnder colour to make Octauian Duke, whoſe father and vnkle had poſſeſſed the ſame dignitie: that the French men amazed for the commotion of Genes, and being inuaded by the Swiſſers, would reuoke to the Duchie of Millan all the bands which they had with Ceſar and the Duke of Ferrara, which would be a cauſe that the Venetians ſhould eaſily recouer Verona, and afterwards ſet vpon the Duchie of Millan: that his regiments ſhould do the like after they had (as he hoped) made an eaſie conqueſt of Ferrara, being abandoned of the French; ſo that the eſtate of Millan could not defend it ſelfe againſt ſo many enemies, and ſo ſudden a warre. He began at one time the warre againſt Ferrara and againſt Genes: for albeit the Duke of Ferrara (againſt whom he proceeded, the more to haſten the execution, as againſt a notorious offender) offered to giue him the ſalts that were made at Comachio, with obligation that hereafter there ſhould be no more made; yet after he had diſmiſſed his Embaſſadours, he cauſed his armie to march againſt him, which with the onely ſummons of a trumpet, and no defence appearing, obtained Cente and Pieua, the which boroughs appertaining formerly to the Biſhopricke of Bologna, Pope Alexander in marrying his daughter, had annexed them to the Duchie of Ferrara, recompencing that Biſhopricke with other reuenues. Againſt Genes were ſent eleuen galleys of the Venetians, guided by Grillo Contarin, and one of the Popes, carrying Octauian Fregoſa, Ieronymo Dorea, with many other of the babaniſhed men: and by land at the ſame time, and for the ſame expedition, was diſpatched Marke Anthonie Colonno with an hundred men at armes, and ſeuen hundred footmen: this Captaine hauing left the pay of the Florentines, and being entertained by the Pope, abode vpon the territories of Lucques vnder colour to furniſh his band, giuing out a bruite that he was afterwards to go to Bologna: and albeit Monſieur Chaumont entred into ſome ſuſpition of Genes by reaſon of his abiding, yet not knowing that the army by ſea was to come, and the Pope hauing ſubtilly ſpread a bruite, that the preparations of the Swiſſers, and the lingring of Marke Anthonie were to execute ſome ſurpriſe vpon Ferrara, he made no other prouiſion for Genes, then to ſend thither a few footmen. Marke Anthonie with his companies marched to the vale of Biſagna, within a mile of the walls of Genes, although he was not receiued (according to the Popes hopes) either into Serezana or into the towne of Spetia: and at the ſame time the armie by ſea which had occupied Seſtria and Chiauera, was come from Rapale to the mouth of the riuer Entelle, which falleth into the ſea neare the port of Genes: into which Citie, vpon the firſt bruite that the enemies approched, there was entred for the French King the ſonnes of Iohn Lewis de Fieſque with eight hundred men of the countrey, with whom was ioyned the Cardinals nephew of Finalo, with an equall proportion of ſouldiers, which both aſſured the towne, and kept ſuppreſſed all commotions. By meanes whereof the Pope and the exiles being deceiued of their principall hope, ſeeing beſides a continuall flocking of ſouldiers out of Lombardie and the riuer of Ponant, together with ſixe great Galleys entring the hauen guided by Preian, they thought that to tarry longer there, would bring more perill then profite: and therefore both the nauie by ſea and the armie by land returned to Rapale, and in returning aſſayed to take Portofino, where died Franciſco Bolani, a patron of one of the Venetian galleys. And from thence their armie by ſea hoiſſing ſaile to go to Ciuitauecchia, Marke Anthonie Colonno doubting he could not paſſe ſafely by land for the commotions of the countrymen and popular fury alwayes raging againſt ſouldiers that retire in diſfauour, imbarked himſelfe in the galleys with threeſcore of the beſt horſemen, ſending the reſidue by land to Spetia, the moſt part of whom were ſtript, as well vpon the countrey of Genes, as vpon the marches of Lucques, and the frontiers of the Florentines. This attempt was done with very ſmall honour to Grillo and Octauian, for that for feare they abſtained to charge the veſſels of Preian, who being inferiour, it was ſuppoſed that before he entred the hauen, they might haue ſet vpon him with a great aduantage. After they were gone, Preian iſſued out of the hauen with ſeuen galleys and foure ſhips, and followed the Venetian nauie which was ſtronger then he in galleys, but weaker in number of ſhips. Both the one and other fell with the Ile of Elba, the Venetians in the port of Lungono, and the French in the hauen of Ferrato, who after they had accoaſted the enemie to the mount Argentaro, returned againe to Genes. About this time the Popes ſouldiers were entred into Romagna vnder the Duke of Vrbin, againſt the Duke of Ferrara; where hauing taken the towne of Lugo, Bagnacaual, and all the reſidue that the Duke held on this ſide Po, they encamped before the Caſtle of Lugo: and whileſt they lay there, without vſing diligence, and in no good order, being aduertiſed that the Duke of Ferrara with the French bands, and an hundred and fiftie men at armes of his owne, with many troupes of light horſemen, was marching to the reſcue of it, the Duke of Vrbin raiſed the ſiege ſuddenly, leauing three peeces of artillery in prey to the enemie, & retired to Imola. Alphonſo taking the aduantage of this occaſion, recouerd all that they had taken from him in Romagna: but the campe Eccleſiaſtike being againe aſſembled and increaſed, reconquered eftſoones the ſelfe ſame places eaſily, and immediatly after forced the caſtle of Lugo, hauing battred it many dayes: and after the taking of it, an occaſion of greater ſucceſſe preſented it ſelfe vnto them. For there being no garriſon in Modena, for that the Duke being buſied about the defending of other places where the danger was neareſt, could not prouide of himſelfe, nor obtaine of Monſieur Chaumont to ſend thither two hundred Lances, the Cardinall of Pauie paſſing with the army to Frank caſtle, obtained that Citie preſently by compoſition, whither he was inuited to come by Gerard and Francis Maria Rangons Gentlemen of Modena, whoſe authoritie was ſo great (chiefly Gerard) that they were able to diſpoſe of it as beſt liked them: and it was beleeued, that they were puſhed on more by ambition and deſire of innouation, then by any other occaſion. Modena being loſt, the Duke fearing leſt the like would happen to Regge, beſtowed preſent garriſon there, and Monſieur Chaumont doing after the hurt receiued, that which would haue profited more in the beginning, ſent thither two hundred Lances, notwithſtanding he had many impediments for the deſcending

ſcending of the Swiſſers. The confederation betweene the French King and the Swiſſers, was determined many moneths before, the King continuing in his reſolution not to augment their penſions, contrary to the counſell of all his Nobles, who aduiſed him to conſider of what importance it would be, to make thoſe armies his enemies, with the which he had before danted all men. And therefore they being already drawne into armes vnder the authoritie and promiſes of the Pope, and incited by the Biſhop of Sion, but ſpecially made angry with the Kings obſtinacie in denying their demands, were reſolued by an vniuerſall conſent of the Communalties in an aſſembly holden at Lucerna, to make warre againſt him. But Monſieur Chaumont foreſeeing theſe ſtirres, had ſet good guard vpon the paſſages towards Coma, and taken from the riuers all the boates and barks, and withdrawne into places of ſtrength all victuals and prouiſions, and laſtly had taken from the mils their grinding inſtruments. And being vncertaine, whether the Swiſſers would deſcend vpon the Duchie of Millan, or paſſing the mount S. Bernard, enter into Piemont by the vale of Auguſto, go to Sauona, with intention to domage Genes, or elſe paſſing the Appenin, to go againſt the Duke of Ferrara; he had induced the Duke of Sauoy to deny them paſſage; and for their more impediment, he ſent with his conſent fiue hundred Lances to Turea, not ceaſſing neuertheleſſe in the meane while to do all that he could to corrupt with preſents and promiſes the chiefe Commanders of that Nation, to withdraw them from riſing. But it was in vaine, ſo great was their hatred, and ſo much were they incenſed (chiefly the commons) againſt the French king: in ſo much as eſteeming it to be their proper cauſe, notwithſtanding the difficulties that were in the Pope to ſend them money, for that the Fookers bankers of Germanie, who had promiſed to defray it for him, ſhrunke backe for feare to offend Cæſar, ſixe thouſand of them leuied by the Pope began to march in the beginning of September: amongſt whom were foure hundred horſemen, halfe of them armed with ſhot, fifteene hundred footmen with caliuers, and fiftie harquebuſiers, without artillerie or other prouiſion of bridges or boates: who turning to the way of Belinſona, and hauing taken the bridge of Treſa, left abandoned by ſixe hundred French footmen which were there in garriſon, they incamped at Vareſa, expecting there (as they ſaid) the Biſhop of Sion with new companies. This troubled much the minds of the French, both for an ordinary feare they had of the Swiſſers, and more particularly for that at that time they had a very ſmall number of men at armes in Millan, part of them being diſtributed for the guard of Breſſa, Legnaguo, Valegge, & Peſquiero, and three hundred Lances being gone to the ſuccours of the Duke of Ferrara, and fiue hundred being ioyned with the armie of the Almaines againſt the Venetians. Yet neuertheleſſe Monſieur Chaumont aſſembling his forces, came with fiue hundred Lances and foure thouſand footmen into the plaine of Chaſtillon within two miles of Vareſa, hauing ſent Iohn Iaques Triuulce to the mount of Brianſa, to the end that not ſo much with the bands which he brought with him, which were in very ſmall number, as with the fauour of the men of the countrey, he might endeuour to keepe the Swiſſers from taking that way: who as ſoone as they were arriued at Vareſa, ſent to demand paſſage of Monſieur Chaumont, ſaying they would go to the ſeruice of the Church: by reaſon whereof it was doubted they would paſſe to Ferrara by the Duchie of Millan, by which way (beſides the impediments of the French companies) they ſhould haue found difficultie to haue paſſed the riuers of Po and Oglia: or elſe taking the left hand, would turne by the hils below Coma and Lucques, to paſſe the riuer of Adda, which there is narrow and not rough, from whence they might be guided by the hill of the countrey of Bergamo and Breſſia to the riuer of Oglia: and hauing paſſed ouer there, they might deſcend either by the countrey of Breſſia or by Guiaradadda vpon the marches of Mantua, which is a countrey large, where there are neither townes nor forces to reſiſt them. Such was the valour of that nation, and the reputation of their militarie diſcipline, that Monſieur Chaumont had no intention to ſet vpon them, by any meanes, no although they ſhould deſcend into the plaines, but with his horſmen & footmen ioyned together, and with his field peeces, to accoaſt and houer vpon them to cut off their victuals, and to giue them as many impediments as he could to paſſe the riuers (without tempting fortune): and in the meane while from thoſe places neare Vareſa that were well furniſhed with horſemen and footmen, he giuing them oftentimes falſe alarums, keeping them in breath all the night. At Vareſa, where the Swiſſers were now in great want of victuals, a new ſupply of foure thouſand came and ioyned with them, and the fourth day after their coming, they marched all together towards Chaſtillon, keeping vpon the left hand along the hils, marching alwayes in cloſe ranke, in good order, and without making any haſte. They were in euery file foure ſcore or an hundred, and in the laſt files were all the harquebuſiers and caliuers; and marching in this ſort, they defended themſelues valiantly againſt the French army, which alwayes accoaſted them, and skirmiſhed with them both behind and before; yea ſometimes an hundred or an hundred and fiftie of them would iſſue out of their ſquadron, to entertaine skirmiſh, aduancing, ſtaying, and retiring in ſuch ſort, as there could be diſcerned no diſorder in their doings. In this ſort they arriued the firſt day at the paſſage of the bridge of Vedan, which was guarded by Captaine Molard with certaine Gaſcoines, who being driuen backe with the ſhot of their harquebuſes, they lodged the ſame night at Appiana, eight miles from Vareſa, and Monſieur Chaumont encamped within Aſſaron, which is a great village towards the hill of Brianſa ſixe miles from Appiana. The day following, they drew along the hils, towards Cantu, Monſieur Chaumont accoaſting them alwayes with two hundred Lances, for that by reaſon of the roughneſſe of the places, the artilleries remained more lower together with the footmen that guarded them: and yet in the mid way either for the domages which the French had giuen them that day, as Monſieur Chaumont boaſted, or for that ſuch was their reſolution, leauing the way of Cantu, and turning more on the left hand, they went retiring by the high places towards Coma, encamping for that night in a ſuburbe of that Citie, and in the villages thereabout. From the ſuburbe of Coma, they made another lodging at Chiaſſo three miles more forward, keeping the French men in doubt, whether they would returne to Belinſona by the valley of Lungaro, or draw towards the riuer of Adda; where, albeit they were not furniſhed with bridges, yet many ſuppoſed that hauing made a bridge of boates, they would aſſay to paſſe all at once. But the next day putting them out of this doubt, they went and harboured at the bridge of Treſa, and from thence retired by troupes into their houſes, being reduced into the vttermoſt extremitie of victuals and want of money. It was beleeued that this ſo ſudden retrait was done for want of money, and for the difficulties to paſſe the riuers, but much more for the neceſſitie of victuals. In this ſort the French men were deliuered for this time, of a danger which they eſteemed not litle, although the King making his matters greater then they were indeed, affirmed that he could not but hold it profitable for his affaires to ſuffer them to paſſe, making this queſtion, whether of theſe two things would make the Pope more weake, either to be without ſouldiers, or to haue an armie that came to offend him, as did the Swiſſers, whom, with ſo many forces and ſo much treaſure, he had had all the paine in the world to manage.

The perill of the French had yet bene farre greater, if at one time they had bene aſſailed in many places, according to the purpoſe of the Pope: but as the enterpriſe of Genes was afore the mouing of the Swiſſers, ſo the armie of the Venetians aduanced not ſo ſoone as was determined, notwithſtanding they had had a ſingular occaſion and commoditie, for that the Almaine bands within Vincenſa, with whom were the Spaniſh footmen, and the fiue hundred French Lances, being much diminiſhed ſince the departure of Monſieur Chaumont, the Venetian armie iſſuing out of Padua, recouered without great trauell Eſte, Monſelica, Montagnana, Maroſtico, and Baſciana: and paſſing further, the Almaines alwayes drawing towards Verona, they entred into Vincenſa which they had abandoned: and ſo hauing recouered all thoſe peeces, except Legnaguo, which with ſo great expences and trauell of the French men, they had loſt in the whole Sommer; they came to S. Martin fiue miles from Verona, into which Citie the enemies retired, whoſe retraite had not bene without danger, if (as the Venetians ſay) there had bene greater courage in Luke Maluezzo; who was then their Generall, for that Iohn Paul Baillon had left their pay. For, the Venetians being come to the village of Towre, the enemies leauing great ſtore of victuals in their lodgings, tooke the way to Verona, the whole Venetian armie following them, and the light horſemen continually annoying them: and yet the French ſuſtaining valiantly the reareguard, chiefly with the artillery, they paſſed the riuer of Arpan, and marched without danger to Newtowne, the Venetians incamping within halfe a mile of them: and the day after, the Venetians not following them carefully, by reaſon, as they ſaid, their footmen were not able to follow the horſemen, they retired ſafely into Verona. The Venetians ſtayed certaine dayes at S. Martin, and then approching neare Verona, not without blame, for the vnprofitable ſtay they had made, they began to employ their artilleries (which they had planted vpon the oppoſite mountaine) againſt the Caſtle of S. Felix and the next wall: and haply they made choiſe of that place for that it was difficult to be fortified, and for that the horſemen could not ſtirre but very incommodiouſly. The Venetian army contained eight hundred men at armes, three thouſand light horſemen, the moſt part eſtradiots, and ten thouſand footmen, beſides a great quantitie of paiſants: and within Verona were three hundred Spaniſh Lances, one hundred Lances of Almaines and Italians, and more then foure hundred French Lances, fiue hundred footmen payed by the King, and foure thouſand Almaines, no longer vnder the Prince of Henault, who was dead certaine dayes afore. The people of Verona being ill affected to the Almaines, were vp with their weapons in their hands; a matter wherein the Venetians had much hoped, whoſe light horſemen paſſing at the ſame time the riuer of Adice at a foord beneath Verona, ouerranne the whole countrey. The artilleries of the Venetians battered the wall with great fury; notwithſtanding the artillery planted within by the French, and couered with their defences, did greatly diſtreſſe thoſe that were without, who had no rampiers: Lactantius Bergame, a Colonell of the greateſt account with the Venetians, had his buttocks ſtriken away with a ſhot of the artillery, of which he died within few dayes after. At laſt the artillery without hauing done a wonderfull execution, and beaten downe a great part of the wall, euen to the beginning of the ſcarpe, and ſo diſmounted and broken their Cannons that the artillery within was of litle or no ſeruice, the Almaines were not without feare to loſe the Caſtle, notwithſtanding it was well rampierd: to the loſſe whereof, to the end the loſing of the Citie ſhould not be ioyned, they determined in caſe of neceſſitie to retire to certaine rampiers which they had made in a place neare, to beate vpon the ſudden with their Cannons, which they had already planted, the face of the inner part of the Caſtle, hoping to make ſuch an opening, that the enemies ſhould find ſmall ſafetie to tarry there. But the valour of thoſe that were within, was farre aboue the vertue of the other; for that in the Venetian army were no other footmen then Italians, who being ordinarily payed euery fortie dayes, followed that ſeruice, more for that they found in other places very ſlender preferment, then for any other reaſon. Beſides, the Italian footmen, not accuſtomed to the order of ſeruice beyond the Mounts, nor reſolute in the field, were at that time almoſt alwayes reiected of euery one that had meanes to furniſh their ſeruice with footmen ſtrangers, ſpecially with Swiſſers, Almains and Spaniards. Therefore the towne being defended with a greater valour then it was aſſaulted, there iſſued out one night about eighteene hundred footmen, with certaine French horſemen to charge the artillery; and the footmen that guarded it being eaſily put to flight, they choaked two great peeces, ſtriuing to draw them into the towne: but the alarum being ſuddenly raiſed through all the campe, Zitolo de Perouſa came to the reſcue with many footmen, who fighting valiantly, finiſhed his life with great glorie. And Denis de Naldo coming on with the greater part of the army, the enemie was compelled to leaue the artillery and retire; yet with great praiſe, ſith that in the beginning they brake the guard that defended the artillery, and after ſlue part of ſuch as came firſt to the reſcue: and laſtly, retired almoſt all in ſafetie. In the end the Venetian Captaines being diſcouraged by this accident, ſeeing the inhabitants made no mutinie, and iudging withall, that their abiding there would be no leſſe vnprofitable then full of perill, for the ill ſuretie of their campe (their footmen being lodged in the mountaine, and their horſemen in the valley very farre from the footmen) they determined to retire to their old lodging at S. Martin, wherein they made the more ſpeed, for that they vnderſtood that Monſieur Chaumont would come to the reſcue of the towne, hauing already auoided the perill of the Swiſſers. When the campe brake vp, the forragers of Verona accompanied with a great ſtrength, entred the valley of Poliento ioyning to the mountaine of S. Felix: but many light horſemen of the Venetians being ſent out for reſcue, and ſeizing firſt of the entry of the valley, put them all to the ſword, or to the fortune of priſoners. From S. Martin the Venetian army drew to S. Boniface, being fearfull of the comming of Monſieur Chaumont: at which time thoſe that were in garriſon within Treuiſa, tooke by compoſition the towne of Aſola neare the riuer Muſono, wherein were eight hundred Almaine footmen: and afterwards the Caſtle. And in Friul they proceeded with the ſame variations and accuſtomed cruelties, no more making warre vpon the enemies, but proſecuting on all parts the deſtruction of buildings, and the ſpoiling of the countrey, which calamities likewiſe conſumed Iſtria. About this time it came to paſſe that the Marquis of Mantua was deliuered out of priſon after a very memorable maner, procured by the Pope, whereunto he was induced by an ancient affection which he bare to him before, and by a deſire to ſerue his turne of him, and the commoditie of his eſtate in the warre againſt the French King: and it was beleeued through all Italy, that he had bene the worker of his deliuery: but I haue bene informed by

Verona beſieged by the Venetians.

The calamities of Friul and Iſtria.

The Marquis of Mantua eſcapeth out of priſon.

by an author worthy of credite, and through whose hands at that time passed the whole gouernment of the estate of Mantua, that his libertie was wrought by another meane: for that he doubting lest the Venetians (as the truth was) either for the hate they bare him, or for the suspition they had of him, would keepe him perpetuall prisoner; after there had bene vsed in vaine many trials and remedies, it was determined in the Councell of Mantua, to haue recourse to Baiazet Prince of the Turks, whose amitie the Marquis had entertained many yeares, by sending him messages with sundry presents; who, taking knowledge of his calamitie, sent for the Gouernour of the Venetian Merchants lying at Pera in Constantinople, and told him, he must promise him that the Marquis should be deliuered: and the Gouernour refusing to promise that which was not in his power to performe, offered to write to Venice, where he doubted not but there would be set downe a resolution conformable to his desire; but Baiazet replying proudly, that it was his will that he should make an absolute promise, he was constrained to condescend thereunto; which being signified to the State of Venice by the Gouernour, the Senate considering that it was not now time to stirre vp so mightie a Prince, determined to set him at libertie. But to hide his dishonour, and to reape some fruite of his deuice, he gaue eare to the Popes desire; by whose meane it being concluded (but secretly) that to assure the Venetians that the Marquis should not moue against them, his eldest sonne should be put into the Popes hands, the Marquis was conueyed to Bologna, where after he had deliuered ouer his sonne to the Agents of the Pope, being now at libertie, he went to Mantua, excusing himselfe both to Cæsar and the French King by the necessitie he had to redresse his owne estate, that he came not to their armies to do them seruice, as freeholder to the one, and souldier to the other, (for the French King held him always in the number of his Pensioners) although in very deed his intention was to remaine a neuter.

Matters being thus vnhappily begun, had nothing diminished the hopes of the Pope, who perswading himselfe more then euer of the mutations of Genes, determined to assaile it againe. By reason whereof the Venetians following him more by necessitie, then that they approued of his furious dealing, augmented their nauie which was at Ciuitauecchio with foure great ships; and when the Pope had ioyned thereunto one of his Galeasses with some other vessels, perswading himselfe that his name would most easily induce the Genowayes to rebell, he blessed his banners publikly with Pontificall ceremonies; all men maruelling, that now whē his thoughts were made manifest, and that within Genes were many souldiers, and a strong nauie within the hauen, how he could hope to obtaine that, which he was not able to atchieue when the hauen was disarmed, when there was but a small garrison within the Citie, and when there was no doubt at all of him. To the armies at sea which were followed by the banished faction, and also by the Bishop of Genes, sonne of Obietto de Fiesquo, were to be ioyned the land forces. For Federike Archbishop of Salerne, brother to Octauian Fregosa, leuied with the Popes money companies of footmen and horsemen in the countrey of Lunigiana, John de Sasatella and Reinold de Sasseto his Captains, hauing commandement to be readie with their regiments at Bagno de Porretto, to make an approch to Genes as occasion should require. But in that Citie had bene made mightie prouisions both by sea and land, and therefore at the bruite of the approch of the nauie of the enemie, wherein were fifteene light galleys, three great galleys, one galeasse, and three Biscain ships, the French nauie lanching out of the hauen of Genes with two and twentie light galleys, went to meete them at Portouenere: and the diuersitie of vessels was to them a suretie, for that being inferiour to the enemies being vnited together in one strength, but superiour or at least equall in force in respect of the galleys, they might alwayes by their swiftnesse in dispersing saue themselues from the ships. The two nauies approched one another aboue Portouenere within the shot of the artillery, and after they had exchanged betweene them certaine volleys of shot, the Popes nauie went to Sestria, which is in the coast of Leuant, from whence they presented themselues afore the port of Genes, John Fregosa entring within ỹ port with a Brigantine: but the towne being so straitly guarded that the contrary faction could not rise, and the artillery of the tower of Codisa thundring without ceassing, they were constrained to retire. Afterwards they sailed to Portouenere, and spending many houres afore it without any effect, despairing of the successe of the whole enterprise, they returned to Ciuitauecchia; from whence the Venetian vessels departing with the Popes consent to returne into their owne seas, they fell distressed at Far de Messina with such a furious tempest, that fiue of their galleys were lost, & the others were cast vpon the coast of Barbarie, from whence, being much bruised, they fell at last into the ports of the Venetians.

tians. The forces that ſhould haue come by land, were not in this action, for that the companies that were leuied in the countrey of Lunigiana ſtirred not, iudging it an enterprife full of perill to enter the coaſt of Leuant, for the preparations which the French had made: and ſuch as were readie at Bagno de Porreto, making excuſe that the Florentines would not ſuffer them to paſſe, marched no further, but entring into the mountaine of Modena, which yet obeyed the Duke of Ferrara, they aſſailed Fanana, which though they could not obtaine at the beginning, yet in the end (for that the mountaine men ſaw no hope of ſuccours from the Duke of Ferrara) they yeelded to them. Thus till this day had nothing ſucceeded to the Pope of all that he had attempted againſt the French king: for that there was no mutation at Genes, as he did aſſuredly promiſe himſelfe; neither did the Venetians, after they had in vaine aſſailed Verona, hope for any aduancement on that ſide: neither did the Swiſſers accompliſh any thing, their action being rather in demonſtration then in effect: and touching Ferrara, whither the French had ſent ready ſuccours, and the Winter approching, there was no apparence of any danger; onely he had ſurprized Modena, a recompence vnworthy of ſo great emotions. But it ſeemed to be with the Pope, diſappointed of ſo many hopes, as the Poets haue left written of Anteus, who being tamed by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throwne to the ground, ſo often did appeare in him a greater ſtrength and courage. Euen ſo was it with the Pope in his aduerſities; for when he ſeemed moſt deiected and moſt oppreſſed, then did he moſt lift vp himſelfe with a ſpirit more conſtant and reſolute, promiſing himſelfe for the time to come more then euer: and yet he had almoſt no other foundations then of himſelfe; and that which he preſuppoſed (as he would openly ſay) that albeit he was vtterly voide of valiant and loyall armes, hauing no other aſſured friends then the Venetians who by neceſſitie ran the ſame fortune; neuertheleſſe for that his enterpriſes were not vndertaken for any particular intereſt, but of an onely and ſincere deſire to ſet Italy at libertie, he doubted not, with the aide of God, to manage them to an iſſue honorable, happie and commendable. He could not hope much of the Venetians, for that they were alreadie drained of money, and oppreſſed with many difficulties: and the King Catholicke ſeemed rather to counſell him ſecretly, then to aide him openly; for that on the other ſide he vſing his ordinarie ſubtiltie, entertained amitie with Maximilian and the French King: and albeit he made him many promiſes, yet he held him in ſuſpence with many exceptions and delayes. And touching the trauell he had vſed to ſeparate Ceſar from the French King, and to bring him to agreement with the Venetians, it ſeemed euery day more vnprofitable: for that Ceſar, at ſuch time as the Pope had ſent out an armie againſt the Duke of Ferrara, had ſent an Herald to charge him not to moleſt him: and Conſtantine de Macedonia being gone in the Popes name to ſolicite an accord betweene him and the Venetians, he did not onely refuſe to heare him, but giuing to vnderſtand that he would more firmly knit himſelfe with the French King, he ſpake of ſending vnto him the Biſhop of Gurci to negociate with him of all their affaires. Alſo the Electors of the Empire, notwithſtanding they bare great inclination to the name of the Pope, and to the deuotion of the ſea Apoſtolike, would not heare ſpeake of the expences: in ſo much as being addicted onely to the affaires of Germanie, they were not to do him any great ſeruice in thoſe actions. And it ſeemed he could not hope much more of the King of England, notwithſtanding he was yong, and deſirous of innouations, and had made profeſſion to affect the greatneſſe of the Church, and had heard his Embaſſadours, not without ſome inclination of mind: for that being ſo farre remoued from Italy, as well by land as by ſea, he was not able of himſelfe to embaſe the French king, hauing withall ratified the peace with him, and by a ſolemne Embaſſage ſent to that end, receiued the full confirmation. Certainly any other, who had ſo weake foundations, and ſo great impediments, would haue abated in courage, ſeeing withall he had the meanes to obtaine peace with the French King, with ſuch conditions as a conqueror could hardly deſire greater. For the King conſented to abandon the protection of the Duke of Ferrara, though not directly in regard of his honour, yet indirectly to ſatisfie the Pope, referring it to the arbitration of the law, but into the hands of ſuch Iudges as would haue pronounced according to the Popes will: who albeit he was certaine that he might obtaine this forme of peace to his quiet and honour, yet he added, that ouer and beſides theſe, he would haue the King to leaue Genes at libertie, proceeding in theſe actions with ſuch obſtinacie, that not one of his deareſt familiars durſt once aduiſe him to the contrarie: and which more is, the Embaſſadour of Florence offering to ſound him according to the Kings commandement, put him into great choler; & a meſſenger whō the Duke of Sauoy had ſent to him about other affaires, offering that his Prince (if it ſo liked him) would interpoſe in the working of the peace, he was ſo much moued, that crying out, that he was ſent to eſpie, and not to negociate, he committed him to priſon thereupon, and cauſed him to be examined with torments: and finally growing daily more obſtinate in difficulties, not reſpecting either impediments or dangers, he determined to lay aſide all his other thoughts, and to vſe all his endeuours for the ſubduing of Ferrara; and reſolued to go in perſon to Bolognia, both to haſten things by his preſence, to giue more authoritie to his affaires, and to increaſe the courage of his Captaines, which was farre inferiour to his furie: aſſuring himſelfe that to take Ferrara, his owne forces would ſuffice ioyned with the Venetians, who laboured to feed him in that perſwaſion, for feare leſt in the end loſing all hope of good ſucceſſe, he ſhould come to accord with the French King. On the other ſide, the French King being now certaine by ſo many experiences of the intention and ill affection of the Pope towards him, and knowing that it was neceſſarie to prouide againſt other dangers that might happen to his eſtate, he determined to defend the Duke of Ferrara; and keeping eſtabliſhed the amitie he had with Cæſar, he reſolued to perſecute (by his conſent) the Pope with armes ſpirituall, and in the meane while to put off matters vntill the Spring, when he would paſſe into Italy with a puiſſant armie, to make warre either vpon the Venetians, or againſt the Pope, as the eſtate of affaires ſhould require. Wherefore propoſing to Cæſar, not onely that he would go againſt the Venetians with a greater power then heretofore, but alſo that he would aide him (as he knew well he had long deſired) to take Rome and the whole ſtate of the Church, as of right belonging to the Empire: and likewiſe all Italy, except the Duchie of Millan, Genes, the ſtate of the Florentines, and of the Duke of Ferrara: he ranged him eaſily to his opinion, and ſpecially that by their authoritie, ioyning with them the conſent of the nations of France and Almain, they might call a generall Councell, wherein they hoped would be concurrent the Spaniſh regions and the King of Aragon, who durſt do nothing againſt their will. To theſe was added another moſt great foundation, that many Cardinals of Italy and beyond the Mounts, hauing minds ambitious and ſtirring, promiſed to make open profeſſion to be the authors of the Councell. The King for the better direction of theſe things, expected with no ſmall deſire the coming of the Biſhop of Gurce, whom Cæſar had determined to ſend to him. But in the meane while, to lay a beginning to the inſtitution of the Councell, and to remoue preſently from the Pope the obedience of his kingdome, he made ſummons to all the Prelates of France to aſſemble at Orleans in the midſt of September. Such were the reſolutions and preparations of the French King, not altogether approued by thoſe of his Councell and of his Court, who conſidering how vnprofitable it would be to giue leiſure to the enemie, perſwaded him not to deferre the mouing of armes to a new time; whoſe counſell if it had bene followed, the Pope had bene eaſily brought into ſuch neceſſitie, and his affaires ſo confuſed, that it had not bene ſo eaſie for him, as it was afterward, to ſtirre vp againſt him ſo many Princes. But the King perſiſted in his opinion, either through auarice, or for feare leſt other Princes would be iealous of his greatneſſe if he onely made warre againſt the Pope: or perhaps he abhorred ſuch an action, as contrary to the ſurname of Right Chriſtian, and vnworthy of the profeſſion to defend the Church, which his predeceſſors had alwayes done in ancient times.

The kings diſpoſitiō againſt the Pope.

The Pope entred into Bolognia vpon the end of September, with intention to inuade Ferrara as well by water as by land with all his owne forces, and thoſe of the Venetians. Therefore the Venetians at his requeſt ſent out two fleets armed againſt Ferrara, which entred into the riuer of Po, the one by Fornaci, and the other by the port of Primaro, and began to do many domages to the people of Ferrara, as the Popes companies did alſo at the ſame inſtant, who ouerran and pillaged the whole countrey, but not coming neare to Ferrara, wherein was a ſtrength of two hundred and fiftie French Lances beſides the Dukes ſouldiers. For albeit the Popes Captaines were payed for eight hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen, yet, beſides that they were bodies taken vp at randon, (the Popes being ordinarily ill ſerued in warres) the numbers were farre leſſe. And beſides Monſieur Chaumont hauing ſent, after the loſſe of Modena, to Regge and Rubiero two hundred and fiftie Lances, and two thouſand footmen: Marke Anthonie Colonno and Iohn Vitelli departed from the armie by the Popes commandement with two hundred men at armes and three hundred footmen, to go to Modena. For theſe reaſons the Pope made inſtance that of the Venetian armie (the forces of Ceſar ſar being much diminiſhed at Verona and euery where) which had without great difficultie recouered almoſt all Friul; he might paſſe a part of it into the country of Ferrara, where they had newly recouered Poleſina de Rouigna, left abandoned by the neceſſitie of the affaires which the Duke had about Ferrara. The Pope alſo expected three hundred Spaniſh Lances, whom the King of Aragon, according to the bond of the inueſtiture, ſhould ſend to him vnder the leading of Fabricio Colonno whenſoeuer he ſhould demand them: and he made his purpoſe when they were arriued at his campe, to ſet vpon Ferrara on his ſide, and the Venetians to do the like on their part: perſwading himſelfe that as ſoone as the people of Ferrara ſaw the armie approch the wals, they would take armes againſt the Duke, notwithſtanding his Captaines told him that the garriſon within was both able to defend the Citie, and keepe the people in order, what diſpoſition ſoeuer they had to run into tumult: and therefore with incredible care he entertained in ſindry places many bands of footmen. But the Venetians were more ſlow in coming forward then the Pope expected, for that hauing brought by the riuer of Po vpon the marches of Mantua many barkes to make a bridge, the Duke of Ferrara charging ſodainly vpon them with certaine French bands, tooke them from them: and alſo within certaine creeks of Poliſena he tooke many barkes and other veſſels, together with the Treaſurer of the Venetian armie. At which time an intelligence being diſcouered which the Venetians had within Breſſia, to make it rebell againſt the French King, the Count John Maria de Martinengo was beheaded there. But farre more ſlow in marching were the companies of the Spaniards, who being arriued vpon the frontiers of the kingdome of Naples, refuſed, according to the direction of their King, to paſſe the riuer of Tronto, vnleſſe the Bull of inueſtiture which had bene promiſed, were firſt deliuered to his Embaſſadour; which the Pope would not giue vntill they were arriued at Bologna, for doubt leſt after he had giuen it, the companies that were promiſed ſhould not come at all: and yet, neither for any declaration that his Captaines could make to him, neither for the preſent difficulties, did his hope diminiſh that he was able to carrie Ferrara with his owne ſtrength onely; and he looked into all the expeditions of warre with a wonderfull trauell and affection, notwithſtanding that at the ſame time he fell into a great maladie, which (gouerning himſelfe contrary to the counſel of Phyſitions) he deſpiſed no leſſe then other things, promiſing himſelf the victorie of that, as alſo of the whole war, hauing this firme perſwaſion, that it was the will of God that Italy ſhould be reſtored to liberty by his means. He brought to paſſe likewiſe, that the Marquis of Mantua, whom he had called to Bologna, and honored with the title of Gonfalonnier of the Church, ſhould take pay of the Venetians vnder the name of their Captaine generall (the Pope participating for an hundred men at armes, and twelue hundred footmen) but with ſpeciall charge, that it ſhould be kept ſecret, as the Marquis had deſired, vnder colour that it was neceſſary that he ſhould prouide firſt for the affaires of his own country, to the end to withſtand the harmes of the French men: but in truth for that he tooke this charge vpon him, not of good will, but by neceſſitie, becauſe of the promiſes he had made, he ſought to deferre the execution, the better to deliuer himſelfe of it by ſome occaſion that might happen. The great deſire which the Pope had to offend others, was turned into a neceſſitie to defend his owne things: which yet had bene more important and greater, if new accidents had not conſtrained Monſieur Chaumont to deferre his purpoſes. For after the Venetian armie was broken vp from before Verona, Monſieur Chaumont being come as farre as Peſquiero to march to the reſcue of that Citie, determined to returne ſpeedily with his armie to the recouery of Modena, in which quarter, his bands that were at Rubiero, had taken by aſſault the towne of Formingo; which if he had done, it was thought he might haue eaſily obtained it, both for that the garriſon was ſlender, the towne not fortified, and the inhabitants not liking the iuriſdiction of the Church. But it hapned as he thought to go his way, that the Almain footmen that were within Verona began to draw into tumult, for that they were ill payed of Ceſar; by reaſon whereof, leſt that Citie ſhould remaine abandoned, Monſieur Chaumont was conſtrained to abide there till he had appaiſed and reaſſured them, and to this end he gaue nine thouſand duckats for their preſent pay, and promiſed to pay them likewiſe for the moneth following. He had no ſooner put remedie to this diſorder, then there happened another accident, for the Venetian bands being retired towards Padua, and Grotto the Gouernour of Legnagno thinking now a fit occaſion was offered to ſacke the towne of Montagnana, he cauſed all his men at armes and foure hundred footmen to march thither: againſt whom, whileſt they of the towne (who could not be without feare of ſacking) made defence, many troupes of the Venetian light horſemen, finding them in diſorder, brake them eaſily to their great harmes, for that the meanes to flie was taken from them by the enemie that had beaten downe a bridge: by which aduenture Legnagno being almoſt made naked of men, it is without all doubt, that if the Venetian bands had ſuddenly ſet vpon it, they had taken it; which opportunitie was ſoone loſt, for that Monſieur Chaumont being aduertiſed of all that had hapned, diſpatched thither in great diligence other bands. But theſe impediments were the cauſe that he loſt the oportunitie to recouer Modena, into which in this reſpite of time, were entred many footbands, and many fortifications had bene carefully made: and yet by his coming to Rubiero, the Pope was compelled to addreſſe to Modena that armie that was appointed to go againſt the Duke of Ferrara: and there all his forces being aſſembled vnder the Duke of Vrbin Captaine generall, and the Cardinall of Pauie his Legate, and vnder Iohn Paul Baillon, Marke Anthonie Colonno, and Iohn Vitelli, Captaines of authoritie, he importuned them to giue battell to the enemie: a matter which all his Captaines did impugne, foraſmuch as the forces of the French were without all compariſon greater both in number and valour; ſeeing that the footmen of the Church had bene leuied in haſte, and in the armie was no ſuch obedience and order as was fit; there being alſo betweene the Duke of Vrbin and the Cardinall of Pauie a manifeſt diſcord, which proceeded ſo farre, that the Duke accuſing him of infidelitie to the Pope, led him as priſoner to Bologna, either of his owne authoritie, or elſe by the Popes commandement: but all crimes and imputation of crimes being purged by his preſence, he was held in more fauour and authoritie then before. Whileſt theſe two armies lie one right againſt the other, Monſieur Chaumont abiding with his horſemen at Rubiero, and his footmen at Marſaglio, and on the other ſide, the Eccleſiaſtikes keeping at Modena in the ſuburbes of Rubiero, and many courſes and skirmiſhes paſſing betweene them, the Duke of Ferrara, who a litle before had recouered without reſiſtance Poleſina de Rouigna, ioyning to him the Lord Chaſtillon and the French lances, recouered without impediment Finale, and from thence entring into the towne of Cento (which the Pope had taken before) by the caſtle that held for him, he ſacked and burned it, and prepared himſelfe to go ioyne with Monſieur Chaumont: for feare whereof the Church armie within Modena, beſtowed part of their footmen in the ſuburbe toward the mountaine. But the Duke was no ſooner remoued, then he was conſtrained to ſtay for the defence of his owne; for that the Venetian ſouldiers containing three hundred men at armes, many light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen, to winne the paſſage of Po, and ſo to ioyne with the Popes armie, were encamped before Ficquerolo, which is a litle and weake borough vpon Po, but of great renowme, both for the long time that Robert of S. Seuerin was afore it in the warre which the Venetians had with Hercules Duke of Ferrara, and alſo for the defence made by Federike Duke of Vrbin, Captaines of great valour in that time. The Venetians tooke it by compoſition when they had battered it with their artillerie, and afterwards forced the towne of Stellato, which is vpon the oppoſite ſhore; and commanding in that ſort the paſſage of Po, there reſted no more to paſſe ouer, but to caſt the bridge, which Alphonſo after the loſſe of Stellato (being come with his army to Bondin) hindred with his artillerie, which he had planted vpon a point of the land, from whence he eaſily beate that place, and beſides that ſcoured the whole riuer of Po with two galleys, which retired immediatly, for that the Venetian fleet, who at the firſt could not enter Po, the mouthes of the riuer being guarded by the ordinance of the Duke, found entrance now, coming vp Adice againſt the ſtreame; inſomuch as the countrey of Ferrara was much endomaged by the two fleets of the Venetians. But that ceaſſed forthwith, for the Duke iſſuing out of Ferrara, ſet vpon that fleet which was entred by Primaro and come vp to Adria, with two galleys, two ſoiſts, and many ſmall barkes: and hauing eaſily repulſed them, he came to the other, which being compounded but of foiſts and other ſmall veſſels, was entred by Fornaces, and come vp to Puliſella: and as they would haue entred into Adice by a riuer neare it, they were hindered by the ſhallowneſſe of the water: inſomuch as being continually beaten vpon by the artilleries of the enemie, they left their veſſels abandoned, being vnable to defend them, ſeeking to ſaue themſelues and their artilleries.

In theſe ſtirres of temporall armes, the ſpirituall weapons began to be ſtirring on all parts: for the Pope had publikely excommunicated Alphonſo d'Eſte, and all ſuch as were either come or ſhould come to his ſuccours, and ſpecially Monſieur Chaumont, with all the principals of the French armie: and in France the aſſembly of Prelates that had bene tranſported from Orleans to Tours, had consented (although more not to oppose against the will of their King assisting, who was oftentimes present at their assembly, then of their proper will or iudgement) to many articles propounded against the Pope, with this onely modification, that before they withdrew themselues from his obedience, there should be Embassadours addressed to him, to aduertise him of such articles as were agreed vpon by the Clergie of France, and to admonish him that hereafter he should obserue them; and that in case of impugning or resisting, he should be cited to the Councel: and that instance should be made to other Princes, that all the nations of Christendom might be there present. And besides, there it was agreed to leuie a great impost of mony for the King vpon the Churches of France: and a litle after in another Session of the xxvij. of September, they published the Councell to begin at Lions in the beginning of the next March: and the same day the Bishop of Gubei entred into Tours, where he was receiued with so rare and excessiue honour, that it was well perceiued with what long and great desire his coming had bene expected. Furthermore, now began to be disclosed the diuision of the Cardinals against the Pope; for that the Cardinals of S. Crosse and Cosenso Spanish, and the Cardinals of Baieux and S. Mallo French, together with the Cardinall Federike de S. Seuerin, leauing the Pope going to Bolognia by the way of Romagna, and visiting in his iourney the temple of Loretta, which is very famous for the multitude of miracles, they took, with his leaue, their way through Tuscane: but being come to Florence, and obtaining of the Florentines safeconduct, not for any time determined, but vntill they reuoked it, and fifteene dayes after the reuocation should be signified to them, they deferred with many excuses to passe any further: and the Pope being entred into suspition for that they stayed so long, after many requests made to them to go to Bolognia, he wrote a briefe to the Cardinals of S. Mallo, Baieux, and S. Seuerin, to come to the Court vpon paine of his indignation: and proceeding more gently with the Cardinall of Cosensa, and with the Cardinall of S. Crosse, a Cardinall of marke, for his nobilitie, knowledge, good life, and for the embassages which he had managed for the sea Apostolike, he incited them by a Briefe to do the like: but they being resolued not to obey him, went to Millan by the way of Lunigiana, after they had in vaine solicited the Florentines, to giue not onely to them, but to all the Cardinals that would come to Florence, an assured safeconduct for a long time. In this meane while Monsieur Chaumont intending to recouer Carpy, which had bene taken before by the souldiers of the Church, sent thither Albert Pio, and Monsieur de Palisse with foure hundred Lances and foure thousand footmen; and Albert Pio going before with a trumpet, accompanied with a small troupe of horsemen, the townesmen that loued him well, hearing of his coming, began to fall in tumult: for feare whereof the Ecclesiastiks y lay there in garrison to the number of fortie light horsemen, and fiue hundred footmen, forsooke their charge, and tooke the way to Modena: but being pursued by the French which came soone after, they were put to flight in the medow of Curtille, which is almost in the mid way betweene Carpy and Modena; and the horsemen saued themselues, but most part of their footmen were lost. Now Monsieur Chaumont esteemed it the best policie, to set vpon the enemy afore the arriuall of the Spanish lances, whom to aduance, the Pope had deliuered into the hands of the Cardinal of Rhegine the Bull of inuestiture: and before the Venetian companies should ioyne with them, who hauing raised certaine rampiers against the artilleries of Alfonso, hoped speedily to haue cast their bridge. Therefore he drew neare to Modena, where after a long time was spent in skirmishing betweene both parts, the Ecclesiastikes finding themselues the weaker, would neuer issue out with all their forces. This hope being lost, he determined to put in execution that, whereunto many, and chiefly the Bentiuoleis, had perswaded him with sundrie offers: to wit, not to consume time vnprofitably about such small matters, whereof the difficulties were farre greater then the profits: but to assaile on the sudden the bodie of the warre, and the principall head, from whom proceeded so many perils and troubles: That he had now a very good occasion, for that within Bolognia were very few forreine souldiers, and amongst the people many that fauoured the Bentiuoleis, the most part of the residue being inclined rather to expect the issue of things, then to take armes to expose themselues to dangers, and produce new hatreds: That if the attempt were not now giuen, and the present occasion let passe, it would be in vaine to assay it hereafter; for that when the bands either of the Venetians or Spaniards that are expected, shall be come, there will be no hope to do that with a mightie armie, which now is easie to be obtained with farre lesser forces. Then the whole armie being assembled, which the Bentiuoleis followed with certaine horsemen and a thouſand footmen of their owne pay, tooke their way betweene the mountaine and the high way, and aſſaulted Spilinberto, which is a borough of the Counts Rangons, wherein was a garriſon of foure hundred footmen, ſent thither by the Pope; but when they had battered it a litle, they had it the ſame day by compoſition; and Frankeaſtle the next day being rendred, they incamped at Creſpolano, a borough ten miles from Bolognia, with intention to preſent themſelues the day after afore the gates of that Citie, where the coming of the armie being diuulged, and that the Bentiuoleis were in it, all things appeared full of confuſion and tumult, and the Nobles no leſſe then the Commons fell into commotion, the one part fearing, and the other deſiring the returne of the Bentiuoleis. But greater confuſion and feare occupied the minds of the Prelates and Courtiers, better acquainted with the idleneſſe and delights of Rome, then accuſtomed to the dangers of warre. The Cardinals being much offended, ranne to the Pope, complaining that he had put himſelfe, the ſea Apoſtolike, and them into ſo great perill; importuning him with great inſtance, either to make ſome ſufficient prouiſion for their defence (which in ſuch ſhortneſſe of time they held impoſſible) or to ſeeke to qualifie matters, & aſſay to make ſome compoſition with conditions as eaſie as he could, whereunto they ſuppoſed the enemie would incline; or elſe that he would depart out of Bolognia together with them, and that he would conſider, at leaſt if his particular danger touched him not, of what importance it would be for the Sea Apoſtolike, and for all Chriſtian religion, if there happened any inconuenience to his perſon. All thoſe that were moſt familiar with him, and his moſt acceptable miniſters and ſeruants did communicate in theſe complaints. But he onely, in ſo great a confuſion, and in ſuch a diſorder of all things, no leſſe vncertaine of the fidelitie of the people, then ill contented with the ſlow coming of the Venetians, made obſtinate reſiſtance againſt all theſe aduerſities, and the maladie that had much weakened his bodie, ioyned to all theſe afflictions, could not once bend the greatneſſe of his mind. At the beginning he had cauſed to come thither Marke Anthonie Colonno with part of the ſouldiers that were within Modena, and likewiſe had ſent for Ierome Donato Embaſſadour to the Venetians, to whom he complained with moſt ardent exclamations, that for the long delaying of the aides which had bene ſo many times promiſed him, his perſon and his eſtate were in manifeſt danger, not onely with an ingratitude abhominable towards him that had begun the warre chiefly for their ſafetie, and who with great expences and dangers, hauing brought the whole Empire and the French King to be his enemies, had bene the cauſe of the preſeruation of their libertie till that day, but alſo with an incredible indiſcretion in regard of themſelues: for if he ſhould either be vanquiſhed or conſtrained to yeeld to any compoſition, there could be no hope of their ſafetie, and leſſe expectation of good degree for their Commonweale: and laſtly he proteſted with words full of affection, that he would fall to agreement with the French if the next day paſt ouer and no ſuccours of their people which lay at Stellato entred into Bolognia, hauing, for the difficultie to build a bridge, paſſed ouer the riuer of Po vpon barkes and other veſſels. Alſo he aſſembled the Senators and chiefe Captaines of Bolognia, and encouraged and ſtirred them vp with graue words, that remembring the miſeries of their tyrannie paſt, and how much the tyrants would be more hurtfull and dangerous, if they returned after they were expulſed, they would maintaine the iuriſdiction of the Church, wherein they had found ſo great eaſe: and to induce them to a more readineſſe, beſides the priuiledges he had granted them before, he gaue them exemption of the moitie of all the impoſts exacted vpon the victuals that entred into Bolognia for the vſe of man, with promiſe to gratifie them hereafter with greater benefites. He made theſe things knowne by proclamation, the better to moue the people to take armes for the defence of the ſtate Eccleſiaſtike: but without fruite; for not one bodie ſtirred, nor any ſigne made in his fauor. Knowing then in what danger he ſtood, and ouercome with the importunities and plaints of ſo many people, and beſides the Embaſſadours of Ceſar, the King Catholike, and the King of England making great inſtance vnto him, at the requeſt of the Cardinals he conſented they ſhould ſend to Monſieur Chaumont, to demand leaue for Iohn Francis Pigna Count of Mirandola to go to him in ſafetie in the Popes name: and not many houres after he himſelfe ſent one of his chamber, to require him to ſend to him Albert de Carpy, not knowing but that he was in the armie. And at the ſame time, to the end that in all aduentures the moſt precious things of the Pontificacie might be in ſafetie, he ſent Laurence Pucci his Secretarie to Florence with the Regno (ſo they call the principall Miter) which was full of precious ſtones, to be kept in the famous Monaſterie of the Nunnes. Monſieur Chaumont by reaſon of the requeſts that were made vnto him, hoped that the Pope would hearken to peace, which he desired much, for that he knew it was agreeable to the intention of his King: and therefore, not to trouble such a disposition, the day following he retained the armie in their lodgings, suffering notwithstanding the Bentiuoleis with many horsemen of their friends and followers, to run euen to the walles of Bolognia, hauing marching a good space after them an hundred and fiftie French Lances: at whose coming, notwithstanding Hermes, one of the yongest, but the most resolute of the brethren, presented himselfe at the side of the gate, yet there was no mutinie made within. Monsieur Chaumont gaue gracious audience to Iohn Francisco de Mirandola, and sent him backe the same day to Bolognia, to signifie to the Pope the conditions wherwith he was content to accord, viz: That the Pope should absolue Alphonso d'Este of the Church censures, together with all those whosoeuer, which vpon any occasion intermedled either in his defence, or the offence of the estate Ecclesiastike: That likewise he should acquite the Bentiuoleis of all paines, censures and fines, restoring to them the goods which manifestly appertained to them, referring to arbitration and iudgement such as they were possessed of afore their exile: That it should be lawfull for them to dwell in what place they would, so they came not within fourescore miles of Bolognia: That touching the Venetians, there should be nothing done contrary to that which had bene agreed vpon in the confederation of Cambray: That between the Pope and Alphonso d'Este, there should be a surceassing of armes at the least for sixe moneths, each of them retaining all that he possessed: in which respite of time their controuersies should be decided by Iudges assigned by common accord, reseruing to Cæsar the examination of the matters of Modena, which should be presently deliuered vp into his hands: That Cotignolo should be restored to the French King: That the Cardinall of Achx should be deliuered: That the Cardinals that were absent, should be pardoned: And that the collation of benefices through all the dominions of the French King, should be disposed according to his nomination. With this answer Mirandola being returned to the Pope, but not without hope that Monsieur Chaumont would not continue so seuerely in all these conditions; the Pope, contrary to his custome, heard the report with patience, together with the petitions of the Cardinals, who besought him with an incredible affection, that he would accept the composition that was offered, if he could obtaine no better. But on the other part, he complained of the exorbitant conditions that were offered, and mingling in all his speeches complaints against the Venetians, and shewing that he was in doubt, he consumed all that day without expressing what was his resolution: but at last his hope increased, for that Chiappin Vitelli in the euening entred into Bolognia with sixe hundred light horsemen Venetians, and an esquadron of Turks payed by them, who departing by night from Stellato, were come galloping all the way, for that the Venetian Gouernour had giuen him in charge to passe with great diligence. The morning following, Monsieur Chaumont encamped with all his armie at the bridge of Rene, which is three miles from Bolognia, where the Secretaries of the Embassadours of the Emperour, the King of Aragon, and the King of England went to him, and soone after the Embassadours themselues: who, together with Albert Pio, which was come from Carpy, returned many times that day betweene the Pope and Monsieur Chaumont. But the disposition of both the one and other, was greatly changed: for Monsieur Chaumont hauing now no hope by the experience of the day before to be able to raise the people of Bolognia by meanes of the Bentiuoleis, and beginning withall to fall into necessitie of victuals, which would continually increase vpon him, had great distrust of the victorie: and the Pope taking courage by the affection of the people disclosed in fauour of the Church, reentred eftsoones into armes the same day; and because they expected at Bolognia before night two hundred other Venetian Estradiots, two hundred light horsemen vnder Fabricio Colonne, and part of the Spanish men at armes, he did not onely see himselfe deliuered of danger, but returning to his accustomed haughtinesse and brauery, he threatned to assaile the enemies as soone as the Spanish bands were come, which were now not farre off: which confidence made him giue answer all that day, that he bare no inclination to peace, vnlesse the French King would be bound wholly to abandon the defence of Ferrara. The day following were propounded new conditions, by reason whereof the same Embassadours returned to Monsieur Chaumont, but many difficulties arising, there was nothing done: insomuch as Monsieur Chaumont distrusting to be able to profite any more either by armes or by treaties of peace, and besides it was hard for him to remaine there, both for the want of victuals, and distemperance of the time, Winter approching, he returned the same day to Frankcastle,

caſtle, and the day after to Rubiero, making ſhew that what he did, was done at the requeſt of the Embaſſadours, both to giue time to the Pope to conſider of the offers that had bene made, and leiſure to himſelfe to expect the further will and direction of his King. At that time many accuſed the reſolution of Monſieur Chaumont to be indiſcreet, and the execution negligent: for that not hauing forces ſufficient to take Bolognia, (ſith in his armie there were but three thouſand footmen) it was a counſell ill digeſted to ſtirre at the perſwaſions of baniſhed men, whoſe hopes being meaſured more by deſire then with reaſons, became for the moſt part deceitful and vaine: and that at leaſt, if he had deſired to embrace this enterpriſe, he ought firſt to haue reſtored and repaired the weakneſſe of his forces: but of the contrary, that he had loſt the oportunitie by his negligence, for that after his departure from Peſquiero, he had vnprofitably loſt three or foure dayes, whileſt he was in doubt, conſidering the weakneſſe of his armie, whether he ſhould aſſay any thing of himſelfe, or expect the bands of the Duke of Ferrara and the Lord Chaſtillon with the French lances. This perhaps may be defended; but how may it be excuſed, that Frankcaſtle being taken, he brought not his armie to the gates of Bolognia, and had giuen leiſure to take breath to a citie, wherein no ſuccour was as yet entred, the people being in ſuſpence, and as it hapneth in ſodaine things, in great feare and confuſion? a ſingular meanes (if there be any at all) to make him obtaine either the victory, or ſome honorable compoſition. But perhaps the authoritie of ſuch as reprehend things that haue ill ſucceeded, would oftentimes be leſſe, if at the ſame time might be knowne what would haue hapned if they had proceeded otherwayes.

After the retiring of Monſieur Chaumont, the Pope incenſed out of meaſure againſt the King, began to make his complaints to all Chriſtian Princes, that the French King, as vſing the title and name of Moſt Chriſtian, and alſo deſpiſing the confederation ſo ſolemnly made at Cambray, moued with ambition to vſurpe all Italy, and wickedly thirſting after the bloud of the Pope of Rome, had ſent out his armie to beſiege him with all the Colledge of Cardinals, and the reſidue of the Prelates within Bolognia: and returning eftſoones with a courage redoubled to the thoughts of warre, he refuſed the Embaſſadours (who following the ſolicitation begun with Monſieur Chaumont, offered him the meanes of peace) to heare them ſpeake of any thing, if Ferrara were not firſt deliuered to him: yea, notwithſtanding by the trauels he had ſuffered in ſo great an accident both in bodie and mind, his maladie was made much worſe, yet he began to make new leuies of ſouldiers, and to ſtirre vp the Venetians (who at laſt had caſt a bridge betweene Ficquerolo and Stellato) to ſend vnder the Marquis of Mantua part of their armie to Modena to ioyne with his, and with the other part to moleſt Ferrara, aſſuring them that within few dayes he ſhould haue Regge, Rubiero and Ferrara. The Venetian bands had deferred to paſſe the riuer, for the perill they had run into if the death of the Pope had hapned (as was doubted:) but being compelled in the end to yeeld to his will, leauing the other bands vpon the ſhore beyond Po, they ſent towards Modena fiue hundred men at armes, ſixteen hundred light horſmen, and 5000. footmen, but not vnder the leading of the Marquis of Mantua, who ſtaying at Sermidro 50 leuie horſemen and footmen, to the end (as he ſaid) to march afterwards to the armie, although the Venetians were alreadie entred into ſuſpition of his long abiding, went to S. Felix, a borough belonging to Modena: where being aduertiſed that the French that were within Verona were entred into the countrey of Mantua to pillage it, alledging the neceſſitie to defend his owne eſtate, he returned with the Popes leaue from thence to Mantua, but not without the great complaint of the Venetians: for that notwithſtanding he had promiſed to make preſent returne, being alreadie entred into ſuſpition of his faith, they beleeued (all Italy almoſt partaking in that opinion) that Monſieur Chaumont, to giue him an excuſe not to go to the armie, had by his conſent cauſed certaine French bands to make incurſions vpon the country of Mantua: which ſuſpition was increaſed by a letter which he wrote from Mantua to the Pope, that he was not able to march for a ſickneſſe that was befallen him. After the bands of the Pope, the Venetians and the Spaniſh lances were vnited in the confines of Modena; if they had preſently marched, it was thought that Monſieur Chaumont had abandoned the citie of Regge and retained the Citadell, hauing vpon his diſcamping from Bolognia diſmiſſed all his Italian footmen for auoiding of expences: but taking courage by their ſlowneſſe, he began of new to leuie bands of footmen, determining onely to looke to the guard of Saſſuola, Rubiero, Regge and Parma. But as the foreſaid armie lay vpon the marches of Modena, not knowing yet whether they ſhould paſſe further, or turne againſt Ferrara, certaine troupes of the Church which ran vp towards

Regge,

Regge, being put to flight by the French, loſt an hundred horſe, and Count Mateliquo was taken priſoner. At which time the Duke of Ferrara and the Lord of Chaſtillon with the French bands lay encamped vpon the riuer of Po, betweene the Hoſpitall and Bondin, oppoſite to the Venetian regiments, which were beyond Po: whoſe nauie ſeeking to retire, for the ſharpneſſe of the ſeaſon, and for the ill prouiſion that came from Venice, being charged by many barkes of Ferrara, whoſe artilleries ſunke eight veſſels to the bottome, they retired with great paine by Newcaſtle vpon Po into the channell that falleth into Tanare and Adice, and ſuddenly ſeparated themſelues. After this, the Pope gaue order that the armie (which was gouerned by Fabricio Colonno, for that the Marquis of Mantua was not come) ſhould draw ſtraight to Ferrara, leauing the Duke of Vrbin for the guard of Modena, giuing to the Captaines, which with one conſent blamed this counſell, a hope almoſt certaine that the people would draw into tumult. But the ſame day they departed, they returned incontinently by his commandement, no man knowing what had moued the Pope ſo ſuddenly to alter his determination: and leauing off his firſt deuices, the armie went and incamped afore the towne of Saſſuola, (whither Monſieur Chaumont had ſent fiue hundred Gaſcoin footmen) which when they had battered two dayes, to the great pleaſure and contentment of the Pope (who heard the noiſe of the artilleries that battered Saſſuola, in the ſame chamber, wherein not many dayes before he had heard, to his great diſliking, the thundering of his enemies ſhot who were about Spilimberto) they gaue the aſſault, which with ſmall ado ſucceeded happily to them, for that the footmen that were within, fell into diſorder. And then the artillerie being immediatly preſented before the Caſtle whither they were retired, they yeelded as ſuddenly almoſt without any compoſition, with the ſame infamie and infelicitie of Iohn Caſalo who was their Captaine, that he had incurred when the Duke Valentinois tooke the Rocke of Furly: he was a man of very meane and baſe ranke, but for that in the flower of his age he had bene well liked by Lodowike Sforce, he was now riſen to ſome honorable degree. After the taking of Saſſuola, the armie tooke alſo Formingo: and the Pope deſiring that they ſhould go take Montechio, which is a place of ſtrength and importance, ſtanding betweene the high way and the mountaine, vpon the frontiers of Parma and Regge, and part of the territorie of Parma, notwithſtanding it is holden by the Duke of Ferrara, Fabricio Colonno refuſed to execute the direction, alledging that his King had forbidden him to moleſt any thing that was vnder the iuriſdiction of the Empire. Monſieur Chaumont prouided not for theſe diſorders, who hauing left within Regge, Monſieur d'Aubigny with fiue hundred Lances and two thouſand Gaſcoins vnder Captaine Molard, was gone himſelfe into Parma, the King hauing ſent him word to abſtaine as much as he could from expences. For, the King perſeuering in his deuice to temporize vntill the Spring, made then no prouiſion for the affaires of Italy; by meanes whereof his reputation declining there, and the courage of his enemies increaſing dayly, the Pope impatient that his armie aduanced no more, & not approuing the excuſes which his Captaines made, of the ſeaſon of the yeare, and other difficulties, after he had called them all to Bologna, he told them they muſt go and encampe afore Ferrara; which was allowed onely by the Embaſſadours of Venice, either not to offend him by gainſaying, or that by this occaſion their ſouldiers ſhould returne more neare to their frontiers; and blamed of all the reſidue, but in vaine, for that he did not conſult but command. It was then determined that the armie ſhould march to Ferrara, but with this adiunction, that to let the French for ſuccouring it, they ſhould attempt to take Mirandola, if they ſaw it were not a matter of too great difficultie: which Citie, together with the towne of Concorda, inherited by the ſonnes of the Count Lodowike Picqua, and by Francis their mother and tutrix, was kept vnder the deuotion of the French King, following the authoritie of Iohn Iaques Trinulce, naturall father to Francis, by whoſe meanes his nephewes obtained the inueſtiture of Cæſar. The Pope had receiued them long before into his protection, as appeared by a Briefe: but now he excuſed himſelf, that the condition of the preſent times conſtrained him ſo to deale, that thoſe townes ſhould not be holden by perſons ſuſpected, offering, if they would willingly put them into his hands, to redeliuer them immediatly after he had wonne Ferrara. From that time it was doubted (and the doubt increaſed much more afterwards) that the Cardinall of Pauie, who was alreadie ſuſpected to entertaine ſecret intelligence with the French king, had cunningly bene the author of this counſell, by the enterpriſe of Mirandola to auert the beſieging of Ferrara, which citie at that time was neither well fortified, nor ſufficiently manned: and beſides, the French ſouldiers were ouerwearied both in bodie and mind, by their paines and tra-

trauels, the Duke in great weakneſſe, and the King vnwilling to be at any more expences there. But whileſt the Pope with ſo great feruencie managed the expedition of the warre; the French King who was more inclined to practiſes then to armes, continued with the Biſhop of Gurci the negociation of ſuch things as had bene begun; which in the beginning carying a ſhew of great facilitie, proceeded now with greater delayes, both for the ſlowneſſe of the anſwers of Cæſar, and alſo for the doubt that was conceiued of the King of Aragon, who beſides his other actions, had newly called home to the kingdome of Naples his regiments that were within Verona, vndet colour, that towards Otranto the nauie of the Turke was diſcouered. Cæſar and the French King iudged it neceſſarie to make him aſcertained of their intention, as well in regard of the continuation of the league of Cambray, as for the action that was to be done with the Pope, if he ſtill perſeuered in the amitie of the Venetians, and in the deſire to get immediatly to the Church the territories of Ferrara. To which demands after certaine dayes the King Catholike anſwered, taking at the ſame time occaſion to purge himſelfe of many things, whereof Cæſar and the French King complained againſt him: That he had ſent the band of three hundred Lances to the Pope according to the obligation of the inueſtiture, and to the end onely to defend the ſtate of the Church, and to recouer the things that were the ancient demaines of the ſame: That he had called backe his men at armes from Verona, for that the tearme was expired for which he had promiſed them to Cæſar, and yet that he would not haue reuoked them, had it not bene for feare of the Turke: That at Bologna his Embaſſadour interpoſed with others to worke the peace with Monſieur Chaumont, not to giue time to the ſuccours of the Pope, but to quench and put out ſo great a fire in Chriſtendome, knowing withall that to entertaine warre with the Church, was grieuous to the King: That he had alwayes had a ſetled purpoſe to accompliſh all that had bene promiſed in the league of Cambray, which he had further manifeſted by aiding Cæſar againſt the Venetians with fiue hundred lances and two thouſand footmen: That it was not his intention to bind himſelfe to new bands, nor to be reſtrained to new capitulations; for that he ſaw no vrgent occaſion, and for that deſiring to keepe himſelfe free, the better to be able to make warre vpon the Infidels of Africa, he would not increaſe the dangers and calamities of Chriſtendom, which had need of repoſe: That the Councell and the reformation of the Church pleaſed him well, ſo that it were vniuerſall, and not repugnant to the times: of which diſpoſition he asked no better a witneſſe then the French King, in the ſpeeches they had together at Sauona; but now the ſtate of times were much contrary, ſeeing that peace and concord among Chriſtians was the foundation of Councels, and that nothing could be agreed vpon to the vniuerſall benefite, without the vnion of wils: and that it was not a thing praiſeworthy to begin the Councel at ſuch a time and in ſuch a ſort, that it might ſeeme to take beginning more by diſdaine, and deſire of reuenge, then for zeale, either to the honour of God, or to the eſtate of the Chriſtian common weale. He ſaid further to the Embaſſadour of Cæſar apart, that it ſeemed ſomewhat harſh vnto him, that he ſhould aide him to preſerue and keepe his townes, ſince he diſpoſed them afterwards to the French King for money, meaning expreſly Verona. Thus the intention of the King Catholike being knowne by this anſwer, the Biſhop of Gurci on the one part in the name of Cæſar, and the French King on the other part in perſon, delayed no longer to make a new confederation, reſeruing place to the Pope to enter into it within two moneths next, and to the King Catholike and the King of Hungarie within foure. And for a neceſſary foundation of the couenants that were made, the King bound himſelfe to pay to Cæſar an hundred thouſand duckats, part in hand, and the reſidue at times limited: Cæſar promiſed to paſſe into Italy in the Spring with three thouſand horſemen and ten thouſand footmen, againſt the Venetians: in which caſe the King was bound to ſend him at his proper charges two hundred Lances, and eight thouſand footmen, with ſufficient prouiſion of artilleries, and to rig out by ſea two light galleys and foure baſtard galleys: That they ſhould obſerue the league made at Cambray; and that in both their names obſeruation ſhould be demanded of the Pope and King Catholike: and if the Pope made difficultie, in regard of Ferrara, that the King ſhould be bound to hold himſelf content with that that ſhould be reaſonable; but if the Pope would not conſent to their requeſt, that then they ſhould proſecute the Councell; for which purpoſe Cæſar ſhould aſſemble the Prelates of Germanie, as the French King had done his, to the end to proceed further, as they ſhould after be aduiſed. As ſoone as theſe capitulations were publiſhed, the Biſhop of Gurci receiuing many honors and rich gratifications of the King, returned to his Prince: and the King, with the fiue Cardinals

that were procurers of the Councell, presently contracted, that neither he without them, nor they without his consent, should capitulate any thing with the Pope, expressing by a vehement demonstratiō in words, the great desire he had to descend into Italy in person, with such a power as should be able for a long time afterwards to assure his affaires. And to the end that afore his marching they should decline no more, he sent to Monsieur Chaumont that he should not let the Duke of Ferrara perish: which was the cause that he added eight hundred Lanceknights to the companie of two hundred Lances which he had afore sent to the Duke vnder the leading of the Lord of Chastillon. On the other side, the Popes armie, after they had (with great delayes) made necessary prouisions, and left Marke Anthonie Colonno for the guard of Modena with an hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, and fiue and twentie hundred footmen, went and incamped before Concordia, which they forced the same day that the artillery was planted: and afterwards obtaining the Castle by composition, they approched neare to Mirandola. It drew now towards the end of December, and haply the season was much more sharpe then ordinarily it had wont to be; in which respect, and for that the towne was strong, and it being also beleeued that the French would not suffer a place so conuenient to be lost, the Captaines began to distrust of the victorie; and yet the Pope promised himselfe so assuredly the victorie of the whole warre, that sending the Cardinall of Sinigale a new Legate into the armie, for the discord that was betweene the Duke of Vrbin and the Cardinall of Pauie, he charged him in the presence of many, that aboue all things, when the armie should enter into Ferrara, they should looke to the keeping of that Citie. The fourth day after the armie was approched neare Mirandola, the artillerie began to execute, notwithstanding with no lesse trauell then discommoditie, as well in regard of the present season, as for want of victuals, which came very sparingly from Modena: for that fiftie French Lances being bestowed within Guastallo, as many within Correggio, and two hundred and fiftie in Carpy, and the French hauing cast downe all the bridges, and occupied all the passages by the which relieue might come from Mantua, it was impossible to haue any from any other countrey. But their necessities began quickly to diminish, for that giuing out a false bruite, that the armie would come and assaile Carpie, such as were within, being fearfull, for that they were not furnished with artillery, did presently dislodge from thence. In the end of this yeare the person of the Pope fell into some infamie, as though he had bene consenting and fautor that by the meanes of ỹ Cardinal de Medicis, there was a practise with Marke Anthonie Colonno and certaine yong men of Florence to kill Peter Soderin Gonfalonnier, by whose working, it was supposed that the Florentines followed the French faction: and that because the Pope hauing vsed all his endeuours to win that Commonweale to his side, he could neuer bring it to passe: but a litle before, at the French Kings request, and to the Popes great discontentment, they had reuoked the truce with the people of Sienna, although they refused to mone armes vntill sixe moneths after the reuocation. And besides, they had sent to the King two hundred men at armes for the guard of the Duchie of Millan, a matter demanded by the King by vertue of their confederation, not so much for the importance of such a succour, as for a desire to set them at enmitie with the Pope. In this estate of affaires did end the yeare a thousand fiue hundred and ten.

The endeuours of the Popes armie.

Mirandola besieged.

But the beginning of the new yeare was made memorable by a matter not expected, and such as the like hath not bene heard of in former times. For the Pope supposing that there was not vsed that diligence in the seruice of Mirandola as was necessarie for the taking of it, and that they proceeded too slowly in the businesse, and attributing partly to the ignorance, and partly to the infidelitie of his Captaines, but chiefly of his nephew, that which chiefly proceeded of many difficulties, he determined to aduance things by his presence, preferring the importunitie and violence of his mind afore all other regards, and not retaining himselfe by the consideration how vnworthy it was for the maiestie of such a degree, that a Pope of Rome should in person leade armies against the towns of Christians; and how dangerous a thing it might be, making no reckoning of the opinion and iudgement that the world would haue of him, to giue an apparent colour, and almost a iustification to those, who vnder colour principally that his gouernment was hurtfull to the Church, and his vices scandalous and incorrigible, went about to call a Councel, and to stirre vp Princes against him. Such speeches ran through all the Court: all men marueled at him, euery one blamed him, and the Venetian Embassadours no lesse then the residue. The Cardinals besought him with great instance not to go: but all their prayers 1511.

ers were in vaine, and their perſwaſions to no end. He departed from Bolognia the ſecond day of Ianuarie, accompanied with three Cardinals, and being come to the campe, he was lodged in a litle countrey cottage, ſubiect to the ſhot of the artilleries of the enemies, being no further from the wals of Mirandola then a common crosbow will ſhoot at twiſe. There trauelling and exerciſing his bodie no leſſe then his mind and authoritie, he rode continually through the campe, now here now there, and was about the planting of the artillerie, whereof til that day the leſſer part could not be employed for the impediments which the vnſeaſonable time and continuall ſnowes gaue to all actions of warre; and forasmuch as, notwithſtanding any diligence that could be vſed, the pioners and labourers could not be kept to their worke, who beſides the hardneſſe of the time, were much offended with the ſhot of the artilleries out of the towne: and for this reaſon it being neceſſary to raiſe new rampiers in the places where the artilleries were to be planted, and to refurniſh the campe with new pioners, the Pope, in that reſpite of time, withdrew himſelfe to Concorda, ſomewhat to eſchue the incommodities of the armie: to which place Monſieur Chaumont ſent vnto him Albert Pio to make many offers and meanes of accord, the which (notwithſtanding the many labours and meetings of the one and other ſide) ſorted to no effect, either for his accuſtomed hardneſſe and obſtinacie, or for that Albert, who was daily more and more ſuſpected, followed not the buſineſſe with ſuch ſinceritie as appertained. The Pope remained not long at Concorda, the ſame impatience cauſing him ſuddenly to returne to the campe: and the ſame heate, which was nothing cooled by the great ſnowes that continually fell from heauen whileſt he was in the field, nor by the cold, which was ſo great, that the ſouldiers could hardly endure it. He was lodged in a litle Church neare to his artilleries, and ſomewhat nearer to the wals then was his former lodging: and being content with nothing that either had bene done, or was then done, he complained with bitter words againſt all his Captaines, except Marke Anthonie Colonno onely, whom he had newly ſent for from Modena; and went with no leſſe impatience about the armie, now crying out to ſome, then encouraging others, and both in words and deeds performing the office of a Captaine, promiſing the ſouldiers that if they did their dutie, and ſhewed themſelues valiant men, he would take Mirandola vpon no compoſition, but leaue it to them for pillage. Truly it was a thing notable, and to the eyes of men ſtrange and new, that the French King, a ſecular Prince, being yet in his flouriſhing age, in good health, and trained from his youth in warres, ſhould take his eaſe now in his chamber, and adminiſter by Captaines a warre that was made principally againſt himſelfe: and on the other ſide, to ſee a ſoueraigne Biſhop, Chriſts Vicar on earth, hauing a bodie aged and diſeaſed, nouriſhed in eaſe and pleaſures, to go in perſon to a warre ſtirred vp by himſelfe againſt Chriſtian Princes, and to lie in campe afore a place of baſe account, where, as a leader of ſouldiers, he expoſed himſelfe to paines and dangers, retaining no other thing of a Pope beſides the name. By his extreme diligence, by his complaints, promiſes and threats, all things were more aduanced then otherwiſe they would haue bene: and yet many difficulties reſiſting him, all things went but ſlowly forward, both for the ſmall numbers of pioners, and for that in the campe there was no great ſtore of artilleries, and that of the Venetians was not very great, and withall by reaſon of the wetneſſe of the ſeaſon the powder could hardly do his accuſtomed office. They that were within made a valiant defence, hauing for their Gouernour Alexander Triuulce with foure hundred footmen forreiners: and they ſupported all dangers with ſo much the more valour and reſolution, by how much they had hope in the ſuccours promiſed by Monſieur Chaumont, who being commanded by his King not to ſuffer the Pope to take the towne, had ſent for all the bands of Spaniſh footmen that were at Verona, and making continuall leuies of men from all parts, wherein was concurrant with him the Duke of Ferrara, he promiſed to ſet vpon the enemies in their campe before the twentieth day of Ianuarie were paſt. But many difficulties made that purpoſe both hard and dangerous, as, the litle time he had to make ſo great prouiſions, the leiſure giuen to the enemies to fortifie their campe, the difficultie to conuey the artilleries, munitions and victuals in ſo cold a ſeaſon, by wayes ſo troubleſome, and through ſo great ſnowes as had not bene ſeene of long time. And moreouer, he that ſhould haue diminiſhed the difficulties by recompencing the time loſt with diligence, augmented them: for Monſieur Chaumont rode in poſt to Millan, affirming that the cauſe of his going thither, was to make prouiſion of money and other things neceſſarie for the warre. But it being diuulged and beleeued that it was for the loue of a Ladie of Millan, his iourney (notwithſtanding ding his returne was ſpeedie) abated greatly the courage of his ſouldiers, and the hopes of ſuch as defended Mirandola. By reaſon whereof many ſaid openly, that the negligence and ſlackneſſe of Monſieur Chaumont was nó leſſe hurtfull, then the hate he bare to Iohn Iaques Triuulce, and that for this cauſe, inclining more to his proper paſſion (as he often did) then to the profite of his King, it was not diſpleaſing to him that the nephewes of Triuulce ſhould be depriued of Mirandola. On the other ſide, the Pope ſparing nothing that might further his victory, being entred into greater furie, for that by a canon ſhot out of the towne two men were ſlaine in his kitchin, for which danger hauing forſaken that lodging, and then becauſe he could not forbeare returning thither againe, he was conſtrained by new perils to take the tent of the Cardinall of Regina, againſt the which place, they within the towne (haply ſuſpecting that he was there arriued) braked a great peece, not without the danger of his life. At laſt the defendãts (ſtanding deſperate to be ſuccoured oñ all ſides, and the artillery of the enemie doing great harme, and withall the water of the ditch being frozen ſo hard, that it was able to beare the ſouldiers) fearing they ſhould not be able to reſiſt the firſt aſſault which was to be giuen within two dayes, ſent on the ſame day that Monſieur Chaumont had promiſed to ſuccour them, Embaſſadours to the Pope, to yeeld themſelues, their goods and liues ſaued. To whom albeit the Pope made anſwer in the beginning, that he would not be bound to ſaue the liues of the ſouldiers, yet in the end being ouercome by the petitions of his Court, he accepted the towne vnder ſuch conditions as were offered, ſauing that Alexander Triuulce with certaine other Captaines of footmen, ſhould remaine his priſoners, and that the towne ſhould pay a certaine rate of money, to redeeme the ſpoile which he had promiſed to the ſouldiers: & yet the ſouldiers iudging that to be due which was promiſed them, the Pope had much to do to keepe the towne from ſacking; who being drawne ouer the wals, the gates being rammed vp, deſcended by that meanes into the towne. The caſtle alſo yeelded, with permiſſion to the Counteſſe to depart with all her goods. The Pope reſtored Mirandola to Count Iohn Franciſquo, and indued him with all the rights of the ſonnes of Count Lodowicke, as gotten by him in iuſt warres; receiuing of him bond, to pay him within a certaine time for all defrayments, twentie thouſand duckats, and for ſuretie of performance, the perſon of his ſon: and he left there (to keepe the French from recouering it after the armie was retired) fiue hundred Spaniſh footmen and three hundred Italians. From Mirandola he went to Sermidi, a borough ſtanding in the countrey of Mantua, vpon the brinke of Po, in great hope to take Ferrara ſuddenly: by reaſon whereof, the ſame day that he won Mirandola, he anſwered Albert Pio in very plaine words, that he would heare no ſpeech concerning peace, vnleſſe Ferrara were yeelded vnto him before any other matters were propounded.

Mirandola yeeldeth to the Pope.

But thoſe thoughts were changed by a new deliberation of the French. For, the King conſidering how much the loſſe of Mirandola had diminiſhed his reputation, and deſpairing that the Pope of his owne accord would be reduced to peaceable counſels, he commanded Monſieur Chaumont not onely to looke well to the defending of Ferrara, but alſo not to forbeare, vpon conuenient occaſion, to offend the ſtate of the Church. According to which commiſſion, Monſieur Chaumont making leuies of men from all parts, the Pope by the counſell of his Captaines, retired to Bologna, and hauing bene there but a very few dayes, either for feare, or to aduance (as he ſaid) more ſpeedily the battering of the baſtillion of Geniuola, againſt which he determined to ſend certain bands of ſoldiers which he had in Romagna, he came to Lugo, and from thence went at laſt to Rauenna, thinking perhaps that ſo ſmal an expeditiõ was not worthy of his preſence. The Venetian armie, who, for the neareneſſe of the enemies durſt not beſiege Ferrara, ſtayed at Bondin, and the Spaniſh and Eccleſiaſtikes betweene Cento and Finalo; who, notwithſtanding the terme of three moneths was paſt, ſurceaſſed at the requeſt of the Pope. On the other ſide, Monſieur Chaumont hauing aſſembled his armie, which was ſuperiour to his enemies in footmen, and alſo ſuperior to them in horſemen as touching their valor, but inferior in number, tooke counſel what were beſt to be done. The French Captaines perſwaded, that the companies of the Duke of Ferrara being ioyned to the armie, it were beſt to march directly to the enemie, who notwithſtanding they were lodged in places ſtrong, yet there was hope that by force of armes and with the furie of the artilleries, they would eaſily be driuen to retire: and that this ſucceeding, Ferrara would not onely be deliuered from danger, but they ſhould wholly recouer the reputation that had bene loſt euen till that day: and they alledged for the ſame opinion, that the armie paſſing by the marches of Mantua, they ſhould take from the Marquis all the excuſes and impediments for the which he profeſſed to be retained to take armes as Feodarie of Cæſar and ſouldier to the King; and that it was a thing very profitable for the ſuretie of Ferrara, that he ſhould come in and declare himſelfe, & which would greatly endomage the enemies in this war, for the cõmoditie of victuals, of bridges, and paſſages of riuers, which ſhould be taken away from the Venetian armies, and for that the Marquis wold reuoke immediatly the ſouldiers which he had in the campe of the Church. But Triuulce being returned out of France about the ſame time that Mirandola was loſt, gaue counſell to the contrary, declaring how dangerous it was to aſſaile the enemies in their campe, and how hurtfull it would be to ſubmit themſelues to a neceſſitie, to proceed day by day according to the progreſſions of the enemie: That it was farre more profitable and better aſſured, to turne towards Modena or Bolognia, for that if the enemies remoued for feare to loſe either of thoſe townes, then were obtained the end that was ſought, to deliuer Ferrara from the warre: and if they ſtirred not, the one or the other of thoſe two townes would be eaſily carried: the which ſucceeding, they would be drawne by a greater neceſſitie to defend their owne; and haply when they ſhall depart from a place of ſuch ſtrength, occaſions may be offered to obtain an honorable victorie. This was the perſwaſion of Triuulce. Neuertheles for the inclination of Monſieur Chaumont and the other French captains to diminiſh his authoritie, the other opinion was followed, Alphonſo d'Eſte alſo vſing all his endeuor, in hope the enemies would be conſtrained to retire from off his eſtate, which being ſo afflicted & conſumed (he ſaid) was vnable any longer to ſuſtaine ſo heauie a burthen: fearing withall, if the French men went away, that the enemies would enter vpon Poleſina de Ferrara, which would ſo much haue increaſed the calamities of that citie, depriued of all hope and ſpirit, that there remained no more comfort or remedie. Then the French armie marched by the way of Luſero and Gonſaguo, to encampe at Raſſuola and at Mora, where they ſoiourned three dayes for the ill weather that fell, reiecting the counſell of ſuch as perſwaded to go aſſaile Mirandola, for that it was impoſſible to lodge in the fields, and for that at the Popes going away the ſuburbes were burnt and all the houſes thereabout. In like ſort they thought it not conuenient to aſſaile Concorda fiue miles from thence, to the end not to loſe time in a matter of ſmall importance. Therefore they came to Quiſtello, and paſſing ouer the riuer of Secchia vpon a bridge of boates, they lodged the day after at Rouera vpon the riuer of Po: which was the cauſe that Andrew Gritti, who hauing afore recouered Poleſina de Rouigna, and left part of the Venetian ſouldiers at Montagnana vnder Bernardin Montono, to make reſiſtance againſt the garriſons that kept Verona, was withdrawne with three hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and a thouſand footmen, neare the riuer of Po to ioyne with the armie of the Church, hauing afore ſacked the towne of Guaſtallo. From Rouero the French men went to Sermidy, and diſperſed themſelues (but in good order) in the villages thereabouts: and when they were lodged, Monſieur Chaumont accompanied with certaine Captaines (but not with Triuulce) went to the towne of Stellato, being there expected by Alphonſo d'Eſte, to take counſell in what maner they ſhould proceed againſt their enemies, who were now come together and lodged at Finalo. And it was agreed, that the bands of Alphonſo ſhould ioyne with the French armie about Bondin, and then ſhould all go lodge in certaine villages three miles from Finalo, to proceed afterwards according to the nature of places, and as occaſion ſhould be offered by the enemies. But as Monſieur Chaumont was returned to Sermidy, it was told him, it was very hard to go to that place, by reaſon that for the impediment of waters, whereof the country was full about Finalo, there was no paſſage but by the high way and by the banks of the riuer, which the enemie had cut in many places, and beſtowed guard to hinder paſſage: a matter which ſeemed ſo much the more hard & troubleſome, by how much the ill weather and ſeaſon was ioyned to the other impediments. The conſideration of theſe perils bringing Monſieur Chaumont into no ſmall doubt, Alphonſo who had about him certaine enginers and men knowing the countrey, which gaue him information of the ſituation and diſpoſition of places, laboured to perſwade him the contrary, aſſuring him, that with the force of the artillerie, ſuch as kept the paſſages that were cut off, would be compelled to leaue them abandoned, by which meanes it would be very eaſie to caſt bridges for paſſage in any place where it ſhould be neceſſarie. Theſe reaſons being brought by Monſieur Chaumont into counſell and debated, the opinion of Alphonſo was approued, to whom Triuulce was rather not contrary then conſenting: and peraduenture his ſilence moued all men more then if he had directly impugned the deuice. For, all men conſidering more nearly

the greatneſſe of the difficulties, and that this Captaine who was ancient and of long experience, had alwayes reproued that expedition, that if any inconuenience ſhould happen, the King would lay it to the charge of them that had bene the chiefe authors againſt his opinion: Monſieur Chaumont hauing aſſembled another day the Councell for the ſame cauſe, earneſtly deſired Triuulce, that he would expreſſe his opinion, not with ſilence, as he had done the day before, but plainly and ſimply: who being incited by this inſtance, but much more for the great importance of ſuch a deliberation, all men being very attentiue, he ſpake in this ſort:

Triuulce reaſoneth.

I vſed ſilence yeſterday, becauſe I haue often found by experience, that my counſel hath bene litle regarded, the which if it had bene followed from the beginning, we ſhould not now haue bene here, nor ſpent ſo many dayes in vaine, which might haue bene employed to more profite: and I could yet continue in the ſame mind, to vſe ſilence, if I were not ſpurred on with the importance of the matter, ſeeing we are now vpon termes to ſet vpon the incertaine caſt of a die, both this armie, the ſtate of the Duke of Ferrara, and the Duchie of Millan, which is too great a ſtake, keeping nothing in hand. Beſides, that which moues me to ſpeake, is, for that I perceiue Monſieur Chaumont deſireth that I may be he that ſhall firſt aduiſe that which he by reaſon diſcouereth already to be good; a matter of no noueltie to me, for that I haue heretofore proued that my counſels haue bene leſſe reiected, when was queſtion of retracting any thing not ſufficiently deliberated, then when the firſt deliberations were debated. We conſult of going to aſſaile the enemie; and I haue alwayes ſeene that great Captaines haue held for a firme principle (which I haue alſo found true by experience) that the fortune of a battell ſhould neuer be attempted, vnleſſe there be offer of ſpeciall aduantage, or compulſion by vrgent neceſſitie: and alſo according to the order of war, it belongeth to the enemies that be the inuaders, & haue taken the field to conquer Ferrara, to ſeek to aſſaile vs: and to our captains, to whom it ſufficeth to defend themſelues, it belongeth not to endeuor to aſſaile them, contrary to all the rules of military diſcipline. But let vs examine the aduantages and neceſſities that may induce vs. I am of opinion, and (if I be not vtterly deceiued) it is a thing very euident, that we cannot execute the deuice of the Duke of Ferrara, but to our great harmes; ſince we cannot go to their campe, but by a hill ſide, and by a ſtreight and very bad way, where all our forces cannot be employed, and where the enemie with a ſmall number may make reſiſtance againſt a far greater number. We muſt march by the ſide of the hill, one horſe after another, and ſeeing we haue no other way to draw our artilleries, our baggage, our carts and bridges, but by the ſtraite of the hill, who doubteth but in a way ſo narrow and comberous, euery artillery, euery cart, & euery wheele that ſhall breake, will ſtay a whole armie for an houre at the leaſt, and that being encombred with ſo many inconueniences, euery contrary accident may eaſily put vs into diſorder? The enemies are lodged in couert, prouided of victuals and forrages: and we muſt almoſt all lie in the open fields, and expect that forrage be brought after vs, which cannot be performed, but with great difficultie, to the halfe that we ſhall ſtand in need of. It belongeth not to vs to be caried with the reports and opinions of engineers and husbandmen that know the country, ſince warres are managed with the weapons of ſouldiers, and with the counſels of Captaines; they are performed by the execution of the ſword, and not by ſuch plots of people ignorant in warre, as are repreſented in paper, or pointed out with the finger, or with a wand in the duſt. For my part, I do not preſuppoſe that our enemies are ſo weake, nor their affaires in ſuch diſorder, nor that in their incamping they haue bene ſo negligent to take the oportunitie of the waters and other ſituations, that I can promiſe my ſelfe, that as ſoone as we ſhall be arriued at the place whither we ſeeme ſo deſirous to paſſe, although we could come thither with eaſe, that it would be in our power to aſſaile them. Many difficulties may compell vs to ſurceaſſe for two or three dayes; if nothing elſe, yet the ſnowes and raines, coming in ſo hard and crabbed a ſeaſon will detaine vs: and then how ſhall we do for victuals and forrages if we be conſtrained to ſtay there? And ſuppoſe it were in our power to aſſaile them, who is he that can ſo eaſily promiſe the victory? What is he that conſidereth not how dangerous it is to go ſeeke the enemie lodged in a ſtrong place, and to be driuen at one time to fight againſt them, and againſt the incommodities of the ſituation of the countrey? If we compell them not to abandon their campe, we cannot but be enforced to retire: and how hard a matter will that be in a country ſo wholly againſt vs, and where euery litle diſfauour will turne to our great diſaduantage? I ſee no neceſſitie as yet to put the Kings whole eſtate in ſuch danger, ſince we are entred into armes principally for no « other occaſion then to ſuccour the citie of Ferrara; which if we do eſtſoones refurniſh with « new garriſons, we may hold our ſelues in ſuretie, though we ſhould diſſolue our whole armie. « And if any man will ſay, that that Citie is ſo much conſumed, that it is impoſſible that in ſhort « time it ſhall not fall of it ſelfe, the enemies remaining at the backe of it, haue we not meanes to « diuert them, which in warre is a moſt mightie remedie, and with the which we may enforce « them to draw backe from Ferrara without putting one horſe in danger? I haue alwayes perſwa- « ded, and now do perſwade more then euer, that we turne either to Modena or to Bologna, ta- « king the high way, and leauing Ferrara well furniſhed onely for a few dayes (for there will « be no further neede.) But I hold it beſt, that we go now to Modena, whereunto we are « incited by the Cardinall of Eſte, a perſonage of name and merite not vnknowne, and by whom « we are aſſured of intelligences able to put it into our hands: for, conquering a place of ſo great « importance, the enemies will be conſtrained ſuddenly to retire towards Bologna. And though « we ſhould not take Modena, yet the feare that the enemies wil haue, as well of it as of the eſtate « of Bologna, will enforce them to do the like, a thing which no doubt they had done many dayes « ſince, if this counſell had bene followed from the beginning.

Now did all men know, by the reaſons of this graue Captaine, the difficulties being preſent, that which he knew when they were yet farre off. Therefore his opinion was allowed of euery one, and Monſieur Chaumont leauing to the Duke of Ferrara for his better ſuretie a greater ſtrength of men, drew towards Carpy by the ſame way, hauing not yet obtained that the Marquis of Mantua ſhould declare himſelfe, which was one of the principall reaſons that had bene alledged by thoſe that gaue counſell againſt the opinion of Triuulce: for the Marquis deſiring to ſtand indifferent, and as a perſon neuter during the troubles, when the time drew on wherein he had giuen hope to declare himſelfe, he ſolicited with many excuſes to be yet deferred for certaine dayes, debating with the Pope the danger of the French armie that threatned him, and beſeeching Monſieur Chaumont not to take from him the hope he had that the Pope would reſtore to him his ſon within a very ſhort time. But the deuice to take Modena tooke no good ſucceſſe, the ſubtle and ſecret counſels of the King of Aragon giuing greater impediments then the armies of the Pope. Cæſar ſhewed himſelfe ill contented that the Pope had vſurped Modena, a citie alwayes eſteemed of the iuriſdiction of the Empire, and holden a long time by the family of Eſte with priuiledges and inueſtitures from the Emperours: and albeit he had made requeſt with many complaints to haue it deliuered to him, yet the Pope who had another opinion or pretence touching the rights of that citie, had alwayes refuſed it, but principally ſo long as he hoped to be able to take Ferrara. But as ſoone as the French armies began to appeare manifeſtly in fauour of them of Eſte; and being not able to defend Modena without great expences, he began to like the counſell of the King of Aragon, who encouraged him to redeliuer it, both to auoide ſo many preſent troubles, and to appeaſe the mind of Cæſar, and alſo by that action to kindle ſome alteration betweene him and the French King; ſpecially ſeeing that if he deſired to haue it againe at another time more conuenient, it would be a matter of no great difficultie, contenting Cæſar with a reaſonable ſumme of money. This debating was prolonged for many dayes, for that, according to the diuerſitie of hopes, the deliberation of the Pope changed; onely they ſtucke alwayes vpon this difficultie, that Cæſar refuſed to receiue it, vnleſſe in the inſtrument of aſſignation it were clearely expreſſed, that that Citie appertained to the Empire; whereunto the Pope would not conſent. But ſeeing after the taking of Mirandola, that Monſieur Chaumont was the ſtrongeſt in the field, and that the wonted expences and difficulties for the defence of Modena came vpon him againe, he left the diſputation of words, and conſented to haue it ſet downe in writing, that Modena ſhould be reſtored to Cæſar, of whoſe iuriſdiction it was. And as Vitfruch the Embaſſadour of Cæſar reſident with the Pope had receiued the poſſeſſion of it, perſwading himſelfe that he might remaine there in ſuretie by reaſon of the authoritie of Cæſar, he diſmiſſed Marke Anthonie Colonno with the other bands with whom he had kept it afore in the name of the Church, aduertiſing Monſieur Chaumont that Modena was no more the Popes, but was iuſtly reuerted to the iuriſdiction of Cæſar. This was not beleeued of Monſieur Chaumont, and therefore he incited the Cardinall of Eſte to put in execution the conſpiracie and intelligence which he ſaid he had in that Citie: according to whoſe direction, the French bands which Monſieur Chaumont had left in garriſon within Rubiera, being approched one night with as much ſilence as could be within a mile of Modena, they returned the ſame night to Rubiera, either for

that the order of their faction within was not correſpondent, or for ſome difficultie that happened, or elſe for that the French men came too ſoone. They iſſued againe another time out of Rubiero to come to Modena, but they were hindred by the depth and riſing of the waters to paſſe the riuer of Sechia, which runneth before Rubiero. For which thing Vitfruch being entred into ſuſpition, and hauing committed to priſon certaine of the citie, whom he charged with an intelligence with the Cardinall of Eſte, he obtained of the Pope that Marke Anthonie Colonno ſhould eſtſoones returne thither with the garriſon that was there before: a matter which had not ſtayed Monſieur Chaumont (being now come to Carpy) to march and incampe before it, if the qualitie of the ſeaſon had not taken from him the meanes to draw his artillery along the way betweene Ruolo and Carpy, which was not aboue ten miles, but euen the worſt of all the wayes in Lombardie, being ouerflowed with waters in the Winter time, and very foule. Beſides all this, Monſieur Chaumont was euery day more and more aſſured, that Modena was redeliuered to Ceſar abſolutely; for which cauſe he made this couenant with Vitfruch, That he would not offend Modena nor his territories, receiuing reciprocally his promiſe, that in the actions betweene the Pope and his King, he ſhould fauor neither the one nor the other partie. Not many dayes after Monſieur Chaumont fell into a grieuous malady, and being caried to Correge, ended his life within fifteen days, hauing afore his death deuoutly giuen to vnderſtand, how much he repented for the vexations he had done to the Church, and beſought the Pope by a publike inſtrument to giue him abſolution; which being granted while he yet liued, could not come to his knowledge by reaſon of the ſodainneſſe of his death. He was a Captaine that in his life bare great authoritie in Italy, by meanes of the great credite of the Cardinall of Amboyſe, and for that he managed almoſt abſolutely the Duchie of Millan, and all the armies of the King: but touching his valour, it was farre inferiour to ſo great a burthen, the greatneſſe of his place carrying him into ſuch ſingularitie of mind and weening, that not knowing of himſelfe the art and order of warre, he would not giue credite to ſuch as were able to inſtruct him: ſo that after the death of his vnkle, his inſufficiencie being no more ſupported by fauour, he fell in his later dayes almoſt into contempt among the ſouldiers, to whom, to ſtop them from ill reporting of him to the King, he permitted too great libertie: inſo much as Triuulce, a Captain trained in ancient diſcipline, wold oftentimes proteſt by oath, that he would neuer go more into the French armies, vnleſſe either the King marched in perſon, or himſelfe commanded as chiefe. Neuertheleſſe the King had determined afore to ſend for his ſucceſſour Monſieur Longueuille, who was of the bloud royall, but a baſtard, and not ſo much eſteemed for his vertue, as for his nobilitie and riches. By the death of Monſieur Chaumont, Iohn Iaques Triuulce remained Gouernour of the armie, as being one of the foure Marſhals of France, to whom, the Generall of an armie being dead, the gouernment appertaineth by the ſtatutes of France, vntill the King do otherwiſe diſpoſe of it. But Triuulce, not knowing whether the gouernment ſhould be continued to him or not, durſt not attempt any matter of conſequence. Yet he returned with the armie to Sermidy, to ſuccour the baſtillion of Geniuola, afore the which the Pope had not onely ſent his bands that were in Romagna, but alſo had procured the Venetian fleete to approch at the ſame inſtant, which came thither with thirteene light galleys, and many other veſſels of meaner burthen: but he had no neceſſitie to paſſe any further. For whileſt the land-men incamped about it with very litle obedience and order, vpon a ſudden the Duke of Ferrara and the Lord of Chaſtillon iſſued out of Ferrara with the French ſouldiers, being more in number then were the enemies; the footmen paſſing downe along the riuer of Po, and the Captaines and horſemen by the ſhore, and being come vp as farre as the riuer of Santerno, they caſt the bridge which they had brought with them, and in a moment charged and confuſed the enemies, who, by reaſon of their diſorder, none making reſiſtance, ſauing three hundred Spaniſh footmen which guarded the artillerie, they betooke themſelues to flight, loſing their enſignes and artilleries, Guido Vaine, Brunalt de Furli, and Meleager his brother, chieftaines of the horſemen ſauing themſelues with great difficultie; by reaſon whereof the Venetian fleet retiring from thence to auoide the danger, hoiſed ſaile, and ſet themſelues at large in the riuer of Po.

The affaires of the warre proceeded thus diuerſly, not expreſſing any aſſured token whereby could be iudged what would be the iſſue of it. But the thoughts alſo of Princes were no leſſe diuers and incertaine, ſpecially thoſe of Ceſar, who contrary to all expectation, determined to ſend the Biſhop of Gurci to Mantua to negociate a peace. We haue ſhewed before, that by the working of the Biſhop of Gurci, it was reſolued betweene Cæſar and the French King, to make ſtrong warre vpon the Venetians in the Spring time; and to call a Councell, if the Pope conſented not to the obſeruation of the league of Cambray: whereunto Cæſar being much inclined, had ſince the returning of the Biſhop of Gurci, ſent to all the Prelates of his patrimoniall eſtates, to debate in what maner and in what place the Councell ſhould be celebrated. But as he was by nature variable and inconſtant, and an enemie to the greatneſſe of the French, he liſtened afterwards to the perſwaſions of the King of Aragon, who conſidering that the vnitie of Cæſar with the French King, and the embaſing of the Venetians by their common armies, and likewiſe the ruine of the Pope by meanes of the Councell, would be a cauſe of too great increaſe of the French Kings greatneſſe, he laboured to perſwade him, that an vniuerſall peace would be more profitable for him, ſith thereby he ſhould obtaine either the whole or the greateſt part of thoſe peeces which the Venetians vſurped vpon him: and he aduiſed him to ſend to this effect, ſome notable perſonage to Mantua with full power, and to procure the French King to do the like: that for his part he would ſend thither, and that by this meanes the Pope could not refuſe to ioyne in the action, nor go againſt the will of ſo many Princes: vpon whoſe reſolution the deliberations of the Venetians depending, (for not being able to ſtand alone, they were conſtrained to follow his authoritie) there was great hope that Cæſar without difficultie, without armes, and without increaſing the reputation and might of the French King, ſhould to his perpetuall praiſe, reobtaine his eſtate, together with an vniuerſall peace: and though it ſhould not come ſo to paſſe, as in all reaſon it muſt, yet he ſhould not be depriued of the meanes to moue the warre at the time appointed, and with the ſame commodities. But that he being chiefe of all Chriſtian Princes, and protector of the Church, his iuſtifications would be the more augmented, and by ſuch a counſell his glorie would be much exalted, for that it would plainly appeare to euery one, that he had ſought principally the peace and vnitie of Chriſtians, but that the obſtinacie and wicked practiſes of others had conſtrained him to make warre. Theſe reaſons alledged by the King Catholike, were right acceptable to Cæſar, who at the ſame inſtant addreſſed letters to the Pope and to the French King: To the Pope, that he had determined to ſend the Biſhop of Gurci into Italy, for that (as appertained to a Prince religious, and by the Imperiall dignitie being protector of the Church, and chiefe of all the Chriſtian Princes) he was reſolued in all that he might, to procure the tranquillitie of the ſea Apoſtolike, and the peace of Chriſtendome: and to ſummon him (as was fit for the true Vicar of Chriſt) to proceed with the ſame intention, leſt neglecting the dutie of a Pope, he ſhould be conſtrained to prouide remedies neceſſary for the peace of Chriſtendome: That he thought it not fit to depriue the Cardinals that were abſent, of their dignitie, for that being abſent not to any euill end, nor for any hatred they bare to him, they deſerued not ſo great a puniſhment: and that the depriuation of Cardinals belonged not to the Pope onely: He told him beſides, that it was a matter very baſe and vnprofitable, in ſo great troubles, to create new Cardinals, ſpecially ſince it was forbidden by the capitulations which the Cardinals made with him when he was elected Pope: He deſired him to reſerue that matter to a time of better tranquillitie, when he ſhould haue no neceſſitie or cauſe to preferre to ſo great dignities any but perſons wel approued for their diſcretiõ, doctrine, and good life. To the French King he wrote, that knowing he had bene by his vertuous diſpoſition alwayes inclined to embrace a good and aſſured peace, he was reſolued to ſend to Mantua the Biſhop of Gurci to ſolicite a peace vniuerſall, whereunto he beleeued (and vpon no light foundations) that the Pope (whoſe authoritie the Venetians were conſtrained to follow) would readily incline, and that the Embaſſadours of the King of Aragon had promiſed to do the like: That therefore he deſired him to ſend thither likewiſe his Embaſſadours, with full power: That when they were all aſſembled, the Biſhop of Gurci ſhould intreate the Pope to do the like; whereunto if he made refuſall, the Biſhop ſhould denounce the Councell in the names of them all, and ſhould giue order, that to make their proceedings more iuſtifiable, and to put end to all controuerſies, the Biſhop of Gurci ſhould heare the reaſons of euery one; but in all accidents, that he ſhould hold this for certaine, neuer to make any agreement with the Venetians, vnleſſe the controuerſies which he had with the Pope were reſolued at the ſame time. This ſolicitation pleaſed well the Pope, not for any deſire he had to peace and concord, but for that perſwading himſelfe that he could diſpoſe the Senate of Venice to compound with Cæſar, he hoped that Cæſar being freed by this meanes from any neceſſitie to remaine vnited with the French King, he would ſeparate himſelfe from him, which might eaſily cauſe a confederation of many Princes againſt him. But the French King was not a litle diſcontented with ſuch an vnexpected deliberation, for that not hoping that an vniuerſall peace would proceed thereof, he iudged that the leaſt euill that might happen, would be a protracting and delaying of the execution of thoſe things which he had agreed with Ceſar, and feared that the Pope, promiſing to helpe Ceſar, to reconquer the Duchie of Millan, and to indue the Biſhop of Gurci with the dignitie of Cardinall and other eccleſiaſticall dignities, would alienate him from him; or at leaſt, being the worker of the compoſition with the Venetians to the aduantage of Ceſar, he might be conſtrained to accept the peace with diſhonorable conditions. And his ſuſpition was increaſed for that Ceſar was newly confedered with the Swiſſers, notwithſtanding for defence onely. Beſides, he perſwaded himſelfe that the King Catholike had bene the author of this new counſell, of whoſe intention he doubted much for many reaſons: for he was not ignorant that his Embaſſadour reſident with Ceſar, made open trauell and ſolicitation to eſtabliſh an accord betweene Ceſar and the Venetians. He beleeued that he gaue ſecret encouragement to the Pope, in whoſe army his companies and bands of ſouldiers had remained a longer time then he was bound vnto by the capitulations of the inueſtiture of the kingdome of Naples. He was not ignorant that to giue impediment to his actions, he oppoſed manifeſtly againſt the conuocation of the Councell, and vnder colour of honeſtie he blamed apparently, that with weapon in hand, and in a time when Italy burned with an vniuerſall fire of warre, there ſhould be ſuch negociation of a matter, which without the concord and conſent of all Princes, could not bring forth but fruites full of venime and infection: and he was aduertiſed that he prepared an army by ſea, with the which, albeit he publiſhed, that he would paſſe in perſon into Afrike, yet it could not be perceiued, whether he leuied that force for other ends. But that which made him more ſuſpicious, was his ſmooth words, wherewith he deſired the King (as it were with a brotherly affection) to make peace with the Pope, forſaking (if otherwiſe it could not be wrought) ſome part of his owne rights, both, not to ſhew himſelfe a perſecuter of the Church, contrary to the ancient pietie of the houſe of France, and alſo not to turne him from the warre which he had determined to make vpon the Mores in Afrike for the exaltation of the name of Chriſt: and hereunto he added, that it had bene a perpetuall cuſtome among Chriſtian Princes, when they prepared armies againſt Infidels, to demand ſuccours of others in a cauſe ſo holy and honorable, but for his part, it ſufficed him not to be hindered, and he required no other aide of him, but that he would conſent that Italy might remaine in peace. Theſe words, notwithſtanding they were carried to the French King by his Embaſſadour, and pronounced very mildly by his owne mouth to the French Embaſſadour reſident with him, and that with great demonſtration of amitie; yet it ſeemed that they contained a ſecret proteſtation to take armes in fauour of the Pope: a matter which ſeemed not very likely to the King that he durſt do, vnleſſe he had hoped to be able to induce Ceſar to the ſame opinion. Theſe things troubled much the Kings mind, and filled him full of many ſuſpitions, fearing that to worke the peace by the meanes of the Biſhop of Gurci, would be a thing no leſſe vaine then preiudiciall vnto him; and yet, not to ſtirre vp Ceſar, he determined to ſend to Mantua the Biſhop of Paris, a Prelate of great authoritie, and learned in the lawes. At this time the King ſignified to John Iaques Triuulce, who remaining at Sermidi, for the better commoditie of lodging and victuals, had diſperſed his army into many places thereabout, that it was his will that the warre ſhould be adminiſtred by him, with this limitation, that expecting the coming of the Biſhop of Gurci, he ſhould abſtaine from all action againſt the ſtate Eccleſiaſtike, the vnaccuſtomed hardneſſe of the ſeaſon being alſo againſt it, by reaſon whereof it was impoſſible to incampe in the field, notwithſtanding the moneth of March was now begun. Therefore Triuulce, by reaſon he had no occaſion to attempt any other enterpriſe, and for that he was in places ſo very neare, determined to deuiſe how he might offend the army of the enemies, who being diſperſed abroad when Monſieur Chaumont returned from Sermidi to Carpi, moſt part of their footmen were lodged at Bondin, and the horſemen in Finale and the bordering townes. But as ſoone as he had receiued his commiſſion from the King, he marched the day after to Stellato, and the day following ſomewhat further, where he beſtowed the army abroad in the villages thereabouts, and raiſed a bridge of boates vpon the riuer of Po betweene Stellato and Ficuerolla, hauing giuen direction to the Duke of Ferrara to make another a mile lower, at the place which is called the Point, vpon that branch of Po which goeth to Ferrara, and that he ſhould march with the artillery to the Hoſpitall, which is a place of Poleſina de Ferrara right ouer againſt Bondin. In this meane while Triuulce was aduertiſed by his eſpials, that many troupes of light horſemen of that part of the Venetian army which lay on the other ſide Po, were the next night to approch Mirandola to dreſſe there ſome ambuſh: therefore he ſent out ſecretly many horſemen, who being come vp to Belair, a plaine houſe in the countrey of Mirandola, found within it Leonard of Naples, a Captaine of the Venetian light horſemen, a man of great place and reputation in the armie: who nothing doubting that the enemy would deſcend ſo farre, was withdrawne thither onely with fiftie horſe, and expected there a greater ſtrength that was to follow; but being taken at vnawares, as he ſtood vpon his defence, he was ſlaine with many of his company. Alphonſo d'Eſte came to the Hoſpitall according to his direction, and the night following he began to employ his artillery againſt Bondin: and at the ſame time, Triuulce ſent Guaſton Lord of Foix, the Kings ſiſters ſon, being very yong, and come to the army the yeare before, to run vp euen to the barres of the enemies campe, with an hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen, and fiue hundred footmen, with whom he put to flight fiue hundred footmen appointed to guard that front of the campe: by reaſon whereof, all the reſidue leauing Bondin vnder good guard, retired into places of ſtrength on the other ſide the Channell. But not one of the plots of Triuulce ſucceeded according to his expectation, for the artillery planted againſt Bondin (Po being betweene) made litle exploit, for the diſtance of the place, but much more for that the riuer being ſwelled, and part of the banke cut off by them of Bondin, it ſo drowned the countrey, that there was no poſſibilitie of paſſage from the front of the French campe to Bondin but vpon barks: in ſo much as deſpairing eſtſoons to vſe the commoditie of that way to diſtreſſe the lodging of the enemies, he called from Verona two thouſand Lanceknights, and gaue direction to leuie three thouſand Griſons, to the end to draw neare them by the wayes of Saint Felix, in caſe the peace proceeded not by the working of the Biſhop of Gurci, whoſe coming had bene ſomewhat the more ſlow, for that at Sale vpon the lake of Garde, he had in vaine expected anſwer from the Pope, whom he had prayed by letters to ſend Embaſſadours to negociate.

At laſt he came to Mantua, accompanied with Dom Peter de Vree, who was ordinarily reſident with Ceſar for the King of Aragon: and not many dayes after arriued there the Biſhop of Paris; the French King (who to be more neare the ſolicitations of peace, and the better to furniſh his prouiſions for the warre, was now come to Lyon) perſwading himſelfe that the Pope would likewiſe ſend thither. But the Pope made inſtance to haue the Biſhop of Gurci to come to him: not ſo much for that he thought it moſt agreeable to the Pontificall dignitie, as for that he hoped, that in loding him with honors, and winning him with many promiſes, ioyned to the efficacie and authoritie of his preſence, he might range him and make him conformable to his will, now more eſtranged then euer from peace and agreement; wherein to make the labour more eaſie, and the ſucceſſe agreeable to his deſire, he ſolicited Hierome Vich, which was of Valence, and Embaſſadour reſident for the King Catholicke, to go on his behalfe to the Biſhop of Gurci. The Biſhop of Gurci refuſed not to go to the Pope, but ſaid, that that was firſt required of him, that was to be done afterwards, affirming that the difficulties would be more eaſily diſſolued and decided, if the negociation were firſt managed at Mantua, with intention to go afterwards to the Pope with matters well digeſted, and almoſt reſolued: and that he was bound ſo to do, no leſſe for neceſſitie then in regard of facilitie: for how could it be conuenient for him to leaue the Biſhop of Paris alone, whom the French King had ſent to Mantua at the inſtance of Ceſar? and with what hope could he debate the affaires of his King? and how could he require him to go with him to the Pope, ſeeing it was neither anſwerable to his commiſſion, nor correſpondent to the dignitie of his King, to go to the houſe of his enemy, afore their controuerſies were accorded, or at the very point of agreement? Of the contrary, the two Embaſſadours of Aragon, declared that the whole hope of peace-making, depended vpon the agreement and compoſing of the affaires of Ferrara, foraſmuch as that being done, no more cauſe remaining now to the Pope to ſuſtaine the Venetians, they ſhould be conſtrained to yeeld to peace with ſuch laws and conditions as Ceſar would: That the Pope pretended that the ſea Apoſtolike had great and ſtrong rights ouer the citie of Ferrara, and did alſo eſteeme Alphonſo to haue vſed towards him a great ingratitude, and had done him many iniuries: That to qualifie the rigour of his mind, which was now full of diſpleaſure, it was more conuenient that the vaſſall ſhould implore the

clemencie of his Lord, then to diſpute of his iuſtice: That for this reaſon it was not onely honeſt, but neceſſary, to go to him, in which iuſt humilitie and ſubmiſſion they doubted not but he ſhould diminiſh a great part of his rigour: That they thought it not fit that that diligence, induſtry & authoritie which ought to be employed to diſpoſe the Pope to peace, ſhould be conſumed in perſwading him to ſend any one. They added with very ſweet words, that matters could not be diſputed, nor the controuerſies ended, vnleſſe all the parties were preſent: and that within Mantua was but one part onely, for that Ceſar, the French King, and the King Catholicke, were in ſuch vnitie of leagues, parentages and amities, that in this action they were to be reputed as brethren, and that the intereſts of euery one of them was common to them all. At laſt the Biſhop of Gurci conſented, purpoſing that the Biſhop of Paris ſhould expect at Parma what would be the ſucceſſe of his voyage. In the meane while the Pope notwithſtanding all ſolicitation made appertaining to the peace, had not altered his thoughts from the warre: for he attempted againe to ſurpriſe the baſtillion of Geminola, hauing committed the charge of that enterpriſe to Iohn Vitelli. But by reaſon of bad paiments, the number of footmen was far inferiour to his appointment, and all the countrey thereabouts being ouerflowed, as well by the plentie of raines that fell, as for that thoſe that were in the baſtillion had broken downe the banks of the riuer of Po, there was nothing aduanced. Beſides, Alphonſo d'Eſte was the ſtronger by water, who, with an armie of galleys and brigantines, ſo charged the Venetian fleete neare S. Albert, that what with the fury of that encounter, and with the feare of another fleete of leſſer veſſels which they diſcerned ſailing from Comacho, they retired to the port of Rauenna with the loſſe of two foiſts, three barbots, and more then fortie ſmaller veſſels: by reaſon whereof the Pope being diſappointed of his hope to be able to take the baſtillion, ſent thoſe companies to the camp which lodged at Finale, very much weakned of footmen, for that the pay was ſo ſmall. About this time the Pope cteated eight Cardinals, partly to reconcile vnto him the minds of Princes, and partly to arme him againſt the threatnings of the Councell: and thoſe which he created were Prelates learned and experienced, and ſuch as in the Court of Rome were of great authoritie, and of whom he was well aſſured. Of this number was the Archbiſhop of Yorke Embaſſadour for the King of England, and the Biſhop of Sion; the one as a man of importance to ſtirre vp the Swiſſers, and the other at the requeſt of his King, whom he had great hope to ſtirre vp againſt the French. And to giue to the Biſhop of Gurci, an earneſt penie almoſt certaine of the ſame dignitie, and with that hope to make him the more tractable to his deſire, he reſerued to himſelfe, with the conſent of the Conſiſtory, power to name another, ſuch a one as he ſhould thinke fit. But after he vnderſtood that the Biſhop of Gurci had conſented to come to him, he determined to do him great honour; and ſuppoſing he could not do him greater credite, then to go meete him in his owne perſon, and to honor him the more, to receiue him in a ſtately Citie, he went from Rauenna to Bologna, where the Biſhop of Gurci arriued three dayes after, where he was receiued with ſo great pompe, as hardly could any more haue bene done to a King: and the Biſhop alſo for his part expreſſed no leſſe ſtate and magnificence, for that deſcending into Italy with the title of Ceſars Lieutenant, he came accompanied with a very great traine of Citizens, Lords and Gentlemen, all their bands and followers being ſumptuouſly apparelled. The Embaſſadour of Venice reſident with the Pope, came to meet him at the gate of the towne, making ſignes of very great ſubmiſſion: but he turning himſelfe towards the Embaſſadour, with wonderfull pride and arrogancie, as well in his geſtures as in his words, ſhewed himſelfe not a litle diſcontented, that he that repreſented the enemies of Ceſar, could vſe ſuch boldneſſe as to come in his preſence. With this pompe he went vp to the publike Conſiſtory, where the Pope attended him with all the Cardinals; and there he expreſſed in ſhort, but very proud words, that Ceſar had ſent him into Italy, in a deſire to obtaine that that appertained to him, more by the way of peace then by warre: yet there could be no peace, if the Venetians did not reſtore vnto him all that belonged to him in any ſort whatſoeuer. After he had declared thus much in publike audience, he deliuered no leſſe in priuate to the Pope, with the ſame haughtineſſe: and the day following he accompanied theſe propoſitions and demonſtrations with actions no leſſe proud and arrogant. For the Pope hauing by his conſent appointed three Cardinals to negociate with him, to wit, the Cardinall S. George, Cardinall Regina, and the Cardinall de Meditis, who attended him at the houre aſſigned to meet together: he ſent three of his Gentlemen to negociate with them, excuſing himſelfe to haue other buſineſſe, (holding it a matter of great indignitie to debate with any other then the Pope:) which indignitie with many others the Pope ſwallowed ſecretly, the incredible hatred which he bare to the French, ſurmounting the diſpoſition of his nature. But in the accord betweene Cæſar and the Venetians, which began firſt to be drawne into diſputation, there were many difficulties. For albeit the Biſhop of Gurci who in the beginning had demanded all the townes, conſented in the end that Padua and Treuiſa ſhould remaine to them with all their countrey and appertenances, yet he ſtucke to haue them giue to Cæſar in recompence a very great quantitie of money, and that they ſhould hold them of him in chiefe, and reſigne to him the rights of the other townes. Matters which the Senate of Venice would neuer agree vnto; where it was vniuerſally concluded, that it was better for their Commonweale, hauing already ſo fortified Padua and Treuiſa that they ſerued not to loſe them, to preſerue and keepe their money, for that if euer that tempeſt paſſed ouer, there might fall out ſome occaſion to recouer eaſily all the reſidue of their dominion. On the other ſide, the Pope nouriſhed an importunate deſire to haue them agreed with Cæſar, hoping to make that an occaſion to eſtrange him from the French King: in which regard he preſſed them partly by requeſts, and partly by threats, to accept the conditions that were offered them. But his authoritie was no more ſo great with them, not onely for that they were not ignorant whence proceeded ſo great a deſire, but alſo knowing how neceſſary their company was for him if he were not reconciled with the French King, they aſſured themſelues that he would neuer abandon them. Neuertheleſſe, after they had diſputed many dayes, the Biſhop of Gurci abating ſomewhat the hard conditions which he propoſed, and the Venetians yeelding more to the vehement inſtance of the Pope then they had determined, and alſo the Embaſſadours of the King of Aragon interpoſing in all actions, it ſeemed they came at laſt to accord, the Venetians (the better to retaine Padua and Treuiſa by the conſent of Cæſar) paying huge ſummes of money, but referred to long termes. There reſted onely a meanes to reconcile the Pope and the French King, betweene whom appeared no other difference then for the quarrels of the Duke of Ferrara: and to reſolue them with the reſidue of the controuerſies (for without that Cæſar was determined to eſtabliſh nothing) the Biſhop of Gurci went to ſpeake with the Pope (to whom he went but ſeldome) being perſwaded by the hopes which the Cardinall of Pauie and the Catholicke Kings Embaſſadours had put him in, that it would very eaſily be done: and on the other ſide, he knew that the French King hauing leſſe regard to dignitie then to tranquility, was diſpoſed to conſent to many things, which bare no litle preiudice to the Duke of Ferrara. But the Pope on the contrary, cutting him off at the firſt, began to exhort him, that agreeing with the Venetians, he ſhould leaue at libertie the matters of Ferrara, ſeeming to be ſorie that Cæſar knew not the occaſion that was offered, to be reuenged with the forces and money of another, of ſo many great iniuries done againſt him by the French: and that he tarried to be intreated in a matter wherein reaſonably he ſhould beſeech others with great inſtance. To which things when the Biſhop of Gurci had replied with many reaſons, ſeeing he could not turne him from his opinion, he told him he would depart without giuing other perfection to the peace with the Venetians: and hauing kiſſed his feete, according to the cuſtome, he departed the ſame day (being the fifteenth after his arriuall at Bologna) to Modena, the Pope ſending after him in vaine to call him againe, as ſoone as he was departed out of the Citie. From Modena he tooke his way towards Millan, complaining of the Pope for many things, but ſpecially for that whileſt by his coming into Italy there was almoſt a generall ſurceaſſing frõ armes, the Pope had ſent ſecretly the Biſhop of Vintemille, ſonne to the late Cardinall Fregoſa, to trouble the ſtate of Genes: whereof the French men being aduertiſed, they tooke him in the countrey of Montferrat, all diſguiſed and vnknowne as he was, and from thence caried him to Millan, where he fully manifeſted the cauſe of his going, and the whole enterpriſe. When the Biſhop of Gurci departed from Bologna, he required the Embaſſadours of Aragon (ſeeming not a litle diſcontented with the Popes obſtinacie) to ſee returned to the Realme of Naples the three hundred Spaniſh Lances: whereunto they condeſcended readily: a matter which made men maruell the more, that at the ſame time when the generall Councell was in negociation, with expectation that the armies of France and Germanie accompanied with the preſence of their Princes, ſhould be moſt mightie in Italy; the Pope, beſides the ill will of the French King, ſeparated Cæſar from him, and ſtood depriued of the ſuccours of the King Catholike. Some doubted that in this action (as almoſt in all others) the counſels of the King of Aragon were different from his demonſtrations, and that his Embaſſadours had practiſed one thing in publike, and another thing in ſecret with the Pope: for that hauing prouoked the French King by new offences, and in the ſame giuen a new memory to ancient wrongs, it ſeemed he feared leſt the peace with all others would be the cauſe of great perils againſt him, the Venetians remaining weakned in eſtate, of money and reputation, and Ceſar no more mightie in Italy, and more variable and prodigall then euer. Others conſidering better of things, conceiued, that it might haply be, that the Pope was confident, what proteſtation ſoeuer the King Catholike made to abandon him, and though he ſhould reuoke his companies, that conſidering how much his embaſing might be preiudiciall to himſelfe, he would alwayes ſupport and defend him in his greateſt neceſſities.
